43021

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

Digitized by the Internet Archive
in 2013

http://archive.org/details/nation125julnewy

Index

The Nation

RUSSELL SAGE LIBRARY

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE
DRAMA, MUSIC, ART INDUSTRY

43024

FOUNDED 1865

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIB.

VOLUME CXXV

JULY 6, 1927, TO DECEMBER 28, 1927

THE NATION, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIB.

43024

INDEX TO VOLUME CXXV

JULY 6, 1927, TO DECEMBER 28, 1927

(Nos. 3235-3260)

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A Art
C Correspondence
Ct Cartoons
D Drama
Dt Driftway
E Editorial Article
EP Editorial Paragraph
I International Relations, Documents
IP International Relations, Foreign Press
IS International Relations, Signed Article
M Music
P Poetry
S Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

A

Abele, Trescott T.
Farmers and Pullman porters; C..... 513
Adams, John Haslup. Obituary; EP..... 465
Adams, Mildred
Ruth Hanna McCormick; S..... 449
Adams, Thomas L.; EP..... 124
Advertising
Honesty in advertising. R. Fuller; S..... 202
Adler, Lawrence
Korngold's "Violanta"; M..... 664
Adler, Mortimer J.
The outlining of knowledge; S..... 380
Advertising
Modern advertising methods; EP..... 351
Selling Jesus; E..... 725
Aeronautics
Byrd's effort to reach Paris; EP..... 29
Fights and flights in the newspapers. S. Bent; S..... 473
Loss of Spirit of Dallas; EP..... 189
Mob-murdered aviators; E..... 276
Still far from transatlantic air service; EP 189
Well, then, a short cheer; E..... 442
Africa
Is Africa going white, black, or brown? W. D. Hubbard; S..... 249
Agriculture
Business men's commission on agriculture; E..... 590
The tariff, agriculture, and the president; E..... 590
Alabama
Alabama's super government. C. N. Feidelson; S..... 311
Attorney general McCall's good work in fight with Ku Klux Klan; EP..... 668
Floggings not to go unpunished; EP..... 439
Grand-jury report on kidnapping and flogging of citizens; EP..... 218
A la carte. Rosalie Stewart; D..... 295
Albania
Martial rumblings in the Balkans; EP.... 616
Aldington, Richard
Pedants on pedestals; C..... 87
Alekhine, Alexander..... 674
Allen, Devere
Andrew Carnegie said; C..... 339
Allen, Florence E.
Florence E. Allen. E. N. Blair; S..... 628
Allen, Robert S.
The Northwest stands pat; S..... 104
American association for old-age security
Christmas in old age. E. Gilman; C..... 736
American bar association
The social bar. L. G. Brooks; C..... 87
What is a bar association? L. P. Miller; C..... 684
American federation of labor
Grows increasingly cautious year after year; EP..... 438
Sets forth terrible conditions in coal industry; EP..... 588
American legion
Hamilton Fish, jr.'s, resolution submitted at Paris convention; EP..... 299
Have we forgotten Centralia? J. A. Gahan; C..... 544
Holiday in Paris; EP..... 299
Is the American legion liberal? J. D. Kenderdine, A. B. Lewis, F. Bailey, J. B. Milgram; C..... 313
Is this America? I. Treat; S..... 421
The reactionary Edward E. Spafford elected head of organization; EP..... 323
The real American legion. S. Cook; S.... 224
Americans we like
Alexander Meiklejohn. L. Price; S..... 541
Daniel Willard: a selfish man. D. Kirkley; S..... 307
Florence E. Allen. E. N. Blair; S..... 628
Georgia O'Keeffe. F. O'Brien; S..... 361
Justice Brandeis: apostle of freedom. N. Hapgood; S..... 330
Mr. Babbitt, meet Sinclair Lewis. W. McNally; S..... 278
Norris of Nebraska. F. Babcock; S..... 705
Ruth Hanna McCormick. M. Adams; S. 449
Ames, Frank Chaloner
Honor is a tradition of the sea; S..... 37
Amoskeag manufacturing company
Reduces wages 10 per cent, to go in effect December 24; EP..... 721
Anderson, Charles
Life at Elbow Lake Lookout; Dt..... 86
Anderson, Paul Y.
Time out for corruption!; S..... 566
Andrews, John B.
Rock dusting in mines; C..... 255
And so to bed; D..... 612
An enemy of the people. H. Ibsen; D..... 430
Anna
Taken from colored foster parents but later restored to them; EP.....219, 273
Anthony, Beatrice O.; E..... 241
Anti-Semitism
Henry Ford's anti-Semitism; EP..... 47
Students in Rumania attack Jewish comrades; EP..... 722
Anthropology
Is Africa going white, black, or brown? W. D. Hubbard; S..... 249
Arc, Joan of; EP..... 124
Archaeology
Agora of Athens on way to sunlight; EP 465
The Glozel war; E..... 591
Where Genghis died; E..... 493
Architecture
Guy Lowell. T. F. Hamlin; S..... 178
Armenian massacres; Dt..... 338
Armour packing company
The Armours betray the farmers. F. Boselly; S..... 196
Art
Composograph of the dance. K. Niles, A. Niles; S..... 552
Jacob Epstein. R. Lee; S..... 716
Modern art in Palestine. F. O'Brien; S. 484
Puzzling questions raised by Brancusi's The bird; EP..... 465
Return to America of the sculptor, Jacob Epstein; EP..... 411
The inoffensive art; E..... 496
Artibonite valley (Haiti) concession to William A. Rodenberg; E..... 51
Artzybasheff, Mikhail Petrovich
Lovers and enemies. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 407
Asia
America and Asia outstrip Europe; E.... 4
Asquith, Herbert Henry
Stricken with "physical immobility"; EP. 95
Atheism
Pious unbelief; E..... 328
Atkinson, Navarre
Publishes sensational report of uprising in the Ukraine in Times; EP..... 669
Austin, Mary
Boulder dam and Arizona culture; C.... 737
The Colorado river controversy; S..... 510
The forward turn; S..... 57
Australia
Price-fixing in Queensland. M. A. Hallgren; IS..... 140
The Australian labor situation. C. H. Grattan; IS..... 432
Austria
Austria wavers toward reaction. G. E. R. Gedye; S..... 474
July insurrection in Vienna; EP..... 75
The Viennese shambles. G. E. R. Gedye; S..... 128

B

Babcock, Frederic
Norris of Nebraska; S..... 705
Baby cyclone. G. M. Cohan; D..... 320
Background, cashing in on; Dt..... 132
Bagley, Commander
Censors dispatches sent to Lindbergh on the Memphis; EP..... 2
Bailey, Forrest
Is the American legion liberal?; C..... 313
Baldwin, Roger N.
Liberty under the soviets; S..... 505
"Liberty under the soviets"; C..... 634
Baldwin, Roger N..... 565
Ballinger, "The bondage of Ballinger"; C.... 111
Bankers
Obtain hold in Nicaragua; E..... 98
Barnhill, John Basil
Justice in hell; C..... 513
Barrows, D. P.
The new pacifism. P. Guldbrandsen; C.. 602
Barry, Philip
John. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 582
Baruch, Bernard
Doubts Germany's ability to meet demands of Dawes plan; EP..... 237
Basshe, Em Jo
The centuries. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 718
Beal, Fred E.
Brutal treatment by police during Sacco-Vanzetti funeral; EP..... 239
Beard, Charles A.
Agriculture in the nation's economy; S.. 150
Beauchamp, Earl
The necessity of free trade; IS..... 24
Beck, Adolf; E.....275, 620
Behold this dreamer; D..... 554
Belgium
Quarrel over inscription on restored Louvain library; EP..... 409
Belloc, Hilaire
Warrior Wells and battling Belloc; E.... 194
Belt; D..... 554
Bent, Silas
Fights and flights in the newspapers; S. 473
Reparations for robbers; C..... 543
Bigelow, F. H.
Is Boston reforming?; C..... 603
Birnbaum, Silas J.
Should music teachers be licensed?; C.... 160
Bitterbaum, Chas.
Hail, Heywood Broun; C..... 287
Black, Ruby A.
"Al" Smith in Texas; S..... 14
Blacksmith—his importance; Dt..... 286
Blackwell, Alice Stone
Sissified sex literature; C..... 63
Blair, Emily Newell
Florence E. Allen; S..... 628
Blake, Aldrich
Oklahoma goes Rosicrucian; S..... 246
Blake, William
William Blake, 1827-1927; E..... 221
Blankenhorn, Heber
Labor's league of nations explodes; IS.. 460
Blood money. G. Middleton; D..... 295
Bogan, Louise
Late; P..... 230
Tears in sleep; P..... 230
Bondage. L. Knight; C..... 111
Book publishing
Have you a little MS? J. Smertenko; S. 108
Merger of Doran company with Doubleday, Page and company; EP..... 325
Borah, William Edgar
Invited to discuss prohibition in connection with constitution; E..... 466
Senator Borah scores again; E..... 562
Vacillating strain; EP..... 189
Borchard, Edwin M.
The citizen abroad; IS..... 365
Borders, Karl
A bit of Russian patchwork; S..... 60
Borghi, Armando; EP..... 124
Borough, Rube
Law and order in Los Angeles; S..... 12
Bosch Magneto
The Bosch Magneto case comes to court. P. Musgrave; C..... 677
Boselly, Frederick
The Armours betray the farmers; S..... 196
The role of the farm bureau federation; C. 314
Boswell, James
Important literary remains brought to light; EP..... 325
Boulder canyon project
Boulder dam and Arizona culture. P. M. Entenman, M. Austin; S.....736, 737
Colorado river controversy. M. Austin; S.. 510
Boyden, Aug. J.
A note of discord; C..... 228
Brace, Charles Loring; EP..... 697
Brailsford, Henry Noel
Welcome to the United States; EP..... 723
Brancusi, Constantin; EP..... 465
Bratianu, Jon
Obituary; EP..... 617
Rumania free from the lion's paw. G. E. R. Gedye; S..... 732
Brenner, Anita
Weeping the bone; S..... 540
Brigham, Johnson
Why Harlan dismissed Walt Whitman; C. 685
Bristol, Mark L.
Admiral Bristol, LL.D. E. H. Fisk; C.. 64
Transference from Turkey to command of Asiatic fleet; EP..... 3
Brittany and Quimperle; Dt..... 313
Britton, Nan..... 329

Broccoli become fashionable; Dt..... 478
Bromfield, Louis
House of women. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 458
Brooks, Lawrence G.
The social bar; C..... 87
Brotherhood of sleeping car porters
Continues fight for honest wages; EP.... 272
Broun, Heywood
Appointed contributing editor of Nation; EP..... 217
Hail, Heywood Broun. C. Bitterbaum; C. 287
Broun, Heywood
It seems to Heywood Broun....243, 277, 305, 329, 358, 416, 444, 469, 498, 536, 565, 594, 622, 674, 702, 728
A little biology is a dangerous thing..... 536
Bright side of drinking..... 358
Concerning football..... 594
Damn Santa Claus..... 728
Defeat at chess of Capablanca by Alekhine 674
Dominating saintliness of women..... 469
Gene Tunney and Upton Sinclair on pessimism..... 622
Insulting the Irish..... 444
Mencken on the artistic achievement of the Negro..... 416
Muckraker tactics; S..... 375
Prize-fighting and prize-fighters..... 305
Resolutions on turning thirty-nine..... 702
Roger Baldwin on soviet Russia..... 565
Roy L. Gray, an average man..... 498
"The President's Daughter"..... 329
"The Problem of Thor Bridge"..... 277
There is no deadline for truth..... 243
Brown, W. Norman
A Buddhist source for Christian legend?; C..... 339
Browne, Herbert Janvrin
From the long-range weather prophet; C. 112
The wisdom of Herbert Brown; E..... 33
Budenz, Louis Francis
Indiana's anti-saloon league goes to jail; S. 177
Scandals of 1927—Indiana; S..... 332
There's mud on Indiana's white robes; S. 81
Buisson, Ferdinand; EP..... 697
Burlesque. G. M. Watters and A. Hopkins; D. 295
Burnet, Dana, and G. Abbott
Four walls. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 343
Burns, William J.
The history of William J. Burns; E..... 561
Burt, Struthers
Vrai bon?; C..... 288
Butler, Hilton
How "Al" Smith fared in Mississippi; S. 244
Butler, Nicholas Murray
Demands political candidates define their position; E..... 466
Byington, Steven T.
Teachers—and teachers; C..... 16
Bynner, Witter
With the gods; P..... 182
Byrd, Richard Evelyn; EP..... 29

C

C., A. S.
Sacco-Vanzetti; C..... 206
Calas, Jean
The case of Jean Calas. H. H. Horwitz; C..... 206
Calder, Margaret
To Chicago readers of The Nation; C.... 364
California
Controversy between San Francisco and Navy department; EP..... 76
Governor Young's pardon of Charlotte Anita Whitney; EP..... 49
Project of bridge across San Francisco bay; EP..... 76
Callizo, Jean
Cheating at solitaire; E..... 275
Calvert, E. Roy
Capital punishment in the twentieth century; E..... 240
Canada
Canada's jubilee. J. A. Stevens; S..... 13
Smuggled liquor does not all travel south; EP..... 272
Canossa
The truth about Canossa. H. C. Engelbrecht; C..... 160
Capablanca, José Raul..... 674
Capital punishment
A survival of barbarism; E..... 240
A twentieth amendment. M. Fruchter; C. 451
Capital punishment in Germany. M. Tucker; C..... 571
Executions: the new sport. E. Stevenson; S..... 676
Invoke against it general loathing for public executioner; EP..... 492
Warden Lawes thinks it worse than futile; EP..... 464
Capps, Edward
Given fund to proceed with excavations in Athens; EP..... 465
Carillo, Donato; EP..... 531
Carillo-Grecco case
A frame-up; EP..... 531
For Grecco and Carillo. N. Thomas; C.. 634
Carnegie, Andrew; C..... 339
Carpenter, George Albert; EP..... 437
Carr, Horace, and Nettie Burton
Issue Sacco-Vanzetti poster in Cleveland; EP..... 239
Cartoons
Apply tariff common sense to international sport. H. W. van Loon..... 357
Blow your own horn! H. van Loon..... 7
Building a new Russia. H. W. van Loon. 497
Galeries Lafayette, we are here! H. W. van Loon..... 415
Geneva. H. W. van Loon..... 101
In the presidential year. H. W. van Loon. 443
Loot. H. W. van Loon..... 621
Massachusetts. H. W. van Loon..... 223
Prosperity—1927. H. W. van Loon..... 673
Rhythms of the ages. H. W. van Loon.. 727
The angel of peace in modern dress. H. W. van Loon..... 701
The optimist. H. W. van Loon..... 564
The world does change—1077-1927. H. W. van Loon..... 80
Torture up to date. H. W. van Loon.... 195
What the European public wants. H. W. van Loon..... 593
Catt, Carrie Chapman
Defends Jane Addams and Florence Kelley against attack by D. A. R.; E..... 50
Censorship
Abolition of peace-time censorship urged by international press experts in Geneva; EP..... 238
Centuries. E. J. Basshe; D.....718
Charity organization society
Who are the poor? H. I. Fisk; C..... 685
Chase, Robert S.
What history says; C..... 227
Chemical foundation
A marvel of chemistry; E..... 669
Cheyney, Ralph, and Lucia Trent
Contemporary verse; C..... 113
Poets' last chance; C..... 254
Chez Columbia
Among the teachers; C..... 287
Chicago
Chicago's mayors. U. S. Schwartz; C.... 39
Three pure historians; EP..... 491
Child labor
Present state of and outlook for improvement; EP..... 411
Children
The plague of juveniles. R. Drucker; S... 545
What books shall my small child read? R. Hourwich; S..... 546
Children's aid society
Notable service of the Charles Loring Braces; EP..... 697
Chiang Kai-shek
The courtship of Chiang; E..... 355
China
Carrying on with normal supply of civil wars; EP..... 560
Chiang Kai-shek passes on; E..... 194
China—seen from Moscow. L. Fischer; IS. 613
China tests our religion. H. F. Ward; S. 283
Commendable style of C. C. Wu; EP..... 190
Fake pictures from China. F. Hough; C.. 478
Japanese troops reoccupy Shantung; EP.. 76
Madame Sun's withdrawal; IP..... 298
More Chinese atrocities. J. G. Sayre; S.. 129
Nationalists break off relations with soviet Russia; EP..... 722
Realignment of Chinese generals; EP..... 3
The white terror in China. S. Nearing; S..... 734
What is happening in China; E..... 441
What is happening in China's kuomintang. R. Cort; IS..... 636
Chinese seamen's institute
Acts in behalf of wronged Chinese seamen; E..... 99
Chiossone, Mario; EP..... 124
Christmas
"Holidays" here once more; EP..... 721
Christy, Howard Chandler; EP..... 589
Churchill, Winston
Explains how to reduce naval expenditure; E..... 33
Clapper, Raymond
Sinclair and Fall on trial; S..... 445
Clark, Edith
Trying to be modern; S..... 153
Cleanliness institute; Dt..... 16
Cleghorn, Sarah N.
Only dogs; C..... 513
Cleveland, Ohio
Like other cities, without machinery to feed unemployed; E..... 495
Clifford, Mrs. Della; EP..... 76
Coal industry
A challenge to Mr. Rockefeller. M. L. Ernst; S..... 733
Continuing unsettled conditions; EP..... 721
Terrible conditions set forth by A. F. L. president; EP..... 588
Cohan, G. M.
Baby cyclone. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 320
Cohen, Morris R.
Given testimonial dinner; EP..... 439
Colorado river conference
The Colorado river controversy. M. Austin; S..... 510
War in Colorado. F. L. Palmer; S..... 623
College students
Some students write well; E..... 6
Colleges
Begging for women's colleges; E..... 496
Even a college student has some rights; E. 241
Faculty dismissals; EP..... 239
If teaching is good, college is good; EP.. 533
West Virginia and College of the City of New York officially favor R.O.T.C.; EP. 589
Cook, Sylvanus
The real American legion; S..... 224
Coolidge, Calvin
Cowboys give cerise silk shirt; EP..... 49
Eulogizes the Mellons in Pittsburgh; EP.. 438
Gems from president's speech; EP..... 587
Is Coolidge coming or going?; E..... 148
Moves to clear up American foreign relations; EP..... 30
Oddly worded refusal to run again; EP.. 125
Praises Rear Admiral Bristol for services as high commissioner to Turkey; EP.. 3
Press disapproval of cowboy stunts; EP.. 95
Speaks on lost art of thinking; E..... 466
Tells country bedtime stories of industrial condition; EP..... 464
The language of the president; E..... 697
Time to make known naval policy; EP.. 169
Coolidge, John
Accompanied by secret-service man in college; EP..... 353
Cooper, Hugh L.; C..... 112
Crawford, Ruth
The anger of South America [re Sacco-Vanzetti]; S..... 334
Creative work; Dt..... 159
Crim, John W. H.
Testifies to graft and corruption in United States; EP..... 301
Crothers, Samuel McChord. Obituary; EP.... 589
Cuba
Impressive American delegation to attend sixth Pan-American conference; EP..... 532
Collins, Joseph
Half-confessed; S..... 10
Command to love. R. Lothar and F. Gottwald; D..... 407
Commerce
The movement of world wealth. S. Nearing; IS..... 234
Trade honesty a boast of western capitalism; EP..... 272
Competition for federal summer capital; Dt. 38
Connecticut Yankee; D..... 583
Coquette; D..... 582
Corning, Howard McKinley
Warm stone woman; P..... 88
Correction
"God's trombones." H. A. Potamkin; C. 133
Cort, Roy
What is happening in Chinese kuomintang; IS..... 636
Cory, Bill, typifying the west; Dt..... 255
Covering Washington. The Unofficial Spokesman..... 729
Coward, Noel
Fallen angels. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 718
The marquise. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 690
Cowling, Ellis
Compulsion at De Pauw; S..... 59
Cuckoschay, Joseph Paul; EP..... 96
Cuthbert, Clifton
Bookworm; P..... 480

D

D., H.
Hippolytus temporizes; B..... 382
Dabney, Thomas L.
A Negro looks at Sacco's America; C.... 287
Danziger, Samuel
Another view of Brandeis; C..... 513
Darrow, Clarence
Had Darrow been a journalist. One Who Is; S..... 131
Daudet, Leon; EP..... 29
Davenport, Frances Gardner. Obituary; EP.. 589
Dawes, Charles Gates
Frank talk at opening of peace bridge connecting the United States and Canada; EP..... 143
Opinions as to equipment of diplomatic representatives; E..... 5
Dawes plan
Is Germany extravagant? F. Kuh; S..... 682
Parker Gilbert sends warning note to German government; EP..... 532
Trade relations between France and Germany favor modification; EP..... 238
Davis, E.
Ten per cent. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 344
Davis, James John
Calls conference to consider coal situation; EP..... 721
Day, Joseph B.
Massachusetts—there she stands; C..... 113
Dell, Floyd
Explaining (some) men; C..... 86
Dell, Robert
A year after Thoiry; S..... 282
Demonstrations
Some mass demonstrations [in Berlin, Vienna, Heiligenblut]. F. Kirchwey; S 337
Denton, Nixson
That six-cylindered airman; C..... 17

Deterding, Sir Henri; EP....126, 190
Dillon, John. Obituary; EP.... 170
Disarmament
Disarmament and the British Labor party. R. Smith; IS.... 584
From Geneva to Honolulu; E.... 78
The disgrace at Geneva; E.... 127
To disarm, disarm; E.... 99
Dobsevage, I. George
Modern saints; C.... 254
Dole, Charles F. Obituary; EP.... 617
Dombeys," "The gay; EP.... 125
Dooley, Henry W.
Honor in Languedoc; C.... 363
Dos Passos, John
An open letter to President Lowell; C.... 176
Dowd, Harrison
Diplomatic sonnet; P.... 248
Doyle, Conan.... 277
Dracula. B. Stoker; D.... 458
Drew, John
John Drew. Obituary; E.... 52
Drucker, Rebecca
The plague of juveniles; S.... 545
Drujilovski, Serge
A forger of soviet "documents." L. T.; IS 213
Dryden, John
The art of translation; E.... 563
Du Bois, W. E. Burghardt
The Hampton strike; S.... 471
Duncan, Isadora
Isadora Duncan is dead. M. Eastman; S. 309
Dunsany, Plunkett
If. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.... 554

E

E., G.
Have faith in Calvan T. Fullidge!; C.... 228
Eastman, Max
Isadora Duncan; P.... 309
Isadora Duncan is dead; S.... 309
Economic conference
Ineffectiveness of economic and other kinds of conferences; EP.... 48
Edgerton, Charles E.
California sterilization; C.... 16
Education
Are Rhodes scholars failures?; EP.... 49
Comment on new experimental college of University of Wisconsin; EP.... 171
Compulsion at De Pauw; S.... 59
Dismissal from Des Moines university of Norman MacDowell Grier; EP.... 76
Higher education in Chicago. L. Martin; S.... 538
Political science. W. Pater; C.... 634
Superior, Wisconsin, school situation once more normal; EP.... 272
Teachers—and teachers. S. T. Byington; C.... 16
The negligible graduate student; E.... 619
Education—Private vs. public schools
Private school teachers. J. M. Hayes; C. 64
Edward, Harry F. V.
Through sports to peace?; C.... 632
Eisenstein, Serge Mikhailovich
Mass movies; S.... 507
Elder, Ruth
Breaks down taciturnity of President Coolidge; EP.... 589
Ruth Elder's revolt. R. Owen; S.... 569
Elder, Ruth; S.... 473
Elder, Ruth; C.... 632
Elgin marbles; E.... 79
Eliot, Charles W.
President Eliot's letters. H. James; C.... 160
Eloesser, Arthur
German literature today; S.... 572
Elsworth, Louise A.
Sacco-Vanzetti; C.... 206
Enemy, The
An enemy worth having; E.... 535
Engelbrecht, H. C.
The truth about Canossa; C.... 160
Entenman, Paul M.
Boulder dam and Arizona culture; C.... 736
Epstein, Jacob
Enlightens a judge in a problem of art; EP.... 465
Returns after absence of twenty-eight years; EP.... 411
Ernst, Morris L.
A challenge to Mr. Rockefeller; S.... 733
Mr. Hughes and Michael Karolyi; C.... 479
Errata
A correction. G. L. Winslow; C.... 479
Escape. J. Galsworthy; D.... 553
Estcourt, R.
The American woman; C.... 229
Europe
America and Asia outstrip Europe; E.... 4
Spirit of Locarno hibernating; EP.... 492
Evans, Elizabeth Glendower; EP.... 219

F

Fadiman, Clifton P.
On contemporary American fiction; S.... 642
Fall-Sinclair case
Status of oil scandals litigation; EP.... 75
The history of William J. Burns; E.... 561
Time out for corruption! P. Y. Anderson; S.... 566
Fallen angels. N. Coward; D.... 718 Fame
Cheating to secure it; E.... 275
Famous Players-Lasky corporation
Ordered not to purchase or operate theaters for purpose of coercing exhibitors; EP.. 49
Fanatics; D.... 582
Farmers
Farmers and Pullman porters. T. T. Abele; C.... 513
The Armours betray the farmers. F. Boselly; S.... 196
The farmer's future. F. Wertgen; C.... 207
The role of the farm bureau federation. H. R. Kibler, F. Boselly; C.... 314
Fascism
Anti-fascist propaganda leads to persecution and deportation; EP.... 124
Fascist culture; IP.... 215
Murder by "persons unknown." G. Salvemini; S.... 34
The fascist state; IP.... 322
Feidelson, Charles N.
Alabama's super government; S.... 311
Ferril, Thomas Hornsby
Ocean; P.... 604
Fetzer, William R.
Talks to persons alleged to have created "disturbances"; EP.... 273
Field, Sara Bard
Quaker pagan; P.... 315
Finance—France
Seeking $100,000,000 loan from United States; EP.... 237
Finance—Germany
Difficulty in meeting reparations in fourth year of Dawes plan; EP.... 237
Finance—Great Britain
British finance and the Labor party. J. R. MacDonald; S.... 537
Finance—United States
Secretary Mellon fails in judging the money market; EP.... 30
The federal reserve fight. E. M. Friedmann; S.... 359
Finger, Charles J.
Sex literature continued; C.... 133
Fischer, Louis
China—seen from Moscow; IS.... 613
On the road to socialism; S.... 499
The passing of Trotzky; S.... 703
Fisher, Irving
Publishes figures indicating distribution of national income; EP.... 668
Fishermen's cup races; Dt.... 735
Fisk, E. H.
Admiral Bristol, LL.D.; C.... 64
Fisk, Helen I.
Who are the poor?; C.... 685
Five o'clock girl; D.... 458
Fletcher, John Gould; EP.... 31
Fletcher, John Gould
Second advent; P.... 646
The unfamiliar house; P.... 130
Flood
National flood control; E.... 467
Follen, Charles; EP.... 219
Ford, Henry
Hendrik van Loon and Rosika Schwimmer. H. W. van Loon; C.... 571
How explain his anti-Semitism; EP.... 47
"Strut, Miss Lizzie!"; E.... 672
The king is dead. M. Marshall; S.... 678
Fosdick, Harry Emerson; EP.... 31
Foss, Horatio G.; Dt.... 570
Foster, L. H.
School wants old Nations; C.... 160
Four walls. D. Burnet and G. Abbott; D.... 343
Fox, R. M.
Free state and republican Ireland; IS.... 186
France
Franco-German trade treaty; EP.... 190
French literature today. L. Lewisohn; S. 572
Is this America? I. Treat; S.... 421
Marc Sangnier heads Italian refugees relief committee; EP.... 272
Offends American manufacturers by high-tariff legislation; EP.... 271
Prison escapes of MM. Daudet and Semard; EP.... 29
Restores American products to previous tariff rates; EP.... 491
The Catholic "renaissance" in France; S.. 55
The Glozel war; E.... 591
The perils of Paris. V. O'Sullivan; C.... 632
The tariff reckoning begins; E.... 302
Trial of Schwartzbard for murder of Petlura; EP.... 493
France—Finance. See Finance—France
Frank, Eva A.
The Mexican "just won't work"; S.... 155
Frankfurter, Felix; EP.... 219
Frazier, E. Franklin
The Negro in the industrial South; S.... 83
Free press
Fight for "open door" in news dissemination at Geneva; EP.... 170
Fit to print ["Venus and Adonis"]. M. C. Underwood; C.... 62
Imprisonment of Haitian editors by President Borno; E.... 51
Scarsdale prohibits sale of "hot dogs"; EP 124
Survivals of old-fashioned journalistic courage; EP.... 123
Friedman, Herbert J.
Charles Evans Hughes; C.... 543
Friedmann, Elisha M.
The federal reserve fight; S.... 359
Fruchter, Max
A twentieth amendment; C.... 451
Fuller, Alvan T.
A conference with Governor Fuller. A. G. Hays; S.... 285
Found no dissatisfaction with Americans in Europe on account of Sacco-Vanzetti execution; EP.... 695
Misquoted in report of a congressional speech; EP.... 410
Prejudice revealed in congressional speech; EP.... 143
Writing decision in Sacco-Vanzetti case; EP.... 123
Fuller, Raymond
Honesty in advertising; S.... 202
Fuller, Walter. Obituary; EP.... 353

G

Gahan, John A.
Have we forgotten Centralia?; C.... 544
Galsworthy, John
Escape. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.... 553
Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand
"Drain inspector's report" [Miss Mayo's "Mother India"]; IP.... 488
Gannett, Lewis S.
"Norris for president"; S.... 470
Garden of Eden. A. Hapgood; D.... 431
Garvan, Francis P.
Sneers at European competition in foreign markets; E.... 669
Gary, Elbert H.
Mr. Gary and his times; E.... 221
Obituary; EP.... 170
Gassner, John Waldhorn
To the impatient revolutionist; P.... 514
Gedye, G. E. R.
Austria wavers toward reaction; S.... 474
Rumania free from the lion's paw; S.... 732
The Viennese shambles; S.... 128
Genghis Khan
Where Genghis died; E.... 493
George, Stefan
Receives Goethe prize of 10,000 marks; EP 353
Georgia
Crusade against mob floggings in South; EP.... 218
Geography
Rediscovering the Pacific ocean. E. H. Hume; S.... 179
Germany
Capital punishment in Germany. M. Tucker; C.... 571
Formation of Liga miramundum; EP.... 191
Franco-German trade treaty; EP.... 190
German literature today. A. Eloesser; S. 573
Hindenburg has a birthday. D. Thompson; S.... 447
Is Germany extravagant? F. Kuh; S.... 682
Police discover plot to ruin soviet Russia; EP.... 588
Some mass demonstrations. F. Kirchwey; S. 337
Gilbert, Parker
Sends warning note to German government; EP.... 532
Third report as agent general of reparations an optimistic document; EP.... 723
Gilbert, William Schwenck, and Sir Arthur Sullivan
Mikado. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.... 344
Gilman, Elisabeth
Christmas in old age; C.... 736
Glass, Carter; EP.... 437
Gleason, James
The Shannons of Broadway. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.... 431
Glenny, P., and M. A. Hecht
Such is life. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 320
Glozel; E.... 591
Gluck, Alma
A letter from Mme Zimbalist; C.... 742
Glucklich, Vilma
Vilma Glucklich. R. Schwimmer; C.... 339
Golden, A. A.
That fifteenth amendment; C.... 630
Good Hope. H. Heijerman; D.... 485
Goodenough, Caroline L.
For president: Jane Addams; C.... 451
Grand Rapids, Michigan
Reading "Land of the Pilgrim's Pride" by high-school pupils leads to uproar in community; EP.... 411
Grattan, C. Hartley
The Australian labor situation; IS.... 432
Graves, Robert
Story of interview between T. E. Lawrence and King George; E.... 591
Gray, Roy L.... 498

Great Britain
British finance and the Labor party. J. R. MacDonald; S. 537
British trades union congress satisfies neither Baldwin nor Stalin; EP. 271
British women in politics. J. Stephen; S. 245
Criticized for hypocritical policies by minister to Egypt. J. M. Howell; EP. 48
Curzon weeps; E. 591
Disarmament and the Labor party. R. Smith; IS. 584
England's economic plight. J. A. Hobson; S. 567
Humanitarians appeal for support of Italian refugees; EP. 272
Lord Wemyss wants Declaration of Paris of 1856 denounced; EP. 559
128,770 British subjects sign Arthur Ponsonby's peace letter; EP. 695
Reform of House of Lords; EP. 1
Significance of Labor party gains; EP. 532
The Elgin marbles; E. 79
Women invade Oxford; EP. 1
Great Britain—Foreign policy
Britain's folly toward Russia. J. R. MacDonald; S. 102
Great Britain—India
The naivete of the English; E. 562
Great Britain—Navy
Cut in naval building program comes opportunely; EP. 587
Great Britain—Parliament
Parliament solemn and sober; EP. 49
Great Britain—Politics and government
England too bitter to compromise? F. Kirchwey; S. 103
Steady continuance of reactionary drift; EP. 144
The necessity of free trade. Earl Beauchamp; IS. 24
The uses of a king; EP. 29
Trade-unions bill passed third reading in Commons; EP. 1
Grecco, Calogero; EP. 531
Grecco-Carillo case
For Grecco and Carillo. N. Thomas; C. 634
Gregg, A. W.
Authors' royalties not "earned income"; E. 149
Green, William; EP. 615
Grier, Norman MacDowell; EP. 76
Grubb, W. I.
Hands down injunction against Journeymen stone cutters' association of North America; EP. 353
Gruening, Ernest H. 684, 710
Guldbrandsen, Peter
The new pacifism; C. 602
Gurley, Boyd; EP. 124

H

Haggin, B. H.
Music and its re-creation; M. 405
The tail wags the dog; M. 264
Haiti
A voice from a Haitian jail; IP. 168
Crushing Haiti. P. Thoby; C. 16
Injustices unchecked by United States; EP. 143
Poor Haiti!; E. 51
The press in Haiti. C. Martins; IS. 166
Haig, field marshal Douglas; EP. 30
Haines, Lynn
Sire of the Eagle; S. 730
Hall, John; EP. 96
Hallgren, Mauritz A.
Price-fixing in Queensland; IS. 140
The patriotic radio trust; S. 53
Hamblin, Chas. L.
From a native of the state; C. 254
Hamilton, Cosmo, and Frank C. Reilly
Pickwick. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 320
Hamlin, Talbot Faulkner
Guy Lowell. Obituary; S. 178
Hammond, John Hays
Deprecates uninformed vote; EP. 588
Hanson, Earl
Iceland and industry; S. 84
Hapgood, Norman
A hero of the Jews; S. 645
Brandeis, Holmes, Sacco, and Vanzetti; C. 424
Justice Brandeis: apostle of freedom; S. 330
Hapgood, Powers
Boston jury sets Hapgood free; EP. 667
Correction of error; EP. 273
In a Boston insane asylum; S. 226
When the fan stops, get out; C. 363
Hard, William
Our passion for arbitration; C. 603
Harden, Maximilian. Obituary; EP. 493
Hardin, Edward E.
Restores Russell Tremaine to his parents; EP. 667
Harding, T. Swann
Serving two masters; S. 310
Harland, Henry
Henry Harland's letters. D. A. Roberts; C. 479
Harrison, Charles Yale, and Norman Hapgood
Brandeis, Holmes, Sacco, and Vanzetti; C. 424
Harvard university
The Harvard war memorial; E. 535
Hayes, Carlton; EP. 438
Hayes, J. M.
Private school teachers; C. 64
Hays, Arthur Garfield
A conference with Governor Fuller; S. 285
Hays, Will
Declares there are too many national trade barriers; EP. 145
Hawkridge, Emma L.
A warning; P. 738
Healy, James P.
The pope's position; C. 175
Hearst, William Randolph
Publishes documents branding Calles and Mexico; EP. 588
The forgery as to The Nation; E. 699
"The sewer system of American journalism"; E. 724
Hedges, Edison; EP. 464
Heijerman, Hermann
The Good Hope. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 485
Heindel, Mrs. Max
Rosicrucianism; C. 425
Henry Street settlement
Has instituted remarkable nursing service in New York city; EP. 464
Herrmann, John; EP. 411
Herzl, Theodore
A hero of the Jews. N. Hapgood; S. 645
Heyward, Du Bose
Porgy. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 456
Hidden. W. Hurlbut; D. 458
High gear; D. 458
Hill, Creighton
Describes police invasion of Sacco-Vanzetti funeral procession; EP. 238
Hindenburg, Paul
Celebrates eightieth birthday; EP. 353
Hindenburg, Paul von; S. 447
Hinkle, Beatrice M.
Why feminism?; S. 8
Historicus
Another view of war guilt; C. 133
Hoboken takes a joke; E. 99
Hobson, John A.
England's economic plight; S. 567
Hoffecker, G. S.
Who plants bombs?; C. 287
Hoffmann, Max von. Obituary; E. 79
Holland tunnel
Formal ceremonies at opening of tunnel under the Hudson river; EP. 560
Holmes, Harry N., defends gas warfare; EP. 48
Holmes, John Haynes, Harry F. Ward
The Gandhi relief fund; C. 426
Holmes, John Haynes
The outlining of knowledge; S. 379
Holly, William H.
The American woman; C. 229
Hopwood, A.
Garden of Eden. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 431
Horwitz, H. H.
Sacco-Vanzetti; C. 206
Hough, Benson W.
Issues injunction setting illegal limits to picketing; EP. 273
Hough, Frederick
Fake pictures from China; C. 478
Houghton, Alanson B.
Blames governments for war; E. 32
One-hundred-year peace pact; E. 127
Hourwich, Rebecca
What books shall my small child read; S. 546
House of women. L. Bromfield; D. 458
Howell, Joseph Morton; EP. 48
Hubbard, Wynant Davis
Is Africa going white, black, or brown?; S. 249
Hughes, Charles Evans
Charles Evans Hughes. H. J. Friedman; C. 543
Charles Evans Hughes. O. G. Villard; S. 417
Mr. Hughes and Michael Karolyi. M. L. Ernst; C. 479
Hume, Edward H.
Rediscovering the Pacific ocean; S. 179
Humor in British parliament; EP. 49
Humor
Is there a Western type of humor?; Dt. 205
Hunter, Stanley A.
Wayne B. Wheeler; C. 339
Huntington, Ellsworth
Why the American woman is unique; S. 105
Hurlbut, W.
Hidden. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 458 Hygiene
Wiping out yellow fever; EP. 325

I

Ibsen, Henrik
An enemy of the people. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 430
Iceland
Iceland and industry. E. Hanson; S. 84
Ile de France; E. 31
Immigration
Humanity and immigration laws. B. M. Woodbridge; C. 571
India
"Drain inspector's report" ["Mother India" by Katherine Mayo]; IP. 488
Promulgation in Kashmir of law against child marriage; EP. 324
The begum of Bhopal inaugurates India-wide drive for Islam; EP. 325
The Gandhi relief fund. J. H. Holmes; H. F. Ward; C. 426
The naivete of the English; E. 562
Indiana
Breaking loose from the Ku Klux klan; EP. 48
Forced retirement of Republican state chairman; EP. 587
From the executive chamber into jail; EP. 271
Indiana's anti-saloon league goes to jail. L. F. Budenz; S. 177
Rotten politics; EP. 323
Scandals of 1927—Indiana. L. F. Budenz; S. 332
There's mud on Indiana's white robes. L. F. Budenz; S. 81
Industrial exploration
Charting the world's commodity flow. B. Mackaye; IS. 70
Charting the world's requirements. B. Mackaye; IS. 92
Charting the world's resources. B. Mackaye; IS. 119
Industry
Big business is very happy. P. Musgrave; S. 225
Our waning prosperity; E. 495
Reasons for exchanging great cities for the country of various trades; EP. 301
Satisfactory results follow establishment of 8-hour day in steel industry; EP. 273
Shortsighted tactics of leaders of motion-picture industry; EP. 301
What business wants from congress. L. Todd; S. 626
Ingersoll, Robert G.
Colonel Ingersoll's letters. E. I. Swasey; C. 603
Institute of Pacific relations
Rediscovering the Pacific ocean. E. H. Hume; S. 179
Interference. R. Pertwee and H. Dearden; D. 486
International conference of press experts
Favors abolition of peace-time censorship; EP. 238
International mercantile marine company
Proposed reduction of capital; EP. 191
Irish sensitiveness
On Irish films. A. J. Reilly; C. 602
Ireland
Assassination of Kevin O'Higgins; EP. 48
Clouds have not rolled away; EP. 170
Death of Countess Markievicz; EP. 77
Free state and republican Ireland. R. M. Fox; IS. 186
President Cosgrave continues to hold his place; EP. 190
Iron Trade Review
Testifies to good results from shorter day in steel industry; EP. 273
Italy
An episode of fascism. G. Salvemini; IS. 556
Extraordinary new code of laws promulgated by Mussolini; EP. 218
Fascist culture; IP. 215
Murder by "persons unknown." G. Salvemini; S. 34
Mussolini censors reedit Shaw's apologia for their chief; EP. 533
The fascist state; IP. 322
The significance of suffrage under fascism; EP. 559

J

J., H. M.
Sacco-Vanzetti; C. 206
Jackson, Ed
Indicted on charge of conspiracy to commit a felony; EP. 271
James, Henry
President Eliot's letters; C. 160
James, Louise Cushing
Sacco-Vanzetti; C. 206
Japan
Disquieting increase of population; EP. 96
Labor elects twenty-six of its candidates to the prefectural councils; EP. 532
Mr. Lamont's duty; E. 671
Plots to control Manchuria and through it China; EP. 300
Jennings, Leslie Nelson
The gulls know best; P. 208
Jesus
Selling Jesus; E. 725
John. P. Barry; D. 582
Johnson, Albert
Demands deportation for foreign-born sympathizers of Sacco and Vanzetti; EP. 169
Johnston, H. S.; EP. 696
Johnston, Sir Harry. Obituary; EP. 124
Jonas, Barukha
Mr. Jonas wants to yelp; C. 64
Jones, Leonora H.; EP. 218
Judicial hysteria
Cases of; EP. 273
Justesen, Viggo; EP. 723
Justice
Case of Mrs. Brennan of Detroit; EP. 464
Debts of justice: unpaid; E. 275

K

Kane, John
Painter of houses and pictures; E..... 496
Kanner, Heinrich
Another view of war guilt; C..... 86
Kansas
Revolt against lawlessness of Wichita police force; EP..... 36
Kaye, F. B.
Pope manuscripts; C..... 64
Keezer, D. M.
An anti-trust law fiasco; S..... 122
Kellogg, Frank B.
Gross mismanagement in foreign service; EP..... 123
Kenderdine, John D.
Is the American legion liberal?; C..... 313
Kennedy, William Sloane
Sacco-Vanzetti; C..... 206
Kerr, John Leeds
Sex literature continued further; C..... 159
Keynes, John Maynard
Doubts Germany's ability to meet demands of Dawes plan; EP..... 237
Kibler, H. R.
The role of the farm bureau federation; C. 314
King, Carol Weiss
Our rights in New York; C..... 479
King, W. L. MacKenzie
Originator of company-union plan; E.... 534
Kirchwey, Freda
England—too bitter to compromise?; S.. 103
Some mass demonstrations [in Berlin, Vienna, Heiligenblut]; S..... 337
The docile American business man; C.... 112
Kirchwey, George W.
Opinion on victims of California criminal-syndicalism law; EP..... 49
Kirkley, Donald
Daniel Willard: a selfish man; S..... 307
Knight, L.
Bondage; C..... 111
Knight, M. M.
In an Algerian looking glass; C..... 64
Knox, Judge John Clark
Refuses to hear "experts" on the literary value of "What Happens"; EP..... 411
Kreymborg, Alfred
Epitaphs; P..... 65
Krupskaya, N.
Soviet achievements in public education; S..... 501
Krutch, Joseph Wood
A fiasco; D..... 582
Black ecstasy; D..... 456
Dutch interior; D..... 485
Hare and hounds; D..... 553
Holiday suggestions; D..... 743
Ibsen Again; D..... 430
Oyez, oyez, oyez; D..... 406
Papa Shaw; D..... 690
Paul Valéry and the intellectualist critics; S..... 377
Pauline Lord; D..... 610
Petruchio in modern dress; D..... 521
Pickwick redivivus; D..... 320
Plastic and temporal in art; S..... 643
Poet laureate; D..... 718
Stone walls do not; D..... 343
The curtain rises; D..... 295
The genius of Reinhardt; D..... 666
Ku Klux klan
Alabama's super government. C. N. Feidelson; S..... 311
Crusade against mob floggings in South; EP..... 218
Has neat system of mulcting the gullible. EP..... 359
The new South; E..... 173
There's mud on Indiana's white robes. L. F. Budenz; S..... 81
Kuh, Frederick
Is Germany extravagant? S..... 682

L

L., H.
A call for organization; C..... 118
Labadie, Joseph A.
A new labor library; E..... 222
Labor
Amoskeag manufacturing company orders a 10 per cent reduction in wages. EP..... 703
Herbert Hoover vs. Irving Fisher in evaluating worker's status; EP..... 668
Labor's league of nations explodes. H. Blankenhorn; IS..... 460
"Mother Metropolitan." G. F. Willison; S. 599
Statistics showing United States is workers' paradise; EP..... 410
The Australian labor situation. C. H. Grattan; IS..... 432
Labor banks
Optimism expressed at their inception not realized; EP..... 3
Lamont, Thomas W.
Mr. Lamont's duty [with regard to South Manchurian loan]; E..... 671
Langdon-Davis, John..... 536
Lansbury, George; EP..... 532
Law courts
A Sacco revolver expert revealed. A. Warner; S..... 625
To err is human; E..... 620
Law, international
The citizen abroad. E. M. Borchard. IS. 365
Lawes, Warden
Asserts capital punishment is worse than futile; EP..... 464
Lawrence, Susan; EP..... 522
Lawrence, T. E.; E..... 591
Lawrence, Thomas L.
From the other Boston; C..... 287
Lawrence, William
A Christian bishop. A. N. Meyer; C..... 425
Lawson, John Howard
Mobilizing public opinion; C..... 228
Lawyers
Attorneys for oil magnates not treated like country lawyers; EP..... 461
League of nations
A year after Thoiry. R. Dell; S..... 282
Attitude of powers to Russia's participating in disarmament conference; EP..... 616
Fight for "open door" in news dissemination. EP..... 170
First week of naval disarmament conference at Geneva; EP..... 2
Geneva and neutrality; E..... 241
Is war planned in Geneva between England and the United States?; EP..... 47
Our passion for arbitration. W. Hard; C.. 603
Peace or war?; E..... 618
Poland and Lithuania declare for peace; EP..... 695
Russia leads the world [with proposal of disarmament]; E..... 670
The revolt at Geneva; E..... 274
The scandal at Geneva; E..... 33
Vilna and the League. M. Spence; IS... 719
World articles indicate tampering with report on white-slave traffic; EP..... 668
Leary, Zoe
On leaving newspapers; C..... 339
Leavens, Robert F.
Another son of Massachusetts; C..... 426
Lee, Rose
Jacob Epstein; A..... 716
Lehmann, Lilli; E..... 726
Lenin
Quotation from last "testament"; EP..... 533
Letter, The. W. S. Maugham; D..... 431
Levermore, Charles H. Obituary; EP..... 465
Levine, Charles A., honored on return; E.... 442
Lewis, Alfred Baker
Is the American legion liberal?; C..... 313
Radio censorship; C..... 39
Lewis, Frederick W.; EP..... 272
Lewis, John L.; EP..... 416
Lewis, Wyndham
An enemy worth having; E..... 535
Lewisohn, Ludwig
French literature today; S..... 572
Liberia
The police of Monrovia. F. O'Brien. C. 544
Lieberman, Elias
Black magic; P..... 788
Liga miramundum
League for international friendship formed in Germany; EP..... 191
Lindbergh, Charles August; C..... 64
Lindbergh, Charles A.
Censorship on the Memphis; EP..... 125
Lindbergh's own story; E..... 125
Lindbergh, Sr., Charles Augustus
Son of the Eagle. L. Haines. S..... 78
Lippmann, Walter
Walter Lippmann, connoisseur of public life. B. Stolberg. S..... 600
Literary criticism
A Bible course for Christian living. W. N. Brewer. C..... 800
The golden complex. A. Rathbone. C. 544
Five faces. S. Burt. C..... 295
Literature
A selected list of the season's translations. 771
A survey of the season's books. M. Van Doren. S..... 771
Paid reviews and wilful misfire. E..... 5
Censorship on the rise. E..... 146
French literature today. L. Lewisohn. S. 572
German literature today. A. Eloesser. S. 581
Hope for a live MS? J. Southerland. S. 165
Literature and tradition; E..... 340
Machine-made fiction. H. Block. S..... 77
On contemporary American fiction. C. P. Fadiman. S..... 631
Paul Valéry and the intellectualist critics. J. W. Krutch; S..... 377
Pedant or pedagogue. R. Aldington; C..... 87
Plastic and temporal in art. J. W. Krutch. S..... 643
Sex literature continued. C. J. Finger. M. Marini. M. R. Sanford; C..... 133
Sex literature continued further. J. J. Kerr; C..... 159
Stopped sex literature. A. S. Blackwell. W. McFee; C..... 63
That six-cylindered airman. N. Denton. D. P. Spencer; C..... 17
The art of translation; E..... 583
The charm of the Victorian; E..... 307
The noble art of mystery; E..... 242
The stock of Boswell continues to soar; EP..... 325
Warrior Wells and battling Belloc; E..... 191
William Blake, 1827-1927; E..... 221
Lithuania
Vilna and the League. M. Spence; IS.. 719
Litvinov, M.; E..... 670
Long, Haniel
Letter after a visit; P..... 18
Los Angeles
High-school sophomore wisdom; Dt..... 229
Law and order in Los Angeles. R. Borough; S..... 12
President of Better America federation in a scrape; EP..... 30
Lothar, R., and F. Gottwald
Command to love. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 407
Lovejoy, Owen; EP..... 697
Lovers and enemies. M. P. Artzybasheff; D... 407
Loving, Pierre
Legend of the brazier man; P..... 257
Lowell, Guy
Guy Lowell. T. F. Hamlin; obituary; S.. 178
Lucky strike cigarettes advertising; EP..... 351
Lynn, Marshall
Frenzied railroad finance; S..... 35

M

M., W.
Morituri te salutant; C..... 181
McAdoo, William Gibbs
Decides not to run for presidency; EP... 299
McAndrew, William; S..... 538
MacClinchy, Russell
The reform movement in Michigan; C.... 39
McCormick, Ruth Hanna
Asks for support in order to smash corrupt politician; EP..... 351
Nation readers criticize her; EP..... 438
Ruth Hanna McCormick. M. Adams; S.. 449
MacDonald, James Ramsay
Britain's folly toward Russia; S..... 102
British finance and the Labor party; S. 537
McFee, William
Sissified sex literature; C..... 63
Mackaye, Benton
Charting the world's commodity flow; IS.. 70
Charting the world's requirements; IS.... 92
Charting the world's resources; IS..... 119
McKnight, Floyd
A legend; P..... 161
Macmahon, Benjamin
The mark of Cain; C..... 175
McNab, Tansy
The soviet invasion of America; S..... 528
McNally, William
Mr. Babbitt, meet Sinclair Lewis; S..... 278
Mafalda, the principessa; Dt..... 512
Magruder, Thomas Pickett
Consideration of charges against navy department; E..... 354
Detached from command of Philadelphia navy yard; EP..... 491
Maine
Maine's water-power fight. E. Sparling; S..... 710
Retains primary by large majority; EP.. 463
Maltzan, Ago von. Obituary; EP..... 325
Manchuria. See Japan
Manning, William Thomas; EP..... 31
Marckwardt, Albert
Dismissed from high school for taking class in English to review "Land of the Pilgrims' Pride". EP..... 414
Marini, Myra
Sex literature continued; C..... 133
Markievicz, Constance Georgine. Obituary; EP 77
Marquis, Donald Robert Perry
Out of the sea. Criticism. J. W. Krutch. D..... 718
Marquise. N. Coward; D..... 690
Marshall college
President Shawkey dismisses two professors; EP..... 304
Marshall, Margaret
The Lion is dead. S..... 675
Martin, Lawrence
Chicago's symphony orchestra; S..... 404
Higher education in Chicago. S..... 568
Martins, Carlos
The poet in Haiti. S..... 700
Massachusetts
Arbitrary dismissal of Miss Clifford from Lynn schools; EP..... 70
Ousts typewriter from bedroom of Steve Vanzetti; day. EP..... 695
Matthews, W. Somerset
The letter. Criticism. J. W. Krutch. D. 431
Meacham, Frank T.
In defense of measles. C..... 451
Meiklejohn, Alexander
Alexander Meiklejohn. L. Price; S..... 541
Mellett, Don R; EP..... 123
Mellon, Andrew J.; EP..... 50
Memorials
The Harvard war memorial; E..... 535
Men
Save-the-men movement. M. H. Speer; C. 736
Should men be protected? L. Pruette. S. 200
Mencken, H. L.
Has become a national fashion; EP..... 273
Mennonites
Granted generous concessions by Paraguay; EP..... 410
Menuhin, Yehudi
A letter from Mme Zimbalist. A. Gluck. C. 751

Meteorology
From the long-range weather prophet. H. J. Brunner; C ... 114
The ... of Aubrey Burton; E ... 66
Metropolitan life insurance company
... Mortgage ... E. H. Wilson; S ... 666
Mexico
... Catholic ... from Peru; EP ... 370
... and ... ; E ... 67
... the government; E ... 67
... Abraham Lincoln ... M. H. Knight; C ... 61
... Mexican ... ; E ... 9
... Mexican "... and ..." E. K. ... ; C ... 136
... Indians
... from the Past. A. ... ; E ... 10
Meyer, Annie Nathan
A Christian bishop; C ... 425
Michigan
... new ... ; E ... 66
... secret ... in ... R. MacCleary; C ... 66
Middleton, George
... Blood ... California. J. W. Krutch; D ... 66
... D ... 66
Miller, W. J. Gibson and A. Sullivan; D ... 311
Milazzo, Frank J. S ... 667
Miley, Cora
The homicide oil field; S ... 151
Milgram, Joseph B.
Is the American union liberal? ... 118
Military training
... Commission on Do Facto. E. Chaffee; S ... 45
Must be no letdown in militarizing youthful minds; EP ... 97
... tactics ... to ... children; EP ... 66
Mill island in Baffin bay, reclaimed? EP ... 131
Millay, Kathleen
Wake ... Elegy; P ... 416
Miller, Alice Duer
The springboard. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 186
Miller, Kelley
Gallinipper wisdom; C ... 478
Miller, Leon P.
What is a bar association? ... 66
Miller, Nathan; EP ... 184
Mills, Florence. Obituary; Dt ... 543
Mines
Rock dusting to prevent ... J. G. Andrews; C ... 66
Missions, Christian
In defense of missions. H. F. Meacham; C ... 151
Mississippi flood
Discouraging condition of water-logged lands; EP ... 6
Steps to be taken to lessen ... cost of future flood control; EP ... 723
Moca, ... Cuban; EP ... 66
Morals
... between Bishop Manning and Harry Emerson Fosdick; EP ... 10
Morocco
Kidnapping in Al-Moghreb Al-Oksa; Dt ... 543
Morris, Homer
Captain Pinsent's testimony; C ... 136
Morrow, Dwight
... Mexico's ... ; E ... 66
Promoting friendship between United States and Mexico; EP ... 66
Morton, David
Eavesdropper; P ... 427
Most interesting possessions; Dt ... 66
"Mother India" by Katherine Mayo; IP ... 66
Mullins, Helene
... ; EP ... 66
Municipal government
Need of ... for ... police; EP ... 634
Munro, William B.
Not afraid at ... ; EP ... 66
Musgrave, Percy
Big business is very happy; S ... 66
The Bosch Magneto case comes to court; S ... 66
Music
Beethoven festival at ... H. Simon; S ... 718
Chicago's symphony orchestra. L. Martin; S ... 66
Korngold's "Violanta." L. Adler ... 664
Lower Rhine festival in ... O. Straus; S ... 66
Music and its ... H. H. Bagley; S ... 66
Should music teachers be licensed? S. J. Birnbaum; C ... 66
Some German ... ; E ... 66
Straus; S ... 66
The tail ... the dog. H. H. Bagley; S ... 66
Women and ... ; E ... 66
Yehudi Menuhin. O. G. Villard; S ... 66
Mussolini, Benito
No merry Christmas and happy new ... for him; EP ... 66
Praised, Howard Chandler Christy; EP ... 66
Promulgates new code of laws; EP ... 115
Muzzey, David Saville
... abusers of textbooks for ... EP ... 66
Mc Maryland; D ... 244

N

Nathan, George Jean; EP ... 41
Nation, The
... ; A. S. P.; C ... 66
Morituri te salutant. W. M.; C ... 181
... waits on Nations. L. H. ... ; C ... 66
... ; ... ... ; EP ... 66
... ; ... ... ; E ... 66
... ; ... ... of The Nation; M. Calder; C ... 364
National ... to ... ; ... ... ; EP ... 66
Comes out with program for protection of ... ; EP ... 66
National child labor committee
... and ... of National ... ; EP ... 311
National City bank
... affiliating ... with ... Weekly Review; EP ... 96
Nearing, Scott
The movement of world wealth; IS ... 234
The white terror in China; S ... 734
Negroes
... of Arms in Milwaukee; EP ... 219
... Hughes ... from Virginia to New Jersey; EP ... 66
Strike of white pupils in Gary high school in protest against presence of Negro students; EP ... 66
... of ... settlement; EP ... 66
The Negro in the ... Scott; E. F. Frazier; S ... 66
The Negro peril. W. Pickens; C ... 112
The social bar. L. G. Brooks; C ... 66
What is a bar association? L. P. Miller; C ... 684
Newspapers
Boston Herald merits booby prize; EP ... 219
Fake pictures from China. F. Hough; C ... 478
Fights and flights in the newspapers. S. Bent; S ... 478
... ... ; EP ... 66
On ... newspapers. Z. Leary; C ... 66
The vanishing American daily; E ... 127
What is news? EP ... 66
Newspapers, foreign
World opinion on Sacco and Vanzetti ... 174
New York (city)
Americanism of the Government club; EP ... 409
Are you a New Yorker?; E ... 51
... ... in "A" Smith's ... state-wide victory; EP ... 559
Hearings on the relations between the city and the I.R.T. and the B.M.T.; EP ... 66
"L" service infuriating "angry passengers"; EP ... 66
Our rights in New York. C. W. King; C ... 479
... ... when they were criminal; EP ... 492
... ... ; EP ... 66
Tammany hall; Dt ... 711
Tragic-comic police conduct; EP ... 66
New York (state)
... ... attacks ... Smith; EP ... 437
... ... for intelligent voting; EP ... 560
Nicaragua
... and ... ; EP ... 66
Humiliating spectacle in Nicaragua and Washington; EP ... 409
... ; EP ... 66
... ; E ... 66
The American plan. D. Y. Thomas; C ... 543
... ... marines kill?; EP ... 237
Nightingale, D ... 66
... ... ; ... ... ; ... ... ; A ... 66
Nobel peace prize
... ... ; EP ... 66
... ... ; EP ... 66
... ... ; E. ... ; S ... 66
... ... ; L. S. ... ; S ... 66
... ... ; ... ... ; EP ... 66
Nye's platform for progressives; EP ... 66
... ... ; ... ... ; EP ... 66

O

... ... ; ... ... ; A ... 66
... ... ; C ... 66
... ... ; ... ... ; EP ... 66
... ... ; ... ... ; EP ... 66
... ... ; ... ... ; EP ... 66

O'Sullivan, Vincent
The perils of Paris; C ... 632
Odams, John; EP ... 219
Odhner, Madefrey
Silly Marten; P ... 246
... ... ; ... ... ; ... ... ;

Poems
A legend. F. McKnight ... 161
A warning. E. L. Hawkridge ... 738
Advice to a mendicant. L. Riggs ... 472
Aesthete. H. A. Potamkin ... 134
Anxiety in solitude. H. Mullins ... 678
Before winter. Lynn Riggs ... 686
Black magic. E. Lieberman ... 708
Bookworm. C. Cuthbert ... 480
Contemporary verse. R. Cheney, L. Trent; C 113
Diplomatic sonnet. H. Dowd ... 248
Eavesdropper. D. Morton ... 675
Interior. D. Parker ... 598
Introduction. C. A. Wagner ... 715
Epitaphs. A. Kreymborg ... 60
Isadora Duncan. M. Eastman ... 309
Late. L. Bogan ... 260
Legend of the brazier man. P. Lovine ... 257
Letter after a visit. H. Long ... 18
November corn field. W. Snow ... 333
Ocean. T. H. Ferril ... 604
Poem. C. P. Smith ... 453
Quaker pagan. S. B. Field ... 315
Second advent. J. G. Fletcher ... 646
Silly Marten. M. Odhner ... 246
Song. M. de L. Welch ... 378
Tears in sleep. L. Bogan ... 230
The gulls know best. L. N. Jennings ... 208
The subway. A. Tate ... 448
The unfamiliar house. J. G. Fletcher ... 130
This rock. H. S. White ... 114
To the impatient revolutionist. J. W. Gassner 514
Vigil. A. Tate ... 18
Wake. Dirge. Elegy. K. Millay ... 340
Warm stone woman. H. M. Corning ... 88
With the gods. W. Bynner ... 182
Poetry
Shall poets become extinct?; EP ... 31
Poindexter, Miles
Reports South America alive with fear of the United States; EP ... 532
Poland
Polish-Lithuanian entanglement; EP ... 616
Police
Revolt against increasing lawlessness of police forces; EP ... 96
Tragic-comic mistake; EP ... 169
Ponsonby, Arthur
128,770 British subjects sign peace letter; EP ... 695
Pope, Alexander
Pope manuscripts. F. B. Kaye; C ... 64
Popescu, Aureliu Jon
Parties and politics in Rumania; IS ... 744
Popper, Marion Z.
To teachers; C ... 685
Porgy. D. Heyward; D ... 456
Portland, Maine; Dt ... 683
Potamkin, Harry Alan
Aesthete; P ... 134
"God's trombones"; C ... 133
Pound, Ezra
Pound for president; C ... 684
The passport nuisance; S ... 600
Powell, John Benjamin
Punished for opposing military intervention in China; EP ... 96
Presidential possibilities
Alfred E. Smith. O. G. Villard; S ... 595
Charles Evans Hughes. O. G. Villard; S. . 417
Hoover to the fore. O. G. Villard; S ... 700
Price, Lucien
Alexander Meiklejohn; S ... 541
Prohibition
Indiana's anti-saloon league goes to jail. L. F. Budenz; S ... 177
Lapse of son of head of Virginia anti-saloon league; EP ... 145
Some survive without wine. J. N. Washburne; C ... 451
Prohme, Rayna. Obituary; EP ... 617
Property, sequestrated
Foregoing theft; E ... 303
Pruette, Lorine
Should men be protected?; S ... 200
Pullman company
Porters continue fight for honest wages; EP 372
Pullman porters
Farmers and Pullman porters; C ... 513
Putnam, David
Luckiest boy in world; EP ... 124

Q

Quidde, Ludwig; EP ... 697

R

Racket; D ... 690
Radio
Censor cancels talk on the President and fishing methods; EP ... 77
Radio censorship. A. B. Lewis; C ... 39
The patriotic radio trust. M. A. Hallgren; S 53
Raffaele, Thomas
Obtains verdict against New York city detective; EP ... 492
Railroads
B. & O. celebrates first century of existence; E ... 141
Evils of private management; EP ... 144
Frenzied railroad finance. M. Lynn; S ... 35
Momentous decision in the St. Louis and O'Fallon railroad case; EP ... 696
Railroading or stockjobbing; E ... 725
Raisuli; Dt ... 543
Rakovsky, Alexandra
Modern women in soviet Russia; S ... 509
Ratcliffe, K. M.
A visit to the men's [Sacco-Vanzetti] home towns; S ... 335
Rawson, Philip N., and Gertrude K. Rawson
There's room for freedom in Texas; C ... 363
Raymond, Frank M.
Al Smith; C ... 712
Red Cross
Must not solicit subscriptions from small-salaried civil employees; EP ... 492
Red peril
Gallinipper wisdom. K. Miller; C ... 478
Red rooster of Russia; Dt ... 600
Reilly, A. J.
On Irish films; C ... 602
Rein, G. A.
Deplores anti-German movies in United States; EP ... 170
Reinhardt, Max
A midsummer night's dream. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 666
"Revelry"; S ... 375
Revelry. M. Watkins; D ... 344
Rhodes scholars; EP ... 49
Riggs, Lynn
Advice to a mendicant; P ... 472
Before winter; P ... 686
Riis, Roger William
Twenty-three!; C ... 571
Robbing American tourists in Europe; Dt ... 424
Roberts, Donald A.
Henry Harland's letters; C ... 479
Rochester, Anna
Boston's state of mind; C ... 176
Rock dust
When the fan stops, get out. P. Hapgood; C ... 368
Rodenberg, William A.; E ... 51
Rolland, Romain
Message to America on Massachusetts tragedy; S ... 306
Roman catholicism
Catholic "renaissance" in France. I. Treat; S ... 55
Catholic schools. B. O'Dwyer; C ... 112
The truth about Canossa. H. C. Engelbrecht; C ... 160
Romancing 'round; D ... 131
Romanov, Panteleimon
The actress; S ... 157
Roosevelt, Theodore, Jr.
Unlucky at game of politics; EP ... 352, 437
Rosicrucianism
Rosicrucianism. Mrs. M. Heindel; C ... 425
Rosicrucian. See Oklahoma goes Rosicrucian
Rosselli, Carlo; IS ... 556
Rotarians
Questionable antics in foreign countries; EP 8
Rubin, Daniel
Women go on forever. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 320
Rumania
Kings mere figureheads; EP ... 97
Muddled situation following Bratianu's death; EP ... 617
Parties and politics in Rumania. A. J. Popescu; IS ... 744
Rumania free from the law's law. G. E. R. Gedye; S ... 732
The Eastern edge of Europe. I. E. Van Norman; IS ... 41
Things not going well; EP ... 549
Russia
A bit of Russian patchwork. K. Pendexter; S 69
A feature of soviet "documents." I. T. IS 245
All over the soviet land. A. R. Williams; S 502
British pin-pricking causes exciting summer; EP ... 94
Chronological record of the Russian revolution; IRS ... 570
Disarmament proposals and Litvinov's resolution; L ... 660
English sentiment in behalf of satisfactory Russian relations declines; EP ... 94
Expulsion of Trotzky and other members of the opposition from the Communist party; EP ... 555
Liberty under the soviets. R. N. Baldwin; S ... 503
"Liberty under the soviets." R. Baldwin; C ... 660
Mac Orlovsky. S. M. Eisenstein; S ... 507
Mr. Jones wants to yelp. R. Jones; C ... 64
Modern women in soviet Russia. A. Rakovsky; S ... 509
"Mother may I look at the bolshevik?" EP ... 77
On the road to socialism. L. Fischer; S ... 599
Prosecution under the soviets; statistics ... 744
Russia on defendant and initiant; E ... 139
Sensational news of uprising in Ukraine; EP ... 370
Something new in the world; E ... 241
Soviet achievements in public education. N. Krupskaya; S ... 501
Soviet exiles. M. Zoshchenko; IS ... 556
Soviet-Persia trade treaty irritates England; EP ... 146
The pressure of Trotzky. L. Fischer; S ... 710
The patient. M. Zoshchenko. Transl. by M. Eastman; S ... 505
The soviet invasion of America. T. McNab; S ... 528
The soviet opposition. L ... 266
Trotzky answers some questions; IP ... 346
Rutledge, Archibald
The author complains; C ... 314
Ryo Yei maru, Dt ... 550

S

Sacco, Rosina
From Mrs. Sacco; C ... 630
Sacco-Vanzetti case
A case for organization. H. L.; C ... 225
A conference with Governor Fuller. A. G. Hays; S ... 585
"A decent respect to the opinions of mankind"; E ... 172
A humane warden. G. H. Sedgwick; C ... 225
A Negro looks at Sacco's America. T. L. Dabney; C ... 287
A note of discord. A. J. Boyden; C ... 228
A Sacco revolver expert revealed. A. Warner; S ... 625
A visit to the men's home towns. K. M. Ratcliffe; S ... 335
American professor's opinion; EP ... 169
Among the teachers. Chez Columbia; C ... 287
Andrew Carnegie said. D. A.; C ... 339
Another son of Massachusetts. R. F. Leavens; C ... 426
Another view of Brandeis. S. Danziger; C. 513
Booby prize for poltroonery goes to Boston Herald; EP ... 219
Borah's disappointing letter to Jane Addams; EP ... 189
Brandeis, Holmes, Sacco, and Vanzetti. C. Y. Harrison; C ... 424
British opinion on the Sacco-Vanzetti execution; IP ... 321
From Mrs. Sacco. R. Sacco; C ... 630
From the other Boston. T. L. Lawrence; C ... 586
Governor Fuller writing decision; EP ... 123
Gratitude due to Elizabeth Glendower Evans and Felix Frankfurter; EP ... 219
Handsome Carr posters; EP ... 239
Have faith in Calvan T. Fullidge! G. E.; C ... 228
"Have faith in Massachusetts"? Letters from Nation readers ... 566
Honor in Lawrence. H. W. Dewey; C 368
Hopeful augury in behalf of prisoners; EP. 97
Hostility of Albert Johnson; EP ... 169
In a Boston insane asylum. P. Hapgood; S ... 226
Is Boston reforming? F. H. Barrow; C 613
Justice in hell. J. B. Barnhill; C ... 513
Justice underfoot; E ... 146
Lenora H. Jones loses job for talking in favor of Sacco and Vanzetti; EP ... 218
Massachusetts judicial council recommends revision of appeal system; EP ... 695
Massachusetts the murderer; E ... 192
Massachusetts there she stands. J. B. Dee; C ... 125
Mayflowering. A. S. P.; C ... 479
Message to America on Massachusetts tragedy. R. Rolland; S ... 306
Mr. Jones wants to yelp. R. Jones; C ... 64
Mobilizing public opinion. J. H. Lawson; C ... 228
Most outrageous happening in entire trial; EP ... 143
Nation readers on Sacco and Vanzetti ... 175
New York magistrates punish men for distributing Sacco-Vanzetti circulars; EP.. 218
On reading the Sunday newspapers; 1927. E. Sayre; C ... 287
Our rights in New York. C. W. King; C. 479
Police invasion of funeral procession; EP ... 238, 239
Press comment on the Sacco-Vanzetti execution ... 252
Sacco-Vanzetti. A. S. C.; H. H. Horwitz; H. M. J.; H. Peirce; L. A. Elsworth; L. C. James; W. S. Kennedy; W. T. Seofield; C ... 306
Sacco-Vanzetti next steps; E ... 120
Shortsighted tactics of leaders of motion-picture industry; EP ... 201
Three years. S. G. Shapleigh; C ... 344
The anger of South America. R. Crawford; S ... 334
The Lugano spirit. J. Zed; C ... 478
Twenty-three! R. W. Rus; C ... 1
Violence bad policy; EP ... 189
What happened August 2?; E ... 171
What history says. R. S. Chase; C ... 227
Who'll help? R. Watson; C ... 225
Who plants bombs? G. S. Hellman; C ... 287
World opinion on Sacco and Vanzetti [newspaper excerpts] ... 174
Y. M. C. A. letter and Nation's reply; E. 238
Salvemini, Gaetano
An episode of fascism; IS ... 556
Sandburg, Carl
Did Mrs. Stowe make shoes?; C ... 62
Sandino, Augusto; EP ... 75
Sanford, Mary R.
Sex literature continued; C ... 133
Santa Claus in Dt ... 586
Sassenbach, Joh.
Who helped the British miners?; C ... 63
Sayre, J. G.
More Chinese atrocities; S ... 129

Scarsdale
Problems ... [illegible] ... EP 183
Schatz-and-Hertz, Expedition, L. 126
Schermerhorn, Rollin
Denied first editorship ... EP 127
Health ... [illegible] ... 213
Schmidt, Gladbach, C. 213
Schoenmaker, Judge
Letter concerning ... [illegible] ... EP 213
Scott, Evelyn
On reading the works ... [illegible] ... C 213
Seabrook, Marcelle, L. 213
Seaver, Marcella. Obituary; EP 1
Secretary Two ... [illegible] ... 213
Shady street for eighteen cities, D. 213
Shakespeare, William
A mid-summer night's dream. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 213
The taming of the shrew. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 213
Shannon, of Broadway. J. Gerard; D. 213
Shapleigh, Serma G.
Thank you; C. 311
Shaw, Fred E.; EP 213
Shaw, George Bernard. EP 213
Shaw, George Bernard
The doctor's dilemma. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 213
Shipler, Guy Emery
The Los Angeles Times; C. 213
Shipping
East Atlantic lanes; E. 213
Home is a tradition of the sea. F. C. Ames; S. 37
Proposed reorganization of Italian mercantile marine company; EP 213
United States line ... [illegible] ... EP 213
When is a ship not a ship? E. 213
Sigman, M.
Mr. Sigman on the garment strike; C. 17
Sinclair-Fall case
Calling men by their right names; E. 440
Money warping the law; EP. 531
Sinclair and Fall on trial. R. Clapper; S. 445
Sinclair, Upton
Would indict Massachusetts; C. 175
Sinclair, Upton 213
Sirovich, William Irving
Al Smith; C. 712
Slacker vote
"Bawling at the voters" EP 213
Compulsory voting no remedy. EP 213
Vargo Judson's proposal noted. EP 213
Slater, Oscar; E. 213
Slowacki, Julius
Return of body to Poland; EP. 77
Smeaton's Jokes
Have you a little MS? S 213
Smith, Alfred Emanuel
Al Smith. F. M. Raymond; N. Thomas; W. I. Sirovich; C. 712
"Al" Smith in Texas. R. V. Peale; S. 213
Alfred E. Smith. O. G. Villard; S. 213
Dealers protest ... [illegible] ... EP 213
Governor Smith—penologist; E. 213
How "Al" Smith fared in Mississippi. H. Butler; S. 244
Praise to Mr. McAdoo ... [illegible] ... EP 213
Smith, Chard Powers
Poem 213
Smith, Reeve
Discrimination ... [illegible] ... 213
Smutney, Joseph, D. 213
Snow, Wilbert
November corn field; P. 213
South, the Symphony in the South. G. A. Pindar; C. 684
The new South; E. 173
South Africa
Hot discussion ... [illegible] ... ED 213
Souvenirs and drifting among Oriental bazaars; D. 213
Spain
First assemblage of ... [illegible] ... since establishment of Primo de Rivera dictatorship, EP 213
Sparling, Earl
Maine's water-power fight; S. 213
Speer, Margaret H.
Save-the-men movement; C. 213
Spence, Matilda
Vilna and the League; IS. 213
Spencer, D. P.
That six-cylindered airman; C. 17
Sperling, L. N.
Our wonderful language; C. 314
Sport
Amusing jargon of the prize ring, EP 213
Executions: the new sport. E. Stevenson; S. 213
Presidential fishing; EP. 77
Text: the world's series; E. 413
Through sport to peace?; E. 303
Through sports to peace? H. P. V. Edward; C. 632
Springboard. A. D. Miller; D. 486
Stefano, Ettore de; Dt. 629
Steichen, Edward; EP. 465
Stephen, Jessie
British women in politics; S. 213
Stephenson, D. C.; EP 213
Stevenson, Edward
Impressions ... [illegible] ... S 213
Stevenson, J. A.
Canada's ... [illegible] ... S 213
Stewart, Rosalie
A la carte. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 213
Stimson, Henry L.
Secretary Lamont Wins as ... [illegible] ... EP 213
Stoker, Bram
Dracula. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 213
Stolberg, Benjamin
Walter Lippmann, ... [illegible] ... S 213
Story of ... [illegible] ... 213
Stowe, Harriet Beecher
Did She Write Uncle Tom's Cabin? C. Stedman; C. 62
Strachey, John St. Loe. Obituary; EP. 219
Straus, Henrietta
Some German literary impressions. M. 213
The Beethoven festival at Bonn. M. 213
The lower Rhine festival in Aachen; M. 211
Strikes—Great Britain
Who helped the British miners? J. Sassenbach; C. 213
Strikes—United States
Bloody Colorado; E. 534
Coal miners in Illinois and Iowa win strike lasting since April 1; EP 213
Green and Lewis submit miners' grievance to President Coolidge; EP 213
In the bituminous coal fields; EP. 77
Miners discriminated against by hospitals and relief agencies; EP. 722
Miners in Ohio and Pennsylvania still on strike; EP. 410
Miners' predicament in coal region result of laissez faire; EP. 144
Mr. Sigman on the garment strike. M. Sigman; C. 17
Notable strike of Henderson mill-workers; EP 213
Reading in Ohio and Pennsylvania coal region; EP. 144
Settlement of Superior, Wis., school strike; EP 213
The Hampton strike. W. E. Burghardt Du Bois; S. 471
War in Colorado. F. L. Palmer; S. 623
Such is life. P. Glenny and M. A. Hecht; D. 320
Sun Yat-sen, madam; IP. 298
Supreme court of the United States
Brands Fall and Sinclair in Teapot Dome trial; E. 440
Sutherland, Geo. B.
A humane warden; C. 228
Swasey, Eva Ingersoll
Colonel Ingersoll's letters; C. 603
Syracuse university
Evans stresses ... [illegible] ... E 213

T

T., L.
A ... [illegible] ... 213
Tabloids ... [illegible] ... 213
Taft, Lorado
Tagore, Sir Rabindranath
Tate, Allen
Taylor, ...
Teachers ...
Tennessee ...
Texas
Theater
Thoby, Perceval
Thomas, David Y.
The American plan; C. 213
Thomas, Norman
Al Smith; C. 712
For Grecco and Carillo; C. 213
Thompson, Dorothy
Hitting the ... [illegible] ... S 213
Thompson, William Hale
Case of Illinois ... [illegible] ... EP 213
Thomson, William Hope, S. 213
Time, sphericality of; Dt. 111
Times, New York
Carries ... [illegible] ... uprising in the Ukraine; EP. 213
Todd, Laurence
What ... [illegible] ... S 213
Toth, Andrew; E. 213
Trade unions, ... [illegible] ...
Trade-unions bill passed third reading in Commons; EP. 1
Translations
A ... [illegible] ... 213
Treat, Ida
Is ... [illegible] ... S 213
The Catholic "renaissance" in France; S. 55
Tremaine, Russell
Court ... [illegible] ... EP 213
Trent, Lucia
Contemporary verse; C. 113
Trial of Mary Dugan. B. Veiller; D. 406
Trotter, Frank Butler
Bates peace lecture at University of West Virginia; EP. 589
Trotzky, Leon; EP. 532
Trotzky, Leon
The passing of Trotzky. L. Fischer; S. 703
Tucker, Marguerite
Capital punishment in Germany; C. 571
Tunney, Gene. 622
Turati, Filippo; IS. 556
Two tragedies on the high seas; Dt. 570

U

Underwood, Marius Charles
Fit to print; C. 62
United States—Administration of justice
Justice underfoot; E. 146
United States—Agriculture
Agriculture in the nation's economy. C. A. Beard; S. 150
United States—Army
Director of budget moves to reduce number of reserve officers; EP. 300
United States—Board of tax appeals
Matter of interest to students of the psychology of patriotism; EP. 696
United States—Commerce
America and Asia outstrip Europe; E. 4
United States—Corruption
Testimony to graft and corruption EP 301
United States—Department of justice
Calling men by their right names; E. 440
United States—Department of state
Carter Glass attacks policy of supervising private loans to foreign governments; EP 437
Foreign theft [in dealing with sequestrated property]; E. 303
Gross mismanagement in foreign service, EP 213
The Latin American business man. F. Kirchway; C 213
United States—Federal trade commission
An anti-trust law fiasco. D. M. Kennedy; S. 422
Useless and awful kinds of attack on big corporations illustrated by order against Famous Players-Lasky corporation; EP. 437
United States—Foreign relations
Temporary solution of tariff difficulty with France, EP 491
United States—Industrial strife
Anti-labor injunctions issued by federal judges; EP. 352
United States—Indians
Big business is ... [illegible] ... P. Mumford; S 213
Our wasting ... [illegible] ... E 213
United States—International relations
Patriots and patriotisms; E 50
The rainbow ... [illegible] ... J. H. Holmes; M. J. Adler; S. 379 380
United States—Interstate commerce commission
Cutting ... [illegible] ... EP 213
Railroading or stockjobbing?; E. 725
United States—Judiciary
Impertinence of naturalization courts; EP. 437
United States—Navy
A billion dollars for the navy; EP. 695
Admiral Magruder's charges of inefficiency and extravagance; EP. 323
S-4 disaster; EP. 721
The navy and army waste; E. 354
Time to make known naval policy; EP. 169
United States—Panama
Genesis and present status of canal zone republic; EP. 300

United States--Politics and government
Bills aimed against aliens introduced in Congress; EP ... 668
Career diplomats and others; E ... 5
Congress grappling with Senators Vare and Smith; EP ... 667
Congress opens for short session; EP ... 615
Congress to relieve business of its tax burdens; EP ... 616
Covering Washington. The Unofficial Spokesman ... 675, 729
For president: Jane Addams. C. L. Goodenough; C ... 451
Is Coolidge coming or going?; E ... 118
Politicians and issues; E ... 166
Primaries reveal apathy of voters; EP ... 351
Senator Borah scores again; E ... 562
Speculating on presidential candidates; EP ... 217
That fifteenth amendment. A. A. Golden; C ... 630
The Northwest stands pat. R. S. Allen; S ... 104
Wanted: leadership; E ... 326
What business wants from congress. L. Todd; S ... 626
United States steel corporation
Waning prosperity; E ... 495
United States—Supreme court
Brands Fall and Sinclair; E ... 440
Reparations for robbers. S. Bent; C ... 543
United States—Tariff
Provocative note to France on tariff entanglement; EP ... 323
Steady rise of protests against international trade barriers; EP ... 145
Tariff tangles; EP ... 413
The tariff, agriculture, and the president; E ... 590
The tariff reckoning begins; E ... 302
United States—Taxation
Abolishing the death duties; E ... 327
Utica [Mississippi] normal and industrial institute; Dt ... 61

V

Van Doren, Mark
A survey of the season's books; S ... 376
First glance; S ... 382, 427, 646, 686, 713
van Loon, Hendrik Willem
Apply tariff common sense to international sport; Ct ... 357
Blow your own horn!; Ct ... 7
Building a new Russia; Ct ... 497
Galeries Lafayette, we are here!; Ct ... 415
Geneva; Ct ... 101
Hendrik van Loon and Rosika Schwimmer. H. W. van Loon; C ... 571
In the presidential year; Ct ... 443
Loot; Ct ... 621
Massachusetts; Ct ... 223
Prosperity—1927; Ct ... 673
Rhythms of the ages; Ct ... 727
The angel of peace in modern dress; Ct ... 701
The optimist; Ct ... 564
The world does change—1077-1927; Ct ... 80
Torture up to date; Ct ... 195
What the European public wants; Ct ... 593
Van Norman, Louis E.
The Eastern edge of Europe; IS ... 44
Van Sweringen, O. P.; S ... 35
"Variety." By Paul Valéry; S ... 377
Vassar Journal of Undergraduate Studies
Display of solemnity by undergraduates copied from their elders; EP ... 3
Veiller, Bayard
Trial of Mary Dugan. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 406
Veterans of foreign wars
Attack Professors Hayes and Moon's "Modern History" as pro-British; EP ... 438
Viereck, George Sylvester; EP ... 145
Villard, Oswald Garrison
Alfred E. Smith; S ... 595
Charles Evans Hughes; S ... 117
Hoover to the fore; S ... 700
Yehudi Menuhin; M ... 742
Vivisection
Only dogs. S. N. Cleghorn; C ... 513
Voltaire
Quotation from pamphlet on Toleration; C ... 306

W

Wagenknecht, Edward
Those maddening pacifists; C ... 253
Wagner, Charles A.
Introduction; P ... 713
Walb, Clyde; EP ... 583
Wald, Lillian; EP ... 464
Walker, Christine; E ... 328
War
Ambassador Houghton tells some more truths; E ... 32
Is war planned in Geneva between England and the United States?; EP ... 47
Senator Borah versus President Coolidge; E ... 618
Voices of European statesmen and generals; E ... 618
War—Gas warfare
Gas warfare not devilish; EP ... 48
War guilt
Another view of war guilt. Historicus; C ... 133
Another view of war guilt. H. Kanner; C ... 86
Ward, Harry F.
China tests our religion; S ... 283
Warner, Arthur
A Sacco revolver expert revealed; S ... 625
Washburne, John N.
Some survive without wine; C ... 451
Wasp's nest; D ... 522
Watson, Blanche
Who'll help?; C ... 425
Watson, John B.
The weakness of women; S ... 9
Watkins, M.
Revelry. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 344
Watters, G. M., and A. Hopkins
Burlesque. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 295
"We." By Charles A. Lindbergh; E ... 125
Wealth
Concentrated control. H. G. Wexler; C ... 513
Weather clear, track fast; D ... 522
Welch, Marie de L.
Song; P ... 378
Wells, H. G.
Warrior Wells and battling Belloc; E ... 194
Wertgen, F.
The farmer's future; C ... 207
Westinghouse electrical company
What can one do with new mechanical man?; EP ... 439
Wexler, Harry G.
Concentrated control; C ... 513
Wheeler, Wayne B.
Wayne B. Wheeler. S. A. Hunter; C ... 339
Wheeler, Wayne B. Obituary; EP ... 239
White, Hal Saunders
This rock; P ... 114
Whitman, Walt
"The good gray poet"; E ... 168
Why Harlan dismissed Walt Whitman. J. Brigham; C ... 685
White-slave traffic; EP ... 668
Whitney, Charlotte Anita; EP ... 49
Wilbur, Curtis D.
Disciplines Rear Admiral Magruder. EP ... 491
Sligh's progressive organizations; E ... 50
Wildes, Harry Emerson
Enlightenment in Philadelphia; C ... 113
Wilkins, Ernest Hatch
Observations in regard to research among teachers; EP ... 593
Wilkinson, Ellen; E ... 104
Williams, Albert Rhys
All over the soviet land; S ... 503
Willison, G. Findley
"Mother Metropolitan"; S ... 599
Winkler, Max
Tables regarding American loans to foreign countries; E ... 1
Winnipeg, Manitoba
Joke of the year. EP ... 669
Winslow, Gertrude L.
A correction; C ... 479
Wisconsin
Staff of new experimental college of State university; EP ... 171
Woman's national committee for law enforcement
Senator Borah scores again; E ... 562
Women
British women in politics. J. Stephen; S ... 71
Explaining feminine men. F. Dell; C ... 86
Half-confessed. J. Collins; S ... 10
Madame Leadway at Oxford, England; EP ... 1
The American woman. R. Estcourt; C ... 57
The American woman. W. H. Hoby; C ... 295
The forward turn. M. Austin; S ... 57
The weaker sex of women. J. B. Watson; S ... 9
Trying to be modern. E. Clare; S ... 7
Why feminism? B. M. Hinkle; S ... 8
Why the American woman is myopic. E. Huntington; S ... 195
Women and politics. E ... 72
Women's co-operative guild. D. Radice; D ... 522
Wood, Charles Erskine Scott
Neathe's curse nor ours; C ... 295
Wood, Leonard
Fight for continuance of Lt. Peake (R. P. R.) court martial; EP ... 49
Leonard Wood. Obituary; E ... 241
Woodbridge, Benjamin M.
Humanity and manufacturing; C ... 57
Woodbridge, Frederick J. E.
Dramatic need stimulates Ireland to "Theatre guild"; D ... 246
Workmen's compensation
Inadequate provisions for children; EP ... 50
World war
Field Marshal Haig declares America's services were not needed; EP ... 30
Lack of religious cause of war; EP ... 145
Wuh, C. C.; EP ... 199

Y

Y. M. C. A.
Student leaders win notable victory over conservatives; EP ... 301
Yorkell, Ernest J.; S ... 625
Young workers' communist league
Victim of police czarism in New Jersey; EP ... 560

Z

Z., A.
A scene from the South; C ... 564
Zaghlul Pasha, Saad. Obituary; EP ... 217
Zaslaw, M.
Soviet courts; IS ... 267
Zed, John
The Lugano spirit; C ... 478
Zinoviev, Gregory; EP ... 532
Zoshchenko, Michael
The patient; S ... 608

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

Absolute at large. K. Capek; B ... 564
Adam and Eve. J. Erskine; AN ... 690
Adams, E. C. L.
Congaree sketches; AN ... 294
Adams, H. C.
Travellers' tales. A book of marvels; AN. 404
Adams, Samuel Hopkins
Revelry; B ... 375
Adventures in Arabia. W. B. Seabrook; B ... 394
Aide de camp of Lee. Sir F. Maurice, editor; B ... 600
Aiken, Conrad
Blue voyage; B ... 254
Akhnaton. D. S. Merezhkovsky; B ... 314
Alexander, Ruth S.; R ... 89, 210
Allen, James Turney
Stage antiquities of the Greeks and Romans and their influence; AN ... 488
America. H. van Loon; B ... 488
American caravan. Van Wyck Brooks, A. Kreymborg, L. Mumford, and P. Rosenfeld, editors; B ... 386
American civil war. D. Knowles; AN ... 388
American labor and American democracy. W. E. Walling; B ... 42
American opinion of France. E. B. White; AN ... 60
American people. T. J. Wertenbaker; AN ... 212
American poetry, 1927. A miscellany; AN ... 456
American policy in Nicaragua. H. L. Stimson; B ... 74
American songbag. C. Sandburg; B ... 634
American spirit in art. F. J. Mather, Jr., C. R. Morey, and W. J. Henderson; AN ... 165
Analysis of matter. B. Russell; B ... 600
Ancient cities and modern tribes. T. Grant; AN ... 9
Anderson, R. Gordon
Those quarrelsome Bonapartes; AN ... 742
Andrássy, count Julius
Bismarck, Andrássy, and their successors; B ... 564
Anet, Claude
End of the world; AN ... 484
Angell, Norman
Public mind. Its disorders, its exploitation; B ... 48
Animal stories the Indians told. E. B. Johnson; AN ... 550
Anonymous
Why women pray. Wise words of the disillusioned; AN ... 390
Architecture in Italy. M. A. Bragg; AN ... 600
Armstrong, Martin
St. Lawrence and madame Jeanne. Tall stories; AN ... 610
Arthur Eloesser
German literature today; B ... 573
Artistic ideals. D. G. Mason; B ... 91
Ashbee, C. R. Essays. J. B. Bury; AN ... 98
Ashenhurst, Rose, A. Kreymborg, and Funnybone alley; AN ... 550
Asquith, Lady Cynthia
Sale of gold. New poems and plays; AN ... 94
Atkinson, J. Brooks
Henry Thoreau, the cosmic Yankee; B ... 630
Auden, W. H.
Lands of the sun; B ... 686
Autobiography of an ex-colored man. J. W. Johnson; AN ... 456
Ayres, C. E.
Science, the false Messiah; B ... 252

B

Bacon, Peggy
Lion-hearted kitten; AN ... 552
Baibus, or the future of architecture. C. Bauman; AN ... 22
Balch, Emily Greene, editor
Occupied Haiti; B ... 315
Ballad for sale. A. Lowell; B ... 98
Ball, V., translator
Travels in India; B ... 122
Bang, Herman
Denied a country; B ... 183

Barman, Christian
... AN.. 22
... AN.. 319
Barnes, Harry Elmer; R..18, 111, 161, 205, 344
Bates, Ernest Sutherland; R... 116, 161, 257
... 130
Bedford, John, editor
... AN 610
Bennett, Arnold
... 342
... AN 130
Bertholet, Alfred ... 264
Bertholet, Alfred
... AN 417
Best, Mary Agnes
... B 66
... editor; B... 480
Bibliography. A classified list of books concerning Indian arts; B 480
Bibliography relating to India (1900-1926); B. 480
... B 316
... Count J. Andrássy; B... 611
Bizzell, W. B.
... AN 117
Boetzman, Edith
Search for Atlantis; AN... 462
... B 429
Black, prof. J. B.
Art of history; AN... 343
Black stream. N. S. Colby; AN... 462
Blake, G. Keynes, editor; B... 713
... B 611
Blum, Pere C., translator. A. B. Harold
... of Buddha, parallels to the legends of ancient India; B... 342
... B 98
... AN 117
Boetzman, Edith
Search for Atlantis; AN... 462
... B 429
Bogert, Abel
... AN 98
Book of Dedy and Cassidy. G. Chaney. R. K. Root, editor. AN 212
... W. Gould. AN 611
... D. T. Lynch; B 601
... G. R 611
Boughton, C. Kenneth
... B 417
Bourchier of Adam. J. G. Farmer. B 518
... B 611
Bowell and Kerr. C. E. Walker. B 611
Bowers, James H.
Conquest of civilization; AN... 117
... B 462
Boyesen, Hjalmar H.
... AN 488
Brentano, Paul
... earliest times; AN... 582
... B 230
Brewer of San Luis Rey. T. Wright. B 687
Bridgman, P. W.
Logic of modern physics; B 115
Briggs, Alvin, compiler
... AN 456
Briggs, Martin S.
... AN 611
... AN 44
... B 161
Brody, Alter; R.. .19, 164, 257, 652, 715, 716
Bromfield, Louis
Good woman; B... 586
... L. Mumford, and P. Rosenfeld, editors
American caravan; a yearbook of American literature; B... 282
... AN 36
... B 611
Brown, Lewis
... B 611
... B 611
Bruère, Martha Bensley
Does prohibition work?; AN... 21
... B 116
... AN 36
... B 611
... B 116
Buddha. See also Gotama the Buddha
... in the night. B. Benefield; AN... 610
... AN 611
Burkitt, F. C.; preface, J. Warschauer
Historical life of Christ; AN... 611
Burrell, Angus; R... 716
Burt, Struthers
... B 42
... B 611
... 660
Butler, Samuel, and his family relations. Mrs. R. S. Garnett; AN... 741
Butler, Samuel. C. E. M. Joad; AN... 742
Butler, Samuel, historical and critical review. W. G. Rutherford; AN 611
Butler, Samuel. P. J. De Lange. AN 611
Byrne, Donn
... AN 54

C

Cabell, James Branch
... B 611
Cahill, Holger
Profane earth; AN... 484
Calhoun, Arthur
Worker looks at government; B... 42
... R 611
... M. J. Newlon; AN 485
... B. M. Stewart; AN... 117
Capek, Karel
Absolute at large; B... 164
Carco, Francis
... AN 611
Carlyle at his zenith. D. A. Wilson; AN... 716
... B 611
... R 184
Case, Shirley Jackson
Jesus; a new biography; B... 455
Cather, Willa
... B 611
Catlin, G. E. G.
... B 116
... R 611
... AN 484
... B 611
... H. Rose. B 611
... B 611
Chalmers, lord
Further dialogues of the Buddha; AN. 754
Chapman, Charles R.
... AN 611
... R 611
... B 116
... B 611
Book of Troilus and Criseyde; AN... 212
... B 611
... F. Weyer. AN 611
... (H. H. Milman) AN 611
... B 611
... B 611
... AN 611
Civil war and readjustment in Kentucky. E. M. Coulter; AN... 138
... AN 611
... B 611
Cline, Leonard
Dark chamber; B... 586
Coad, Oral Sumner; R... 42
... B 611
... AN 611
... B 611
... B 611
... Michael. P. Beaslai; B... 611
... AN 98
... B. J. Lowry. D 611
... AN 611
... AN 611
House of lost identity; B... 586
... AN 611
... B 611
Covering Washington. J. F. Essary; B... 135
... AN 185
Cross, Wilbur L., editor
Sentimental journey through France and Italy, with selections from the journals, sermons, and correspondence of Laurence Sterne; AN... 43
Cross, Wilbur L., introduction by Life and opinions of Tristram Shandy; AN 43
Cullen, Countee
Copper sun; B... 518
Cummins, John, and J. Bulk
Voyage to the South Seas in his majesty's ship Wager in the years 1740-1741; AN.. 212

D

D., H.
Hippolytus temporizes; B... 382
Daglish, E. F. illustrator of Walden; B... 650
... R 116
... L. Cohen. B 586
Davis, Elmer
... AN 484
Davis, Jerome, and H. E. Barnes, editors
Introduction to sociology; AN... 319
Davis, Richard Harding
... AN 484
Death comes for the archbishop. W. Cather; B 586
Death of a young man. W. L. River; B... 211
Declaration of love. G. Dennis; AN... 484 de Gourmont, Rémy. L. Galantière, translator
... AN 663
de Haas, Jacob
... B 645
de Ibarra, Francisco, and Nueva Vizcaya. L. Mecham; B... 184
Delaisi, Francis
Political myths and economic realities; B.. 575
... AN 742
Delectable mountains. S. Burt; B... 67
Dell, Floyd
An unmarried father; B... 652
... B 392
Delteil, Joseph. J. Leclercq, translator
Poilus; AN... 43
de Montherlant, Henry
Bullfighters; AN... 663
Denied a country. H. Bang; B... 184
Dennis, Geoffrey
Declaration of love; AN... 484
Dent, Edward J.
Terpander, or music and the future; B.. 21
... H. Sudermann; B... 660
De Sade, marquis, S. Putnam, translator
Dialogue between a priest and a dying man; AN 582
Development of the theater; A. Nicoll; AN.. 582
... De Sade, S. Putnam, translator; AN.. 582
... D. Diderot, F. Birrell, translator; AN 137
... of Plato. B. Jowett, translator. W. C. Greene, editor; AN... 43
Diary of a country parson. J. Beresford, editor; AN... 403
Dibble, R. F.; R... .401, 650
Dickman, Major General Joseph Theodore. J. J. Pershing, foreword
Great crusade; B... 182
Dictionary of Canadian biography. W. S. Wallace, compiler; AN... 137
Diderot, Denis. F. Birrell, translator
Dialogues; AN... 137
... epistles in Mexico, Bermuda, and China. H. L. Wilson. B... 116
Dobie, J. Frank; R... .41, 429
... Valentine
Young cuckoo sings by kind; B... 115
Dodd, Lee Wilson
Golden complex; defense of inferiority; AN. 21
Dodd, William E., C. Becker, J. M. Clark
Spirit of '76 and other essays; AN... 319
... prohibition work? M. B. Bruère; AN... 21
Dole, Charles F.
My early years; B... 652
... pioneers of the Americans. F. Tolles; AN 403
... See Life of Don Quixote and Sancho
... Paul R., translator
... Victor Hugo. B. Fay; B 608
Dorsenne, Jean
... fondamentale de Paul Gauguin; B 688
Dorsey, George A.
Evolution of Charles Darwin; AN... 138
... Donald
... B 429
Down stream and other works. J. K. Huysmans. S. Putman, translator; AN... 582 Dream of a woman. R. de Gourmont. L. Galantière, translator; AN... 663
... E. R Graves. AN 91
... Rebecca
... of Jacobites; B 545
... of France. M. Feuerlicht. B 211
... Lewis
French society in the eighteenth century. AN 185

Dunne, J. W.
Experiment with time; AN..... 233
Durant, William
Transition; B..... 427
Dusty answer. R. Lehmann; B..... 575
Dziewicki, M. H., translator
Promised land. L. Reymont; B..... 715

E

Earle, Homer P., translator
Life of Don Quixote and Sancho. According to Miguel Cervantes de Saavedra. M. de Unamuno; B..... 578
Eastman, Max
Venture; B..... 710
Economic and social conditions in France during the eighteenth century. H. Sée, E. H. Zeydel, translator; AN..... 185
Eddy, Sherwood, and K. Page
Makers of freedom; AN..... 212
Edge, William
Main stem; B..... 429
Edman, Irwin; R.....232, 262
Education of India. A. Mayhew; B..... 480
Eight bells. Sailors' snug harbor yarns and ballads. F. Waters; AN..... 138
Eliot, Clara
Farmer's campaign for credit; AN..... 117
Elliott, W. Y; R..... 453
End of the world. C. Anet; AN..... 484
Engels, Friedrich
Peasant war in Germany; B..... 290
Employment statistics for the United States. R. G. Hurlin and W. A. Berridge, editors; AN..... 264
Erasmus, Desiderius of Rotterdam. J. Mangan; B..... 137
Ernst, Morris L.; R..... 134
Erskine, John
Adam and Eve; AN..... 690
Essary, J. Frederick
Covering Washington; B..... 135
Europa year book, 1927. M. Farbman, R. Muir, and H. F. Spender, editors; AN..... 343
Evans, Ernestine; R.....430, 687
Evergreen tree. K. Millay; B..... 715
Evolution of Charles Darwin. G. A. Dorsey; AN..... 138
Exile. M. Johnson; AN..... 663
Experiment with time. J. W. Dunne; AN... 233

F

Fadiman, Clifton P.; R..396, 454, 515, 575, 608, 687, 738
Fadiman, Clifton P.
On contemporary American fiction; B.... 642
Fall of Robespierre and other essays. A. Mathiez; AN..... 294
Farbman, Michael, R. Muir, and H. F. Spender, editors
Europa year book, 1927; AN..... 343
Farm income and farm life. A symposium on the relation of the social and economic factors in rural progress; AN..... 688
Farmer's campaign for credit. C. Eliot; AN.. 117
Fascist dictatorship in Italy. G. Salvemini; B. 453
Fay, Bernard, P. R. Doolin, translator
Since Victor Hugo; B..... 608
Feinstein, Martin
Drums of panic; B..... 211
Ferguson, W. K.; R..... 137
Fergusson, Harvey
Wolf song; AN..... 263
Field, Rachel
Magic pawnshop; AN..... 550
Field, Robert. H. Piers; B..... 318
Field, Sara Bard
Pale woman; B..... 715
Figner, Vera
Memoirs of a revolutionist; B..... 208
Fischer, Louis; R.....90, 514
Five Weeks: the surge of public opinion on the eve of the great war. J. F. Scott; B.. 18
Fletcher, John Gould
Branches of Adam; B..... 518
Flower show. D. Mackail; AN..... 481
Flowering quince. D. Van Doren; B..... 130
Foreshore of England, or under the red ensign. H. M. Tomlinson; B..... 516
Fraenkel, Michael; R..... 688
Francke, Kuno
German after-war problems; B..... 114
French literature today. L. Lewisohn; B.... 572
French society in the eighteenth century. L. Ducros; AN..... 185
From Bismarck to the world war. E. Brandenburg; B..... 43
From Gallegher to the deserter. R. H. Davis; AN..... 184
From man to man. O. Schreiner; B..... 210
Funnybone alley. A. Kreymborg. B. Artzybasheff, illustrator; AN..... 550
Further dialogues of the Buddha. Lord Chalmers; AN..... 233

G

Galantière, Lewis; R.....658, 739
Galantière, Lewis, translator
Dream of a woman. R. de Gourmont; AN. 663
Gale, Zona
Yellow gentians and blue; B..... 738
Gallions reach. H. M. Tomlinson; B..... 516
Gann, Thomas
Ancient cities and modern tribes: exploration and adventure in Maya lands; AN. 22
Gannett, Lewis S.; R.....315, 741
Gard, Wayne
Book reviewing; AN..... 212
Garnett, Mrs. R. S.
Samuel Butler and his family relations; AN. 741
Gateway of life. F. Thiess; B..... 575
Gauguin, Paul, la vie sentimentale de. J. Dorsenue; B..... 688
Gautier and the romantics. J. G. Palache; AN..... 292
Gay-neck. D. G. Mukerji; AN..... 552
General theory of value. R. B. Perry; AN.. 22
Genghis Khan. H. Lamb; B..... 401
Genzmer, George; R.....182, 209
German after-war problems. K. Francke; B.. 114
German literature today. A. Eloesser; B.... 573
German world policy. O. Hammann; B..... 43
Gershoy, Leo; R..... 135
Giants in the earth. O. E. Rölvang; B..... 41
Gide, André
Counterfeiters; B..... 454
Si le gram ne meurt; B..... 739
Giese, William F.
Victor Hugo: the man and the poet; AN.. 292
Gillespie, Frances Elmar
Labor and politics in England, 1850-1867; AN..... 520
Girl from Rector's. G. Rector; AN..... 69
Gissing, George
Victim of circumstances; B..... 716
Give the people their own war power. T. H. Shastid; B..... 608
God got one vote. F. H. Brennan; AN..... 484
Goebel, Dorothy Burne
William Henry Harrison; a political biography; AN..... 164
Golden complex: defense of inferiority. L. W. Dodd; AN..... 21
Gooch, G. P.
Recent revelations of European diplomacy; B..... 114
Gooch, G. P., and H. Temperley, editors
British documents on the origins of the war: the outbreak of the war, June 28-August 4, 1914; B..... 161
Good woman. L. Bromfield; B..... 258
Gorman, Herbert; R.....386, 518
Gorman, Herbert S.
Hawthorne: a study in solitude; B..... 482
Place called Dagon; B..... 608
Gotama the Buddha, life of. E. H. Brewster, compiler; B..... 230
Gottschalk, Louis R.
Jean Paul Marat, a study in radicalism; B..... 135
Grandmothers. G. Wescott; B..... 396
Great crusade. J. T. Dickman, J. J. Pershing, foreword; B..... 182
Great poems of the English language. A. Briggs, compiler; AN..... 456
Green rising. W. B. Bizzell; AN..... 117
Greene, William Chase, editor
Dialogues of Plato; AN..... 43
Greville diary. P. W. Wilson, editor; B..... 654
Griffith, Ernest S.
Modern development of city government in the United Kingdom and the United States; AN..... 741 Groves, Ernest R.
Drifting home; AN..... 91
Gruen, William; R..... 604
Guedalla, Philip
Palmerston; AN..... 117
Guiney, Louise Imogen
Happy endings; B..... 745

H

Hagrin, B. H.; R..... 91
Hamlin, Talbot Faulkner; R..... 455
Hammann, O.
German world policy; B..... 43
Handbuch der altarabischen altertumskunde [by] D. Nielsen and N. Rhodokanakis; B..... 340
Hapgood, Norman; R..... 646
Hapgood, Norman, and H. Moskowitz
Up from the city streets: Alfred E. Smith; B..... 548
Hapgood, Norman, editor
Professional patriots; B..... 66
Happy endings. L. I. Guiney; B..... 745
Harper's literary museum. O. F. Wiswell, compiler; AN..... 302
Harrison, William Henry. D. R. Goebel; AN. 164
Harsha, R. Mookerji; AN..... 318
Hart, Albert Bushnell, and W. M. Schuyler, editors
American year book. A record of events and progress for the year 1926; AN..... 165
Hastings, George Everett
Life and works of Francis Hopkinson; B. 484
Hawthorn, Horace Bone
Sociology of rural life; AN..... 11
Hawthorne. H. Gorman; B..... 482
Hearnshaw, F. J. C., editor
Social and political ideas of some great thinkers of the Renaissance and the Reformation; B..... 662
Hemingway, Ernest
Men without women; B..... 548
Henderson, William James, F. J. Mather, jr., and C. R. Morey
American spirit in art; AN..... 402
Herford, C. H., and P. Simpson, editors
Works of Ben Jonson; AN..... 518
Herold, A. Ferdinand, P. C. Blum, translator
Life of Buddha, according to the legends of ancient India; B..... 342
Herskovits, Melville J.; R..... 292
Herzl, Theodore. J. de Haas; B..... 645
Hibben, Paxton
Henry Ward Beecher: an American portrait; B..... 648
Hippolytus temporizes. "H. D."; B..... 382
Hirst, Francis W.
Safeguarding and protection in Great Britain and the United States; B..... 230
Historical life of Christ. J. Warschauer, F. C. Burkitt, preface; AN..... 185
History of Anthony Waring. M. Sinclair; B. 481
History of England. G. M. Trevelyan; B..... 262
History of Hebrew civilization. A. Bertholet; AN..... 117
History of prostitution. P. La Croix, S. Putnam, translator; AN..... 69
History of socialist thought. H. W. Laidler; B. 20
History of the American drama. A. H. Quinn; B..... 713
History of the ancient world. M. Rostovtzeff; B..... 390
History of the Cuban republic. C. R. Chapman; AN..... 404
History of the people of the United States during Lincoln's administration. J. B. McMaster; B..... 289
Hobson, J. A.; R..... 514
Holmes, John Haynes; R.....455, 608, 652
Hommel, geheimrat Fr., und N. Rhodokanakis
Handbuch der altarabischen altertumskunde; B..... 340
Hopkinson, Francis, life and works of. G. E. Hastings; B..... 182
Hose, Charles
Natural man: a record from Borneo; AN. 165
Hourwich, Rebecca
What books shall my small child read?; B. 546
Hourwich, Rebecca; R..... 134
House of lost identity. D. Corley; B..... 483
How red is America? W. Irwin; AN..... 343
Hugo, Victor. W. F. Giese; AN..... 292
Hull, Helen
Islanders; B..... 89
Human body. L. Clendening; B..... 427
Hurlin, Ralph G., and W. A. Berridge, editors
Employment statistics for the United States; AN..... 264
Hutchison, Keith; R.....42, 654
Huysmans, J. K., S. Putnam, translator
Down stream, and other works; AN..... 582

I

I know a secret. C. Morley; AN..... 552
In China, 1920-21. A. Bonnard; AN..... 22
India in 1925-26. J. Coatman; B..... 486
Indians of North America. E. Kenton, editor; AN..... 403
India's past. A. A. Macdonnell; AN..... 520
Ingersoll, Colonel Bob. C. Rogers; B..... 90
Insurance trusts. C. A. Scully; AN..... 348
International problems. T. Tatsuo; AN..... 26
Introduction to social psychology. L. L. Bernard; B..... 342
Introduction to sociology. J. Davis and H. E. Barnes, editors; AN..... 319
Irwin, Margaret
Knock four times; AN..... 40
Irwin, Will
How red is America?; AN..... 343
Islanders. H. Hull; B..... 89
Italian primitives at Yale [by] R. Offner; AN..... 664
I think I remember. M. King-Hall; AN..... 456

J

Jacobs, Alma, memorial ed. J. Oppenheim, ed. [by] B..... 578
Jacques Credo. A. E. Kroll; AN..... 66
Jaeger, M. de la Roche; B..... 570
Jastrow, Joseph; B.....347, 481, 662
Jean-Aubry, G.
Joseph Conrad: life and letters; B..... 387
Jeffers, Robinson
Women at Point Sur; B..... 88
Jefferson and embargo. L. M. Sears; AN.... 238
Jewish a cappella music. S. L. Cohen; B..... 386
Jewish daily bulletin index. A key to news items in the Jewish bulletin, v. 1-3, no. 1-Dec. 31, 1926. AN..... 344
Joad, C. E. M.
Samuel Butler; AN..... 41
Joffe, Judah A., translator
Modern Russian composers. L. Sabaneyeff; AN..... 520
Johnson, Elizabeth Bishop
Animal stories the Indians told; AN..... 550
Johnson, James Weldon
Autobiography of an ex-colored man; AN. 459
Johnson, Mary
Exile; AN..... 663
Johnstone, G. H.
Prosper Mérimée; a mask and a face; AN. 104
Jonson, Ben, works of. C. H. Herford and P. Simpson, editors; AN..... 518
Jowett, Benjamin, translator. W. C. Greene, editor
Dialogues of Plato; AN..... 43
Joyce, James
Ponies poneach; AN..... 403
Judaism in the first centuries of the Christian era. G. F. Moore; B..... 182

K

Kathleen. Arbel.
Kantor, Lee
Kenton, Edna, editor
Kerr, Albert Boardman
Keynes, Geoffrey, editor
Keyserling, count Hermann
Kingdom of [illegible]. W. D. Orcutt. AN 484
King-Hall, Magdalen
I think I remember; AN. 456
Knock, Ian James. M. Lewis; AN 103
Knowles, David
Kommof, Mikhail, [illegible]
Kreymborg, Alfred, R. Arrowsmith, illustrator
Funnybone alley; AN. 550
Krutch, Joseph Wood; R. 67, 377, 390, 428, 481, 548, 643, 713
Kuntz, Joshua. R 485, 714

L

Labor and politics in England. F. E. Gillespie; AN 470
La Croix, Paul, & Putnam, translators
History of prostitution; AN. 69
Laidler, Harry W.
Lamb, Harold
Lampoons. H. Wolfe; AN 104
Lands of the sun. M. Arnaud. B 656
Langer, William L., R 68
Lardner, Ring
Story of a wonder man; AN. 69
Laski, Harold J. R
Laski, Harold J.
Communism; B. 260
Latimer, Margery; R. 429
Law of organized labor and industrial conflicts. E. S. Oakes; B 484
Lawrence, D. H.
Mornings in Mexico; B. 257
Leclercq, Jacques, translator
Poilus. J. Delteil; AN. 43
Lee, Ivy L.
USSR (union of soviet socialist republics), a world enigma; B. 514
Lehman, Raymond
Leonard, William Ellery
Locomotive god; B. 428
Leppor, John Heron, translator
Complete poems of François Villon; AN. 43
Levy, Melvin P.
Wedding; B. 183
Lewis, Ethelreda, editor
Lewis, J. H., translator
Ingenious hidalgo Miguel Cervantes. H. Rytor, R
Lewis, Wyndham
Time and western man. B 642
Lewisohn, Ludwig
French literature today; B. 572
Lewis, Mrs. C. I.
Magic of herbs, a modern book of simples. AN 118
Life and opinions of Tristram Shandy. L. Sterne. W. L. Cross, introduction. AN 46
Life, journalism, and politics. J. A. Spender. B 643
Life of Don Quixote and Sancho. M. de Unamuno. H. P. Earle, translator. B 705
Lion-hearted kitten. P. Bacon; AN. 552
Lippmann, Walter
Men of destiny. B 666
Living constitution. H. L. McBain; B. 116
Loeb classical library
Plutarch's moralia, vol. I, F. C. Babbitt, translator. Geography of Strabo, vol. IV, H. L. Jones, translator. Cicero: pro lege Manila, pro Caecina, pro Cluentio, pro Rabirio. Perduellionis. Aristotle: the poetics. "Longinus": on the sublime. Demetrius: on style. W. H. Fyfe and W. R. Roberts, translators; AN. 456
Locomotive god. W. E. Leonard. B 428
Logic of modern physics. P. E. Bridgman; B 115
Lord Grey und der weltkrieg. H. Lutz; B 68
Love child. E. Olivier; B. 341
Lowell, Amy
Ballads for sale; B. 382
Lowie, R. H.
Origin of the state; B. 656
Luhrs, Marie; R. 341, 550
Lutz, Hermann
Lord Grey und der weltkrieg; B. 68
Lynch, Denis Tilden
"Boss" Tweed; B. 604
Lyons, Eugene
Life and death of Sacco and Vanzetti. B 68

M

McBain, Howard Lee
Living constitution; B. 116
MacDonald, William; R. 230, 550
Macdonnell, A. A.
History of A survey of his traditions, religions, languages, and antiquities; AN. 520
Mackail, Denis
Flower show. AN 484
Macken zie, Agnes Mure
Playgoer's handbook to the English renaissance drama; AN. 664
McKeon, Richard; R. 317
McMaster, John Bach
History of the people of the United States during Lincoln's administration. B 398
Macy, John; R. 398
Magic of herbs. Mrs. C. F. Leyel; AN. 138
Magic pawnshop. R. Field; AN. 550
Main street. W. Edge. B 122
Makers of freedom. K. Page and S. Eddy. AN 212
Man who saw through heaven and other stories. W. D. Snaith. B 708
Mangan, James
Life, character, and influence of Desiderius Erasmus of Rotterdam. B 397
Manly, John Matthews
Some new light on Chaucer. B 382
Manning, Clarence A., translator
Prince of outlaws. A. K. Tolstoy. B 514
Mansfield, Katherine, journal of; AN. 716
Marat, J. Paul. L. R. Gottschalk; B 115
Marshall, Lenore G.; R. 715
Mason, Daniel Gregory
Artistic ideals; B. 91
Mather, Frank Jewett, jr., C. R. Morey, and W. J. Henderson
American spirit in art; AN. 402
Mathiez, Albert
Fall of Robespierre and other essays. AN 704
Mattock, J. Stevens; AN. 43
Maude, Aylmer, editor
Private diary of Leo Tolstoy, 1853-1857. AN 480
Maurice, Sir Frederick, editor
Maxse, Marcia
Mayhew, Arthur
Education of India; B. 480
Mayo, Katherine
Mother India; B. 40
Meade, Norah; R. 232, 661
Meanwhile (the picture of a lady). H. G. Wells. B 651
Mecham, Lloyd
Francisco de Paula and Nueva Vizcaya. B 184
Medina, R. I.
Three Swedes. AN 402
Memoirs of a revolutionist. V. Lidine. B 288
Menaker, B. L., R 427
Men of destiny. W. Lippmann. B 666
Men without women. E. Hemingway; B. 548
Mende, Elsie Porter, H. G. Pearson, collaborator
American soldier and diplomat: Horace Porter. B 714
Merezhkovsky, Dimitri S.
Death of the gods. B 114
Akhnaton; B. 316
Mérimée, Prosper. G. H. Johnson; AN. 164
Millay, Kathleen
Impressions from B 717
Milne, Susan Gertrude
Death. A tragedy. B 88
Minutes of the year. G. Overton, editor. AN 136
Missouri, development of city government in the United States. [illegible] for the United States. E. S. Corwin. B 741
Modern Russian composers. L. Sabaneyeff, J. A. Joffe, translators. AN 484
Montague, C. E.
Hindle Wakes. B 644
Mookerji, Radhakumud
Hindu. AN 418
Moore, H. D. Durham. B 644
Moore, Virginia. D. Rivers. AN 402
Moore, Grace. E. B. Young. AN 402
Moore, Harriet
Outlaw. AN 484
Moore, George Edward
Judgment on the final proposals of the Chinese commission of the Washington. B 284
More, Thomas, and his friends. A. Kincaid, B 288
More, Charles Arthur. F. J. Mather, jr., and W. J. Henderson
American spirit in art. AN 402
Morley, Christopher
Thunder on the right. AN 252
Morrison, C. C.
Outlaws of war. B 644
Morrow, Honoré, and N. Hapgood
Up from city streets. Alfred E. Smith. B 548
Mother India. K. Mayo. B 40
Mott, Martha; R. 211, 290
Mountsier, Mabel
Sitting pretty; an anthology of poems by children; B. 210
Muir, Ramsay, M. Farbman, and H. F. Spender, editors
Europa year book, 1927; AN. 343
Mukerji, Dhan Gopal
Gay-neck; AN. 552
Mullen, Grace, R 740
Mumford, Lewis, Van W. Brooks, A. Kreymborg, P. Rosenfeld, editors
American caravan; a yearbook of American literature. B 386
Muret, Maurice
Twilight of the white races; AN. 319
My visiting years. C. F. Dole. B 652
My heart and my flesh. E. M. Roberts; B 668
Mystic maze. A. E. Crawley. T. Besterman, reviser; AN. 185

N

National history of France. F. Brentano; AN. 582
Natural man. C. Hose; AN. 165
Nathaniel; the story of Nathaniel Bowditch. A. Stanford; B. 398
Negro in the reconstruction of Virginia. A. A. Taylor; AN. 484
New horizons for a new age. E. A. Parr. B 455
Newbigin, Marion I.
Canada. The great river, the lands, and the men; AN. 185
Newcomb, Rexford
Spanish house for America; AN. 185
Next age of man. A. E. Wiggam; B 580
Nicoll, Allardyce
Development of the theater; AN. 582
Nicolson, Harold
Some people; B. 739
Niles, Abbe; R. 19
Norris, Charles G.
Zelda Marsh; AN. 484

O

O rare Ben Jonson. B. Steel; AN. 402
Oakes, Edwin Stacey
Law of organized labor and industrial conflicts; B. 481
O'Brien, Edward J.
Best short stories of 1927; B. 738
Best British short stories of 1927; B. 738
Occupied Haiti. E. G. Balch, editor; B 315
Ocean tramps. E. Williams, editor; AN. 212
Ockham, William of, the de imperatorum et pontificum potestate of. C. K. Brampton, editor; B. 317
Offner, Richard
Studies in Florentine painting: fourteenth century; AN. 91
Italian primitives at Yale university. Comments and revisions; AN. 664
Ogg, Frederic Austin
Builders of the republic; AN. 402
Olivier, Edith
Love child; B. 341
On contemporary American fiction. C. P. Fadiman; B. 642
On the steppes. J. N. Rosenberg; AN. 664
O'Neil, George
White rooster; B. 262
Oppenheim, J., introduction by Memoirs of Aletta Jacobs. B 578
Orcutt, William Dana
Kingdom of books; AN. 484
Ordeal of civilization. J. H. Robinson; AN. 212
Oriental encounters. M. Pickthall; B. 394
Origin of the state. R. H. Lowie; B. 656
Other doors. A. Linington; AN. 456
Our times. M. Sullivan; B. 656
Outlawry of war. C. C. Morrison; B 396
Overton, Grant, editor
Mirrors of the year. A national review of outstanding figures, trends, and events of 1926-27; AN. 165
Owen, Robert Latham
Russian imperial conspiracy. B 208
Oxford edition of standard authors
Edgar Allan Poe. Tales of mystery. Poems and miscellanies. AN 456

P

Packard, Sidney R., R 262
Page, Kirby, and S. Eddy
Makers of freedom; AN. 212
Pageant of America, vols. VIII and XII; AN. 402
Pageant of India. A. Waley. AN 520
Paine, Thomas. M. A. Best. B 65
Paish, Sir George. G. E. Roberts, foreword
Road to prosperity. B 163
Palache, John Gardner
Gautier and the romantics; AN. 292
Pale woman. S. B. Field. B 715
Palmerston. P. Guedalla; AN. 117
Park, Edwin Avery
New backgrounds for a new age. B 455
Parrington, Vernon Louis; R 182
Parsons, Alice Beal; R. 278, 483
Pascoe, textile studio. M. H. Vose. AN 212
Patches of blue and gold. P. Wilstach; AN. 716
Pearson, Henry Greenleaf, collaborator
American soldier and diplomat: Horace Porter. E. P. Mende. B 714

Peasant war in Germany. F. Engels; B..... 290
Peck, Walter Edwin
Shelley: his life and works; AN..... 664
Perry, Ralph Barton
General theory of value; AN..... 22
Pershing, General John J., foreword
Great crusade. J. T. Dickman; B..... 182
Phelps, Edith M.
Civil liberty; AN..... 484
Phillips, Marion
Women and the miners' lock-out; AN..... 404
Physiology of taste. J. A. Brillat-Savarin; AN. 43
Pickthall, Marmaduke
Oriental encounters; B..... 394
Pierre-Quint, Leon
Marcel Proust. His life and work; AN.. 69
Piers, Harry
Robert Field; B..... 318
Place called Dagon. H. S. Gorman; B..... 608
Plague in Shakespeare's London. F. P. Wilson; AN..... 610
Plague of juveniles. R. Drucker; B..... 545
Platonism and the spiritual life. G. Santayana; B..... 316
Playgoer's handbook to the English renaissance drama. A. M. Mackenzie; AN..... 664
Poe, Edgar Allan. Oxford edition of standard authors; AN..... 456
Poilus. J. Delteil, J. Leclercq, translator; AN. 43
Political myths and economic realities. F. Delaisi; B..... 575
Pomes penyeach. J. Joyce; AN..... 403
Porter, Horace. E. P. Mende. H. G. Pearson, collaborator; B..... 714
Potamkin, Harry Alan; R.....91, 210
Powys, Llewelyn; R..... 115
Primer of medieval Latin. C. H. Beeson; AN. 212
Primitive hearths in the Pyrenees. R. O. Sawtelle and I. Treat; B..... 291
Primitive man as philosopher. P. Radin; B.. 662
Prince of outlaws. A. K. Tolstoy, C. A. Manning, translator; B..... 514
Pringle, Henry F.
Alfred E. Smith. A critical study; B.... 384
Problems in Shakespeare's penmanship. S. A. Tannenbaum; AN..... 318
Profane earth. H. Cahill; AN..... 484
Professional patriots. N. Hapgood, editor; B. 66
Promised land. L. Reymont, M. H. Dziewicki, translator; B..... 715
Proust, Marcel. L. Pierre-Quint; AN..... 69
Psychology: a simplification. L. R. Coleman and S. Commins; AN..... 22
Public mind. N. Angell; B..... 136
Putnam, Samuel, translator
History of prostitution. P. La Croix; AN. 69
Down stream, and other works; AN..... 582
Dialogue between a priest and a dying man; AN..... 582
Pyramid. S. Vines; B..... 518

Q

Quinn, Arthur Hobson
History of the American drama. From the civil war to the present day; B..... 713

R

Radin, Paul
Primitive man as philosopher; B..... 662
Ramondt-Hirschmann, C.; R..... 578
Rebel earl and other papers. W. Roughead; AN..... 404
Recent revelations of European diplomacy. G. P. Gooch; B..... 114
Rector, George
Girl from Rector's; AN..... 69
Red Crow's brother. J. W. Schultz; AN..... 552
Red damask. E. Sachs; AN..... 69
Red flag. L. Ridge; B..... 19
Religion called behaviorism. L. Berman; AN.. 430
Requiem. H. Wolfe; AN..... 404
Revelry. S. H. Adams; B..... 375
Reymont, Ladislas, M. H. Dziewicki, translator
Promised land; B..... 715
Rhodokanakis, prof. Nik., und Fr. Hommel
Handbuch der altarabischen altertumskunde; B..... 310
Riata and spurs. C. A. Siringo; B..... 41
Ridge, Lola
Red flag; B..... 19
Right off the map. C. E. Montague; B..... 515
Right to be happy. Mrs. B. Russell; B..... 580
River, W. L.
Death of a young man; B..... 211
Road to prosperity. Sir G. Paish, G. E. Roberts, foreword; B..... 163
Roberts, Elizabeth Madox
My heart and my flesh; B..... 606
Roberts, George E.
Road to prosperity. G. Paish; B..... 163
Robinson, James Harvey
Ordeal of civilization; AN..... 212
Robinson, Luther E.; R..... 656
Roche, Mazo de la
Jalna; B..... 550
Rockow, Lewis; R..... 136
Rogers, Cameron
Colonel Bob Ingersoll; B..... 90
Rölvang, O. E.
Giants in the earth; B..... 11
Romance of Villon. F. Carco; AN..... 402
Root, Robert Kilburn, editor
Book of Troilus and Criseyde; AN..... 212
Rorty, James; R..... 686
Rosenberg, James N.
On the steppes; AN..... 664
Rosenfeld, Paul, Van W. Brooks, A. Kreymborg, L. Mumford, editors
American caravan: a yearbook of American literature; B..... 386
Ross, Mary; R..... 67
Rostovtzeff, Michael
History of the ancient world; B..... 330
Roughead, William
Rebel earl and other papers; AN..... 404
Rowe, Dorothy
Moon's birthday; AN..... 550
Rozanov, V. V., S. S. Koteliansky, translator
Solitaria, together with matter from the apocalypse of our time; B..... 515
Russell, Bertrand
Analysis of matter; B..... 604
Selected papers of Bertrand Russell; AN 664
Russell, Mrs. Bertrand
Right to be happy; B..... 580
Russian imperial conspiracy. R. L. Owen; B. 208
Rustic elegies. E. Sitwell; B..... 382
Ryner, Han, J. H. Lewis, translator
Ingenious hidalgo Miguel Cervantes; B.... 20

S

Sabaneyeff, Leonid, J. A. Joffe, translator
Modern Russian composers; AN..... 520
Sacco and Vanzetti, life and death of. E. Lyons; B..... 687
Sachs, Emanie
Red damask; AN..... 69
Safeguarding and protection in Great Britain and the United States. F. W. Hirst; B. 230
Sails of gold. C. Asquith, editor; AN..... 552
Saki (H. H. Munro)
Unbearable Bassington; AN..... 663
Chronicles of Clovis; AN..... 663
Salvemini, Gaetano
Fascist dictatorship in Italy; B..... 453
Samples: a collection of stories; B..... 738
Sandburg, Carl
American songbag; B..... 646
Santayana, George
Platonism and the spiritual life; B..... 316
Sawtell, Ruth Otis, and I. Treat
Primitive hearths in the Pyrenees. The story of a summer's expedition in the haunts of prehistoric man; B..... 291
Sawyer, Joseph Dillaway
Washington; B..... 317
Schelling, Felix E.
Shakespeare and demi-science; AN..... 664
Schlink, F. J., and S. Chase
Your money's worth. A study in the waste of the consumer's dollar; B..... 134
Schmidt, Nathaniel; R..... 340
Schreiner, Olive
From man to man; B..... 210
Schultz, James Willard
Red Crow's brother; AN..... 552
Schuyler, William M., and A. B. Hart, editors
American year book. A record of events and progress for the year 1926; AN.... 165
Science and method of politics. G. E. G. Catlin; B..... 136
Science, the false Messiah. C. E. Ayres, B. 232
Scott, Jonathan French
Five weeks: the surge of public opinion on the eve of the great war; B..... 18
Scully, C. Alison
Insurance trusts. A manual for attorneys and life underwriters; AN..... 343
Seabrook, W. B.
Adventures in Arabia; B..... 394
Seagle, William; R..... 394
Search for Atlantis. E. Bjorkman; AN..... 402
Sears, Louis Martin
Jefferson and embargo; AN..... 233
Sée, Henry, E. H. Zeydel, translator
Economic and social conditions in France during the eighteenth century; AN..... 185
Scham, Max and Grete
Tired child; AN..... 138
Sentimental journey. L. Sterne, W. L. Cross, editor; AN..... 43
Servant of the machines. Mrs. A. Wingate, B. 401
Shakespeare and demi-science. F. E. Schelling; AN..... 664
Shakespeare studies. E. E. Stoll; B..... 209
Shastid, Thomas Hall
Give the people their own war power. B..... 108
Shelley. W. E. Peck; AN..... 664
Shepard, Odell
Heart of Thoreau's journals; B..... 650
Should we be vaccinated? B. J. Stern. B..... 292
Si le rendit ne meurt. A. Gide. B..... 709
Simpson, Percy, and C. H. Herford, editors
Works of Ben Jonson; AN..... 548
Since Victor Hugo. B. Fay, P. R. Doolin, translator; B..... 608
Sinclair, May
History of Anthony Waring; B..... 481
Sinclair, Upton, a study in social purpose. F. Dell; B..... 292
Singing youth. M. Mountsier. B..... 210
Siringo, Charles A.
Riata and spurs; B..... 41
Sir Pompey and madame Juno and other tales. M. Armstrong; AN..... 610
Sitwell, Edith
Rustic elegies; B..... 382
Skinner, Constance Lindsay
Tiger who walks alone; AN..... 552
Smertenko, Johan; R.....89, 183, 231, 514
Smith, Alfred E. H. F. Pringle; B..... 384
Snider, Charles Lee; R..... 580
Social and political ideas of some great thinkers of the Renaissance and the Reformation. F. J. C. Hearnshaw, editor; B..... 662
Social factors in medical progress. B. J. Stern; B..... 292
Sociology of rural life. H. B. Hawthorn; AN. 117
Solitaria, together with matter from the apocalypse of our time. V. V. Rozanov, S. S. Koteliansky, translator; B..... 515
Solow, Herbert; R..... 43
Some new light on Chaucer. J. M. Manly; B. 289
Some people. H. Nicolson; B..... 739
Something about Eve: a comedy of fig-leaves. J. B. Cabell; B..... 386
South Africans. S. G. Millin; B..... 88
Southern Albania: or northern Epirus in European international affairs. E. P. Stickney; AN..... 518
Spaeth, Sigmund
Weep some more, my lady; B..... 646
Spanish house for America. R. Newcomb; AN. 185
Spender, Hugh F., M. Fairbman, and R. Muir, editors
Europa year book, 1927; AN..... 343
Spender, J. A.
Life, journalism, and politics; B..... 648
Spinoza, oldest biography of. A. Wolf, editor; AN..... 582
Spirit of '76 and other essays. C. Becker, J. M. Clark, W. E. Dodd; AN..... 319
Stage antiquities of the Greeks and Romans and their influence. J. T. Allen; AN.... 582
Stage costuming. A. B. Young; AN..... 404
Stanford, Alfred
Navigator: the story of Nathaniel Bowditch; B..... 398
Steel, Byron
O rare Ben Jonson; AN..... 402
Steele, Wilbur Daniel
Man who saw through heaven and other stories; B..... 738
Stern, Bernard J.
Social factors in medical progress; B..... 292
Should we be vaccinated?; B..... 292
Sterne, Laurence, W. L. Cross, editor
Sentimental journey through France and Italy, with selections from the journals, sermons, and correspondence of Laurence Sterne; AN..... 43
Sterne, Laurence, W. L. Cross, introduction by Life and opinions of Tristram Shandy; AN..... 43
Stevens, James
Mattock; AN..... 43
Stewart, Bryce M.
Canadian labor laws and the treaty; AN.. 117
Stickney, Edith Pierpont
Southern Albania: or northern Epirus in European international affairs, 1912-1923; AN..... 518
Stimson, H. L.
American policy in Nicaragua; B..... 741
Stolberg, Benjamin; R..... 639
Stoll, Elmer Edgar
Shakespeare studies; B..... 209
Story of a wonder man. R. Lardner; AN.... 69
Story of civil liberty in the United States. L. Whipple; B..... 66
Story of music. P. Bekker; B..... 21
Strange woman. E. Davis; AN..... 484
Studies in Florentine painting. R. Offner; AN. 91
Sudermann, Hermann. K. Busse; B..... 660
Sudermann, Hermann
Der tolle professor. Ein roman aus der Bismarckzeit; B..... 660
Sullivan, Mark
Our times. Vol. I. Turn of the century. Vol. II. America finding itself; B..... 656

T

Tannenbaum, Samuel A.
Problems in Shakespeare's penmanship; AN 318
Tavernier, Jean-Baptiste, V. Ball, translator
Travels in India; B..... 106
Taylor, A. A.
Notes on the reconstruction of Virginia; AN..... 184
Temperley, Harold, and G. P. Gooch, editors
British documents on the origins of the war, the outbreak of the war, June 28-August 4, 1914; B..... 161
Preparation of music and the figure. E. J. Dent; B..... 21
Terry's guide to Cuba. T. P. Terry; AN..... 138
Terry, T. Philip
Terry's guide to Cuba; AN..... 138
That man Heine. L. Browne; B..... 661
Thiess, Frank
Gateway of life; B..... 575
Thomas, Edward J.
Buddha, life of, as legend and history; B. 230
Thomas, Norman; R..... 66, 396
Thoreau, Henry D.
Moon; B..... 650
Thoreau, Henry. J. B. Atkinson; B..... 650
Thoreau's journals. O. Shepard, editor; B.... 650
Those quarrelsome Bonapartes. R. G. Anderson; AN..... 742
Three Sitwells. R. L. Megroz; AN..... 402
Tiger who walks alone. C. L. Skinner; AN.. 552
Time and western man. W. Lewis. B..... 657
Tired child. M. and G. Scham; AN..... 138

Tolstoy, Leo
Tolstoy, count Alexis K., C. A. Manning, translator
Tomlinson, H. M.
Trader Horn. E. Lewis, editor; B. 144
Transition. W. Durant; B. 427
Travellers' tales. H. C. Adams; AN. 400
Trees at night. A. Young; B. 740
Trevelyan, George Macaulay
Trollope, Frances
Tully, Jim
Tupper, Frederick; R. 289
Twain, William M. See "Boss" Tweed
Twilight of the white races. M. Marsh; AN. 648

U

Unamuno, Miguel de. H. P. Earle, translator
Life of Don Quixote and Sancho. According to Miguel Cervantes de Saavedra; B. 578
Unbearable Bassington. "Saki" (H. H. Munro); AN. 668
Unmarried father. E. Dell; B. 652
Up from the city streets. N. Hapgood and H. Moskowitz; B. 548
USSR (union of soviet socialist republics). I. L. Lee; B. 544

V

Valéry, Paul
Variety; B. 377
Van Doren, Carl; R. 387
Van Doren, Dorothy
Van Doren, Mark; R....88, 382, 427, 646, 686, 713
Vanguard. A. Bennett; AN. 690
van Loon, Hendrik
Variety. P. Valéry; B. 377
Vedrine, M. Etienne; B. 740
Victim of circumstances. G. Gissing; B. 716
Villard, Oswald Garrison; R..114, 135, 163, 182, 384, 548, 606
Villon, François, complete poems of. J. H. Lepper, translator; AN. 43
Vines, Sherard
Vivas, Eliseo; R. 20, 346, 775
Voorde, Walter; R. 42, 784
Voyage to the south seas in his majesty's ship Wager in the years 1740-1. J. Bulkeley and J. Cummins; AN. 212

W

Walden. E. F. Daglish, illustrator of; B. 650
Waley, Adolf
Pageant of India; AN. 520
Walker, Charles Rumford
Bread and fire; B. 19
Wallace, W. Stewart, compiler
Dictionary of Canadian biography; AN. 137
Walling, William English
Warschauer, J., F. C. Burkitt, preface
Historical life of Christ; AN. 185
Washington, George. M. Weems; AN.
Washington, J. D. Sawyer; B.
Waters, Frank
Eight bells. Sailors' snug harbor yarns and ballads; AN. 138
Wedding. M. P. Levy; B.
Weems, Mason
History of the life and death, virtues and exploits of general George Washington; AN.
Weep some more, my lady. S. Spaeth; B. 646
Weiss, Paul; R. 115
Wells, H. G.
Wertenbaker, Thomas Jefferson
American people: a history; AN. 212
Wescott, Glenway
Wesselman, William Linn; R.
What books shall my small child read? R. Hourwich; B.
Whipple, Leon
White, Edward Lucas
Why Rome fell; AN. 664
White, Elizabeth B.
White rooster. G. O'Neil; B. 262
Why Rome fell. E. L. White; AN.
Wiggam, Albert Edward
Next age of man; B. 580
Wilder, Thornton
Bridge of San Luis Rey; B. 687
Williams, Edgar, editor
Ocean tramps; AN. 212
Wilson, Dave Alec
Carlyle at his zenith (1848-1853); AN. 716
Wilson, F. P.
Wilson, Henry Lane
Diplomatic episodes in Mexico, Belgium, and Chile; B. 116
Wilson, Philip Whitwell
Greville diary. Including passages hitherto withheld from publication; B. 654
Wilstach, Paul
Patriots off their pedestals; AN. 716
Wine, women, and war.
Winsor, Mrs. Alfred
Servant of the mightiest; B. 401
Winslow, Ola Elizabeth, compiler
Harper's literary museum. A mirror of American manners and morals from Pocahontas to the days of Dolly Madison; AN. 402
Wolf, A., editor
Oldest biography of Spinoza; AN. 582
Wolfe, Humbert
Lampoons; AN.
Requiem; AN. 404
Wolf song. H. Ferguson; AN. 263
Wolfson, Theresa; R. 42, 208
Women and the miners' lock-out. M. Phillips; AN. 404
Women at Point Sur. R. Jeffers; B. 88
Woodward, W. E.; R. 66, 392, 601, 648
Woolf, Virginia
To the lighthouse; B. 67
Woolrich, Cornell
Children of the Ritz; B. 550
Worker looks at government. A. Calhoun; B. 42
World in the making. Count H. Keyserling; B. 260

Y

Yellow gentians and blue. Z. Gale; B. 738
Young, Agnes Brooks
Stage costuming; AN. 404
Young, Art
Trees at night; B. 740
Young, E. H.
Moor fires; AN. 663
Your cuckoo sings by kind. V. Dobrée; B. 115
Your money's worth. S. Chase and F. J. Schlink; B. 134

Z

Zelda Marsh. C. G. Norris; AN. 484
Zeydel, Edwin H., translator
Economic and social conditions in France during the eighteenth century. H. See; AN. 185

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXV NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 6, 1927 No. 3235

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 1
EDITORIALS:
America and Asia Outstrip Europe
Career Diplomats and Others
Bold Adultery and Wilful Murder 5
Some Students Write Well 6
BLOW YOUR OWN HORN! By Hendrik van Loon
EXPLAINING WOMEN:
Why Feminism? By Beatrice M. Hinkle 8
The Weakness of Women. By John B. Watson
Half-Confessed. By Joseph Collins 10
LAW AND ORDER IN LOS ANGELES. By Rube Borough 12
CANADA'S JUBILEE. By J. A. Stevenson 13
"AL" SMITH IN TEXAS. By Ruby A. Black 14
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter
CORRESPONDENCE 16
BOOKS AND MUSIC:
Vigil. By Allen Tate 18
Letter After a Visit. By Haniel Long
Did the Newspapers Make the World War? By Harry Elmer Barnes 18
Concordance to Poetry. By Alter Brody 19
Antaeus. By Abbe Niles 19
An Outline of Socialism. By Stuart Chase 20
Toward a Revaluation. By Eliseo Vivas 20
Darkening Our Lightness. By B. H. Haggin
Books in Brief 21
Music: Some German Operatic Impressions. By Henrietta Straus 23
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The Necessity of Free Trade. By Earl Beauchamp 24

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor Literary Editor

FREDA KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

THE BRITISH HOUSE OF LORDS is one of the strangest menageries of great-grandsons of distinguished public servants, modern beer millionaires, friends of Mr. Lloyd George or of Mr. Asquith or of Mr. Baldwin, warranted-genuine descendants of the Norman freebooters, newspaper publishers, selected admirals and generals, bishops and archbishops which was ever gathered together under one roof. The English, who have strange tastes, rather like it; it is to them one of those precious symbols, like a Chinese ancestor's grave, or the American Constitution, about which people wax eloquent but which they seldom squarely face. In 1911, when the dear old thing had threatened to be a bit obstreperous, a bold Liberal government clipped the wings of its power—took away its veto power over appropriation bills and gave the Commons authority, by affirmative action at three successive sessions, to pass any bill over the peers' veto. The consent of the Lords to this shearing was obtained by the threat of having the King—another precious symbol—create a thousand new Peers, guaranteed to vote for their own destruction. Since then there has been intermittent talk of further "reform." And now Mr. Baldwin has brought forth the Tory program of "reform." Some of the efficiency gentlemen in his Cabinet obviously prepared it for him. It would reduce the Lords to manageable size, and provides for election of the bulk of the House by the hereditary peers themselves. This, it will be noted, would prevent any repetition of the Liberal threat of 1911, and assure an eternal Tory majority. Which, doubtless, is what Mr. Baldwin's friends want. But don't they know that symbols are valuable only when dust-covered, and that by polishing up the House of Lords and making it modern and efficient they risk its total destruction?

THERE SEEMS TO BE nothing to do about women except to tolerate them. No effort to bar them ever lasts. Oxford University's decision to establish a female quota of one in four is no more likely to stand the test of time than the earlier efforts to keep them out altogether. It is only seven years since women were first allowed to take the Oxford examinations; and it may be less before they take another trench. As Principal Margery Fry suggests, the real opposition to them is in itself a confession of defeat. "Women are such beastly grinds," one Oxford undergraduate is reported as saying, "that the standards of examination are going up." It may even happen that the influx of women will change the emphasis of Oxford to such a revolutionary degree that the cables will carry other Oxford news than that of undergraduate styles in trousers.

ENGLAND'S TRADE-UNIONS BILL, following the time-schedule set by the Government, has passed its third reading in the House of Commons. The present amended form of the bill is essentially the same as the original draft. A few phrases have been added and one or two deleted, but the underlying principle remains: the bill strikes squarely at the trade unions. The most palpable hit is scored by clause one, which, in its amended interpretation, prohibits not only general strikes but also sympathetic strikes of any importance. The London Weekly makes this clear in these words:

> The legality or illegality of a sympathetic strike, in the opinion of Sir Douglas Hogg, depends upon its effects. If it induces such hardship as to compel the Government to act it will be illegal under this bill. If it does not, it will be legal.

The key word, "hardship," is not defined. By such ambiguity this first clause paralyzes the very spirit of the trade-union movement, based on working-class solidarity. A second decisive blow is administered by clause three and its amendments. Here the conduct of a picket is so severely circumscribed that even the "legal" strikes must be conducted almost innocuously polite lines. If a picket causes "in the mind of a person a reasonable apprehension of injury" ("and the expression 'injury' includes injury other than physical or material") he is liable to arrest. Thus blacklegs are protected from such inopportune smiles or untoward smirks as might appear on a careless picket's physiognomy. We have selected only two points from the bill, but there are many similar ambiguous and anomalous phrases. It is throughout a piece of bitter class legislation, oppressive where it is definite and still more dangerous where it is not. Complete repeal of the bill, which the Labor Party promises at its first opportunity, seems the only proper treatment for such a Die-hard delusion.

THE FIRST WEEK of the naval disarmament conference at Geneva resulted merely in the laying of the Japanese, American, and British cards on the table. As we go to press, the outlook is for a deadlock. An enormous number of words has been cabled across the ocean denouncing, denying, explaining, declaring, contradicting, retracting, and if the average reader has any clear idea of what is taking place he is a smarter man than the editors of The Nation. We cannot, however, see anything diabolical or underhand in the British proposals nor behold in them any effort to trick us into a grave naval inferiority. But we should not care if that turned out to be the case. The United States has always been in a state of naval inferiority to Great Britain and has remained free and, usually, happy. We are not interested in balancing navies. We want to see them heavily reduced as a step toward completely doing away with them. The whole institution is a curse to all concerned, an endless economic waste of national resources, a powerful incentive to wars. So, for the moment, we are compelled to get what satisfaction we can out of the coming of Ambassador Herrick with a "Locarno pact" with France in his pocket, and the reports that, as a result of the naval conference, England and Japan are quite ready to sign similar agreements with us for one hundred years of peace. That would be a long step forward and would help to demonstrate the futility of keeping up large navies.

IN THE HEARINGS being held in New York into the relations of the city and the two great companies the Interborough and the Brooklyn-Manhattan Transit, which control the transportation situation in New York, Samuel Untermyer's masterly cross-examination has brought out some extremely interesting facts. For instance, the Interborough has paid since 1919 $212,954.19 to Ivy Lee for acting as publicity agent—a sum charged to operating expenses, which eventually comes out of the taxpayers under the city's contract with the company. Moreover, a part of this sum was paid from 1919 to 1922 for the company's propaganda efforts to obtain a higher than the five-cent fare. Finding the public wholly opposed, Mr. Lee finally advised a discontinuance of this campaign. Again, it has appeared that the Brooklyn-Manhattan Transit Company has bought 19,650 shares of its rival company's stock; and that Albert H. Wiggin, chairman of the B.-M. T. and also chairman of the board of directors of the Chase National Bank, and T. L. Chadbourne and G. M. Dahl, also of the B.-M. T., have respectively purchased 3,600, 9,800, and 6,600 shares of the Interborough which have not paid a dividend in eight years and cannot for twenty years unless there is an increase in fares. Mr. Wiggin freely stated that he and his two associates were gambling on this fare increase to make fortunes—at the public's expense. It is not surprising that Mayor Walker and the other municipal authorities are now reported ready to have the city go ahead and take over the whole traction system. It should, of course, have done so years ago.

SINCE THE APPEARANCE in our last issue of the editor's article on Lindbergh and the Army and Navy we have been informed that a complete censorship of all dispatches was established on the Memphis, which brought Lindbergh back from Europe, by Commander Bagley, chief of staff of Vice-Admiral Burrage, whose flagship the Memphis is. No dispatch about Lindbergh was passed without Commander Bagley's editing it. Even bulletins bore his initials. The flier was not consulted about the changes; the navy simply assumed the right to decide what the American people should or should not know about the hero of the hour, and the press associations, with their usual cowardice in dealing with governmental agencies, failed to protest at the first official censorship established since the war. As William Hillman, who made the voyage on the Memphis, says in the Editor and Publisher:

> The naval censorship was but a continuation of that strange isolation of Lindbergh from the world which began when Ambassador Herrick took Lindbergh in charge in Paris and, standing by his side at the press conference, nodded approval or shook his head as Lindbergh answered questions put by newspapermen.

Naturally Charles Lindbergh, young and inexperienced as he was, fell a victim. According to a New York Times dispatch, Ambassador Houghton labored the best part of a night to persuade him to give up his plan to fly back via Asia and the Pacific in order that Mr. Coolidge could officially receive him and not delay his vacation by a single day. Lindbergh finally asked: "Then you order me back across the Atlantic?" To which, according to the correspondent, Ambassador Houghton replied that it was not an order but "the wish of Washington." So the son of a Congressman who opposed our entering the World War was victimized and exploited for the political aggrandizement of the President and the ballyhoo ends of the army and the navy.

LEONARD WOOD has returned from the Philippines, physically a broken man, to fight for the privilege of carrying on as Governor General of the islands. There is something superb in his determination to continue, however one may disagree with the general's policies. Politics still beckoned to him seven years ago, when he returned to the East; undoubtedly he hoped, by a demonstration of administrative competence, to maneuver himself into the strategic position for the 1924 elections. But Calvin Coolidge inherited a position he had done nothing to earn; and General Wood struggled on with a growingly difficult task in the Oriental tropics. Today he has no political hopes left and little physical strength; but he wants to finish his job, and he stands in the shadow of defeat. A quarter century ago Wood might have ranked as one of the world's great colonial governors; today, in an Asia which also includes Gandhi's India and Nationalist China, any white general wielding supreme authority is an anachronism. Even so, Leonard Wood may be a more useful public servant than the Ohio politician who seems slated to replace him. For Carmi Thompson is a fixer; he would be glad to exchange an appearance of greater political independence for the reality of more American control of the rich rubber lands of the South Philippine Islands; and Governor Wood, however untactful he and his cavalry cabinet may be with Filipino politicians, is more interested in administration than in exploitation.

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE told the simple truth when he declared that Rear Admiral Mark L. Bristol's eight years' service as High Commissioner to Turkey "has been notable in the annals of American diplomacy." For these years Rear Admiral Bristol has been ambassador in all but name, but his failure to be a regularly assigned plenipotentiary has made it impossible for him to deal directly with the head of the nation within whose border he was representing the United States. This in itself created a delicate situation; when one adds that the Admiral was sent to Turkey almost immediately after the close of the war, recalls that we still have no treaty with Turkey, and remembers the dramatic and difficult events that followed upon the Turkish Revolution, it will be seen that his was a task calling for a superman. This the Admiral has really been among diplomats; he demonstrates the correctness of Mr. Dawes's assertion, which we discuss in another column, that the President should have the right to pick any particularly competent man for any given diplomatic position. No word of criticism—only admiration for his achievements—has come to our ears. Now he goes to the Asiatic Fleet, as commander-in-chief, and we believe that it is a most excellent omen for our future relations with China. For Admiral Bristol has an extraordinary ability to understand and to sympathize with the national aspirations of any people to which he may be sent. No repetition of the Nanking incident is likely to take place under his command of the Asiatic Fleet. We have only one regret: that he is not to be minister in Peking, as well as the commanding admiral in China.

WITH A GREAT HULLABALOO the North China war chiefs who were allied with each other have become re-allied, and Chang Tso-lin, who has the best army, has acquired a new title which is said to be a hybrid between President, Generalissimo, and Chief Executive. The military and political situation, however, remains unchanged. The winds of Nationalism still blow strong, and they disturb the peace of Chang's lieutenants, who are earnestly determined to be on the winning side. If the Nationalists were not as humanly divided among themselves they could topple Chang and win Peking at a stroke; but the mysterious process of negotiation continues. Feng Yu-hsiang, the "Christian General," has met his moderate Nationalist rival, Chiang Kai-shek, and has issued a magnificently confusing pronunciamento. He says that the Communists within the Kuomintang must accept party discipline, but implies that they remain; he urges Borodin, the Russian civilian adviser of the Hankow Government, to return to Russia but implies that General Gallen and the other military advisers may continue. On this basis the three Nationalist groups may be able to cooperate. Chinese armies have an extraordinary and civilized capacity for sitting still while public opinion wins bloodless battles for them.

"THE PRESENT ECONOMIC REVOLUTION in the United States," a Harvard professor titled his book two years ago, and for data he relied in large part upon the invasion of Wall Street's functions by the labor banks. The Nation, too, expressed a generous optimism. Union after union founded banks; labor was to control its own capital; within the shell of the old society a new was rising. Grandfather of them all was the noble chain of labor banks established by the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. The brotherhood bought into control of a New York trust company; it owned coal mines; it was developing a seaside city in Florida. Utopia seemed at hand. And now—officers of the brotherhood have been negotiating with Thomas E. Mitten, famous for his street railways and taxicab companies (where "outside unions" are not permitted), to take over its banks and relieve it of its seaside city. The rank and file of the union was openly hostile, and Mr. Mitten withdrew his offer. But the fact remains that the most expansive of the unions is attempting to withdraw from business; the hope of invading Wall Street has faded. A score or more of lesser union banks continue to do a normal commercial business; some, like the Amalgamated Bank of New York, which has almost a monopoly of certain lines of Russian-American business, and others which have a strong political position, prosper. But the bright bubble has burst. Professor Carver will have to put on his spectacles again and hunt for other proof of the new American revolution.

THE SINGING ROTARIANS who startled Windsor Castle last week by gathering around Queen Victoria's statue and rendering "We are strong for Toledo," could not, of course, see anything amiss in their actions. "Singing is our 100 per cent hobby," explained their leader; they sang in Paris streets until they stopped the traffic, they grew melodious in restaurants and other public places. If this causes a shudder to travel down the spine of any reader, let him stop and consider. The untutored savage shuns the limelight, slinks through the jungle under cover, avoids bright lights, large groups of persons (particularly strange ones), the inquiring eye of the camera, and the voice of the explorer. He is afraid of so many things; there is so much he does not know. The simple Rotarian suffers from no such handicaps. He has had an education; and, being an honest, God-fearing, upstanding citizen of the community, he can not only look every man in the eye—he can also shout in his ear. Nor do blushes rise to his cheek when his shouts bring an audience. His motto is Be Hearty, and hearty he is, whether he stands under the shadow of the pyramids or by the tomb of kings or in the wildernesses of winding Paris streets. He is a stranger to reverence and to awe—or perhaps psychologists would twist his brashness to mean that he is really scared to death and that his mighty voice alone bears up his trembling knees.

IF YOU WANT A SUMMARY of the literature of the oxidation of paraffins, or a bibliography (488 items) of the applications to bacteriology of the determination of hydrogen in concentration, go not to the Chemical Journal or anything like that but to the Vassar Journal of Undergraduate Studies, the second volume of which extremely learned work has just come under our eye. You will also find there a comparison of Lucretius's theory of the atom with the modern theory of Rutherford, Millikan, and Bohr; a study of the Legal Obligations Subsisting Between China and Great Britain; essays dealing with "aspects of" or "moot questions in the criticisms of" Hardy, Wordsworth, Ruskin, and Francesco Redi; and an article on Conditions Underlying the Spread of Religions. In the last-named you will find the conclusion arrived at that "the methods of obtaining conversion to a religion are the same as those of the commercial advertiser"—a touch which somewhat relieves the whole Journal of the solemnity which lies elsewhere upon it. We wish we could say that this solemnity is per se an undergraduate thing; unfortunately our Vassar authors have copied their elders, the writers of articles for the incredible learned journals of professorial America, very well. Their accomplishment is indeed impressive, and we suppose without parallel. But it is a bit depressing.

America and Asia Outstrip Europe

THE sun is 93,000,000 miles away, and a fair-sized body; but Betelgeux in Orion is 30,000,000 times as big as the sun, and although light travels at the rate of 11,000,000 miles a minute it takes light 190 years to get from Betelgeux to this miserable little earth. So, at least, the astronomers assure us; but the economists are beginning to plague us with figures almost as huge and as incomprehensible.

Max Winkler, former head of the foreign bond department of Moody's Investors' Service, has compiled for the Information Service of the Foreign Policy Association a set of tables and figures regarding American loans to foreign countries. One of the greatest economic revolutions of history—that of the United States in the last decade and a half—is mirrored in his figures; but the sums are so vast and their present and potential significance so enormous that it seems almost easier to let one's mind play with the light rays dancing earthward from Betelgeux.

In 1914 the United States was still a field for foreign investment. Foreign countries had some five billion dollars of their surplus capital invested in this country; and American investments abroad were only about half that sum. Then came the war, and a process for which we had been ripe was enormously accelerated. In the three years 1915-1917, according to Dr. Winkler's reckonings, foreign capital flotations in the United States totaled $3,316 362,000—more than the total amount which we had invested abroad in all the previous years and decades of our national history. The scales turned. In the next three years, 1918-1920, we were so deeply engaged in our own war industries that we lent a mere bagatelle of $1,717,555,300; but in 1921-1923 we had $2,039,451,764 spare cash to invest abroad; and in 1924-1926 our foreign investments reached the staggering total of $5,687,113,411.

In these last three years we have put a billion dollars into Germany—in loans to cities, states, banks, churches, tramways, automobile companies, housing corporations, steel mills, electric companies, dye works, cigarette companies, harvester companies, water-power, film companies—everything. There is hardly a country in the League of Nations which has not borrowed money in Wall Street in this period. Argentina, Austria, Belgium, Brazil, Bulgaria, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Czecho-Slovakia, Denmark, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Finland, Germany, Greece, Honduras, Hungary, Italy, Japan, Jugoslavia, Liberia, Mexico, Norway, Panama, Peru, Poland, Salvador, directly or through their states and municipalities, came to America for money in 1926 alone, and got it—and one might add another dozen countries to the list by going back to 1924 and 1925. And these are governments alone. Dr. Winkler's lists of American investments also include oil corporations in Cuba, Mexico, Canada, Venezuela, Peru, British Guiana, Persia, and Trinidad; Norwegian aluminum, Russian gold mines, French perfume and silk, Finnish cooperatives, automo[illegible] factories in a dozen countries and railways everywhere, Italian shipping, Belgian and Spanish telephones, Brazilian coffee and African rubber plantations, Caribbean sugar fields, Central American fruit, Caucasian manganese, Ural platinum—a little of everything and a great deal of some.

Along with this, of course, has gone an enormous increase in our foreign trade—and a significant change in its nature and direction. In the years before the war almost two-thirds of our exports went to Europe; in 1926 less than half. Before the war almost exactly one-half of our imports came from Europe; in 1926 less than a third. In dollar values, to be sure, we sell to Europe more than twice as much as we sold her before the war, and we also buy two and one-half times as much; but Europe's relative importance has declined for us—as for the rest of the earth. Asia and Latin America as well as the United States are coming up in the world, while the old continent of Europe is losing its primacy. From Asia we actually imported in 1925 and 1926 a few hundred million dollars' worth of goods more than we imported from Europe—a fact of unrealized historic significance. Silk and rubber—women's clothes and automobile tires—have made Asia a greater department store for us than all the countries of tired Europe. And Latin America, if present trends continue, will soon put Europe into third place.

Before the war Great Britain and Germany met us on fairly equal terms in the South. In 1913 the Latin-American republics purchased goods valued at $323,832,000 from the United States, at $270,223,000 from the United Kingdom, at $185,197,000 from Germany. In 1926 the corresponding figures were $836,592,000, $295,965,000, and $189,965,000. We have outdistanced our competitors—both as exporters and importers we dominate Latin-American trade. Nearly 40 per cent of all Latin America's exports come to the United States; indeed, Mexico, the West Indies, and the Central American countries send us nearly 70 per cent of all that they ship abroad. What this economic dominance will come to mean in political terms can only be guessed. And while our proportion of Asiatic trade is still relatively slight, it is significant that silk and silk goods account for almost half of Japan's total exports, and that the United States takes over 60 per cent of the world's silk, and a still larger proportion of Japan's.

One of the documents issued by the recent International Economic Conference at Geneva gave in dull statistical terms a number of flashes upon our new world. For instance, Japan and the United States between them are consuming today nearly two million more bales of cotton each year than they did before the war; and Europe nearly two million bales less. Lancashire's cotton mills will never again hum with the old activity; during the war Japan and India learned to weave their own cotton instead of sending it raw on the long journey to England and having it reshipped as cloth. China will learn, too, in time, and then Japan's mills will drowse. The world is learning the primary economic lesson: to produce near the sources of raw materials. That explains much of the present prosperity of the United States, the new significance of Asia, and the depression of Europe. Europe will never again be the world's factory as she was before 1914. These Geneva figures tell a tale of her decline:

PERCENTAGE OF WORLD PRODUCTION

	Europe		North America		Asia
	1913	1925	1913	1925	1913	1925
Pig [illegible]	[illegible]	47	41	49	1	3
Steel	56	46	43	52	0.5	2
Coal	51	47	43	44	4.5	6.6
Cotton yarns	[illegible]	41	26	27	20	27

The economic basis of Europe's political empire is plainly crumbling and decayed, and the political house has begun to tumble on top of it. What America's new economic empire will mean we do not yet know, or how dangerous proportions it will reach before other continents follow our lead in asserting both political and economic independence.

Career Diplomats—and Others

WITH the diplomatic service it has been out of the frying-pan into the fire. For years civil-service reformers, nonpartisan journals like The Nation, and students of our foreign policy urged the creation of a permanent diplomatic and consular service to put an end to the sale of offices, from ambassador down, and the appointment of grossly unfit politicians to positions abroad in which they misrepresented and often disgraced the United States. Finally, the reform was achieved—only two years ago; the career diplomat arrived by act of Congress; and behold, there is already growing dissatisfaction with the professionalizing of the service. Within its ranks there is a bitter feud between the careerists and those who have been directly appointed. Whenever a vacancy occurs now in an important post, as in Mexico or in Argentina, the State Department seethes with the effort of the permanent staff to induce the President to appoint a career official to the vacancy.

Their arguments are not unimpressive; if there are to be promotions all along the line there must be top places for those to fill who have risen from the bottom. But experience shows the career diplomat too often dull and routinized, or tradition-bound and limited in vision, as witness our minister to China, Mr. MacMurray, who, for all his technical equipment, has been a sad misfit. He has been repeatedly overruled by Washington—if we may trust the daily press—but, being a permanent official, he does not resign. By contrast, there is Ambassador Sheffield, who has just returned from his post in Mexico City; the gossips have it that he has done so because he has not been in accord with the State Department. We have disagreed emphatically with Mr. Sheffield's views; but we like his manliness in resigning rather than cooperating in what he believes bad policy. If the diplomatic service were entirely officialized a situation might grow up in which some future President would be unable to appoint a minister adaptable to his purposes or sufficiently in sympathy with his policies to carry on with the necessary enthusiasm. It is obvious, therefore, that some strategic places should be kept free for the President to bestow. It is an open secret that Mr. Wilson would have been happy, indeed, if he could have filled the embassies in Vienna, Berlin, and London with new men early in 1915. Gerard, Page, and Penfield were picked in 1912—two for their campaign contributions—without, of course, Mr. Wilson or anybody else having the faintest prevision how important these positions would become. When the emergency came Mr. Wilson could not bring himself to ask for resignations abroad or, for that matter, at home. When he had appointed a man he stuck to him rather than admit an error. As Vice-President Dawes has just put it, the war "demonstrated the incalculable damage which may be done at critical times by small men in high places."

In his address to the graduating class at Washington University on June 7, from which we take the above quotation, Mr. Dawes also declared that "war lessons should make us distrustful of too great extension of the policy on the part of any government of educating and using career men for diplomacy." They may do well in peace time, he said, but their psychology "is often fatal to diplomatic competency in important emergencies." He is afraid that the right of promotion by seniority, which ruins, he thinks, the effectiveness of an army in peace time, will have "its dire result on the future of American diplomacy." To the career man, he explains, diplomatic convention often seems of supreme importance. So in China, he might have added, it seems as if convention, an inclination to act with the other ambassadors, and a total failure to understand the new psychology of Chinese Nationalism have controlled the acts of our ambassador.

It is so rarely that we find ourselves in hearty accord with the Vice-President that we cannot forbear from quoting this passage from his address:

> This is a time when our diplomatic negotiations must be carried on with courage, forbearance, and patience, with sympathy for the suffering, without arrogance resulting from the thought of our national wealth and power, and with a humility of mind which shrinks from the quick preconception of solutions prior to thorough familiarity with the facts with which solutions must deal. Our diplomatic representatives should be strong enough, no matter how embarrassing the circumstances, to stand firmly for American rights and against their infraction. But again they should be strong enough to urge upon those at home a policy consistent with these rights which is also just to other countries.

Of course the classic example is the appointment of James Bryce to the ambassadorship in Washington. No career diplomat from the Court of St. James's could possibly have approached the usefulness and the completeness of Mr. Bryce in this country. He was a specialist in America; a citizen of our world as of the European. His understanding was beyond cavil, whereas the career diplomat who may have served in a dozen countries before reaching high rank remains a specialist in none of them and is usually too wrapped up in procedure and convention to be able to understand the psychology, the history, and the peculiar problems of, let us say, the Balkan peoples or the Latin Americans. We are one with General Dawes in dreading the giving over of the diplomatic service to career men.

Bold Adultery and Wilful Murder

IN a recent number of the magazine Books Mr. William McFee writes an amusing letter and raises again a perennial question. In a previous issue of the same magazine Mr. Hugh Walpole had had occasion to discriminate between those contemporary novels which are "important" and those which are not, and Mr. McFee was aware of certain elements which appeared to have had an unconscious influence upon the choice which was made. Accordingly he arose to protest, though he is anxious that the nature of the protest should not be misunderstood. He is not, he says, arguing that Zane Grey and Harold Bell Wright are "important." Neither is he wishing to convey the impression that his own impulses or actions are purer than most. But in downright, sailor-like language he rises to ask a question. "Why is it," he demands, "that 'important' novels always treat of some fresh variation of adultery, 'moral revolt,' or other sex upheavals?"

Why indeed? The question is not an easy one to answer even if one happens to feel that Mr. McFee's case is not quite as strong as it seems. It is simpler to fall back upon history and suggest that at least he is wrong in the implied assumption that he has caught the moderns in a depravity peculiar to them alone; for the fact is that the "important" novels of every age have exhibited a similar preoccupation with adultery. It is in Fielding and Smollett, Thackeray and George Eliot; even the domestic Richardson concerned himself with a seduction that did not come off instead of one that did; and if the French are not to be dismissed as too notoriously evil-minded to be admitted into the argument, one may well ask where Balzac and Stendhal and Flaubert would be if the marriage vow were inviolate in fiction. Indeed one might leave the novel aside and, without indulging too much exaggeration, assert that almost all great literature has been about adultery. Without it Homer would have lacked a theme, the story of King Arthur and his Knights would have been deprived of its catastrophe, and the other of the three greatest stories in the world—the story of Tristram—could not have existed at all. We are not, it is true, told anything about the sex life of Beowulf, and the Song of Roland has no bedroom scenes, but these are exceptions drawn from barbarous ages and adultery and civilization go hand in hand. Nor is Mr. McFee's protest by any means new. It has arisen to embarrass the humanist since time immemorial, and the downrightness of Mr. McFee's manner calls directly to mind the challenge of Roger Ascham, who, in the sixteenth century, denounced the "Morte D'Arthur" as no more than "bold adultery and wilful murder.

As to the reason for this lamentable state of affairs the cynic might argue that people always enjoy in fiction an account of those exploits which they do not themselves dare to perform, and that adultery is popular in novels because it is hedged about with unpleasant consequences in life. But there is another explanation which does not involve as a corollary the assumption that the major part of the population has adulterous itchings. If we are willing to grant that love is the most interesting of all subjects, then it will follow that of all the varieties of love the most interesting sort is that which is illegitimate in one way or another. In the first place, the annals of the virtuous, like the annals of the happy, are brief. And in the second place, love is most intense when it meets an impediment. It must be great to sweep over barriers which society has set up, and as it pauses before them it gathers strength and volume like a stream that has been dammed. Illegitimate love is, moreover, the kind which produces the greatest upheaval in the lives of those affected by it, and if adulterous attachments have been most treated by novelists it is chiefly because they are the sort which produce the greatest consequences.

If many modern "sex" novels are dull it is not because they deal with infractions of the marital vow but because in the society which they treat that infraction is represented as one which has ceased to be serious and which does not either constitute a very imposing barrier or entail very far-reaching consequences. What these modern novelists need is a new sin—something which will give their characters pause and involve them in really formidable difficulties.

Some Students Write Well

WE have been reading here and there in the undergraduate press of the country, and we have come to the conclusion that American students today are outrageously defamed. The current notion is that the rah-rah boy of twenty years ago has been succeeded by a creature with smooth hair who, to be sure, is crude no longer but who could actually afford to take on a little crudeness—could venture, for instance, to develop an enthusiastic interest in the affairs of the world. The current notion of the undergraduate is that he has brains but is too bored to use them. Having scanned the editorial pages of the Coe College Cosmos, the Yale News, the Duke University Chronicle, the University of Georgia Red and Black, the Rice Institute Thresher, and other student papers, we demur.

"Nourished on a steady diet of platitudes," the Coe College Cosmos assures it readers, "the student is fortunate if he possesses any mind at all." It is much to have recognized that most of what one hears, in college or out, is meaningless. The editors of the Cosmos have gone further than this, however; they have informed themselves, and they have thought about things until these things had meaning. They have taken the trouble to find out what is really going on in China. They have asked why Mr. Coolidge should send marines to Nicaragua, in the interest of order, and should not send them to Chicago. And they write:

> Let us have done with this chatter about making war more pleasant, more humane. Let no effort be spared to make it as deadly and ghastly as possible.

Doubtless many college papers still fill all their space with nice nothings about local crises in social and athletic relations. But it is refreshing to see a number of dailies spreading over their front pages intelligent news articles about American foreign relations, the censorship of books, race prejudice, preparedness, the politics of Chicago, and recent developments in the world of science and of art. The Yale News, among all of the papers we have examined, goes farthest in the direction of grown-up journalism. Some of its contemporaries have as intelligent and critical an editorial page, but only a few can rival it for volume of significant news. And its editorials, which happen to be of a distinctly liberal cast, often have to be answered from off the campus. One of its pronouncements on the Allied debt, for example, drew letters on the same day from Secretary Mellon and the Wall Street Journal.

An instructor in Rice Institute, Texas, walked into class the other day, wrote on the board the three words "Sacco and Vanzetti," and asked his students what they meant. After one or two highly incorrect definitions had been supplied the instructor compromised with the information that: "It's the name of a Spanish dish that is somewhat similar to spaghetti. Literally, Sacco means cheese and Vanzetti crackers. Haven't any of you ever eaten or heard of it?" Two girls, reports the Thresher, remembered having seen the thing on menus, and one boy shyly admitted having tasted it. Not one member of the class had heard of the two Massachusetts men whose names have been going round the world for seven years. The Thresher viewed the affair partly with derision and partly with alarm; and rightly, though the thing might have happened in dozens of other colleges. Where college journalism can offset ignorance like this it renders a vast service.

For the benefit of 7,486,356 of our young literary enthusiasts
"And you, my young friend, what might you be doing?"
"I am trying to learn to play like Mr. Mencken, sir."
"And do you really believe that sort of thing can be learned?"

Blow Your Own Horn!

Explaining Women

[Three well-known psychologists here analyze the anonymous articles by distinguished modern women published in The Nation a few months ago.]

Why Feminism?

By BEATRICE M. HINKLE

THE women who pictured their early backgrounds for The Nation in an effort to explain their later "feminist" behavior attempted the impossible. The incidents and general conditions of the environment that one consciously remembers, the external aspect of life, are but a part, indeed the smaller part, of one's background. Silently and quite apart from the will and knowledge of the child a mysterious alchemy takes place between the inherited reaction-trends, the dominant psychological functions of the particular individual, and the environmental influences which play upon them. Out of this welter arise the marked characteristics and attitudes which become organized in the mature personality.

We know that biologically two marked reactions to the same stimulus among living beings are always possible. For instance, fear produces the familiar fight-or-flight reaction; frequently, both reactions occur in the same individual, one following the other. Different individual organisms will react differently and unpredictably to the same condition or environment. Among human beings there are many choices of reaction to a specific stimulus or environmental situation but it is safe to say that the specific attitude taken is the only one possible to the individual at the time his general direction is being formed.

The development of attempting to explain the particular destiny of an individual solely by some special type of environment is amply attested by these women's stories. The tendency they show to consider their own lives as the direct result of their external environment is natural and common to most persons. However, what they most clearly reveal in varying degrees is the particularly personal character of their opinions and attitudes.

For example, in the first story we have the statement of the writer that she, "the most timid of created beings," was nevertheless an active participant in one fight after another and a feminist of the militant type. From the account of the family background it is evident that there was an atmosphere in the home of free discussion and a liberal attitude toward women's aspirations. There were women members of the household whose attitude was apparently distinctly modern, and therefore she imbibed during her youth the special nutriment which stimulated the individualistic aspect of her personality. Her exultation over the "first brick thrown" in the militant suffrage cause was a joyous release to action through the psychological mechanism of identification with the thrower, for she was thus enabled to overcome her personal timidity through a collective action.

Even though these stories are inadequate for an analysis of the writers, due to their marked concern with family conditions and the obvious repression of any clear picture of the individual in the family, they do present conditions which inevitably play an important role in affecting the general attitude of the developing child.

The failure to present clear-cut individual personalities makes it necessary to consider these women as similar types because of their "feminist" opinions and a so-called modern attitude toward children, marriage, and jobs. Of course this is not true, for although the writers share a "modern" point of view they have no general, common attitude. For instance, the woman who has not married and who resents [illegible] regards marriage as a compromise is a very different person from the one who finds herself comfortably married with the feeling that it is good, and that neither economic dependence or independence makes much difference. Nevertheless, when attempting to consider a group of different personalities, nothing more than a collective survey can be made.

Two distinct types of family environment are described in these histories and are highly important in their influence on the children. In one group there is a distinctly feminist and free attitude on the part of the parents and close relatives. There are play of ideas, free discussion, and equality between the boys and girls in the family. The children were surrounded by this atmosphere from birth, and accordingly their intellectual espousal of the feminist cause was a natural development, an acceptance of the family attitude, and not something born out of personal revolt.

Such a case is the one described as Mother-Worship. Here the girl had a constant example before her in the harmonious attitude of both parents toward sex equality and in their freedom from ordinary conventions, besides the actual experience of the mother's unusual life activities. To be sure this same condition might have produced an opposite reaction in another type of child, but not where so strong an admiration and love for the mother existed, coupled with mother-identification. There is no evidence that this woman's modern attitude was born of revolt or included a protest at all. It was a natural, an easy (perhaps too easy, as she herself comments), acceptance of the general family attitude and thought. The same can be said of the writers of the stories, Staying Free and Lightning Speed Through Life. Their efforts in the world cannot be said to be of a different nature than those of any man who wishes to achieve the fulfilment of his ideas, and struggles to carry on his activities on that basis. In other words, the feminism of these women was not born out of a sense of injustice and bitterness, but developed as a natural growth from their own personality in contact with the special family environment. On the other hand, this same environment might well be conceived to be the cause of a violent revolt when the young women went into the world and found themselves hampered by the existing inequalities and traditional attitudes toward women.

Quite different is the second group. Here there are family conditions in which grinding poverty, conservative ideas, heavily burdened, unhappy mothers, and a serious responsible childhood prevail. The opinions and attitudes of these women are largely conditioned by revolt against the trying circumstances which they experienced. A fight reaction manifested itself in their protests against and overthrow of the conditions prevailing in their families.

* Each [illegible] Articles [illegible]

Like the first group, they were undoubtedly aided by the lessening of the social restriction of women still strong during the early life of their mothers.

All this represents one half of the problem. The other half is the type of the individual upon whom these influences fell. For we know that the same family conditions need not produce the same effect upon another type of child, and in these very families there are probably sisters who did not react as these writers did. The problem narrows down to this: What is the real inner cause of the revolt in the souls of these women?

Adler would probably account for their attitude by calling them victims of the masculine protest, and see their revolt as an expression of an organically determined inferiority complex which compensates itself by the espousal of the cause of women as a class, and by a refusal to accept the traditional submissive role.

The Freudian analyst would diagnose them as suffering from a castration complex and explain their revolt as an abnormal manifestation of an inner protest that they were not men; in other words, as a refusal to accept their own sex and live the love life of women. There does not appear to be much distinction between these two conceptions except as regards terminology and emphasis. Each authority postulates his thesis on the traditional conceptions of woman's psychology and position.

My own point of view is that, given their particular psychological organism with its need and capacity for change and development, together with the special family conditions and the comparatively free outer environment, their attitude is a normal protest against external collective restrictions. In the economic struggle women have been notoriously exploited and misused, and there is a definite analogy between their attitude of revolt and that of subject peoples and exploited workers of the male sex. It is significant that in not one of these cases is the feminism of the women based on principle but in each instance it was born directly from the necessities of their personal life.

The most common experience among these women is that of their later education and final goal. All but two were college-trained; all of necessity were self-supporting.

A striking revelation in these "backgrounds" is the overwhelming part played by the mother in the family and, in the majority of cases, in the lives of the daughters. It was the mother on whom many of the families depended for their economic existence and for the education of the children; it was the mother on whom the affection and respect of the daughters were focused. Even though in some of the mother-dominated families the father made an effort to assume economic responsibility, the mother continuously contributed her share to the exchequer. In the cases where the father is especially mentioned with love and preference by the daughter, the mother still remained the gallant figure in the economic life of the family. These mothers are largely of the pioneer type and they present unmistakably the basis for the external freedom and unusual position of importance possessed by women in general in this country.

Although our group of feminist women appear from their statements to have achieved some kind of fulfilment, it is obvious in spite of their concealments that they have not achieved an inner freedom, or a real solution of their personal problems. They are weak on the side of their woman's nature. Several of them are married, but children are few; and taking them as a group, the general deduction to be drawn is that the love life is meager and that little enrichment of the personalities through the love experience has been gained. Men might say that their unsatisfied sex impulses produce a vicarious activity manifesting itself in "unwomanly" feminist ideas. We can without difficulty agree that the sexual energy provides a driving power for this type of interest as it does for every form of creative activity. But no woman who has lived through such an experience will admit that bearing large families, exhausting energy in the painful economic struggle to support children, as did the mothers of these women, offers to the individual woman or to the race a more satisfactory way of life.

These modern women are engaged in a real creative effort even though it may not be realized, for behind their stridency and revolt lies the great inner meaning of woman's struggle with the forces of convention and inertia. This is nothing less than the psychological development of themselves as individuals, in contradistinction to the collective destiny that has exclusively dominated their lives.

In spite of their individual failure to achieve their full destiny—and who fulfils it to his complete satisfaction, whether man or woman?—their attitude is part of a great rolling tide which is bringing to birth a new woman. This new woman will possess an individuality which will enable her to stand by the side of man, strong and secure within herself. From her a new race will be born for whom feminism or masculine antagonism will be but an echo of a dark age long past.

The Weakness of Women

By JOHN B. WATSON

HOW much truth are the women telling in their biographies? At best biographies reveal mainly superficialities. It is curious that human beings know so little about themselves. We almost never tear ourselves apart to see how the parts work together. It is so much easier to tear other people apart. We learn from infancy to lay blame for failure upon parents, home life, associates, early economic conditions. If we win through it must be because of some innate, instinctive virtue in us that will not be downed by adversity. This all comes out in the biographies. One is struck by the failure on the part of almost all of the women to pay tribute to the very adversities of the environment. Nearly all of them actually quarreled with it—magnified its hardships. "What rot," says the behaviorist who believes that all individuals are made, not born, "the very sorrows and tribulations these women passed through were the conditioning stimuli which forced them on their way." Probably under what they would have considered a favorable environment most of them would have reached the age of fatness and forty and never been heard of—I speak freely, since I know none of the ladies.

The second thing that strikes one about these brief life histories is that the women were all restless—seeking something. What were they striving for—happiness? No, happiness apparently has gone out of fashion, it is not a present-day desideratum. We ask people today how many cars they have, whether they live in the town or the country or both, whether they play golf, tennis, or bridge, but we never ask whether they are happy or not. I doubt if very many children or adults today would understand what you meant if you did ask them, and I insist that happiness can be defined objectively in behavior terms, that it is a mode of behavior. These women were too modern to seek happiness; they sought what? Freedom. So many hundreds of women I have talked to have sought freedom. I have tried to find out diplomatically but behavioristically what they mean. Is it to wear trousers? Is it to vote—to hold office—to work at men's trades—to take men's jobs away from them—to get men's salaries? Does their demand for this mystical thing called freedom imply a resentment against child-bearing—a resentment against the fact that men's sex behavior is different from women's (but not so much any more)? I rarely arrive at a reasonable answer. The analysts claim that they can by psychoanalysis get at the truth about women. I make no such rash claim. I can read women only after making careful observations of their behavior over long periods of time. Then I put two and two together like any other scientist. When a woman is a militant suffragist the chances are, shall we say, a hundred to one that her sex life is not well adjusted? Marriage as such brings adjustment in only approximately 20 per cent of all cases, so poorly have men and women been taught about sex. Among the 20 per cent who find adjustment I find no militant women, I find no women shouting about their rights to some fanciful career that men—the brutes—have robbed them of. They work—they work like a man (than which nothing better can be said about work)—they often quietly achieve careers. Most of the terrible women one must meet, women with the blatant views and voices, women who have to be noticed, who shoulder one about, who can't take life quietly, belong to this large percentage of women who have never made a sex adjustment.

The biographies as a whole strikingly confirm the view that militancy passes as soon as the woman, by the trial-and-error process, finds sex adjustment. Then they cease to hunt for freedom, they lose themselves in their work. Surely the only freedom worth striving for is complete engrossment in activity, be that activity writing a play, washing infant's clothes, or losing oneself in the sway of passion.

The great weakness of women (who seek careers) is that they have never been trained to work like men. I mean trained so from infancy. Men are brought up in the tradition that men must work. They get it in their youth in gang activities and later in sports. They learn from boyhood that they must support their families and that to do so they must establish technique for work—habits of work—and that they must endure fatigue to harden their muscles; they must learn to do everything well enough to compete. They are trained in their infancy in habits of manipulation—women are not. They used to be in the fine art of needlework—only look at the samplers of the eight to twelve-year-olds. They were trained to weave and spin and cook and make their own dresses. Then the fashion changed—women had to be ladies—pretty ornaments. Their sphere was in the home. Now the picture is changing again. Mothers are beginning to train their girls in habits of manipulation. Women's customs have changed so rapidly that work traditions have never had a chance to soak in. Hence few women have achieved greatness.

I have never believed that there were any insuperable difficulties which keep women from succeeding. They have strength enough to paint, yet there has never been a great woman painter. They have strength enough to play the violin and yet there has never been a great woman violinist. They have endurance and strength enough to become great scientists and yet one can count on fewer than the fingers of one hand the women scientists who have achieved real greatness. During the past thirty years thousands of women have taken the degree of Ph.D. and yet scarcely a dozen have come to the front.

Not being trained from infancy to the tradition of incessant manipulative work they drop out of the race as soon as they get comfortable. Marriage is usually the shady spot that causes them to lie down and rest. And when they fail in that, as 80 per cent do, restlessness again sets in, but now it is too late to go back and take up the threads of the old career. Most women who had aspirations for a career have tried to eat their cake and have it too. A career is a jealous all-consuming taskmaster.

Marriage as such should be no barrier to a career. Apartment hotels, which can be found in every town where a woman could have a career, have freed married women without children almost completely. The having of children is almost an insuperable barrier to a career. The rearing of children and the running of a home for them is a profession second to none in its demands for technique.

The behavioristic moral—and we must have morals—is: Women do not like to work (neither do men). There is no natural "instinct" to work. Biologically speaking the hungry animal reaches up and pulls down a banana, reaches out and grasps his female (or vice versa); his hunger adjusted, he rests and sleeps. Work habits are the result of civilization and competition. If you want your children to have careers, be they boys or girls, teach them from infancy habits of manipulation, skilful technique, endurance. Work must become "first nature"—"second nature" is not enough. And along with it teach them (or have them taught if you are a Puritan) what to expect in the realm of sex.

Half-Confessed

By JOSEPH COLLINS

ARTICULATE confession is better for the soul than scriptural. It is likewise better for the confessor seeking illumination of sin, sanity, or sanctity. The women who have been telling through The Nation why and how they rebelled against some of the conventions to which they were born and reared can scarcely have had the exquisite feeling of purity and spiritual lightness that comes from frank and full confession. They have kept back a lot, and no experienced confessor like myself will give them absolution.

The writers are all revolutionists; that is, they are all feminists. There are many varieties of feminists but they all have one thing in common: enmity to privilege. Feminists want to do something in the world and to do it themselves.

Privilege has always precipitated revolutions. Privileges that man arrogated to himself precipitated feminism. Had it not been for Paul, Luther, and Loyola women would have had their rights hundreds of years ago. Now that they have them in part, and soon are to have them in full measure, it behooves women to use them properly. I can see no sign that they are seeking or getting instruction in that direction. I have no doubt many echo the sentiment of the woman who wrote in The Nation series:

I feel no need for more freedom, but I want a world in which the freedom I now have can be used. The industrial and political world is in hands like mine today. Are we, while I live, going to get courage and wisdom to match our freedom? I am hopeful that we shall, but I suspect that I shall be disappointed.

The question that woman must answer is Why am I here? not Where am I at? Woman has one purpose: to help God run the world. In every respect save populating it, He would seem to be wholly beyond the need of assistance from His image. Until man began to sin, God had only one command: "Be fruitful and multiply; replenish the earth and subdue it." Woman is chiefly concerned with the first part of the command, man with the second. Incidentally, she may express herself, strive to be happy, and help make life livable for others. Those are privileges, not duties. Woman is becoming more and more loath to do her duty; man more and more eager to obey God's command. Flying over the Atlantic without stop, telephoning from London to San Francisco qualify under "subdue the earth." The woman who is willing to have ten to twenty children is almost extinct.

There are many good reasons why the majority of women should not have ten to twenty children, but there are many more and better reasons why they should have from five to ten. Women arrogate to themselves the freedom to say how many children they shall have and when they shall have them. One thing we know: the "best" stock is showing the smallest reproduction.

Propagation and its entailments may not be essential to the health of woman, but they promote it enormously, and their absence engenders mental and emotional disequilibrium. There would be small call for specialists of my sort if men and women married early and successfully. Every diagnostician has "hunches." I have a hunch that the sex-coefficient of many of these writers is low.

The women who wrote the articles under discussion have all achieved a measure of success in varied careers. Yet they say little of their duty toward the race. Most of them mention men only as they have observed them in youth, particularly in their fathers, and they maintain a deep silence about child-bearing. Nine of the group do not even mention it, still less do they imply that they have given it a thought. Two were so terrified at the idea that they decided never to procreate; one wanted children, though without marriage, and in the end had neither. One is a confirmed celibate and satisfied with it as she is with everything she has done, and one "lives in sin" and is childless. This alone is a terrifying discovery. If these women are so steeped in their desire for social freedom and economic rights that they disregard entirely their first prerogative, what will become of the race they claim to uphold? Despite the celibate's self-complacency, her life is incomplete. To pretend that she has handled the marriage problem by avoiding love in or out of marriage is fatuous.

One of the writers with a sense of humor has decided that her feminism and convictions about self-support are not powerful enough to destroy the happiness she feels at being supported by her husband. One preaches need of financial independence for women as a self-respecting basis for love and marriage (why love?) while another declares it has nothing to do with them: "It is the spirit of cooperation that counts and enables two people to make adjustments." A third has discovered that marriage is "the only profound human experience," and another consented to it after thirty-odd years of celibacy as the only way in which "one can give expression to love without interference."

I am disappointed that I find no discussion of the relation of pleasure to work. One admits that she hates work and sees no necessity for it even if it is needed to uphold feminist doctrines. To be sure, the five writers or journalists agree that they like the economic independence their work gives them, but they possess some of the sacred fire that makes for efficient work. The four teachers are engrossed with the ideal aspect of their careers, and the one social worker renounced it when she felt the discrepancy between her ideals and practise; she is the most ardent and militant feminist of the group.

Has station in life anything to do with feminism, or is it by sheer coincidence that, with one exception, these women were born to poverty? It would be interesting to have a series of articles on the same subject by women born to riches. If it would not affect their views on marriage and children, it might on feminism. The woman who, in her struggle for existence, hurts the wings of her ideals against hard walls erected by man is likely to overstress the necessity for independence of every kind.

Few of the writers, obviously, are under forty, and many of them are much older. Their efforts were made at a time when the struggle was real; now they take on the aspect of pioneer work. These women have "arrived" by their own means and their stories should be illuminating. They would have been so had the writers taken full advantage of their anonymity to reveal the soul in conflict between love and the principles and practice of feminism.

Were I seeking examples to illustrate that temperament and talent are inherited and not acquired, I could ask for no better ones than this series of articles furnishes. Nearly every one of the writers had at least one parent entitled to be called intellectual, with a desire for books and knowledge, and a determination that his or her offspring should have an education. It is interesting, too, that ten of these women had energetic, determined, dominating mothers, the kind that often shapes docile, dependent daughters and has sons with a flair for the easiest way.

On rereading these articles I fell into meditation. Which of these women should I have liked to companion?

There were two with whom I should have been willing to attempt it. One had strong, lusty desires and she wished more than anything else to have "swift feet that she might run after them." Another who interests me wrote the twelfth instalment. She seems to have neither ambition nor determination to administer the world, and she knows how to laugh and be joyous. She thinks the earth a lovely place to live and her only reason for being a feminist is dictated not by affect but by intellect. If her buoyant spirit has not made her over-affable I think she would be my first choice.

Turning to the corollary of this meditation, I wondered which of these women would be my last choice. Again it simmered down to two: The second and the fourth. The former had a childish sense of guilt. The grief and gloom of her parents was that they had brought her into the world, and she has a passionate desire to be no trouble to her husband. The fourth says that "no living person can give me the excitement I got at eight years old when my father took me on his knees and popularized the theories of Darwin for me." I should hesitate to enter as a contestant with father!

Law and Order in Los Angeles

By RUBE BOROUGH

Law and order suppressing "radicals" and disreputables is confident, belligerently verbose, forthright in action. Law and order suppressing "respectables" is stricken with qualms of "conscience," talks not so long nor so loud, and cautiously tests the ground before it moves.

Law and order in Los Angeles today faces the "respectables." Fifty-five of the city's most eminent bankers and business men have been indicted for looting the Julian Petroleum Corporation of from $12,000,000 to $18,000,000 in usurious interest charges and flooding the market with 4,250,000 worthless "overissued" shares of stock. Among the indicted are Harry M. Haldeman, president of the Better America Federation, that super-virtuous radical-baiting guardian of California's patriotism; Charles F. Stern, president of the Pacific Southwest Trust and Savings Bank, and three vice-presidents of the same bank, the chairman of whose board of directors is Henry M. Robinson, of Dawes Plan fame; Louis B. Mayer, general manager of the Goldwyn-Mayer Production Corporation; William Rhodes Hervery, a former superior-court judge.

About three years ago C. C. Julian, whose spectacular oil-stock-promotion methods had brought him into conflict with the California State corporation commissioner, was forced out of the presidency of the Julian Petroleum Company; a reorganization followed in which that company was merged with the California Eastern Oil Company. The merged concern took for its new president one S. C. Lewis, from the South, Middle West, and East, a man with a long "oil" history. Substantial business and banking interests backed Lewis.

Now Julian has been making speeches from his own radio station in which he charges that Lewis is "a big boob," that he let the "banker crowd" get him and permitted the looting of "Julian Pete." Julian has "named names" over the radio and as a result is in danger of losing his federal radio license. All of Julian's story may not be printed yet. But one may safely report the charge that H. M. Haldeman, as a member of "Pool No. 1," lent $20,000 to "Julian Pete" through its agent, A. C. Wagy and Company, a brokerage house, owned by S. C. Lewis, and that he received usurious interest in excess of $7,000. Haldeman, upon his arraignment in the local municipal court, indicated that he would try to show his transaction was not a "loan" but a stock purchase. It is the contention of the prosecution that all of the transactions by which "Julian Pete" was mulcted, whatever attempt may be made to represent them as "contracts of sale," were in essence loans with the stock involved held by the lenders as security only. It is furthermore asserted that the transactions were carried on the books of the brokerage house as "loans."

One of the money-lenders, according to the complaints, made five loans for thirty-day periods totaling $254,200, for which he received $26,920 interest; another made twenty-one loans for thirty-day periods totaling $424,800, and collected $41,180 interest; and the third made thirteen loans for thirty-day periods totaling $1,939,750, and collected $204,250 interest. California's usury law, it should be said, prohibits interest charges in excess of 1 per cent a month.

While City Prosecutor E. J. Lickley, a Progressive in local and State politics, was prosecuting the usury cases, the county grand jury was hearing testimony to fix responsibility for the "over-issue" of 4,250,000 shares of stock. The indictment, on June 26, of Lewis alone would mean little to the man on the street, or to the 40,000 shareholders of "Julian Pete" who have seen their stock with a book value of $50 drop in a few weeks from $15 to nothing. Many regard Lewis as in part a victim. As to his usurious interest payments, they believe he acted under duress of circumstances; and, as to the enormous stock over-issue, that it could not have taken place without prominent financiers having had knowledge of it. Moreover, Lewis has been talking freely both to the grand jury and the city prosecutor. Shareholders and the public want to see the big culprits punished.

While the city prosecutor and the county grand jury occupy the center of the picture, Receivers Joseph Scott and H. L. Carnahan, appointed by Federal Judge McCormick (who deprived Doheny of his Elk Hills oil lease), are trying to save Julian Petroleum from complete wreckage. Part of their strategy is to "encourage" the usury collectors to "put back" their gains into the company treasury and put them back "without strings." Less than half a million dollars of the $12,000,000 to $18,000,000 collected has so far been "put back." Some of the gentlemen offered to "put back" in return for receivers' certificates but the receivers would not agree. Haldeman, of the Better America Federation, "put back" his $7,000 but after a few days changed his mind and took it out again. "Big lawyers" had told him and others implicated that they had done no "legal or moral wrong." The city prosecutor answered with a warrant for arrest.

The receivers' job is not an easy one even if the "restitution" is made in full. The authorized stock of Julian Petroleum numbered 1,200,000 shares. The receivers have had some recent successes in bringing in new wells. But if they can build value into the full 5,250,000 shares now outstanding they will be wizards of finance. Of course, the fate of those 4,250,000 shares issued without permission from the State corporation commissioner is as yet uncertain, but auditors in the investigation have thrown up their hands at the problem of distinguishing between the authorized and the unauthorized shares.

One more figure and the picture for the time must stand as complete: Major Walter K. Tuller, big-business attorney and head of former Governor Richardson's "crime commission," is one of the half-dozen impeccable lawyers who are advising respectable citizens that they did no wrong in collecting what Receiver Scott calls "dirty money." As chairman of the crime commission he has urged upon the people and the legislature "reforms" of the criminal procedure which would have made possible convictions by a three-fourths jury verdict, given a trial judge the right to comment on the evidence as well as the law in a criminal case, reduced the defendant's number of peremptory challenges, and otherwise invaded the constitutional rights of American citizens.

Democracy is up against a real test in California.

Canada's Jubilee

By J. A. STEVENSON

Ottawa, June 24

THE Canadian people will begin on July 1 a solemn celebration of the sixtieth anniversary of the birth of their Dominion. Attending the ceremonies will be a small band of men and women who witnessed the jubilations of 1867, and it is they who must possess the truest perspective of the immense changes wrought in the Dominion by the intervening sixty years. Confederation found Canada a country where three-fourths of its population of 3,300,000 souls were still engaged in a stern daily battle with the primeval wilderness. There were only two cities with over 50,000 inhabitants, and even these were trading centers with a sprinkling of struggling factories. Life was almost Arcadian in its simplicity, the tone of society was sober and equalitarian, and the political temper fiercely democratic. Five thousand dollars per annum was a princely income and great fortunes were unknown. Industry and economy were the sovereign virtues and the grim battle with nature had left little time for culture and the elegancies of life. But the qualities of enterprise and self-reliance had been highly developed, and once Confederation halted the racial and political feuds which had paralyzed the country for nearly forty years, the planning of economic developments which promised a larger measure of prosperity and opened the way for the amenities of civilization became possible.

Immense sums of public money were spent in providing transportation links like the Intercolonial and the Canadian Pacific Railway, and in equipping the newer territories with the physical machinery of civilization, but for thirty years after Confederation the growth of the Dominion was disappointingly slow. The census of 1891 showed a population of only 4,833,329 which meant that the country, despite a regular inflow of immigrants, had scarcely retained its natural increase and the West had but a meager sprinkling of population. Its settlement had to wait until the free homestead land of the United States had been exhausted, and this event coincided with the advent to power in 1896 of the Laurier Government, which adopted a vigorous immigration policy. Immediately the pace of development began to quicken, and despite the setback caused by the Great War, Canada's growth and general progress during the last thirty years have fully justified the dreams of the architects of Confederation.

It is true that the growth of Canada's population, which is today estimated at nine and one-half million souls, has fallen short of expectations, but this slow increase makes all the more impressive Canada's economic achievement. The American people did not face half the obstacles in providing the physical machinery for their part of the continent that the Canadian people have successfully surmounted in a parallel task. The 2,278 miles of railway in 1867 have now been expanded to 40,352, and no country in the world has as large railway mileage per capita. A string of fine, modern cities, with broad streets and every modern convenience, constitutes the nerve centers of the Dominion and the harnessing of the vast water-powers has both simplified the problems of domestic life and given a great stimulus to industrial development. The story of the material expansion which the Dominion has enjoyed is most simply told in the following figures:

	1867	1926
National Wealth (Estimated)	1,000	22,000
Federal Revenues	19	395
Foreign Trade	149	2,242
Assets of Chartered Banks	50	2,300
Produce of Field Crops	100	1,121
Produce of Dairies	15	241
Produce of Mines	4	240
Produce of Forests*	32	327
Manufacturing Production	221	2,948

Today Canada leads the world as an exporter of wheat, newsprint, nickel, and asbestos and her command of raw materials and water-power resources, which can cheapen the costs of the manufacturing processes, insures her steady industrial expansion. Her huge northern hinterland may be incapable of profitable cultivation, but evidence accumulates that its mineral resources have only been scratched and that it may yet prove the Dominion's richest fountain of wealth. Individual enterprise, as in the United States, has been responsible for much of this amazing economic development, but the Canadian people have never shared the fear of collectivist enterprises which prevails so strongly south of the Forty-ninth Parallel. Today the great state-owned system of the Canadian National Railways is providing the Canadian Pacific Railway with formidable competition; the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario, a child of Conservative politicians, has achieved a wonderful success in providing cheap light and power to almost one-third of the country's population; and the co-operative wheat pools of the West are working a veritable revolution in the marketing of grain. A people whose core consists of yeomen landholders could not fail to be fundamentally conservative in its outlook, but it is the conservativism of progress and not of stagnation.

But parallel with the material advancement has come a great improvement in standards of life and a widespread appreciation of the civilizing influences of education. Poverty and hardship are by no means unknown, but there is a widespread diffusion of comfort and well-being, and only in the United States do the working classes enjoy the same material comforts and range of pleasures. At the time of Confederation 20 per cent of the population were illiterate, but the proportion has now fallen to less than 5 per cent. There were only two universities of standing in 1867, but today there are at least a dozen, and Toronto University has more students on its rolls than any university in the British Empire. A distinctive native school of art, whose quality is recognized by foreign critics, is now flourishing in Toronto and elsewhere, and a new stirring of literary impulses is evidenced by the emergence of an authors' association with branches in every important city.

Equally momentous have been the changes in the political field. The British North America Act endowed *Manufacturing and Forestry production figures are for 1925, but were exceeded last year.

Canada with complete autonomy in domestic affairs, but the mother country still acted as guardian trustee in the field of international relations. However, bit by bit as the years rolled on, the responsibilities of this trusteeship have been whittled down as Canada grew in strength and confidence, and the Great War made inevitable the final emancipation from tutelage which was ratified by the constitutional report of the last Imperial Conference. Today, although certain legal limitations destined to be obliterated at no distant date still bar the claim to untrammeled sovereignty, Canada is for all practical purposes an independent self-governing nation; the Crown and the authority of the Imperial Privy Council survive as formal links, but the real binding ties with the motherland are the common heritage of political ideals and the common literature and traditions. The Dominion is now responsible for her own systems of defense, she has begun to create her own diplomatic service, and she sends in her own right representatives to the Assembly of the League of Nations.

In domestic politics the racial solidarity of the French-Canadian people, the most conservative element in the community, on the Liberal side has completely upset the old equilibrium and is responsible for many anomalies and confusions. Since the war, moreover, there has been a serious retrogression in political morality and no further evidence of it need be sought than in the sorrowful story of the customs and revenue scandals, still being investigated, which the Toronto Globe, a Liberal paper, describes as "the blackest chapter in the country's history." But the younger generation is in a questioning mood about the existing political dispensation and the presence of a group of thirty independent members in the House of Commons indicates that a substantial element of the population can no longer be herded within the corrals of the two historic parties.

Relations with the United States were never more cordial, and there has been no more notable change in the last sixty years than the relegation to limited circles of the inveterate distrust of the Republic which the United Empire Loyalists implanted in the Canadian mind. But few Canadians are yet persuaded that the maintenance on this great continent of two distinct political systems which afford valuable opportunities for comparison of their experiments and results is not a distinct benefit to its inhabitants.

"Al" Smith in Texas

By RUBY A. BLACK

THE village doctor, the village good-for-nothing, the village banker, the village editor, the former village mayor, who is now the county's representative in the Texas Legislature, have all come out for the nomination of "Al" Smith for President in 1928.

The rest of the 733 inhabitants of Thornton, Texas, over twenty-one years old holding poll-tax receipts will vote for the New York Governor if he is nominated. Governor Dan Moody even journeyed to New York this week with a delegation of 200 Texans, a committee of whom paid a call on New York's Governor.

This is significant news. Texas—and the rest of the South—is largely made up of towns like Thornton—towns that are Dry and Fundamentalist. The fact that leaders in such towns, several of which I have visited recently, are going over to the "Al" Smith camp is probably more significant than the recent switch of Albert Sidney Burleson and Thomas Watt Gregory, members of the last Democratic Cabinet, from McAdoo to Smith.

It is easy to believe that Gregory and Burleson and other Southern politicians are [illegible] because they think it would be [illegible] endowed with patronage once more. But not so Thornton and the hundreds of villages of which it is a symbol. They have nothing much to gain politically one way or another. A Democrat instead of a Republican would be appointed postmaster, and that is about the only political gravy they could even smell. Furthermore, the Southern "Republican" postmaster is usually a special brand of Republican—a "postmaster Republican." The town does not hold his politics against him if he is a good postmaster.

These people in Thornton are Dry and Anti-Catholic. One of the elders of a Thornton church says he does not like Catholics because they do not believe in Christ. That is typical of the knowledge the Anti-Catholics here have of the church to which Governor Smith belongs. Most of them here have been—or are—members of the Ku Klux Klan. G. W. Black, the ex-mayor, now a member of the Texas Legislature, while never a Klansman, has always been anti-Catholic. He always read the Menace and Tom Watson's diatribes against the Catholics. He did not tell me this. I have known it a long time. He is my father. Now Representative Black is for "Al" Smith for President.

When I last visited my native State two years ago nobody spoke a kind word for "Al" Smith except a lone anti-prohibitionist, who was always a thorn in the side of the respectable citizens of the village he inhabited.

Down in Austin it is the same way. The Wilson Postmaster General, Albert Sidney Burleson, now retired from politics and satisfactorily occupied with seeing the money roll in from oil royalties, is busy converting his Austin friends to "Al" Smith, arguing against religious prejudice, pointing out that Woodrow Wilson himself was opposed to the Volstead Act, so much opposed that he vetoed it—a fact which Dry Democrats seem to have forgotten until a few weeks ago.

Professors at the State university, newspapermen, cotton brokers, a city commissioner, the husband of a W.C.T.U. leader, all told me they had "begun to favor 'Al' Smith." The women are a little vague about it, but they seem ready to accept Smith, in spite of the doubts of Dry editorial writers who declare that women who fought for prohibition could not be induced to vote for a Wet candidate.

However in the Capitol the youthful Governor, Dan Moody, is still troubled about "Al" Smith's wetness. He thinks, however, that the New York Governor's religion will not stand in his way. "Texas repudiated religious prejudice when it twice in succession elected governors who had fought the Ku Klux Klan," he points out.

Dan, as the whole State calls him, is not prepared to say whom he will support for the nomination. He says quickly enough that he, and the rest of Texas, will vote for "Al" Smith, once he is nominated.

In fact, the politicians are so sure of the staunchness of the Solid South that they are not even considering a Southern man for the Vice-Presidential nomination. They do not think such a sop need be thrown to the South to get it to support Governor Smith. Ohio or Indiana, they say down here, will name the running-mate for Smith. Or, perhaps, some Western State.

The Texas delegation to the Democratic National Convention will go instructed for Dan Moody for President. They all agree on that. Leading politicians declare that William Gibbs McAdoo has not the slightest chance of capturing the delegation this trip. The line-up at the last convention, controlled by Klansmen, cannot be duplicated at this convention, they assure you. McAdoo is just out of it.

Ritchie of Maryland and Donahey of Ohio they know little about, and they are not even curious. They dismiss Senator Carter Glass as too advanced in years, although he is Dry enough and loyal enough to Woodrow Wilson to suit them. Cordell Hull of Tennessee is mentioned, but rather fleetingly. Besides, Texas politicians do not believe any Southerner has a chance at the White House.

Senator James A. Reed of Missouri is not even considered here. Nobody ever voluntarily brings his name into the conversation. When it is mentioned by a newspaper reporter seeking opinions they all dismiss him with scant attention, with even less attention than they give McAdoo. Of course, he is as Wet as "Al" Smith. But what looms large in Texas minds is "Jim" Reed's behavior during—and following—the Wilson Administration. In fact, Texans hardly remember to point to Reed's wetness as a factor against him, although they mention it in the case of Smith. They remember only that "Jim" Reed did not do as Woodrow Wilson wanted him to do. They cannot forgive him for going against their President.

This state of mind seems to indicate that Texans are Democrats before they are Protestants or Prohibitionists. If they are Democrats first, and Protestant Prohibitionists second, they are probably subconsciously, if not consciously, preparing their minds to pick somebody who can be elected, regardless of prohibition or religion.

Their talk sounds like it.

"'Al' Smith is the only Democrat with a ghost of a show."

"Nobody but 'Al' Smith could get a run for his money."

"Does look like out of a hundred million Protestants, we might find some good man who could be elected President, but if we can't, why, we'll have to go for 'Al' Smith."

"I rather think 'Al' Smith would be the most available man. He is progressive, and a good executive. He might be elected, and I don't know of any other Democrat who could be."

These are typical quotations from Texas politicians, and from Texas merchants, farmers, druggists, lawyers, cotton men, newspapermen, oil men, university professors, realtors, and doctors, most of them prohibitionists, all of them Protestants.

This is reminiscent of the state of mind which elected Dan Moody governor. Texas wanted somebody to defeat the Fergusons. The word began to go around, "Dan's the man." On that slogan, the fighting and smiling young Attorney General polled the highest vote in the Texas primary, and that left him and "Ma" Ferguson to fight it out in the run-off primary. Many people who wanted to vote for other candidates went out in the first primary and voted for Dan Moody, simply because they were convinced that he was the man who could run the Fergusons out of Texas politics.

The question is, Will Texas act in exactly the same way in the Democratic convention? Will it line up under the slogan, "Al can beat Cal"? And will the rest of the South? Emily Newell Blair of Missouri, vice-chairman of the Democratic National Committee, says the Democrats have been out of power long enough to stop fighting among themselves and pick a winner. Texas politicians are not on the whole so honestly practical. They have a tendency to say that the Democratic Party would rather be right than in power.

But they are certainly busy thinking in practical terms, as their conversation reveals. "The people of this part of the country," says the Governor, "are convinced that prohibition is right, and they are not going to help nominate anybody who will try to repeal or nullify the Eighteenth Amendment."

On the other hand, many politicians and ordinary Texans with whom I have talked recently have drawled, "Well, I used to be for prohibition, but now I don't know." And while they are in that state of mind, some Smith man comes around and points out that "Al" Smith, while opposed to prohibition, is in favor of enforcing laws as long as they are on the statute books, and that New York has never had a better executive than Governor Smith. Such talk may prove to be seed cast on very fertile ground. It is everyday conversation in Austin and Dallas, Thornton and Mexia.

Governor Smith's letter on the relation of his religion to his politics was greeted joyously in Texas by those who were anxiously seeking some excuse for overcoming their religious prejudice and hopping on the Smith bandwagon. There is much talk in Texas these days about Thomas Jefferson and religious freedom, about Jefferson Davis and the New York Catholic lawyer who offered to defend him against a threatened charge of treason, about Chief Justice Roger B. Taney, a Catholic, and his loyalty to States' Rights, about the staunchness of the New York Catholic Democrats in the dark days following the Civil War. Texas seems to feel that it is about time some New York Catholic Democrat was rewarded for the service Tammany performed for the party when it seemed that the party might die with the death of the Confederacy.

Then they sit around and count votes in the Electoral College—even while engaging in their "rather-be-right-than-President" talk. They count on the Dry West to be won by a water-power program—if Smith is the nominee. The Republicans have done nothing about Boulder Dam, they remind one another. Smith has a water-power record that could win the West, they believe. They will almost count Ohio or Indiana on the provision that a Dry from one of these States is nominated for Vice-President—to run with "Al" Smith.

They do not hesitate for one minute to count the whole South, and the industrial East. They count Massachusetts, still mindful of David Walsh's defeat of William Butler, Coolidge's own candidate in Coolidge's own State. They get enthusiastic and count some other New England State. Somehow, they cannot seem to count enough votes to put a Democrat in the White House, except when they are counting "Al" Smith votes.

In the Driftway

ALL the Drifter's sympathy is with the small boys who, if the proposal of Clifford Goldsmith is accepted by Cleanliness Institute, will be lured into bathtubs cruelly renamed "The Spirit of Charles Lindbergh." There is no [illegible] more devastating a child's [illegible], and parents should respect it. Instead, with deadly sureness of [illegible] a treasured jealousy [illegible] from the boy-hood to a plaster of furniture [illegible] Little Boston hears every day about the hour when Napoleon [illegible] Martin's excuse for having gone to bed [illegible] about the great Bonaparte's clean collars than his own valet probably did. Gradually the reverence turns under such treatment to bitter disillusion. There must be some small [illegible] to whom Lindbergh is still a god bathed in heroic radiance; but how can this vision survive the installation of the Lindbergh bath? As for the [illegible] which is to be called "The Beauty Parlor of Mary Pickford," it is another form of the burnt-crust propaganda which the Drifter himself passed on to his nieces before they were old enough to protect themselves. If they ate burnt crusts their hair would curl; if they take enough baths they will look like Mary Pickford.

THE Drifter is not unqualifiedly for Cleanliness Institute anyway. His pride has not recovered from a devastating blast against American crudity by a British philosopher of note. This critic, after quoting Mencken, Sinclair Lewis, and no doubt The Nation itself about the sadder aspects of American self-expression, pictured contemptuously the slavish Yankee materialists who have nothing better to live for than a religion of exaggerated cleanliness. He could never bring himself to visit this preposterous country, Mr. Joad admitted proudly, but he had it on good authority that every American householder on showing visitors his home takes them first to the bathroom as a sort of shrine. When this outburst was shown him by a tolerant Englishman in a second-class railway carriage, the Drifter assured him of its falsity. To an Italian or even a Frenchman the Drifter would have made the best of it and tried to defend his country; but how could he face the scoured pink cheeks of an Englishman and say that Americans were cleaner and proud of it? He denied the slander. Now comes Cleanliness Institute to spoil the Drifter's reputation for even a fair degree of truthfulness.

CLEANLINESS INSTITUTE is a new public welfare organization of national scope. The chairman of the Board of Directors has the appropriately cleanly name of Colgate. As for Clifford Goldsmith, who proposed the Lindbergh and Pickford bathtubs, he is described as an author of health epigrams. Like the heroine of the ballad burning to know "who writes the lovely mottoes that you find in cracker boxes," the Drifter always likes to pierce the veil that hides modest authors whose words are as famous as their names are obscure. Can he have found in Mr. Goldsmith the gifted author of "Four out of five" and "Leaves no telltale odor" and "Cleanliness is next to——" But no. Mr. Goldsmith could hardly be old enough for that.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Crushing Haiti

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: President Borno has been "reforming" our constitution. Twelve articles have been modified and thirteen suppressed, while [illegible] itself. All the principles on which modern government is based have been eliminated. There are no more constitutional guaranties for the freedom of the press, the jury, and popular election. Everything is left to the executive power, who, through the domesticated Council of State, now can enact all sorts of [illegible] unconstitutional. The Supreme Court itself has also been domesticated. The chief justice and the judges will be appointed by the President for five years instead of for life. Mr. Borno will be the only judge in the Republic of Haiti, the Supreme Court losing the right to declare a law contrary to the constitution. All the city councils are abolished, thus municipal life will be extinct in Haiti.

The most interesting feature of Borno's constitutional reform is that he can be reelected for a six-year third term. Thus he expects to remain fourteen years in power. And General Russell is returning to Haiti in September to organize the farcical plebiscite by which the Haitian people must ratify the constitution [illegible]

[illegible] THOMAY,
Administrateur Délégué, Union patriotique d'Haïti

Teachers—and Teachers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: There are two sides to this matter of restrictions on teachers. In the good old days when an anarchist movement existed, I mentioned to a friend that being an anarchist was a hindrance to my getting the more attractive position in the teaching field. She exclaimed against it as an outrage. I asked her, "Would you be willing to send your daughter to a convent to be educated?" She hesitated a second or two, and then said squarely, "No, I wouldn't." "Well, then," said I, "why should a parent who disbelieves in anarchism not object to putting his child under anarchist influences?"

If you think it outrageous that the habit of smoking tobacco should be an obstacle to a teacher's getting a job, are you sure that if you yourself had to select a teacher you would not be influenced by the knowledge that she was a persistent and incorrigible gum-chewer?

The evils of restrictions on teachers are undeniable, but it is also pretty steep to demand that a man should send his child to a teacher whose teaching he thinks is bad for the child, and pay the teacher real money for it. Neither will the problem be satisfactorily settled by saying that a teacher may have all the beliefs and habits he likes as long as he keeps them quiet. Had I a child to send to school, I would sooner send him to a man who would vigorously teach positive error—say John Roach Straton—than to a man who refrained from advocating his beliefs.

Vale, Mass., May 31 STEVEN T. BYINGTON

California Sterilization

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You say: "It is reported that in California alone 635 insane people have been sterilized." Up to January 1, 1927, 3,951 sterilizations had been performed in the State hospitals of California. See the Journal of Social Hygiene, May, 1927, page 258.

Ithaca, New York, June 4 CHARLES E. EDGERTON

Mr. Sigman on the Garment Strike

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The fascinating communications in your issue of June 15, one from representatives of a Committee on Democracy in Trade Unions and the other from Mr. Louis Hyman, Left-Wing leader of the defunct Communist Joint Board of cloak, skirt, dress and reefer makers' unions, both vigorously dissenting from Mr. Stolberg's résumé of the situation, lead me to make a few observations. To the "impartial" experts of the committee on democracy I will not reply except to say that they lack Mr. Stolberg's ten years' familiarity with our organization, as well as his singular detachedness. They might have mentioned that I was among the first in our union to fight for proportional representation and have remarked that within this last year we had the disastrous general strike in New York, lasting six months, and that the remaining six months have been spent in rebuilding our New York organization after the Communist junket, which cost the union $3,500,000 and the workers a loss in wages of $30,000,000. Why, it was upon the motion of the Communists themselves in our General Executive Board that a referendum on proportional representation was postponed during the strike!

I can best reply to Mr. Hyman's statements by listing them and giving my version of them. To responsible readers of The Nation I am ready to throw open all official records of our union as witness to my statements.

Mr. Hyman says: The membership voted to strike for the demands in that year (1924). Instead of carrying out the order to strike, President Sigman presented the demands to a commission named by Governor Smith. I say: The general strike order, like all strike orders within our International, instructed officials of the union to call the strike if, in the officials' discretion, all amicable means had previously been exhausted.

Mr. Hyman says: When the commission reported, after two years, its terms were such as could not be accepted by the union, as President Sigman pointed out in many speeches and interviews. . . . Mr. Sigman has since reversed himself, in his efforts to find some excuse for getting rid of the opposition to his administration by the time-honored method of expulsion. I say: Before the strike, in April, 1926, I expressed the opinion before the General Executive Board and the New York Joint Board, that an unfavorable industrial condition existed and that the internal strength of the union was such as forbade a fight against all the elements of the industry at one time. But my recommendations were rejected, because to deal with the bosses on the basis of the Governor's commission's report would be "class collaboration," and this was distinctly against the orders received by the Communist leaders of our New York Joint Board from William Z. Foster's Trade Union Educational League, affiliated with the Communist Party. The general strike was called.

As against my recommendations made in the inner councils of our organization in April, 1926, Mr. Hyman quotes from an affidavit made by me in September, 1926, in a court document to fight an injunction obtained by the employers against us during the strike. Mr. Hyman has the ill grace to use against me a statement made by me during time of strike and against the common enemy! Why, when the Communists proved obdurate and insisted upon a strike, like all loyal trade unionists, I threw my lot in with them, and so did every union man, anti-Communists among them!

Mr. Hyman says: Mr. Stolberg's statement that "never in the history of American labor has a strike been more incompetently, irresponsibly, and wastefully managed" is both ridiculous and untrue. I say: Mr. Stolberg's figures are the most accurate obtainable since the Communists, to date, have given no audit, detailed or otherwise, of their expenditures.

Mr. Hyman says: Four of the most important of the eight (strike) committees were placed in the hands of the Right-Wing leaders. These were the finance, settlement, law, and out-of-town committees. I say: Mr. Abraham Baroff resigned in the first week of the seventeen-week strike as chairman of the finance committee because of ill health; Mr. Hyman signed all checks of this committee. The settlement committee was a rubber-stamp committee, being forced to settle on instructions from the organization committee, headed by a Communist. The law committee, while nominally headed by a non-Communist, had all expenditures approved by Mr. Hyman. All vouchers for expenditures by the out-of-town committee were forced to have the counter-signature of Joseph Levine of the Communist Party.

I may add: The mismanagement of the general strike began to be evident in the very first weeks of the strike, when the political interests of the Communist Party, rather than the economic welfare of the strikers and their families, were seen to be paramount. Only shop chairmen who were Communists were included in the General Strike Committee; union men acquainted with the city and the outlying districts were denied the privilege of serving; I was defeated as chairman of the General Strike Committee and, later, when scabbing became notoriously widespread and I offered to head the picket committee, I was turned down. Non-union production was never properly supervised and the strike soon settled down, not against the jobbers who were admittedly the evil of the industry, but against the small group of Industrial Council manufacturers. The details of the Communists' amazing incompetency, failure to realize almost elementary strategy in the conduct of a strike, their maneuver in sending back 16,000 workers to contractors' shops which worked only for jobbers against whom the strike was being conducted, their refusal to obtain a good early settlement of the strike, all these would take too much space to report.

We have, till now, scrupulously refrained from answering any of the nonsense emanating from the Communist camp. We have rested content with the certitude that the rank and file of our unions, as well as the broad masses of the labor movement, were well acquainted with the criminal fanaticism of the Communists and their faculty for destroying that which has been laboriously built up by the sacrifice of countless immigrant men and women. We make this single exception because we know there are many fine men and women among the readers of The Nation, sympathetic to labor, but perhaps unacquainted realistically with its struggles.

New York, June 16 M. Sigman,
President International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union

[In addition to Mr. Sigman's letter The Nation has received communications from both camps of the fur workers, from the cap-makers' union, and from various interested individuals. Interesting and important as many of these communications are, The Nation's space is limited and its field is wide; further letters on the subject cannot be printed.—Editor The Nation.]

That Six-Cylindered Airman

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In The Nation for June 8 Abbe Niles quotes the verse concerning the dying airman, with the remark that, so far as known, it had never seen print before. As The Dying Aviator it is included in an anthology of humorous verse called "The Comic Muse," compiled by J. C. Squire, and published in London by William Collins Sons & Co., Ltd. Mr. Squire, in his anthology, includes several additional lines not given by your reviewer. The author of the verse is anonymous.

Detroit, June 7 D. P. Spencer

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I have read The Nation for years. But this is the first time I have ever scored a scoop on you. I printed the same variant, a trifle more variable, perhaps, of The Dying Airman in my column in the Cincinnati Times-Star on May 20.

Cincinnati, June 10 Nixson Denton

See Pages 27, 28, and iii

Books and Music

Vigil

By ALLEN TATE

When you are dead and the frosty iron of laughter
Stupendously settles its pride upon your lips,
I will gather up the whispers you came after
When we first met, of immutable dissimulation.

If you are dead when the wind cries again
Over the bleak gables of an expected hour,
I will build a chapel out of the astonished pain
And wait for bells ringing in an empty tower.

Letter After a Visit

By HANIEL LONG

We walked along the leafless avenue
And you looped your arm through mine, and sang, and laughed,
And to avoid the cold, damp, sunless side of people's houses,
Led me across the street and into the sun,
And when that side grew cold, back again into the sun,
With a dance step and a funny story.
I held your arm tighter, understanding you at last,
Delighted to zigzag, zigzagging with the sun.

Did the Newspapers Make the World War?

Five Weeks: The Surge of Public Opinion on the Eve of the Great War. By Jonathan French Scott. The John Day Company. $2.50.

AMONG the few courageous writers who have dared to assault that most menacing of contemporary fetishes, obsessed nationalism and super-patriotism, Professor Scott must be assigned a leading place. In his "Patriots in the Making" (1916) and his "Menace of Nationalism in Education" (1926) he has provided us with highly illuminating surveys of the pernicious influence of patriotic education in the schools of Europe, giving special attention to the teaching of history. In the volume under review he has extended his researches to include an analysis of the influence of nationalism as it emerged through the newspaper opinion of Europe in the crucial days from June 28 to August 5, 1914.

Few topics connected with war responsibility offer potentially richer rewards to the investigator than a study of the influence of European journalism upon public opinion and official policies in the period from 1870 to 1914. We have considerable information with respect to the bribery of the French press between 1912 and 1914, thanks to the Bolshevik publications and the courage of l'Humanité, but this is only a speck in the ocean of corruption and incitement which existed in political journalism throughout the Western world. While we should like to have a monumental treatise on the part played by the press in bringing about the conditions which made the World War likely in 1914, we may be grateful for the labors of Professor Scott, who has made a careful and interesting summary of European press opinion during the crisis of 1914. He takes up the attitudes of the European papers during this period country by country—Austria, Germany, Russia, France, and England. In general he has performed the task in a conscientious, interesting, and informing manner. The book is a valuable and original contribution to the Kriegsschuldfrage.

As Professor Scott's book is in itself little more than a brief summary of newspaper opinion, it is obvious that we cannot in the space available present any adequate statement of the alignment of the European papers during this critical time. The essential facts seem to be the following: (1) The Serbian press was from the first preponderantly bellicose and arrogant, glorifying the assassination and emphasizing alleged Austrian oppression of the Serbs. (2) In Austria the press, with the notable exception of a few liberal papers, laid down an appropriate publicity barrage for the determination of the ministers to invade and punish Serbia, the assaults upon Serbia becoming much more intense after the sending of the Austrian ultimatum. (3) The German press was from the beginning inclined to hold Serbia responsible for the assassination of the Archduke, and to approve strong Austrian action against Serbia. There was, however, little or no sentiment for a general European war, the dominant hope being for the localization of the Austro-Serbian conflict. A strong minority favored deserting Austria rather than risking a general war. (4) The Russian press was vigorously and almost unanimously for intervention against Austria from the moment when the Russians received news of the nature of the Austrian ultimatum. (5) The French press, including many socialistic papers, was firm for standing resolutely with Russia in the crisis, though recognizing that it meant a European war. (6) In England there was much sympathy in papers of every complexion for Austria and equally decisive condemnation of Serbia. The majority of the Liberal Party organs, notably the Manchester Guardian and the London Daily News, were strong for neutrality until the end, but the Northcliffe papers clamored for intervention, particularly after the Austrian declaration of war on Serbia on July 28.

While fully recognizing the debt of gratitude under which Professor Scott has placed all students of war responsibility in this work, we must unqualifiedly reject his main thesis, which is that "In the surge of public opinion in the various countries, and not in the orders and telegrams of statesmen and diplomats, lies the fundamental explanation of the disastrous outcome of the crisis." In none of the European countries did the newspapers as a group take a more bellicose attitude than the governments. Nor did the newspapers advocate war-like measures in advance of the governmental determination upon such measures. There is no evidence whatever that any European government in 1914 based its fundamental decisions upon the state of press opinion, or, indeed, was in any important way influenced by newspaper articles or editorials. In England Grey, Crowe, and Nicolson threw their country into the war against the almost unanimous opposition of their party organs. No more eloquent or convincing argument for neutrality was written in 1914 than the famous editorial of A. G. Gardiner in the London Daily News for August 1. In France the government has been convicted of having, as in 1870, semi-officially stimulated bellicose and incendiary falsifications in the press, designed to incite the French public. This was notable as early as July 25, when Berthelot, Poincaré's henchman in the Foreign Office, caused a gravely distorted account of the pacific conversations between Bienvenu-Martin and Baron Schoen to be published in the Echo de Paris and the Matin. Professor Scott could hardly have taken the attitude he has toward the French press if he had read of the almost incredible distortions of facts and news sponsored by the government in 1914 and revealed with remarkable logic, fearlessness, lucidity, and factual accuracy in Demartial's "L'Évangile du Quai d'Orsai." And nothing could be more unlikely than that the Russian autocrats were swayed by the Russian papers in 1914. The government controlled most of the important papers; the majority of the Russians could not read; and many of them did not even know of the existence of Serbia.

There is no longer any case for the absolute inevitability of the war in 1914. If instead of Pachich, Sazonov, Poincaré, Berchtold, and Grey there had been in their offices Bogitschevitch, Kokovtsov, Caillaux, Tisza, and Morley, it is completely unthinkable that there could have been any European war after the murder of the Archduke on June 28, even granting that newspaper opinion had been exactly what it was in 1914. We may safely assume, however, that with pacifically inclined men in office the newspaper expressions would have been very different from what they were. Finally, before any dogmatic conclusions could be reached as to the influence of the newspapers in producing the war, it would be necessary to make a comparative study of newspaper opinion in those previous crises when war did not follow: in particular, the two Morocco crises and the Bosnian crisis of 1908.

Professor Scott would be ranked as a "moderate revisionist" in his views on war guilt, and his general attitude toward war responsibility is a civilized one. Yet there are a number of statements which should be corrected in a new edition. The Austrian declaration of war on Serbia did not "entail" the Russian mobilization unless one admits Russia's full right to aggression to defend her prestige. Sazonov's attitude on July 7, before the visit of Poincaré, cannot be taken as indicative of his orientation after July 20 or 24. It is incorrect to say that we have no proof that Grey's words and acts in 1914 had a decisive influence on Russian military measures. Nor is it true any longer to say that we do not have positive knowledge that the Serbian civil government was aware of the assassination plot before its execution and failed to warn Austria. These critical observations do not, however, detract seriously from a substantial, honest, and illuminating book which should be read sympathetically by every person interested in the great calamity of July, 1914.

HARRY ELMER BARNES

Concordance to Poetry, 1927

Red Flag. By Lola Ridge. The Viking Press. $1.50.

THERE is something in the lashing power and sweep of Miss Ridge's verse that sounds pathetically out of key in the contemporary poetic scene. It is as if someone were chatting in a parlor in a tone adapted to an outdoor Socialist rally. Under such circumstances, genuine power is apt to reecho rhetorically, and a voice crying in the wilderness may seem like much ado about nothing. Yet the fault obviously does not lie with Miss Ridge. It simply indicates that our poetry, which spoke in discreetly modulated minor accents before the vers libre upheaval, has again assumed its earlier voice, and Miss Ridge—like many another of our poets—is not yet aware of it. It is a fact, nevertheless, and is being increasingly acknowledged in practice if not in theory; and since contemporary poetry is largely colored by it, poetic criticism would do well to take cognizance of it. That it has not yet done so is due to a fundamental misconception of a bit of recent literary history.

When the tide of modern realism—which forcefully right-about-faced European literature from romancing over the past to an active participation in the present—belatedly reached these shores, it burst through the most vulnerable (because least commercialized) section of our literature, poetry. The humble Muse, which was then serving in a minor capacity as magazine filler-in, having little to lose, welcomed the invasion, and before long found itself hailed by default as "the major American art." To its credit it responded nobly, and, shouldering the burden of a standpat fiction and drama on its slender back, launched into a vigorous campaign for the new order. Which was all too successful. For fiction and drama soon saw the light, and with the zeal of fresh converts rushed to the front and brushed poetry respectfully aside. This was to be expected. Poetry is no longer as living a language as it was when the world's thought and emotion chose it as a favorite channel. In no contemporary modern literature has poetry remained dominant in the face of a vigorous drama or fiction, and when American drama and fiction woke up, American poetry likewise gave ground. Thereafter a delicate minor note crept into our poetry, which, despite its superior polish and sophistication, was actually an unconscious adaptation to a smaller, more intimate audience.

There are, of course, a few who can afford to ignore the contemporary drift—poets who are already so classic that their work is not subject to current standards. But it is a mistake to confuse the universal respect with which their work is received with the dynamic interest aroused by their prose contemporaries or their own earlier, timelier collections. If Miss Ridge's remarkable first volume, "The Ghetto," had appeared just a few years earlier, she might have been among those fortunate ones. As it is, she has to go to school with the newcomers and learn to walk softly and carry a small but prying stick. That this can be a fascinating occupation much of recent poetry attests. On the wayside, off the main-traveled literary highways, the poet may uncover secrets unnoticed otherwise, and catch fleeting glimpses of shy wild truths. This is a thesis which can be proved from Miss Ridge's latest volume, in which her most ambitious attempts fail to lift her from the ground; whereas almost every line of her more fragmentary notations is the take-off of a beautiful and agile fancy.

ALTER BRODY

Antaeus

Bread and Fire. By Charles Rumford Walker. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

THE larger and more successful portion of this unusual first novel seems to consist of a record of things seen inside two related but contrasting spheres of human activity; first in that of preparation for political action, of theory straining to become tangible fact; and then in that of present reality, of the struggle for individual existence in which theories find their roots. Specifically, the hero, Harris Burnham, finds himself serving as managing editor of a statistical weekly supported by a tiny ambitious radical party, and is gradually drawn into the latter's councils. With the disillusionment of its collapse he parachutes to earth again, the earth of first principles, the earth of which it was said that "out of it cometh bread, and under it is turned up as it were fire"; to that individual struggle which has been mentioned, as it manifests itself in a great copper mill. In the end Antaeus is ready once more to rise; for just what new campaigns one is not told.

The great war has been won and the peace duly appointed, yet things about and under the world are arranging and disarranging themselves with apparent obliviousness or indifference to these facts. To the young, intelligent, and eternally curious Burnham, watching the papers and seeking solid ground somewhere, it occurs suddenly that there is none; that

> For a few years the world will contain a molten charge like a steel furnace. . . . Anything can be done to the mixture by adding carbon or manganese or sulphur. But in five years at the outside it will be poured off into new molds.

Such a discovery calls naturally for such action as is open to him while time remains; it motivates the extension of his interest from his immediate job on the Economic Weekly to earnest participation in the activities of the Social Policy Group. This episode, in view of its denouement, is remarkable for the self-control with which the author sticks to facts and falls neither to partisan ranting on the one hand nor to disappointed ridicule or denunciation on the other. The group, it transpires, is as mad as such groups run: a centrifugal conglomeration of assorted obsessions. An anarchist who would save one law, "prohibition"; a communist, expelled from the party for a pacifism which logically rejects The Revolution itself; another pacifist who takes pride in his war service; a Catholic advocate and practitioner of free love; an actual worker who knows what he wants and intends to have it, in contrast with the majority of intellectuals who, typically, can argue without excessive heat or consciousness of absurdity on the question who is the most radical. The madness is in the conjunction of cross-purposes; a group craziness, since, whatever may come of the beliefs of any unit, the group as such must surely disintegrate. That it does, and Burnham, whose young inquisitiveness, enthusiasm, and hero-worship have drawn him into it, passes no judgments as he sees the signs of dissolution, but sadly seeks the factory.

There, among the raw materials of unease, one feels the writer less and what he sees about him more; because, perhaps, he feels things here are more important than the impression they have made on any observer. At the same time, whenever Mr. Walker's unpretentious prose touches unregarded human beings in their fight against odds, and equally when it treats of engines, of furnaces, and of hard physical labor as something done and felt, not merely watched or valued in terms of production, it takes on special power and color. The laborers and the officials in the mill stand out as do no other characters in the book. The heroine, despite the thought that went to making her portrait, is a shadow beside the charcoal sketches of Halsey, Kreck, and Kenwick. Nothing in these pages is so momentous as the instant when the imminent and long-preparing strike dies unborn, as a single yellow slip tells the pay-day line that unemployment has set in. Nothing in the book is so moving as the incidents that follow—in particular, the story, a brief masterpiece, of the hooker, Rakhofsky.

There is a love story, not a perfunctory one, and yet one whose ratio decidendi the reviewer confessedly finds obscure, and which he feels as a recurring distraction from the business on hand. Taking this love story to be a work of creative imagination rather than of ruminative memory, I believe, not that the author would best take to reporting, but that the humanitarian observer and messenger in him on the one hand and the energetic and adventurous physical man on the other have in him the advantage over the closeted romancer. It is difficult to predict the exact nature of Mr. Walker's future. He is interested in politics, in economics, in social theory, in work, and in the living people whom he meets, and, instinctively, walks around and studies. He is more interested in these than in the fabrication of a plot. Between them his choice may not yet have been made. He has, and will increasingly acquire, under the spur of curiosity and concern, practical knowledge on subjects which are names only to the average novelist; he will wish to act on that knowledge, and to impart it. Too much in this country active men of affairs take up the pen only in time for the valedictory reminiscences and scholars write only to inform each other, while novelists, save for occasional sallies forth in conscious search of material, sit in a vacuum and work their heads. It is probable that Mr. Walker will continue both to do and to write, and the prospect this offers is a pleasant one. He has balance, tolerance, and imagination, and he exhibits the uncommon combination of a tough mind and a tender heart.

ARIEL NILES

An Outline of Socialism

A History of Socialist Thought. By Harry W. Laidler. Thomas Y. Crowell Company. $3.50.

TO the outlines of history, science, and religion Dr. Laidler adds the outline of socialism; starting with Isaiah and ending with Zinoviev. It is a careful, thorough, and withal a dramatic outline. Before us passes the great procession of the world's idealists and dreamers—the divine fools of the ages, and some of the wisest men that ever lived. What a galaxy it is of those who have glimpsed the Kingdom of Heaven upon earth—Plato, Savonarola, Sir Thomas More, Bacon, Campanella, Andreae, Saint Simon, Fourier, Proudhon, Coleridge, Robert Owen, Emerson, Bellamy, William Morris, Wells.

Against the flaming dreams of the Utopians is set the relentless logic of Marx and Engels, the Communist Manifesto, and the revolutions of '48. Here the spirit of Utopia seeks to find practical expression in a world of behaving men and women, with results dire, terrible, and beautiful. The clash of what with what might be is set forth in all its absurdity and splendor.

We go on to the super-logic of the Fabians, with the biggest lump of victual in that stew—the rotund figure of Sidney Webb. And so to Bernstein and the revisionists in Germany; to syndicalism, philosophic anarchism, guild socialism, and at last to the stark realities of the Russian revolution and the living, breathing dictatorship of the proletariat over 150 millions of human beings.

Dr. Laidler has no ax to grind. He is the scholar, not the propagandist. On a broad canvas he has given us the history of one of the most poignant dreams which ever have beset mankind. And whether that dream shall ever come permanently to earth only the gods may tell.

But to those gods all who care beyond tomorrow's porridge and tomorrow's rent must pray.

STUART CHASE

Toward a Revaluation

The Ingenious Hidalgo Miguel Cervantes. By Han Ryner. Translated by J. H. Lewis. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.75.

THE spectacle of Cervantes—a man trying to lift himself above the mediocrity and suicidal limitations of his day and people—has the fascination of the deepest tragedy. Looked at from the position of intellectual and moral freedom we enjoy today, it may be hard to understand. One must dig a little into that unfortunate period which the Spaniards call their Golden Age; one must realize fully the incubus which then held genius to the mat, before one begins to gain an inkling into its real meaning. Compare the physical struggle of Cervantes for survival with the smug complacency of Lope de Vega and his followers and their supine surrender to popular values and taste; Lope belonged to that peculiar kind of talented mediocrity which finds ambient circumstances always good enough. Compare it even with the partial maladjustment of Quevedo, who was at bottom a conformist. Only through such comparisons will we arrive at an understanding of the meaning of Cervantes's tragedy.

It is only recently, thanks to Américo Castro's book on Cervantes, that we are beginning to realize the full reach of his powers, the thoroughly protestant grain of his temper. Enough has been unearthed already to enable one to hazard the opinion —for which we are not yet fully prepared, perhaps—that, viewed in the light of these discoveries, Cervantes was a gloriously frustrated genius. He never quite dared to express himself openly, as one may suppose he would have wanted to. The subterfuges he had to make use of in no small way prevented a full development of his talents. And he was also frustrated, because the drama which Lope made popular—as Mr. Ryner suggests—blocked the way for the development of a tragic drama, capable of competing with the Elizabethan, which Cervantes could have perhaps created. That Cervantes was a great enough dramatic artist to do for Spain as much as Marlowe did for England; that Lope or any of his followers could not equal Cervantes in intellectual depth or artistic skill, however much Lope may have surpassed him in lyric power, Tirso in wit and verve, and Calderón in fantasy, one may easily find out not only from a study of his great works but even from a glance into his minor work, his entremeces.

The question is, of course, much more complicated than one can indicate in a short space. Before we can attempt a just evaluation of Cervantes a great deal of traditional cant and prejudice must be cleared off. As long as scholars persist in finding in Lope the summa of all excellence, and critics continue —in the main, for one should remember the Azorín of pre-academic days—to repeat the old platitudes, little will be gained, not only toward a just evaluation of Cervantes but also toward an evaluation of the whole literature of his day. Meanwhile, books like the present are exceedingly useful because they help in the preliminary work of clearing the ground. As a fictionized biography Mr. Ryner's book has also intrinsic merit. Happily devoid of the pedantry of erudition, yet containing valuable information, it introduces to a wide public the figure of one of the world's geniuses, as little known as he is badly understood. Although a little overdone in certain respects—for one may doubt whether Cervantes was a conscious hater of the Catholic church, as well as altogether free from the jingoism of his day—the beautifully tragic figure of old Cervantes, protesting ironically and serenely in spite of untoward circumstances, when he could have easily arrived at prosperity through boot-licking, as everybody else did in his day, emerges vividly from these pages.

ELISEO VIVAS

Darkening Our Lightness

The Story of Music. By Paul Bekker. W. W. Norton. $3.50.
Terpander, or Music and the Future. By Edward J. Dent. E. P. Dutton and Company. $1.

BEKKER'S purpose is to acquaint the layman with the changes in music and their causes. But I must repeat that the layman can only misunderstand a verbal account. For the connotation of a word—a word that refers to this procedure in music or to that characteristic of some composer's music—is as wide as its denotation, as the examples of the procedure or quality which the reader knows. To the layman, then, the word conveys no meaning, or an incorrect one; and to learn its correct meaning he must hear its examples. But having heard these, he need not do anything more. For one can be satisfied with the what of an art and ignore the why; one can enjoy the final artistic products and not worry about what produced them. And if one wants to know their relations to one another—including causal relations, if any—one does best, again, merely to listen. For the final musical products contain within themselves both that which distinguishes them from one another and whatever relates them, and do not contain what does not belong.

All this to explain and justify my belief that Bekker should have given a series of concerts. Instead, he has chosen the spoken and written word, one source of confusion; and to this he adds a passion for causes where often no cause exists, and an insistence that these causes be conditions imposed by human life and thought. We get, then, to account for the series of musical products, a series of external causes; and the two interact somewhat as follows: the causes, as the music sprawls about, become tortuous, obscure (hence at first glance impressive), and improbable when not downright absurd; and the music, in order that it be governed by the causes, is conceived of in such a way as often to be unrecognizable, even to one who is familiar with it, leave alone one who is not. Thus do obvious sensitiveness and intellectual power defeat themselves and each other.

What Bekker wants to establish above all is the falseness of the idea of improvement in the forms of art, as distinguished from mere change. It is not merely that we cannot judge what we are accustomed to regarding as primitive forms of music because we do not know what they sounded like; but that music is a product of human creative energy, and that "men have been men at all times, at least as clever, at least as talented and as inventive as ourselves"; hence that the product must at all times have been equal in value to our own. And "since the constructive forces always remain the same, since nothing can be added or lost, it follows that the total value of the result must always remain the same, too." Strictly spoken, and strictly speaking, true; but for practical purposes most of us will continue to do with less than strictness.

Mr. Dent, for example, is also concerned over the fact that peoples who we know were highly susceptible to the power of sound and "at the same time consummately accomplished in the other arts should have left behind them an art of music which we can only regard as crude and primitive." Much of it has, he concedes, disappeared into silence; but suppose it had been preserved, then the question arises—"Is a work of art a complete and finite thing, beautiful when it left its maker's hand, beautiful now and for ever; or is it frankly transitory, a momentary expression of a momentary experience, speaking as a rule only to those who belong to the same generation?" What I take to be Mr. Dent's answer—"Music is of all the arts the most subject to change . . . the most transitory"—I interpret as an acceptance of the second alternative. I am not sure, because Mr. Dent's unordered, unintegrated prose does not indicate clearly the patterns of his ideas. I can, then, testify to the shrewdness and discernment of many individual statements; but I can only surmise that collectively they outline changes in the past of a changing art in order to reconcile us to further changes which must perplex when they do not outrage us.

[illegible]

Books in Brief

Does Prohibition Work? By Martha Bensley Bruère. Harper and Brothers. $1.50.

Mrs. Bruère's determination to keep her study free from the underbrush of figures is easy to understand. But there are some for whom a morass of conflicting opinions makes even more difficult going and for whom an occasional dry plank in the way of actual figures would be a cause for gratitude. "Does prohibition work?" Yes and no, comes the answer from the 193 reports submitted by social workers from all over the country. Here and there it works, and that depends. Mrs. Bruère concludes that it does work "wherever there is a Nordic-American population which for several generations has not been in close contact with the newer immigrations or the cosmopolitanism of the great cities." She holds that factors of importance to the problem are our great national prosperity and the new work of women. The final paragraph of the book appears to imply a tentative affirmative to the title. Reading the book reinforces the inclination of this reviewer toward a tentative no.

The Golden Complex: A Defense of Inferiority. By Lee Wilson Dodd. The John Day Company. $1.[illegible]

As Mr. Dodd launches his essay in literary psychology in a mood of pleasantry, his thesis need not be taken too seriously, either as stimulation or as conclusion. But for all his banter, he has a thesis; and still better, a wholesome perspective which a sense of humor commonly confers. He wishes to save the complex from the stain of inferiority and move it to the place of advantage. It isn't a leaden drag but a golden spur. He centers the discussion about the case of Byron, whose lame foot was the stimulus to make him a courageous athlete—"a master horseman, a dead shot, the best swimmer in England"—and, with the assurance thus gained, to make him speak and act notably as a lover, poet, and patriot. And he is only one of many who has converted a handicap into a ladder. The "complex" is a Freudian term, but the "inferiority" comes from Adler, who makes it the corner-stone of an entire psychology, and regards its removal as the first step toward normality. Mr. Dodd's suggestive and altogether agreeable contribution is a welcome correction of Dr. Adler's doctrine in its extreme form, as well as a skit about Freudianism that should induce a more rational attitude toward it than commonly prevails. Whether a handicap produces a sense of inferiority and induces a complex, or conduces to a heroic resolve to achievement despite it, depends upon the type of nervous constitution upon which it happens to be grafted. Adler makes it the keystone of character. It is far more likely that it is just one of many units that together make a human mosaic—the design often vague and the practitioner of free love; an actual worker who knows what he wants and intends to have it, in contrast with the majority of intellectuals who, typically, can argue without excessive heat or consciousness of absurdity on the question who is the most radical. The madness is in the conjunction of cross-purposes; a group craziness, since, whatever may come of the beliefs of any unit, the group as such must surely disintegrate. That it does, and Burnham, whose young inquisitiveness, enthusiasm, and hero-worship have drawn him into it, passes no judgments as he sees the signs of dissolution, but sadly seeks the factory.

There, among the raw materials of unease, one feels the writer less and what he sees about him more; because, perhaps, he feels things here are more important than the impression they have made on any observer. At the same time, whenever Mr. Walker's unpretentious prose touches unregarded human beings in their fight against odds, and equally when it treats of engines, of furnaces, and of hard physical labor as something done and felt, not merely watched or valued in terms of production, it takes on special power and color. The laborers and the officials in the mill stand out as do no other characters in the book. The heroine, despite the thought that went to making her portrait, is a shadow beside the charcoal sketches of Halsey, Kreck, and Kenwick. Nothing in these pages is so momentous as the instant when the imminent and long-preparing strike dies unborn, as a single yellow slip tells the pay-day line that unemployment has set in. Nothing in the book is so moving as the incidents that follow—in particular, the story, a brief masterpiece, of the hooker, Rakhofsky.

There is a love story, not a perfunctory one, and yet one whose ratio decidendi the reviewer confessedly finds obscure, and which he feels as a recurring distraction from the business on hand. Taking this love story to be a work of creative imagination rather than of ruminative memory, I believe, not that the author would best take to reporting, but that the humanitarian observer and messenger in him on the one hand and the energetic and adventurous physical man on the other have in him the advantage over the closeted romancer. It is difficult to predict the exact nature of Mr. Walker's future. He is interested in politics, in economics, in social theory, in work, and in the living people whom he meets, and, instinctively, walks around and studies. He is more interested in these than in the fabrication of a plot. Between them his choice may not yet have been made. He has, and will increasingly acquire, under the spur of curiosity and concern, practical knowledge on subjects which are names only to the average novelist; he will wish to act on that knowledge, and to impart it. Too much in this country active men of affairs take up the pen only in time for the valedictory reminiscences and scholars write only to inform each other, while novelists, save for occasional sallies forth in conscious search of material, sit in a vacuum and work their heads. It is probable that Mr. Walker will continue both to do and to write, and the prospect this offers is a pleasant one. He has balance, tolerance, and imagination, and he exhibits the uncommon combination of a tough mind and a tender heart.

ABEL NILES

An Outline of Socialism

A History of Socialist Thought. By Harry W. Laidler. Thomas Y. Crowell Company. $3.50.

TO the outlines of history, science, and religion Dr. Laidler adds the outline of socialism; starting with Isaiah and ending with Zinoviev. It is a careful, thorough, and withal a dramatic outline. Before us passes the great procession of the world's idealists and dreamers—the divine fools of the ages, and some of the wisest men that ever lived. What a galaxy it is of those who have glimpsed the Kingdom of Heaven upon earth—Plato, Savonarola, Sir Thomas More, Bacon, Campanella, Andreae, Saint Simon, Fourier, Proudhon, Coleridge, Robert Owen, Emerson, Bellamy, William Morris, Wells.

Against the flaming dreams of the Utopians is set the relentless logic of Marx and Engels, the Communist Manifesto, and the revolutions of '48. Here the spirit of Utopia seeks to find practical expression in a world of behaving men and women, with results dire, terrible, and beautiful. The clash of what with what might be is set forth in all its absurdity and splendor.

We go on to the super-logic of the Fabians, with the biggest lump of victual in that stew—the rotund figure of Sidney Webb. And so to Bernstein and the revisionists in Germany; to syndicalism, philosophic anarchism, guild socialism, and at last to the stark realities of the Russian revolution and the living, breathing dictatorship of the proletariat over 150 millions of human beings.

Dr. Laidler has no ax to grind. He is the scholar, not the propagandist. On a broad canvas he has given us the history of one of the most poignant dreams which ever have beset mankind. And whether that dream shall ever come permanently to earth only the gods may tell.

But to those gods all who care beyond tomorrow's porridge and tomorrow's rent must pray.

STUART CHASE

Toward a Revaluation

The Ingenious Hidalgo Miguel Cervantes. By Han Ryner. Translated by J. H. Lewis. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.75.

THE spectacle of Cervantes—a man trying to lift himself above the mediocrity and suicidal limitations of his day and people—has the fascination of the deepest tragedy. Looked at from the position of intellectual and moral freedom we enjoy today, it may be hard to understand. One must dig a little into that unfortunate period which the Spaniards call their Golden Age; one must realize fully the incubus which then held genius to the mat, before one begins to gain an inkling into its real meaning. Compare the physical struggle of Cervantes for survival with the smug complacency of Lope de Vega and his followers and their supine surrender to popular values and taste; Lope belonged to that peculiar kind of talented mediocrity which finds ambient circumstances always good enough. Compare it even with the partial maladjustment of Quevedo, who was at bottom a conformist. Only through such comparisons will we arrive at an understanding of the meaning of Cervantes's tragedy.

It is only recently, thanks to Américo Castro's book on Cervantes, that we are beginning to realize the full reach of his powers, the thoroughly protestant grain of his temper. Enough has been unearthed already to enable one to hazard the opinion—for which we are not yet fully prepared, perhaps—that, viewed in the light of these discoveries, Cervantes was a gloriously frustrated genius. He never quite dared to express himself openly, as one may suppose he would have wanted to. The subterfuges he had to make use of in no small way prevented a full development of his talents. And he was also frustrated, because the drama which Lope made popular—as Mr. Ryner suggests—blocked the way for the development of a tragic drama, capable of competing with the Elizabethan, which Cervantes could have perhaps created. That Cervantes was a great enough dramatic artist to do for Spain as much as Marlowe did for England; that Lope or any of his followers could not equal Cervantes in intellectual depth or artistic skill, however much Lope may have surpassed him in lyric power, Tirso in wit and verve, and Calderón in fantasy, one may easily find out not only from a study of his great works but even from a glance into his minor work, his entremeses.

The question is, of course, much more complicated than one can indicate in a short space. Before we can attempt a just evaluation of Cervantes a great deal of traditional cant and prejudice must be cleared off. As long as scholars persist in finding in Lope the summa of all excellence, and critics continue —in the main, for one should remember the Azorín of pre-academic days—to repeat the old platitudes, little will be gained, not only toward a just evaluation of Cervantes but also toward an evaluation of the whole literature of his day. Meanwhile, books like the present are exceedingly useful because they help in the preliminary work of clearing the ground. As a fictionized biography Mr. Ryner's book has also intrinsic merit. Happily devoid of the pedantry of erudition, yet containing valuable information, it introduces to a wide public the figure of one of the world's geniuses, as little known as he is badly understood. Although a little overdone in certain respects—for one may doubt whether Cervantes was a conscious hater of the Catholic church, as well as altogether free from the jingoism of his day—the beautifully tragic figure of old Cervantes, protesting ironically and serenely in spite of untoward circumstances, when he could have easily arrived at prosperity through boot-licking, as everybody else did in his day, emerges vividly from these pages.

ELISEO VIVAS

Darkening Our Lightness

The Story of Music. By Paul Bekker. W. W. Norton. $3.50.
Terpander, or Music and the Future. By Edward J. Dent. E. P. Dutton and Company. $1.

BEKKER'S purpose is to acquaint the layman with the changes in music and their causes. But I must repeat that the layman can only misunderstand a verbal account. For the connotation of a word—a word that refers to this procedure in music or to that characteristic of some composer's music—is as wide as its denotation, as the examples of the procedure or quality which the reader knows. To the layman, then, the word conveys no meaning, or an incorrect one; and to learn its correct meaning he must hear its examples. But having heard these, he need not do anything more. For one can be satisfied with the what of an art and ignore the why; one can enjoy the final artistic products and not worry about what produced them. And if one wants to know their relations to one another—including causal relations, if any—one does best, again, merely to listen. For the final musical products contain within themselves both that which distinguishes them from one another and whatever relates them, and do not contain what does not belong.

All this to explain and justify my belief that Bekker should have given a series of concerts. Instead, he has chosen the spoken and written word, one source of confusion; and to this he adds a passion for causes where often no cause exists, and an insistence that these causes be conditions imposed by human life and thought. We get, then, to account for the series of musical products, a series of external causes; and the two interact somewhat as follows: the causes, as the music sprawls about, become tortuous, obscure (hence at first glance impressive), and improbable when not downright absurd; and the music, in order that it be governed by the causes, is conceived of in such a way as often to be unrecognizable, even to one who is familiar with it, leave alone one who is not. Thus do obvious sensitiveness and intellectual power defeat themselves and each other.

What Bekker wants to establish above all is the falseness of the idea of improvement in the forms of art, as distinguished from mere change. It is not merely that we cannot judge what we are accustomed to regarding as primitive forms of music because we do not know what they sounded like; but that music is a product of human creative energy, and that "men have been men at all times, at least as clever, at least as talented and as inventive as ourselves"; hence that the product must at all times have been equal in value to our own. And "since the constructive forces always remain the same, since nothing can be added or lost, it follows that the total value of the result must always remain the same, too." Strictly spoken, and, strictly speaking, true; but for practical purposes most of us will continue to do with less than strictness.

Mr. Dent, for example, is also concerned over the fact that peoples who we know were highly susceptible to the power of sound and "at the same time consummately accomplished in the other arts should have left behind them an art of music which we can only regard as crude and primitive." Much of it has, he concedes, disappeared into silence; but suppose it had been preserved, then the question arises—"Is a work of art a complete and finite thing, beautiful when it left its maker's hand, beautiful now and for ever; or is it frankly transitory, a momentary expression of a momentary experience, speaking as a rule only to those who belong to the same generation?" What I take to be Mr. Dent's answer—"Music is of all the arts the most subject to change . . . the most transitory"—I interpret as an acceptance of the second alternative. I am not sure, because Mr. Dent's unordered, unintegrated prose does not indicate clearly the patterns of his ideas. I can, then, testify to the shrewdness and discernment of many individual statements; but I can only surmise that collectively they outline changes in the past of a changing art in order to reconcile us to further changes which must perplex when they do not outrage us.

B. H. HAGGIN

Book in Brief

Does Prohibition Work? By Martha Bensley Bruère. Harper and Brothers. $1.50.

Mrs. Bruère's determination to keep her study free from the underbrush of figures is easy to understand. But there are some for whom a morass of conflicting opinions makes even more difficult going and for whom an occasional dry plank in the way of actual figures would be a cause for gratitude. "Does prohibition work?" Yes and no, comes the answer from the 193 reports submitted by social workers from all over the country. Here and there it works, and that depends. Mrs. Bruère concludes that it does work "wherever there is a Nordic-American population which for several generations has not been in close contact with the newer immigrations or the cosmopolitanism of the great cities." She holds that factors of importance to the problem are our great national prosperity and the new work of women. The final paragraph of the book appears to imply a tentative affirmative to the title. Reading the book reinforces the inclination of this reviewer toward a tentative no.

The Golden Compass: A Dilemma of Inferiority. By Lee Wilson Dodd. The John Day Company. $1.75.

As Mr. Dodd launches his essay in literary psychology in a mood of pleasantry, his thesis need not be taken too seriously, either as stimulation or as conclusion. But for all his banter, he has a thesis; and still better, a wholesome perspective which a sense of humor commonly confers. He wishes to save the complex from the stain of inferiority and move it to the place of advantage. It isn't a leaden drag but a golden spur. He centers the discussion about the case of Byron, whose lame foot was the stimulus to make him a courageous athlete—"a master horseman, a dead shot, the best swimmer in England"—and, with the assurance thus gained, to make him speak and act notably as a lover, poet, and patriot. And he is only one of many who has converted a handicap into a ladder. The "complex" is a Freudian term, but the "inferiority" comes from Adler, who makes it the corner-stone of an entire psychology, and regards its removal as the first step toward normality. Mr. Dodd's suggestive and altogether agreeable contribution is a welcome correction of Dr. Adler's doctrine in its extreme form, as well as a skit about Freudianism that should induce a more rational attitude toward it than commonly prevails. Whether a handicap produces a sense of inferiority and induces a complex, or conduces to a heroic resolve to achievement despite it, depends upon the type of nervous constitution upon which it happens to be grafted. Adler makes it the keystone of character. It is far more likely that it is just one of many units that together make a human mosaic—the design often vague and the color-scheme dull. Mr. Dodd cites a saying of Oscar Wilde that summarizes the matter: "The more one analyzes people, the more all reasons for analysis disappear. Sooner or later, one comes to that dreadful universal thing called human nature."

Balbus, or the Future of Architecture. By Christian Barman. E. P. Dutton and Company. $1.

To deny a part either to technique or to material in developing architectural form, as Mr. Barman does, and to discover as the chief cause of cube building the emancipation of woman and the consequent rise of the department store is a tour de force of no mean order; but it is not sound criticism. But Mr. Barman's analysis of traffic and its development of towns, and, eventually, of zoning for height, is clear and dynamic. Agreeable and stimulating it is, also, to have public attention called to essential changes in architectural thinking and the losses entailed when one builds, as one is forced today, for inclosed cubic feet alone instead of piece by piece for separate functions that thus find expression in the resultant form. An amusing book, but a book whose correct conclusions are dimmed rather than enforced by a mist of smart flippancy.

A General Theory of Value. By Ralph Barton Perry. Longmans, Green and Company. $6.

A theory which makes value the function of interest and analyzes interest in terms of the current jargon of the behavioristic psychology. This volume of 700 pages is an elaborate formulation of a simple assumption, intricately expanded by the device of a speciously specific nomenclature which confuses rather than clarifies. As a compilation and detailed report of psychological hypotheses and phenomena relevant to the stated thesis, and as an examination of alternative ethics, Professor Perry's ample exposition may have value for those who are interested in the by-products of a behavioristic approach to a general theory of the moral judgment.

Psychology: A Simplification. By Lloyd Ring Coleman and Saxe Commins. Boni and Liveright. $3.

The authors have tried to give a bird's-eye view of psychology and psychopathology within the limits of a duodecimo of 300 pages and on the whole have succeeded fairly well. They have reversed the usual method by beginning with the abnormal and working gradually back through borderline states to normal psychology. They have read widely and abstracted with skill, producing a book that is all meat.

In China, 1920-21. By Abel Bonnard. E. P. Dutton and Company. $5.

Mr. Bonnard wandered through China seven years ago, oppressed by its fetid odor of decay. A sensitive French Catholic with a nostalgia for the Middle Ages, he felt the charm of its mass mind, fingered old porcelain, and marveled that every miserable dreamer crouching under the blazing canopy of that blue sky seemed to feel himself a part of an harmonious universe. He was depressed by China's political chaos and the hordes of ragged robber-soldiers, and his own sense of remote alienness deepened every impression. His book, perhaps partly because of its nationalist bias—for France and French missions—stands out as a novelty in a flood of Anglo-Saxon literature on China.

Ancient Cities and Modern Tribes: Exploration and Adventure in Maya Lands. By Thomas Gann. Charles Scribner's Sons. $5.

A third popular book by Thomas Gann gives evidence of the size of the public interested in what is surely one of the most romantically stimulating centers of present-day archaeological activity, the peninsula of Yucatan. Like its predecessors the volume is journalistic in tone and substance and embellished with numerous and stimulating photographs. For the

The Proof of Permanence

THE PEASANTS

By Ladislas Reymont

Original edition: 4 vols. (Autumn, Winter, Spring, Summer), boxed, $10.00

The new Cracow edition: The 4 vols. printed in one, $4.00

"Something as old as the song of Caedmon, but new to us because we have so long lost the flavor of the old and the real."
Charles Phillips, in The Commonweal

Other Thin-Paper Editions of CONTINENTAL CLASSICS

GROWTH OF THE SOIL

By Knut Hamsun

The original two volumes, boxed, $5.00
The Pocket Edition in one volume, $2.50
THE NEW Lofoten EDITION IN ONE VOLUME, $2.50
"Among the very greatest novels I have ever read." H. G. Wells

THE PHILOSOPHER'S STONE

By J. Anker Larsen

The original volume, $3.00
THE NEW Talisman EDITION, $2.50
"A Great achievement." Knut Hamsun

KRISTIN LAVRANSDATTER

(The Bridal Wreath, The Mistress of Husaby, the Cross.)

By Sigrid Undset

The original three volumes, $9.00
THE NEW Lillehammer EDITION
Three Thin Volumes Boxed Together, $6.00
"The very heights of Norse epic power."
Carl Cranson, in The Commonweal

AT ALL BOOKSHOPS

Publisher Alfred A. Knopf New York

BORZOI BOOKS

person who wishes to keep in touch with what is going on in Yucatan—and every year the work progresses—Mr. Gann's annual is the up-to-date and accessible source of information.

Music

Some German Operatic Impressions

IF a cat may look at a king, surely a music critic may look at a Theater Exhibition. And certainly the one just opened at Magdeburg—the most complete of its kind ever attempted—drives home a few homely truths about operatic production. For instance, one follows the German theater from its birth in the medieval church to its present-day return; and sees its development from the crude naivete of the first to the sophisticated simplicity of the second. On the way one passes the mass of detail that gradually accumulated with the invention of scenic devices, only to be again discarded as lighting takes the place of literal fact. Then while one is still marveling at this evolution from bare boards to bare boards, one comes to models for Wagner's "Ring." They are models of the most approved settings as used in Bayreuth, and they are dated 1895. In every respect they could be models of those used everywhere in 1927. Only from Basel does a protest come. There, for the last few years, it seems, "The Ring" has been given on a stage conspicuous for the absence of Valkyrie rocks, and distinguished mainly by what it suggests through line and lighting. But this protest has been followed by no others, and seems to have created no great stir.

For thirty-two years, then, Wagnerian production has remained static. Even the acting has resolved into postures and meaningless gestures. And all this has come about, not because Wagner willed it so but because music critics use their ears but not their eyes. The result is that not only Wagner but all opera has suffered from it. The Staatsoper in Berlin, for instance, has revived "La Forza del Destino" after forty years, and is giving some fine musical performances of it under Leo Blech. One could not ask for a more golden quality of voice than the barytone of Heinrich Schlusnus, or a finer musical artistry than that of Gertrud Bindernagel, who has a superb dramatic soprano as true as her art. But of stagecraft, on the part either of singers or of producer, there was little. The world over, opera houses are spending thousands of dollars annually for elaborate and unnecessary scenery, while the press devotes columns of praise to its elaborateness and expensiveness, and ignores, for instance, the helpless wanderings of the chorus. Opera, we are told by impresarios, is a show; and yet most music critics never get beyond the musical half. Small wonder, then, that the other side has gone to pot!

There are, of course, exceptions to this kind of production. One of these is at the Leipzig Opera, where the stage director, Walther Brügmann, not only can design and stage a new opera like Krenek's "Johnny Spielt's Auf," which requires many scenes, for fifteen thousand marks (between three and four thousand dollars) but can make actors out of his singers. Where Ravel's last opera, "L'Enfant et les Sortilèges," received the most fantastic yet simple settings, Synge's "Riders to the Sea," which Rabaud has set to music, was played with a poignancy of feeling and economy of gesture so sincere and so technically sure that one forgot Rabaud's bad music in the tragedy of the text. As for the audience, it paid the best tribute by remaining silent for several seconds after the curtain fell.

Perhaps the secret of Walter Brügmann's remarkable results is that he was once an actor himself. Also, out of theater hours he offers instruction in the technic of acting to principals and choruses alike, and free of charge. All, needless to say, respond. Nevertheless, such a director is an exception in our opera houses. If one does not believe this, one has only to go to Magdeburg to prove it.

HENRIETTA STRAUS

THEATER

GILBERT MILLER Presents
ETHEL BARRYMORE
in The Constant Wife
By W. SOMERSET MAUGHAM
AT MAXINE ELLIOTT'S THEATRE
Mats. Tues., Wed. & Thurs. No performances Saturday.
Published by George H. Doran

GILBERT MILLER and A. H. WOODS present
JEANNE EAGELS
in "Her Cardboard Lover"
By JACQUES DEVAL
Adapted by Valerie Wyngate and P. G. Wodehouse
EMPIRE B'way & 40th St., Eves., 8:30
Mats. Wed. & Sat., 2:30

The Theatre Guild Acting Company in
THE SECOND MAN
GUILD THEATRE W. 52nd St. Eves. 8:30 Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:30

THE SILVER CORD
JOHN GOLDEN Thea. 58th, E. of B'way. Circle 5678 Eves. 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30

Little Theatre
44th Street West of Broadway
Evgs. 8:30. Mats. Thurs. and Thurs. at popular prices.
THE GRAND STREET FOLLIES
"One cannot find anywhere in New York more clever, more fresh satire or more verve." Joseph Wood Krutch in The Nation.

JANE COWL
in "The Road to Rome"
Playhouse 48th St., E. of B'way. Eves. 8:30
Matinees Wed. & Sat., 2:30

CHANIN'S BILTMORE 47th St. & Madison Ave. Tel. Chickering 5161
CHARLES L. WAGNER
(In Association with Edgar Selwyn) presents
The BARKER
By KENYON NICHOLSON
with WALTER HUSTON
Mats. Wed. & Sat., 2:30. Eves. at 8:30.

The Necessity of Free Trade

By EARL BEAUCHAMP

London, June 4

FEW Englishmen can pretend to say anything upon the fiscal controversy in the United States which can be of real value to the people of America. The best that we can hope to do is to expound the position of Great Britain, explain the reasons why in our opinion conditions here make the policy of free trade vital for our prosperity, and apply those conditions, in so far as they can be made to apply, to the United States.

The dominant fact here is the denseness of our population, which makes it impossible for us to produce food necessary for the daily sustenance of more than a fraction of our people. We must buy it elsewhere, and the only way in which we can save ourselves from starvation is by selling our manufactures abroad to pay for it. In the face of fierce competition the best hope for our success lies in the production of goods not only better but cheaper than those of our trade rivals. Into the element of cost enters naturally that of the workman, and the more that we can reduce the cost of his living the better satisfied he will be. Any tariff upon the foodstuffs and other goods coming into this country must raise their price. That is indeed its avowed object, and we are bound, therefore, in order to reduce the cost of living, to abolish, or to reduce to their very lowest, these tariffs which would raise the price of goods to the consumer.

Many of us envy often enough the happier conditions of other countries, such as the United States, which are able to produce within their own borders everything—or nearly everything—they require both for home consumption and also as raw material for their industries. In this last respect we are in the same position as we are in with regard to food. With the exception of coal, of which we are able to export considerable quantities, there is no surplus raw material which we can send to other countries; and we are thrown back of necessity upon the importation of other materials, either raw or partly manufactured, which, after we have passed them through our factories, we are able to export in exchange for more raw material. Here is the basis of free-trade theory.

But there are many arguments coming to us from protectionist [illegible] country are not paid for by gold, but by the export of other goods. The more, therefore, that we import, the more employment there must be for the people of this country. Other nations of the world [illegible] have to be paid for and high imports, therefore, normally coincide with low figures of unemployment. This is our answer to those who speak of the economic necessity of buying British goods. We all mean to buy British goods if they are cheap and of high quality. None the less, the purchase of foreign goods involves the employment of British labor to make the goods which are exported to pay for the foreign articles we buy; and the working classes, therefore, benefit indirectly by the imports of foreign goods.

Here lies the answer to those who clamor in this country for a duty upon dumped goods. Our answer is threefold: In the first place, to keep them out would not prevent these goods from going into other countries. They would still be made, and we should find them still competing with British goods in other parts of the world. In the second place, these goods generally come from countries which suffer from a high protective system, and where the wages of the workman are so low as to compare unfavorably with those in Great Britain. This fact is hardly likely to encourage our people to adopt a similar system. In the third place, whether dumped or no, these goods do demand a return of equal value, thus giving employment to our own people. If indeed it is ever found that there is a determined attempt on the part of some country to kill some particular trade by a progress of dumping, there is always a remedy open to us. It has, however, never yet been proved that there has ever been anything of the kind, and the dumping which has taken place has always been in the ordinary course of business. Least of all does it lie with us, who are the biggest dumpers in the world, to take measures to alter this particular method of trading.

At past elections, whenever protection has been the main issue, the electorate of Great Britain has unhesitatingly given its verdict for free trade. A large part of the decisive victory of the Liberal Party in 1906 was due to the tariff-reform campaign of Mr. Chamberlain, and in 1913, when Mr. Baldwin went to the country to ask permission to use protection as a cure for unemployment, he met with an answer as decisive. Free traders have hitherto been able to rely upon the experience of this country during the hungry forties, and there are men and women still alive who have heard of those days from their fathers and mothers. This influence, however, has passed away, and the theoretical argument has somewhat lost its effect. We are obliged to rely now rather upon practical arguments against protection, and to point out how little the various measures upon which we have already embarked have really benefited this country. Beaten once and again in frontal attack upon free trade, the Conservative Party has introduced several other measures by which flank attacks have had some success in breaking down our free-trade defense. Imperial preference, safeguarding duties, key industries duties, and McKenna duties have all of them secured some measure of support, rather on political than on economic grounds.

Spasmodic attempts have indeed been made at different periods to reintroduce the system of protection abolished by us in 1846. Lord Randolph Churchill in 1885 talked much about free trade as the antithesis to fair trade. However, this like many other attempts broke down upon a difficulty generally recognized by politicians, that an urban population, which in this country is of supreme importance, will never tolerate any measure of protection which can possibly increase the price of its food. The agricultural community, on the other hand, naturally refuses to indorse a system which by protecting important manufactures will increase the price of the goods which they have to buy, while the price of the goods which they have to sell remains the same. It is a dilemma from which there is no escape.

Imperial preference has many followers, including those who would wish to see a British Zollverein. The advocates of such a system, however, exist only in Great Britain. In the self-governing Dominions there never has been any response to suggestions of this kind. The fiscal systems in Canada and Australia (to name only two) are

This old man walked up to her door!

One day Mrs. Ethelreda Lewis was sitting on the porch of her South African home. Out of the quiet day a strange old man walked up to her. He bore the strangest story of romantic adventure, of dangerous exploration, that has ever burst upon a hungry world. The story of a Rip Van Winkle who awoke from a sleep in Africa and told a tale more marvelous than Marco Polo's.

John Galsworthy says of "Trader Horn":

"This is a gorgeous book, full of more sheer stingo than any you are likely to run across in a day's march among the book shops of wherever you happen to be."

William McFee in Herald-Tribune "Books"

"Mr. Galsworthy claims that it will tickle the appetite of the most jaded! He understates the facts. After no fewer than four excited perusals of this astounding narrative, I am purposing to go back to it again".

TRADER HORN

Being the life and works of

ALFRED ALOYSIUS HORN

an "Old Visitor"... the words written by himself at the age of seventy-three. Edited by Ethelreda Lewis. $4.00

SIMON AND SCHUSTER
PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

The Best of the New Books

THE RISE OF AMERICAN CIVILIZATION

By Charles A. Beard and Mary R. Beard

Third Large Printing

This enthralling story of America's making has been unanimously acclaimed as the "ideal history for the layman." William Allen White calls it "a history that any citizen can read without boredom—the kind of history that sensible, practical men can read." Wars and politics of the usual history are displaced by a balanced account of our national growth and culture. No one who wants to understand his age can afford to miss this book, which is not so much a history as it is a piquantly fresh interpretation.

2 vols., illustrated, $12.50

A New Poem by Edwin Arlington Robinson

Tristram

Fifth Large Printing

"The greatest poem that has yet been written in America" has, through its sheer quality and beauty, won an immediate place on every important best-seller list in America. You'll find no more satisfying reading in the bookstalls. $1.50

The Life of the Author of "The American Commonwealth"

James Bryce

By the Rt. Hon. H. A. L. Fisher

"Admirable biography . . . The work is exceedingly well done. many pages are deep with charm . . . All throw a white light on the author of 'The American Commonwealth.'"—Claude G. Bowers in the New York World.

2 vols. $8.00

Islanders

A New Novel by Helen Hull

Fourth Large Printing

"A deeply significant cross section of life . . . Islanders is one of the highly notable novels of 1927. It would take that rank in any year."—Philadelphia Inquirer. $2.50

Autobiographies

By William Butler Yeats

The story of Yeats' life which "offers such a variety of riches that I can hardly see how anyone could fail to enjoy it. This is a book to own, to read, and read again."—New York Evening Post. $3.50

Dear Old Templeton

A New Novel by Alice Brown

"A novel of worth and substance. There is beauty in its conception and rare charm in its execution. One of the most charmingly written, the truest and most worthwhile novels . . . many a season."—Boston Herald. $2.50

Your Money's Worth

By Stuart Chase and F. J. Schlink

The amazing revelations of this book of the [illegible] and [illegible] are [illegible] by Dr. Hanns Seidel Canby, Dorothy Canfield and other noted critics. To Be Published July 5. $2.00

This Believing World

By Lewis Browne

Eighth Large Printing

The story of the great religions of mankind presents "the entire procession of the world's faiths upon one canvas, [illegible] with order and clarity." Will Durant, George A. Dorsey and other noted authors and critics have recommended this book as the most fascinating and valuable books ever written.

The Macmillan Company New York

Hotels! Camps! Resorts!

There are between thirty and forty thousand Nation readers
and their families,
many of whom may
be interested in spending their summer
or a part of it
at your place.
If you did not advertise
in The Nation last year,
try The Nation this year.
Rates on request.
Dept. S. R., The Nation.

Marx's CAPITAL

The most epoch-making of all works on economics: a critical analysis of the processes of capitalist production and distribution. Marx has done for social science what Darwin did for biology.

Cloth, 3 volumes, 2,586 pages, $7.50 postpaid.

Charles H. Kerr & Company, 347 East Ohio St., Chicago

highly protective; and though in many cases the duties against British goods are slightly lower than those which are paid on goods coming from other countries, they have been sufficiently high to prevent rivalry of equal terms between the goods produced inside and outside the barrier. When analyzed, the figures become ridiculous from any preferential point of view. Thus the average duty collected on British goods going into Canada in 1925 was 18.2 per cent, while the average duty upon United States goods was 13 per cent, and on all foreign goods was 15.1 per cent. Imperial preference in fact is little better than a sham and a pretense, rejected in practice by the self-governing Dominions whose assent to any policy of the kind is essential. In India even, which annually imports £90,000,000 worth of British goods, the same tendency can be seen. Under the greater measure of self-government which India now enjoys it is imposing higher and higher duties on British goods. Our Government has abstained from entering any objection to these tariffs.

For the moment the safeguarding of industries has occupied more attention than any other of these various measures. Free traders have never denied the possibility of benefiting one particular trade by protecting it, but we have always pointed out the difficulties of stopping speed on the slippery slope. There is a story of a convalescent hospital which illustrates the point. A Scotchman alone of all the other patients in the ward seemed to get no better, and a kindly doctor bethought himself of a possible cure. He suggested to Donald that the sights and sounds of his native land might help to restore his spirits and help his recovery. Donald agreed, and arrangements were made for a Highlander in kilts and with bagpipes complete to spend the afternoon in the ward playing the national airs. Next day the doctor, making inquiries after Donald, found that he indeed was better but that all the other patients in the hospital were dead. So may the safeguarding of one industry hurt many others. Thus the protection of leather may help manufacturers of leather, but it will injure those who make up leather into leather goods. The protection of motor buses may help manufacturers of motor buses, but it will have its effect upon the price of the tickets paid for by those who use the cars. So also will duties upon articles of domestic consumption raise the cost of living to the consumer, even though they assist the manufacturer.

Protection for the key industries, i.e., the industries which make goods held to be necessary to national security, is in our opinion equally difficult to justify. A hundred years ago the manufacture of sails and black gunpowder may have been key industries; but as time goes on the connotation of the term key industries changes, and it would be difficult to think that in the unfortunate event of another war we should not once more find that goods, important to some branch of our fighting services, could not be obtained abroad. However much our free-trade system has been broken into in these respects, the people of this country remain at heart firmly convinced of its merits. Manufacturers who are slack naturally rely upon a tariff to make good their own deficiencies, but the principles of the trade unions of this country remain sound upon this question; though the Socialist Party, which follows to a logical conclusion socialist theories of manufacture and distribution, is naturally to be found to some extent supporting a system of protection.

In regard to the McKenna duties, there is little to say, although free traders are sore about them. They were introduced during the war with the object of economizing space in our merchant ships—or that at any rate was the reason given for their imposition. The political leaders of both wings of the coalition assured the country that they were merely temporary duties and that they would be removed at the conclusion of the war. In spite of this promise they have been maintained and even added to, with the exception of twelve months during which they were abolished by Mr. Snowden. It is very difficult to see how the duty of 33 1/3 per cent upon Swiss clocks and watches can be justified today by arguments which were used in 1916.

Our free-trade system, which it must be remembered was instituted after we had tried protection and found it a hindrance to our advance in prosperity, has as its object the securing of the maximum trade possible by refusing to encourage the establishment of economic barriers to imports; the result is facilities to cheap production, conducing to the maintenance of a large export trade to pay for those imports.

So far I have only dealt with economic and fiscal conditions peculiar to our country; but the question has a far wider aspect than the purely national one. This has been well pointed out in the most important plea issued last year [printed in the International Relations Section of The Nation, November 3, 1926], and signed by many prominent bankers and industrialists not only in Europe but in the United States. The object of this plea is merely to restate and reinforce the truism that we are all members one of another. The document said in part:

> Trade is not war, but a process of exchange; in time of peace our neighbors are our customers. If we check their dealings, their power to pay their debts diminishes, and their power to purchase our goods is reduced. Restricted imports involve restricted exports, and no nation can afford to lose its export trade.

The plea recorded the conviction of its signatories that "the establishment of economic freedom is the best hope of restoring the commerce and the credit of the world," and that "the breaking down of economic barriers is the surest remedy for the stagnation that exists." It has been suggested that the American signatories signed it under the impression that the economic truths it contained applied exclusively to European conditions. I cannot believe that the contention is seriously maintained that economic law which is sound when applied to Europe does not equally apply to American conditions. Surely the law, for it is a law, that the diminution of imports by tariff and other restrictions must result in diminished exports obtains in the case of the United States just as unerringly as it does all over the rest of the world. Indeed it was in obedience to that law that America, having tried the policy of inter-State restriction and found it a costly failure, instituted State federation, and so secured the greatest free-trading area in the whole world. The problems of maintaining and increasing international trade and commerce, of paying and receiving international debts, which are now receiving so much attention in America, are the very same problems which are agitating us here in Europe, and for which the plea suggests the "surest" solution. If, as its signatories maintain, the proposed solution is economically sound as regards our European side of these problems, how can it be maintained that its principles have no application to the complementary problems of the United States?

Contributors to This Issue

BEATRICE M. HINKLE is the author of "Recreating of the Individual" and a specialist in psychoanalysis.

JOHN B. WATSON is a well-known psychologist and author of "Psychology from the Standpoint of a Behaviorist."

JOSEPH COLLINS is a neurologist whose latest book is "The Doctor Looks at Love and Life."

RUBE BOROUGH is a reporter on the Los Angeles Record.

J. A. STEVENSON is a Canadian who frequently writes for The Nation.

RUBY A. BLACK is a Texan, Washington correspondent for a group of newspapers in the East.

ALLEN TATE has often appeared in The Nation as poet and critic.

HANIEL LONG is author of several volumes of verse.

HARRY ELMER BARNES is author of "The Genesis of the World War."

ALTER BRODY is a New York writer who devotes much attention to contemporary literature.

ABBE NILES has made a special study of popular music and poetry.

STUART CHASE is coauthor of "Getting Your Money's Worth."

ELISEO VIVAS was the Zona Gale Scholar at the University of Wisconsin this year.

B. H. HAGGIN has been writing a series of articles on music criticism for The Nation.

HENRIETTA STRAUS is attending the European festivals.

WILLIAM LYGON, seventh EARL BEAUCHAMP, is president of the English free-trade association.

NEW YORK— LENINGRAD —MOSCOW

The achievements of young Russia—the historic beauties of old Russia—all the thrill of discovery and the joy of a new adventure await you in the

SIX WEEKS TRIP TO RUSSIA

Starting July 14

by steamer direct to Leningrad; then by rail to Moscow, visiting all nearby places of interest and the museums, factories, art galleries, nurseries, schools, and other sights of both cities.

$575 IS THE ENTIRE COST of the tour, including all expenses for steamer and rail fares, meals, rooms, theater tickets, excursions, etc.

A RARE OPPORTUNITY

Seize it now by writing for further information to the WORLD TOURISTS, Inc.

Room 803, 41 Union Square New York, N.Y.

Stuyvesant 7251

SUMMER PLACES

CAMP TAMIMENT

(Camp for Adults)

FOREST PARK, PA.

Nature's Wonder Spot in the Blue Mountains of Pennsylvania. 20 miles from Delaware Water Gap.

All outdoor sports. 14 splendid tennis courts. 6 cement handball courts. Delightful bathing. Excellent food. Dancing and entertainment in glorious hall on shore of lake.

Daily lecture on Art, Literature, Science et cetera.

Rates moderate. Make early reservations.

New York Office, 7 East 15th St., Phone Stuyvesant 3094

MRS. BERTHA H. MAILLY, Director.

RIVERLAKE LODGE

A Camp Superb

FOR ADULTS

OUTSIDE KINGSTON, N. Y., ON THE HUDSON RIVER AND LAKE TIVOLI

A beautiful place with wonderful views of the Hudson River and mountains, where intelligent people will meet congenial company. Bathing, Boating, Fishing, Tennis, Hand Ball, Dancing and other amusements. Excellent Food. Terms: $35.00 weekly, $7.00 a day.

Special July 4th week end, 3 days, $20.

Camp sites and Furnished Rooms or Bungalows by the season. Write for camp booklet.

RIVERLAKE LODGE

70 West 40th St., New York City. Tel. Longacre 3693.

Ulster Park, Ulster County, N. Y. Tel. Kingston 2810.

HARRY WEINBERGER - - HARRY KELLY

Directors

Rock-Lake Country Club

Formerly CAMP GREATER UTOPIA

Narrowsburg, N. Y. Phone Narrowsburg 47-J

ON BEAUTIFUL ROCK LAKE

A vacation playground for young folks. All water sports, tennis, basketball, handball. Entertainments arranged, social programs different daily. Dancing, everything informal. Meals unrivaled (dietary laws strictly observed). Rates and full information on request. Up to July 1st address all communications to 41 West 25th Street, New York City. Phone Watkins 0640.

Special reduction for $15.00 July Fourth week-end

H. GELBAUM, Manager

TIMBERLAND

IN THE HEART OF THE ADIRONDACKS

POTTERSVILLE, N. Y.

The Camp Property Located to a Congenial Group of 40

Bungalows and Main House modern in every respect. Excellent facilities and equipment for all camp sports; also golf.

Rate $27 per week.

Round Trip Fare to Riverside, N. Y., $13.27.

MORRIS HARKAVY
ESTHER R. KAPLAN

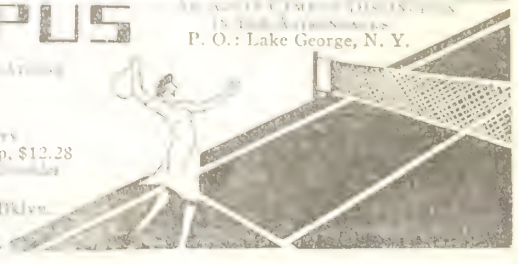
N. Y. Office, 55 West 42nd St. Pennsylvania 7663

SCOPUS

P. O.: Lake George, N. Y.

Fare, Round Trip, $12.28

SCOPUS



SUMMER PLACES—Continued on next page

SUMMER PLACES

ECHO LAKE TAVERN
ADIRONDACKS

IDEAL OF SMALL CAMPS

Capacity strictly limited—Inspiring Adirondack setting. Every desirable facility for sports. Excellent living quarters. Unusual social programs. From every angle the camp for the discriminating vacationist.

RATES, $30 PER WEEK

LAKE ROUND TRIP TO LAKE GEORGE $12.28

Address ECHO LAKE TAVERN
1440 Broadway—Longacre 5432
Warrensburg, New York — MAX NUSSEL, REBECCA NUSSEL

BAILIN'S MAPLEDALE HOTEL
ROSCOE, N. Y. STATION
on the N. Y., O. & W. Line
(Telephone Roscoe 3Y2)

¶ A resort of health, beauty and splendor in the most enchanting heights of the Catskills. ¶ 1,750 feet above sea level. ¶ All conveniences; all camp activities; all recreational treats. Excellent Jewish meals. Low summer rates. ¶ Fifteen ($15) and up per week. ¶ For information and booklet address B. BAILIN, 3 New St., Coney Island, N. Y.

A PERFECT VACATION RESORT

Come and enjoy a delightful Fourth of July week-end and all year round vacation at SCHILDKRAUT'S magnificent Pine Terrace Park Hotel [illegible] Point.

Wonderful outdoor sports and pastimes and entertainments for children and grown-ups. All the delights, luxuries and pastimes.

Write for booklet.

SCHILDKRAUT'S

THE LLOYD, Bellport, L. I.

COOL COMFORTABLE CHARMING MIDSUMMER

Address The Lloyd, Bellport, L. I.
Tel. [illegible]
(Owners D. J. & S. M. Hennig)

SPECIAL NOTICE

Lena Barish and Sam Garlen
Former owners of
Echo Lake Tavern,
ARE NOW CONDUCTING
GREEN MANSIONS

INDIAN HEAD CAMP
on
[illegible] LAKE, WARRENSBURG, N.Y.

Swimming, Fishing, Canoeing, Rowing, Dancing
Baseball, Tennis, Basketball, Handball, Horseback

A Camp for Adults in the Adirondack Mts. $30 per week $5 per day

Look for the Indian Head

[illegible] July Week-End $12.00, which includes free transportation from Albany to Camp and back. Take the Albany Night boat on July 1st and meet our sight-seeing bus on the morning of July 2nd at the Albany pier for a trip through the Adirondack Mountains, passing through Schenectady, Saratoga, Glens Falls, Lake George and Warrensburg. Otherwise, N. Y. Central to Lake George, where our cars will meet you. Write for Camp Booklet

N. Y. Address—R. Helfant, 885 Brook Avenue, Bronx, N. Y. Tel. Melrose 1821

TROUT LAKE CAMP AND HOTEL
[illegible] on Lake George, N. Y.
3rd Season on the Crystal Springs, Trout Lake
July 4th weekend, Special $9 for 3 days
Free Auto service from Lake George
All land and water sports.
Jewish Cooking.
Fare N. Y., round trip $12.28—Rates $25 per week.
Make reservations now.
New York Offices, 9 W. 47th St., 805 Freeman St. [illegible]
P. O. Diamond Point, N.Y. Telephone Bolton 60 F 21

MAYFAIR HOUSE
INVITES YOU

A modern hotel of unusual charm close to the ocean and boardwalk, offering home-like comfort, delightful food, [illegible] hospitality. Reasonable rates. Booklet and particulars.

717 West Penn St., Long Beach, N. Y.
Tel. Long Beach 1059

IDEAL VACATION. Private family, modern home, mountains Sullivan County. Beautiful location, [illegible] Lake. Near Lake. Woodridge, N. Y.

THE LESTER HOUSE, ROSCOE, N. Y.

[illegible] Sullivan County. Facilities and [illegible] Booklet. Mail [illegible]

CHESTNUT HILL CAMP on The Shawangunk Mountains. [illegible] Particulars upon request.

WANTED: [illegible] atmosphere in [illegible]

May I [illegible] that I received two responses to my advertisement in The Nation [illegible] and is more than [illegible] any investment.

Very truly yours,
S. B. L.

GREEN MANSIONS

The Camp for Moderns — On Private Tripp Lake

In the heart of the Adirondacks. 12 miles north of Lake George.

[illegible] tennis courts and aquatic facilities for every other sport.

Commodious community buildings. Modern sanitation in each log cabin. All this limited to 150 campers.

Special summer train rates. New York-Lake George, round trip, $12.28.

RATE $35 A WEEK.

Address
GREEN MANSIONS
Warrensburg, N. Y.
City Office, 33 W. 42nd St. Long. 4682
LENA BARISH SAM GARLEN
Directors
Founders of the "Small Camp Ideal."

PIONEER LODGE
A Summer Camp for Adults
NEAR THOUSAND ISLANDS
[illegible] to Fifty—Has All Conveniences in Lodge and Bungalows—All Sports—Tennis, Boating on Large Lake—G. M. Within 15 Minutes Walk—Rate $25.00 per Week.
Accessible over night by N. Y. Central
STAR LAKE, N. Y. — CITY OFFICE
ST. LAWRENCE COUNTY — [illegible] WISCONSIN 2167

RIVERSIDE ON DELAWARE
Bushkill, Pike County, Pa.
A modern [illegible] camp [illegible] Excellent [illegible] Booklet. [illegible] burg 1R5.

SUBURBAN BOARD

[illegible] LINDEN HALL [illegible] exceptional [illegible] Seashore [illegible] attended [illegible] Beside

---

MANHATTAN BEACH HOTEL, N. Y.

A [illegible] Ocean [illegible] Booklet. New open [illegible]

DR. ELIZABETH M. BAER announces the opening of [illegible] Eye Education. 367 Bay Ave., Patchogue, L. I.

APARTMENT SUBLET SUMMER

OUT of town readers of The Nation in New York to visit or study or attend courses, will probably be looking for apartments for the summer months. This is the right time to advertise your apartment in THE NATION. Rates on Request. Dept. S. A., The Nation.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXV NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 13, 1927 No. 3236

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 29
EDITORIALS:
When Is a Ship Not a Ship? 31
Ambassador Houghton Tells Some More Truths 32
The Scandal at Geneva 33
The Wisdom of Herbert Brown 35
MURDER BY "PERSONS UNKNOWN." By Gaetano Salvemini 34
FRENZIED RAILROAD FINANCE. By Marshall Lynn 35
HONOR IS A TRADITION OF THE SEA. By Frank Chaloner Ames 37
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 38
CORRESPONDENCE 39
BOOKS:
Carbolic Acid for India. By W. Norman Brown 40
"Old Charlie." By J. Frank Dobie 41
Hamsun's Rival. By Walter Vogdes 41
Government for Workers. By Theresa Wolfson 42
Fifty Years Behind. By Keith Hutchison 42
Before the War. By Herbert Solow 42
Books in Brief 43
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The Eastern Edge of Europe. By Louis E. Van Norman 44

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Managing Editor Literary Editor
FREDA KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

GALLANT ALL THE WAY THROUGH was Byrd's effort to reach Paris—just as gallant as was to be expected of the man who flew over the North Pole and has been so modest and unassuming about it all. The whole country thrilled when the news came that he and his associates were safe after that fearful night of flying all over northern France in search of a haven. To those who listened to the radio and got the press cables from Le Bourget that episode must surely remain unforgetable. Talk about Jules Verne or Victor Hugo or Dumas or Wells or any other writer! Here was an epic situation indeed: Four men aloft in a terrific storm, over their destination but unable to see or find it. Then their wireless getting fainter and fainter and finally disappearing altogether while the storms grew worse and the darkness blacker than ever. Finally complete silence ordered upon the spirits of the air, all radio and wireless talk stopped while one station clicked its despairing WTW, WTW call for the ship missing in the ether, missing and fighting the evilest elements, missing, missing, silent—vanished, until the word suddenly comes that back on the coast in the English Channel it has dropped to the water, and that Byrd and his crew are safe. What must have been the sensation of those four men as they watched the gasoline grow less and less? For them those precious disappearing drops were the sands of life running out. "Byrd has three more hours of gasoline"—"two more hours of gasoline"—"one more hour of gasoline"—safe! Who can measure the joy that flash gave to millions of his and his associates' happy countrymen?

BETWEEN AIR RECEPTIONS Paris celebrates prison escapes. Recently, it will be recalled, the Government, in its impartial way, decided to send a Communist and a royalist to jail. As royalist it selected Leon Daudet, leader of the royalist rowdies known as the camelots de roi. These gentlemen love street fights but they also have Mr. Upton Sinclair's passion for making a monkey of the law. They studied telephone switchboards with that end in view; in particular they studied the switchboard of the French Ministry of Justice. Then they telephoned instructions to the prison to release M. Semard and M. Daudet, and so crossed the wires that a return call from the prison, instead of reaching the Ministry, reached one of their own agents. Yes, the royalist telephone operator assured the prison warden, the instructions were genuine; and M. Daudet and M. Semard were accordingly released. M. Semard remained to constitute a problem; he had been officially released, and how could he be rearrested? M. Daudet gloriously disappeared. He has been reported in Spain, in Switzerland, and cruising in the English Channel; wherever he is, he is doubtless enjoying life and cursing when Commander Byrd absorbs the newspaper space on which for two weeks he has had a mortgage. The Government has sought to retrieve its dignity by arresting a royalist telephone operator—which really does not get it very far. What with Lindbergh and Daudet and Byrd, Paris bids fair to exhaust its capacity for excitement before the American Legion arrives in September. What a pity that would be!

EVEN A KING HAS USES now and then. The Die-hard effort to "reform" the British House of Lords by copper-riveting its Tory majority forever stirred up such a storm of protest even among some of the younger Tory peers (who seem to have caught up with the eighteenth century at least), that the elders of the party looked about for avenues of escape. It clearly would not do to have Tory lords on the war-path against the Tory program for revising the Lords. But Viscount Cave had offered the proposal in the name of the Government. Clearly, it was a difficult situation. Then someone remembered the King. Ah, yes, the King. The Cave proposal took away the royal prerogative of naming new peers by the hundred if he (or the party in power which dictates his actions) wanted to. Suddenly the Tories were filled with solicitude for the royal prerogatives. The powers of the King must not be limited, not even to reform the House of Lords. And so the House of Lords stands unreformed—not, according to the official version, because the proposed "reform" was violently out of temper with the twentieth century, but because it clipped the privileges of the King. It was a beautiful example of the British talent for graceful self-deception—and equally graceful retreats.

RUSSIA IS HAVING A HOT and exciting summer. War specters rise to haunt her from every angle. The raid on the Soviet Legation in Peking; the high jinks in London and the official break with Great Britain; the murder of Russia's envoy to Poland, and the consequent war scares, with the revelation of tense nerves exhibited in the execution of a score of "counter-revolutionaries" charged with being in Britain's secret spy service—these have been followed by a sensational statement made by the Communist Party of Poland, which declares that the Polish war factories are working night shifts and that the reservists are being hastily trained for the coming war with Russia. Moscow is, not unnaturally, worried. There is no doubt that Tory Britain, faced with the real threat to her Asiatic empire caused by Russia's moral—and occasionally more than moral—support of Nationalist movements in that continent, is angry; and an angry Britain is dangerous. We do not for a moment suppose that Britain contemplates a new war with Russia; but it is obvious that she has launched upon a policy of pin-pricking Russia wherever opportunity offers, and the result cannot be anything but a constant war psychology.

WHAT IS THIS "CIVILIAN ADMINISTRATION" which Mr. Coolidge foresees for the Philippines? If it means doing away with the cavalry kitchen cabinet which has surrounded General Wood, that will be an advance in the right direction; but if it points toward reducing the Philippines to the status of a sort of territory or territory-to-be, it would be no gain at all. We have promised the Philippines independence—indeed, a nation with our American tradition could not do otherwise; we will be in constant hot water until we redeem our pledges—and even after that, we may find the consequences of our adventure in imperialism dogging our national trail. There are signs that Mr. Coolidge, who dislikes trouble, is moving to clear up some of the worst spots in our foreign relations. The New York Times reports him inclined to recognize the Nationalists in China and to assume the lead in positive friendly action toward that country. Furthermore, the President is reported to be willing to accept a quiet resignation from Mr. Sheffield, United States Ambassador to Mexico. Mr. Sheffield is one of those civilian envoys who thinks an American diplomat in Latin America should act like an army officer training a squad of raw rookies.

WE CONFESS TO A BIT OF UNHOLY GLEE at the demonstration in Los Angeles that patriotism is still the last refuge of some scoundrels. The Better America Federation of California has been one of the very worst of the 100-per-cent-patriotic organizations bent on pursuing all radicals, yes, even mild liberals, in fact any one who did not agree with them at all points. They had their share in enacting the infamous Syndicalism Law under which men were liable and some were sent to jail for fourteen years merely for membership in the I. W. W. or the Communist Party. The "Better America" in the federation's name spelt a tyranny by this organization over workers and workers' organizations, teachers, and dissenters of every variety, avowedly for the improvement of the country, but in reality for increasing the stranglehold of big business upon the community life and—in the interest of the open shop—of the poisonous molding of the entire life of Southern California under pretense of protecting everybody from Bolshevism. It is all wonderfully portrayed in that extraordinary new novel of Upton Sinclair's, "Oil." But not even so great a novelist as he could have imagined that no less exalted a personage than the President of the Better America Federation himself should be indicted for usury in connection with a company that issued illegally 1,000,000 shares of stock and defrauded several hundred thousand innocent investors. Among the indicted are three leading bank officials, two of them vice-presidents of the First National Bank, charged with taking jointly $100,000 for obtaining a loan of $385,000 from one of their banks, and with embezzlement on other counts. How zealously these patriots have labored to better America—and their bank accounts!

FOR ONCE SECRETARY MELLON'S SKILL in judging the money market has failed him and for the first time a refunding operation of his has fallen flat. He offered an issue of Treasury bonds redeemable in 1943-1947 at 3⅜ per cent to help finance the calling of the Second Liberty Loan on November 15 next. Only $250,000,000 acceptable cash subscriptions were received prior to the closing of the books. Of the $3,104,000,000 Second Liberty Bonds outstanding on February 27 last but $1,603,000,000 came in for exchange and of these $243,000,000 were exchanged for the new 3⅜'s. Of the remainder, $1,360,000,000 went for the three-to-five year 3½ per cent Treasury notes while $225,000,000 were purchased by the Treasury for retirement. That still leaves $1,276,000,000 which must be taken up by Mr. Mellon prior to November 15. Instead, therefore, of being closed now, the transaction will drag on through the summer. The fiscal year has, however, ended brilliantly, with a surplus of approximately $635,000,000 and a reduction in the public debt of $1,131,309,383. Undoubtedly this extremely favorable showing was due in part to the failure of a filibustering Congress to pass the Second Deficiency Bill, as a result of which some large expenditures will go over into the new fiscal year. Nonetheless, the surplus is so large that the politicians and the corporations will jointly demand a heavy tax reduction when the new session begins.

AMERICA WAS NOT NEEDED in the World War, didn't win it, and if this country had not come in the war would have been won by the Allies without its aid. Who says this? Some "spineless pacifist"? A Representative or Senator who voted against the war? No, indeed. No one less than Field Marshal Lord Haig himself, in an address to the British Empire Service League—an organization of war veterans. And this is what he said:

> If America had not come in, we might not perhaps have forced the enemy to surrender in 1918, for without the American reserves in existence it would have been unwise for us to risk throwing the whole force of the British army in France and Flanders into the tremendous series of battles which brought the war to a sudden, and by many politicians unexpected, end. But we should have won in the end all the same. (Cheers) . . . In the course of the greatest war in history the British peoples mobilized, equipped, and trained, and put into the field the finest fighting force the world has yet seen. (Cheers). The discipline and quality of its rank and file, the leadership and initiative of its regimental officers, the organization of its supply and medical services, the competence and reliability of its staff and intelligence, all alike were unsurpassed.

This flag-waving British general sounds like some of our American officers. One of them, Major General Joseph T. Dickman, commanding the Third American Army, has just written as follows: "After accomplishing the defeat of the Kaiser's armies, the young American soldiers very naturally desired to return to their homes at an early date."

Again, he says: "In the autumn of 1918 there were no troops in Europe beside the Americans who could have forced their way through the fortified fastnesses of the Argonne Forest. . . . The battle of November 1 and 2, 1918 . . . will forever be recognized as the final blow that drove the hosts of Germany to the very verge of collapse and ended the war."

MORAL INDIGNATION, according to Bishop Manning, is the quality most necessary and most wanting in modern times. Moral indignation, the bishop continues, which is not afraid to call a spade a spade—and prefers to call it a manure-spreader. Thus Dr. Manning, in criticizing a "prominent preacher" in New York City—who turns out to be the Rev. Harry Emerson Fosdick—for being in favor of dropping some old ideas of right and wrong, and substituting "beautiful" and "ugly" in their stead, remarks:

> Which means, I suppose, that there is no longer any law of God which is binding upon us and that our only standard is our own taste or preference. If this is true, if there is no law of God which must be obeyed, we need not wonder if our young people adopt "companionate marriage" or any other suggestion.

Dr. Fosdick's indignant repudiation of this muddying of his remarks was hardly necessary. What he said to the graduating class of Smith College was, in part:

> You are going out into a generation which is witnessing the breaking down of the old well-defined codes of right and wrong by which your fathers lived. . . . There is plenty that is rotten in the old codes concerning love and the relationship of the sexes. . . . Whatever debases personality is wrong and ugly; whatever elevates personality is right and beautiful. . . . When a generation discovers that the old codes cannot be used and set up for themselves high standards of their own, they have much firmer ground on which to proceed.

Other ministers have spoken equally soundly and intelligently. And to all of them the outraged Bishop of New York makes the same sort of reply, full of moral indignation and little else. Sin is sin, insists the Bishop; it always has been and it always will be. And ostriches have always buried their heads in the sand and the world has turned by them unperceived.

"SHALL POETS BECOME EXTINCT?" That highly rhetorical question is asked and answered by John Gould Fletcher, the American poet now living in England, in the current issue of the Modern World. His answer, of course, is No. But his proposal for making the lot of the poet a little easier than it happens to be is so unusual and so practical that the attention of millionaires should be called to it. Mr. Fletcher's very sensible idea is not that poets shall be subsidized for work they have still to do but that their volumes, once written and passed upon by a board of famous poets appointed for the purpose, shall be published for them in limited editions, "in good style and at a high price." If the small audience to which good poetry is and always has been addressed is there to buy the limited edition, well enough; at any rate the edition will exist. If a larger audience wants it, the volume can be taken over by a commercial publisher who will give it the distribution its author desires. The scheme has the merit of promising to bring much good poetry into print without agony to any publisher. Mr. Fletcher is certain that the jury of famous poets can be found; what about the millionaire?

When Is a Ship Not a Ship?

ANSWER: When she comes up the harbor of New York not a steamer but a Ritz-Carlton hotel and the ship-reporters busy themselves not with her sea-going quality or her speed, or the latest improvements embodied in her machinery, but with the vast sums lavished upon her decorations. Let seagoing sailormen listen to this and writhe:

> Deciding on the newest school of decoration, the execution of the plan was placed entirely in the hands of the foremost modernists in art and decoration in France. Using thirty-six kinds of wood, a subtle and lavish harmony of color has been produced from the natural shades of these woods. The grand salon is done in lacquer and gold. Around its walls are forty columns, each sixteen feet high, surrounding a dance floor of a thousand square feet. In this room are four statues, nine feet tall, in gold. . . . The dining room seating six hundred people, and the largest on any ship in the world, is decorated in three harmonizing shades of gray marble. Luminous stripes of gold again present the effect of a warm, bright sun, although the room is several decks below. Another new feature on the Ile de France is a permanent chapel two decks in height . . . a shooting gallery . . . and the largest gymnasium ever constructed aboard a ship. Also a bar which measures nearly thirty feet in length.

Yes, and dress-shops and barber-shops and a swimming pool and a special gymnasium for children and a travel bureau and a bank and safe-deposit vaults and a florist shop and heaven knows what else. And this is called going to sea! We confess that we have not yet seen these marvelous decorations of the salons. We cannot judge therefore whether they are, as some say, the latest in fine arts or, as others assert, merely early North German Lloyd. To the art critics we leave the decision. We merely protest once more that a floating hotel is no ship. It doesn't make any difference how graceful her lines or how beautiful her model—and all the great French liners are graceful and beautiful—this sort of thing is an insult to Father Neptune. It is more than that, a conspiracy against popular taste, an extension of the jazz age to the ocean; another bit of that terrible lurch into conformity which would make luxurious "lounge-lizards" of us all; which leads the younger generation to believe that there is no other way to spend one's life than on dancing floors a thousand feet square amid columns sixteen feet high and walls glittering with gilt, or in baroque with fat neo-Rubens nudes interspersed.

As for us, we'd rather go back to the old ways. If this is modernity then The Nation begs to be counted, at sea at least, among the conservative and the reactionary. Our mind goes back to a lovely old P. and O. Egypt-bound, on a glorious dark and starry night in the Mediterranean. There were yards and sails on all her three beautiful masts. There was only a dingy smoke-room, and a little dingier ladies' cabin. The main salon was flanked on both sides by state-rooms; there one ate one's meals and often heard untoward sounds from within. There were no baths and no running water. What matter? It was something different; it was a life apart; it had nothing in common with Broadway. That queen of the sea had no shops, and no chapel, no orchestra and no dance-floor, no columns and no nudes—it was just a plain, beautiful ship—one of the greatest works of man if not of God. Anyone may have the Ile de France who wants her. When we go to sea we want to go to sea, not to float across the ocean in a gilded barroom.

Ambassador Houghton Tells Some More Truths

ALANSON B. HOUGHTON is an anachronism in our diplomatic service. He is not afraid to speak out in meeting, and when he speaks he has something to say—which is certainly unusual among those who belong to the statesman class. Our readers will recall the sensation Mr. Houghton made in the spring of 1926 when he returned from England and told the truth about the European situation with such frankness and vigor that chancelleries and press alike were horrified at his "calculated indiscretion." Now he has appeared before the Harvard Alumni Association on Commencement Day, after accepting the LL.D. which his alma mater justly and wisely bestowed upon him, and has dared to suggest that the war-making powers of governments should be taken away from them and vested in the people. Other forms and processes of government have been democratized; why not this? The one thing that remains unaffected is the question of war and the power to make it.

Mr. Houghton's real treason to the present order lies in the fact that he, a diplomat of years in Berlin and London, an observer at close hand of governmental machines, speaks slightingly of governments as "little groups of men" who are engaged in maneuvering the masses they represent into dangerous or fatal positions because these "little groups," as he puts it, "seek constantly and naturally to gain supposed advantages of one sort and another for their own nations." When they have succeeded in placing the peoples in a position from which it appears impossible to recede they next order under arms "those great masses of men and women roused by every power of organized appeal and propaganda . . . and war follows." He might well have added that the governing men behave thus because no penalty attaches to their own acts; they are held accountable by no one; they drape themselves in the flag and call themselves "the people" and "the country" when in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred they are nothing but a set of temporary officials elected to office, with no mandate for war whatever. Identifying themselves with their nations, however, they call upon their deluded fellow-citizens—easily deluded because, as in both the Allied and the Central European countries, the diplomats suppress, garble, and misquote the documents which lead up to the impasse—to protect the virtue of their women, the safety of their homes, the sanctity of their national boundaries. The sacred honor of the flag is at stake. Who shall care that the scoundrels or incompetents who involved the flag are hiding behind it and carefully protecting their own rascally skins by staying in the seats of the mighty?

This language is, of course, ours and not the Ambassador's. But the implications are all there in his speech. He refuses to accept the theory that war is inevitable because human nature is what it is. That, he says, simply begs the question. War is not necessarily the "result of a process of necessity"; nor does it follow that the fighters would choose to fight under the conditions into which they are plunged. Especially, he says, "we have no reason to admit that a similar result would follow if the power to declare war were in the hands of the populations. That is precisely what we do not know. The experiment has never been tried. And there are considerations which, apparently, point the other way." Of these he cites four. First, the great self-governing peoples have shown themselves competent to manage their own domestic affairs, and "foreign affairs are merely an extension of their domestic affairs." This veteran diplomat dares to add that there is nothing mysterious about foreign affairs and that they are "not a sort of arcana, wherein the laws of common morality are excluded, and in which only cynical gentlemen of bilingual attainments are competent to play a role. They are in the main simply the natural and beneficial outcome of a desire to trade."

The Ambassador's second point is that war has so steadily increased its demands that no one can make any profit out of it; indeed, it threatens to wreck civilization itself, "for the wars of the civilized mean the breakdown of civilization." Thirdly, he points out that as long as the relations between peoples are based on force and every nation arms for defense, each "thus becomes potentially more able to attack and so more dangerous as a neighbor." Fourthly, and most important, the Ambassador asserts that, "the power to declare war stands on a different plane from all other powers of government. It is all-embracing and all-consuming." It is the one power which a people ought logically to reserve to itself, "since it puts in jeopardy their collective lives and property. And yet, strangely enough, it is the one power they do not possess." Under this head Mr. Houghton brings out the point so often made by The Nation that governments are never elected on the precise issue of peace or war; that, chosen for domestic reasons, they may not be at all representative when suddenly confronted by a decision as to war or peace. Theoretically, he points out, self-governing peoples control their relations with other peoples, but practically, by giving the power to make war to their governments, they have divested themselves of this control. He himself is whole-heartedly in favor of returning it to the people to whom it belongs. Our governments, he declares, have shown themselves unable to protect us against war. They continue to act along the well-defined grooves of the past and to misrepresent the people, whereas the great self-governing peoples are entirely ready to trust each other. And finally, he states the opinion of all the critics of the Versailles Treaty that "a durable peace cannot be based on force. It must, if it exists at all, be based upon good-will." Only a tradition "inherited from an outgrown system of autocratic government prevents our recognition of that great and beneficent fact. We are caught in a process of our own making. And we must unmake it."

These are profoundly wise and noble words, as great as they are constructive. We hail them with the greatest satisfaction. Yet what do we see? The speech utterly ignored by all the newspapers of the metropolis save only the World and the Telegram, and apparently ignored by the great press associations. Yet it is a message which ought to be broadcast over this continent and Europe, for its logic is unanswerable, its wisdom beyond successful dispute. Already men are arising to say it can't be done, and that if it could the peoples would vote for war. We deny that. But if it were true, we should still second this plea for the democratization of the greatest power for evil which conductors of government now have in their hands.

The Scandal at Geneva

THE Disarmament Conference at Geneva is degenerating into a sorry spectacle. The assembled admirals and generals, and the few civilians scattered among them, show no desire to give the world a hearty shove along the path of peace; they have no slightest thought of really disarming; they are haggling and bargaining like a lot of Grand Street peddlers, each seeking to work out a "ratio" which will give his country some advantage in some class of warships.

Britain is deaf to suggestions of reducing the number of light cruisers—a class in which she far outranks the United States and Japan; the United States is eager for limitations which strike Britain, but regards proposals to reduce the big ships beyond the scales of the Washington Conference as violations of "sacred treaty rights." Mr. Hugh Gibson, chairman of our delegation, was even quoted as mouthing this jingo sentiment: "The United States will insist upon equality with Britain in all categories of ships unless forced into a situation where she might regard equality as insufficient"! In that bullyragging spirit peace is not made. That is the spirit which has aroused dislike of America in Europe; if continued it will make the conference the starting-point of a new international naval rivalry.

Possibly it is just as well that the officers and technical experts should thus early display their uselessness as leaders of a conference for the reduction of armaments. They do not want to disarm; at most they want to balance arms. They shudder at the thought of scrapping any of their lovely naval toys in the interest of economy and peace. They want to keep all they have, but to prevent the other fellow from building more. It would seem incongruous, of course, to introduce women, or labor leaders, or ministers of the gospel into such a conference. But if governments wanted to disarm, they would send such messengers; and the technical experts, the generals and admirals, instead of dictating policy would be the servants of policy. If the governments had even been sincere in their protestations of economy, they would have included in their delegations representatives of the suffering treasuries.

The treasury men know that the new naval race is pinching as much as the inter-Allied debts. Winston Churchill openly struggled against the British Admiralty when preparing his budget two years ago, but he was beaten, and Britain accepted the fifteen-cruiser program which is today one of the horrid specters of Geneva. It was the admirals, not the civilians, at Washington in 1921 who deliberately left the loophole for cruisers which is causing such ill feeling today. Mr. Churchill, who has been a jingo in his day but is a realist as Chancellor of the Exchequer, declared two months ago:

> There are only three great Powers able to keep a battle fleet in existence. An agreement between these three great naval Powers to abate the rate of their construction, or to limit the size of their ships, or some other agreement of that kind—in that lies the greatest hope of contraction in naval expenditure.

And of peace. Those three Powers are meeting at Geneva today—and they are throwing away their opportunity, gambling with the hopes of the world. Will the civilian governments who appointed these reckless admirals recall them or give them vigorous instructions before it is too late, or will they let the conference end in agreement upon meaningless nothings, pointing the way to new rivalries and opening new vistas of war?

The Wisdom of Herbert Brown

> I forecast in the United States a crop season which will be marked by destructive cold waves in the fruit and early vegetable sections bordering upon the Gulf of Mexico; late and destructive spring frosts affecting Eastern fruit and threatening the corn crop in its early stages through the Northern portion of the Corn Belt, particularly north of the Ohio and Potomac and east of the Mississippi. I predict that killing frosts will come in June and into July over this section, that frosts will occur again in August and in September. It will be only in the areas south of the Potomac and the Ohio and well down the lower middle Mississippi Valley where crops will be fairly safe from destructive cold waves.

HERBERT BROWN, who addressed these words to a group of business men meeting in Boston last September, has become a legend on the lips of the Middle West. For several years he issued unofficial weather forecasts from Washington, D. C., without attracting more attention than usually is paid to prophets in their own country. Here and there, however, individual readers of his words began to say that Herbert Brown was proving right; farmers asked each other who this man was anyway, and how he knew these things; the Department of Agriculture was reported to be impressed by his methods, or at least by his results; and editors of agricultural papers quietly kept tab on him until the time for expressing editorial opinion should come.

Now thousands will tell you that Herbert Brown last fall predicted the Mississippi floods in precisely their recent dimensions; that he foretold the tornadoes which accompanied them with such superfluous fury; and that today, when the corn is either rotting in the cold fields of Illinois or standing but knee high to a grasshopper, the wisdom of Herbert Brown is in process of demonstration. The Prairie Farmer, assuring its subscribers that a conservative policy has always kept it from dabbling in the sensational, decides that Herbert Brown can no longer be ignored in view of his uncanny accuracy. A Middle Western newspaper devotes a column on its front page to the July frosts soon to be expected if Brown is right; and the implication is that he must be right. The worst crop prospect in years is—no, not attributed to him (that stage in the legend is still to be reached), but at any rate referred back to his warning that 1927 would be a "year without a summer." Brown is not exactly "scientific," they admit; he goes by sun-spots and ocean currents instead of cyclones and anti-cyclones; but blessed if he doesn't seem to be hitting it.

We know next to nothing about Herbert Brown and certainly are in no position to judge the science, if any, that he employs. He may be wiser than all of the heads of all the weather bureaus in the world put together under one medicine hat—though we do understand that there is no agreement among astronomers and meteorologists concerning the effect of sun-spots and ocean currents. What interests us is the readiness of the Middle West, in these years of rain and cold and depression, to make a myth out of a weather man. What more natural? And what more gravely indicative of its general state of mind?

Murder by "Persons Unknown"

By GAETANO SALVEMINI

THE Italian papers have published between April 29 and May 17 of this year summary and fragmentary, often incomprehensible, notices of a trial which was taking place at the Court of Assizes at Chieti—the same court at which was conducted, a year ago, the mockery of a trial for the murder of Giacomo Matteotti. Several English and American papers have published the fact that all the accused have been acquitted.

This acquittal is one of the most recent acts in a juridical farce which has lasted for a year and a half, and which is now approaching an end. It is a farce that follows upon a tragedy of blood and death.

On the night of Friday, September 25, 1925, the Fascists of Florence inaugurated a "man-hunt" against the Freemasons. Bludgeonings took place on a large scale for three days and went on sporadically during the following days. On October 3 a squad of Fascists went to the house of the Freemason Bandinelli, who the previous day had been beaten by the black-snirts. An altercation took place. Another Freemason, named Becciolini, drew his revolver and fired on the Fascists, killing one and wounding another. He was at once thrashed, flung into a motor-car, taken to the premises of the Fascist Provincial Federation, brought back again half dead to the scene of the murder, and 'here riddled with bullets. Bandinelli's house was sacked.

Two hours afterward further reprisals on a large scale were set on foot against persons entirely unconnected with the original incident. The offices of thirteen lawyers and one accountant, a tailoring business, and seven shops were wrecked—nearly all in the center of the town, in the vicinity of the prefecture, the police headquarters, and the barracks of the carabineers. Three private houses were sacked. A squad of Fascists appeared before the house of a tramwayman named Ademaro Cozzi, and summoned him to come out. The moment he did so, one of the band fired at him at close range with his revolver, and then fled with his companions. The bullet burned Cozzi's coat, but was stopped by his pocket-book. Having completed this operation, the band engaged two taxis, drove to the house of the lawyer Gustavo Consolo, beat in his door, and killed him in the presence of his wife and two children, eight and two years old. Meanwhile another squad of Fascists silently surrounded the house of Signor Pilati, a former Socialist member of Parliament. Pilati and his family, knowing nothing of what was happening in Florence that night, were asleep with the windows open on account of the heat. Silently placing a ladder against the sill, two Fascists climbed into the bedroom through the window and ordered the light to be turned on. One of them emptied his revolver point-blank into Pilati's body. Wounded in the leg, the groin, the stomach, and the shoulder, Pilati died after three days' of suffering.

In the suburbs of Florence (Ponte a Mensola, Trespiano, Legnaia, Badia a Ripoli, and Zavarnelle) and in other communes (San Baronto, Anghiari, Arezzo, Prato, Montemurlo) acts of violence took place similar to those of Florence although less ferocious than those of which Pilati and Consolo were victims. The sacking continued in Florence on October 4, and shops owned by the brothers Breschi, the brothers Fini, by the tailor Rossi, together with the house of the accountant Carrer, were wrecked.

The police were conspicuous by their absence from all these acts of violence. Not one of the guilty was arrested on the spot. But this "Saint Bartholomew" of Florence aroused intense indignation wherever the facts became known. Florence is a cosmopolitan city. In early October it is full of foreigners. These had eyes to see, ears to hear, and tongues to speak.

The Fascist Government felt it necessary to show that it was in no way responsible for what had happened at Florence. To do this there was only one course open to it; the guilty must be arrested, tried, and of course condemned. Now we come to the farce. A week after the crimes had been committed the police bestirred themselves and began ostentatiously to make arrests.

A first trial took place from November 21 to 24, 1925, before the Florentine courts. It was concerned with the activities of the band of fifteen Fascists who had sacked the shops of the Breschis and Finis and Carrer's house on the morning of October 4. Another trial on December 11, 1925, dealt with the looting of a pastry-cook's premises. Both trials resulted in ludicrous sentences, which were trumpeted abroad as the result of Fascist justice.

During these same days fourteen persons accused of having, on October 3, taken part in the wrecking of a pharmacy at Legnaia were provisionally set at liberty; and twenty-seven Fascists of Prato, against whom warrants of arrest had been issued for robbery and violence, were simply bound over. On March 8, 1926, eight men charged with attacking and looting the villa Baldi on the night of October 3, 1925, received glaringly inadequate sentences; the most severe was binding over for five months (Corriere della Sera, March 9, 1926). On March 20 seven men accused of looting a shop belonging to Enrico Ricci, a second-hand dealer, were discharged (Stampa, March 21). In May, 1926, twenty-four Fascists received negligible sentences for having broken into and sacked private houses. On June 17 the court acquitted the editor of the Battaglie Fasciste, together with other heads of the Fascio, who had led squads in the outbreaks between September 25 and 29, and who had publicly assumed responsibility for them. On June 30, 1926, the Fascist Gino Lecci was acquitted on the charge of having taken part in the outrages of October 4. On October 27 six Fascists, accused of acts of violence at Badia a Ripoli, were acquitted as not having been involved in the affair, or on grounds of insufficient evidence (Avanti, October 25). On November 19 eight Fascists were acquitted of the murder of Becciolini on the grounds of insufficient evidence; two only remained under trial for this murder, but they were declared by the judges to be guilty of "inflicting serious injuries," not of murder (Nazione, November 20). Thus Becciolini was not murdered, but only seriously injured! On December 1 five other Fascists were acquitted.

The trial at Chieti of April, 1927, is the most monstrous of all. The Fascist jury, in its verdict delivered on May 16, "affirmed the existence of the facts"; that is, they admitted that Pilati and Consolo were killed, that Cozzi's life was saved only by the bullet being stopped, that the offices of the lawyers Corazzini, Citi, Targetti, and the shops of Cardoro and Soli were sacked on the night of October 3, 1925. But they acquitted all the accused. These crimes were committed by "persons unknown."

This is the rule in Italy today for political crimes committed by Fascists. A "person unknown" in the dictionary of the "new era" is a Fascist who kills an anti-Fascist, and whose name is known by all except the judge. Under the Fascist regime the trains arrive on time, but justice lags behind.

The propagandist of the Fascist Government in England, Signor Luigi Villari, in the Review of Reviews (April-May, 1926), in reference to what happened in Florence, wrote:

> The persons responsible for the Florence incidents(!) of last October were all arrested within a few days, and while those indicted for murder are in prison awaiting trial before the assizes, the minor offenders have all been tried and condemned, and quite recently their appeals to the higher court have been rejected.

Some weeks later he was assailed by certain doubts as to his assertion that "all" those responsible had been arrested, but on the whole he found that it was not helpful to the cause to confess that the guilty had been arrested only within a few days of his statement. He therefore wrote in his book, "The Fascist Experiment" (p. 90):

> Nearly all the guilty were at once arrested. The persons responsible for the wrecking of the shops and offices were tried within a few weeks of the affair and condemned to varying terms of imprisonment, and the authors of the murders are awaiting trial.

It will be interesting to see in what way the propagandist will demonstrate that justice has been meted out for the "incidents" of Florence. Pointing with pride to a prompt and improved railway schedule ought not to be sufficient explanation.

Frenzied Railroad Finance

By MARSHALL LYNN

LOOKING toward a fourth great rail system in the East —comparable to the Pennsylvania, Baltimore & Ohio, and New York Central systems—the Van Sweringen proposal for the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad to acquire the Erie and Pere Marquette systems has caught the public mind. Recent legislation, and President Coolidge's outspoken advocacy, had prepared the way; and the C. & O. plan with its parent proposal, the recently disapproved Nickel Plate consolidation, have leaped into the headlines.

And when, in the recent hearings before the Interstate Commerce Commission, O. P. Van Sweringen, chairman of the board of directors of the C. & O., informed the commission that he and his associates would be willing to give up a profit of $10,000,000 on their holdings of Erie stock in order to obtain the approval of the commission for the C. & O. application, a new interest was created. How had he maneuvered himself into that ten-million-dollar profit anyway? And were there other hidden ten millions?

The Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company is asking authority to acquire control by stock ownership of the Erie Railroad and the Pere Marquette Railroad, and to issue $59,000,000 of common stock to finance this acquisition. This plan was devised by a special committee of the board of directors of the C. & O. after the Commerce Commission, on March 2, 1926, had refused to authorize the previous Van Sweringen plan to unify the three roads involved with the Nickel Plate and Hocking Valley roads. Avowedly it was a step toward eventual unification of the three roads. The roads involved in the new plan are, with the exception of the Nickel Plate, the same as before. The proponents of this plan claim that the commission, while denying authorization to the earlier Nickel Plate consolidation, had in substance commended it from the physical and transportation standpoints, basing the adverse decision on the financial features.

The Van Sweringens and their friends say that the C. & O., although serving some of the richest coal-producing districts in the country (hauling in 1926 more coal originating on its own lines than any of the three preeminent systems of the East except the Pennsylvania), is in danger of being stifled and reduced to the status of a purely local carrier unless it can extend its primary system to the North- and Middle West; that union with the Erie would give the C. & O. facilities for competing in the Middle Western area on an approximately equal footing with other carriers in that territory, and provide an adequate traffic artery from Cincinnati to Chicago for the C. & O.'s westbound traffic at a cost of but $42,000,000, or only $8,000,000 more than would be necessary to render the present Chicago division of the C. & O. adequate for that purpose; that the inclusion of the Pere Marquette would give direct access to the thriving industrial territory surrounding Detroit and a through route to Milwaukee and the gateway to the Northwest without diversion through Chicago; and finally that by virtue of the C. & O.'s access to Hampton Roads and the Erie's to New York these two greatest ports of the Atlantic seaboard would have direct connection in a single system with the centers of the Northwest and the Great Lakes. They estimate an anticipated saving of some $2,500,000 annually in the operation of the combined roads, and predict large increases in business.

But minority stockholders of the C. & O., through whose efforts the Nickel Plate merger was defeated, and who (with some defections, it is true) are as staunchly in opposition to the C. & O. plan, are little impressed with these alluring prospects. In their view the C. & O. owes its present secure and profitable position in great measure to the very fact that it is independent. Formation of any such entangling alliance as that proposed with the Pere Marquette and the Erie, they insist, would involve immediate enmity with the Pennsylvania, Baltimore & Ohio, and others, and the withdrawal of a considerable portion of the business which the C. & O. has in the past enjoyed from those roads. Also they assert—and W. J. Harahan, president of the road, was forced to admit this at the recent hearings—that the most vital concern of the C. & O. at present is to obtain control of the Virginian, another important coal road paralleling the C. & O. from the West Virginia coal fields to Hampton Roads. This, they say, will provide ample use for all possible funds available to the C. & O. Mr. Harahan himself testified that unless control of the Virginian were acquired by the C. & O. his road would be compelled to expend some $32,000,000 for double tracking, new piers at Hampton Roads, and new cars.

The objection of the C. & O. minority, however, is essentially financial. On this feature the heaviest guns of minority counsel were trained at the hearings, and the high point of their fight was reached—and won—when Mr. Van Sweringen was compelled to take the stand on behalf of his own plan and disclose his own operations and those of his associates in the stocks of the roads involved. It was in the course of this testimony that he made his sensational offer to waive a ten-million-dollar profit.

This ten-million-dollar profit represents the difference between the present market value of the Erie Railroad stock now owned by the Van Sweringen interests (which, it is proposed, the C. & O. shall purchase) and the price at which this stock is optioned to the C. & O. Since the options held by the C. & O. on this stock were binding only until July 1, 1927, Mr. Van Sweringen's promise that he would extend the options for such time as might be necessary for the commission to reach its decision and keep the price at the original figure was in effect a renunciation of the appreciation in value of this stock since September, 1926, as of which time the price of this stock was fixed. For a better understanding of this feature, the following figures may be noted.

The present capitalization of the Erie consists of 1,124,819 shares of common stock, 479,044 shares of first preferred, and 160,000 shares of second preferred. When the C. & O. filed its application for authority to buy control, it had already acquired some 350,000 shares of the common, 137,000 shares of first preferred, and 50,000 of second preferred. These shares were bought in the open market, and the average price paid was $38.58 per share for the common, $47.21 for first preferred, and $44.94 for second preferred. As to the remainder of the stock necessary to majority ownership, the C. & O. holds options on some 476,000 shares of common at a price of $34.50, plus interest at 6 per cent from September 29, 1926; 24,000 first preferred at $45.875, with the same interest; and 25,000 second preferred at $43.75, with interest. Of the shares under option 345,000 shares of the common, 23,000 first preferred, and 22,000 second preferred are at present in the ownership of the Van Sweringen interests.

The option prices were fixed by a special committee of C. & O. directors and in comparison with the prices paid in the market for the stock already bought by the railroad seem eminently fair. In fact, the minority stockholders admit that the profits of the Van Sweringens on this stock, if any, will be negligible.

But cross-questioning of Oris Van Sweringen eventually elicited the information that up to the date of presentation of the C. & O. application, the Vaness Company, which is used by Oris and his brother for a considerable portion of their private tradings, had sold 77,000 shares of Erie first preferred for which they had originally paid approximately $29 per share, 400 shares of second preferred for which their average payments had been $21 per share, and 19,900 shares of common which had cost them an average of $16 per share, for an aggregate profit of something more than $1,500,000. This Vaness Company is the successor of the Nickel Plate Securities Corporation, with which the Van Sweringens made their debut into railroad circles about 1913. Eighty per cent of its stock is held by the Van Sweringen brothers, and the remainder by two of their fellow directors on the C. & O. and Nickel Plate roads.

With regard to the Pere Marquette stock, the C. & O. was in control of 1,900 out of a total issue of 450,460 shares of common, 2,100 out of 112,000 prior preference, and 12,600 out of 124,290 preferred, the average prices paid having been $117.17, $93.65, and $90.72 per share respectively. Options were held on 261,400 shares additional of the common stock, at an average price of $110.004 per share. Of these, 36,500 are owned by the Van Sweringen interests, 50,000 by other individuals, and the remainder, or 174,000 shares, by the Nickel Plate Railroad. Statistics as to the dealings of the Van Sweringens in the Pere Marquette stock showed no great profits; but, it was claimed, Mr. Van Sweringen emphatically declined to promise that the Nickel Plate would agree to extend the options on this stock, which also expire on July 1. It must be borne in mind that some 54 per cent of the voting stock of the latter road is owned by the Vaness Company.

Opponents of the C. & O. plan insist that these facts point strongly to the conclusion that the Van Sweringen plan to turn the Erie and Pere Marquette over to the C. & O. does not arise solely out of concern for the interests of that road. The Erie they regard as the weak sister of the Eastern rails, control of which at the proposed prices would only dilute the present large earnings of the C. & O. With the Pere Marquette the C. & O. already has physical connection and traffic agreements, under which the former is taking all the business which the C. & O. can turn over to it.

The story of the Van Sweringen brothers' rise to their present position in the railroad world, partially brought to light in these cases, presents an amazing picture of the possibilities of modern finance, and seems to show that the devices of financiers have kept pace with the long strides made in the way of governmental regulation of transportation facilities. Starting in 1913, with the acquisition of the old Nickel Plate road at an ultimate net investment of scarcely more than $500,000; adding the Clover Leaf, the Lake Erie & Western, the Chicago and State Line, and the Fort Wayne, Cincinnati & Louisville to make the present Nickel Plate system; financing the whole by means of bond issues, non-voting preferred stock, and sale of small portions of common stock so that the Van Sweringens remained in the end in full voting control of the system by a total net investment of some $3,750,000; finally buying up virtual control of the C. & O., Hocking Valley, Erie, and Pere Marquette they have furnished in the railroad world a complete demonstration of the possibilities of pyramiding holding companies one upon another. What their net investment in their present holdings has been probably no one knows; but in the history of their building up of the Nickel Plate is ground for suspicion that their newer plans may tend in the same direction.

Almost from the first the Van Sweringens have been assisted by some of the leading financial houses of the country, notably J. P. Morgan and Company and the First National Bank of New York. When they acquired control of the C. & O. one of the first changes of policy was to transfer the bulk of the road's deposits from the local banks in its own territory to these New York institutions. The change was not relished by the smaller stockholders of the C. & O.—nor, it may be imagined, by the banks from which the deposits were taken.

Disclosures such as those made in the C. & O. case demonstrate that the Interstate Commerce Commission must be given greater control over transactions in the stock of railroads and over the control of railroads by holding companies. Otherwise we can never have a really systematic unification of the present carriers, and what unification we get will not be determined by considerations of advantage to the public welfare.

Honor Is a Tradition of the Sea

By FRANK CHALONER AMES

ON the night of Wednesday, March 2, 1927, tropical stars tried with scant success to dispel the inky darkness. A fresh wind blew and the sea ran choppily. A million-dollar freighter with a million-dollar cargo steamed forth from Cebu for Masbate. On her bridge stood the third mate and a pilot. At the wheel was a young Norwegian seaman. On watch, a German sailor strained his eyes for the safety of the ship. For these are dangerous waters.

Ding ding! Two bells. Nine o'clock. The German sailor sighted a light dead ahead. As is customary he notified the bridge. What had taken possession of the third mate's dull Scandinavian brain no one can tell. He called the man off watch and sent him after ice water for the pilot! The young Norwegian had also sighted the light, but without orders he could not alter the course.

At 9:11 p.m. the freighter struck and sank the Perlas Filipinas, a small balandra bound for Cebu with sugar, six Visayan seamen, and their month's wages. The engines stopped in answer to wild signals from the bridge. Excited yells rose fearfully on the night air. The flicker beam of the searchlight frantically swept the sea for signs of life. Did someone see a human hand emerge from the water and clutch hopelessly at nothing? If so, it was quickly gone. While men's hearts stood still the work boat was lowered for the rescue. For two hours the little craft bobbed up and down upon the choppy sea, hitting and being hit by bits of wreckage. It returned with five dazed natives from the sunken craft. The sixth could not be found.

At eleven o'clock the freighter was once more under way.

The terrified, shivering survivors stood huddled near the fidly. In a hot torrent of Spanish a mestizo custom's officer was cursing them for being so careless. They were idiots! Did they not see the freighter? Why had they no lights? He himself saw none. Proof conclusive that they had none. They should be put in prison. If he had his way he would place them in Corregidor! To all this invective and insult the five pitiable fellows returned not a word. No speak Inglis, no sabbe Español.

The captain, mate, and pilot tried in every way to browbeat information from them, an admission that they carried no lights. No effect was apparent other than a tighter resolve on their part to say nothing. They were turned over to the steward's department for safe-keeping. Messboys led them aft and gave them hot coffee to drink, attended to one or two superficial wounds they had suffered, and supplied them with blankets, mattresses, and a place to sleep in the rope locker. There was little sleep that night.

The million-dollar freighter with its million-dollar cargo anchored at Masbate. For five days white men wondered at the strength of the obreros trotting the length of a long wharf, up a steep gangway, over blistering steel decks, with anywhere from one hundred to two hundred pounds of copra on their stooping backs.

At the end of five torrid days the now very friendly survivors were put aboard the inter-island steamer for Cebu, their home port. The captain of the freighter in a strange effort to appear generous presented each of them with two small tins of cheap smoking tobacco! They came aft in wonder not untinged with sadness. How were they to buy food without money? Their families at home could not consume tobacco in lieu of bread. Men of the crew gave them what they could spare. With some fifteen pesos to divide among them the Visayans left the ship and in the clear dawn of a lovely tropical morning the freighter weighed anchor and pointed her bow in the direction of Manila.

Cavite with its great wireless masts loomed up. Shortly afterward the freighter arrived in Manila, the largest city and first seaport of the islands. Here the court of inquiry was to sit. Undoubtedly there would be justice done. Probably the ship would be held until the owners of the Perlas Filipinas could appear in court. It was certain that the Visayan crew would come with their employers and give testimony.

Yes, that was most likely what was going to happen. So the crew of the freighter worked unmindful of the case, each man at his appointed task.

The captain was satisfied with the German sailor. He would be "safe." He was not dismissed, so he stood near the door of the captain's office while the young Norwegian was being questioned. Would the young fellow also be sensible enough to do as he was told? A moment's conversation disclosed the almost staggering fact that he would not. He would tell the truth. In court one was supposed to tell the truth and nothing but the truth. To lie in such a place and manner was to make one's self unfit to become an American citizen. And he had his first papers.

"Well, I'll be ——," thundered the captain. Then to the German sailor: "What do you think of that; is that right?" Didn't he [the German sailor] think the lowest thing a man could do was to squeal on a shipmate? Whatever he thought, he nodded his head and discreetly acquiesced in the captain's judgment. He was given the day off. Without any more ado he promptly went ashore, visited such places of alcoholic refreshment as seemed suited to his taste, and returned early next day unfit for court duty. For this unseemly conduct he was neither logged nor otherwise punished.

The captain proceeded to threaten the Norwegian.

Among other things he told him to watch his step on the way home if he so much as breathed a word in court. He went aft with tears in his eyes. Tears of disgust and anger.

The court sat. The outcome was awaited with eagerness. Some of the crew desired a longer stay in Manila. But by this time the outcome was guessed most uncannily by some cynics aboard the ship. The million-dollar freighter would be absolved, they said, and would sail tomorrow. At nine o'clock the next morning newsboys cried forth the august decision of the court. The cynics had it.

Among other things mentioned was the fact that no witnesses for the defense had appeared. But what difference does that make when a million-dollar ship with a million-dollar cargo tugs impatiently at the dock? What difference does it make whether one or one thousand native seamen lose their inconsequential lives so long as a careless mate and a careless pilot save their jobs?

The freighter headed east for San Francisco. At nine knots an hour it cut through that vast expanse of water ill named the Pacific. The ship must be painted before the Golden Gate loomed up. She must look as lovely as a maid just out of boarding school. And so men were busy in the fresh, stinging wind, with black, yellow, white, and red paint, with chipping hammers and wire brushes. On the homeward trip all enmity is forgotten among the members of the crew. Usually.

The young Norwegian was working hard: at particularly hateful tasks, too. That was noted by the cynics. He spilled some paint. The mate espied this from the corner of his alert eye. He came up and cursed the seaman and ordered him to go forward and paint on a winch. His fists were clenched, but other members of the crew were near. He followed his prey. On the forward deck, out of sight of all except those on the bridge he struck at the Norwegian but missed as the latter turned and avoided the blow. Interruption in the form of other sailors prevented any further assault. At least so it seemed to the cynics.

The ship was half way home. The Norwegian was taking his afternoon smoke just after coming off wheel and before going on deck. The mate burst into the mess-room where he sat with other members of the crew off duty, spluttering forth some almost unintelligible words to the effect that the young Norwegian had better get out on deck or he would be logged. Inasmuch as all the other seamen were allowed ten minutes' smoking time both morning and afternoon there was no reason why he should not be entitled to the same. He was advised by some of the crew to go on duty at once. He did.

At suppertime the men discussed the extraordinary logging of the Norwegian seaman for being late on duty! The cynics kept silence.

The freighter neared San Francisco. The Norwegian seaman was standing four-hour watches at the wheel. The usual watch was two hours. He was on the second mate's watch. He was tired. He leaned back on the bulkhead which separated the wheel-house from the chart-room. He held the wheel in a manner which displeased the second mate. The ship was right on its course; no one had during the previous months taken exception to the way in which he held the wheel.

The second mate entered the wheel-house. In an instant the Norwegian seaman was clouted a terrific blow on the ear. His head rang, he felt warm blood trickle down the side of his neck. Tears of rage filled his eyes. He did not dare to strike back. Why? Mutiny! Irons, bread and water, imprisonment on shore. Perhaps worse right on the ship. Anything could be done in "self-defense."

The mess-table talk was wild and pointless. But a light was beginning to dawn upon the most unenlightened. The cynics said little. They suggested an attitude of resignation until San Francisco should be reached. There the shipping commissioners might look into it. On this they were divided.

San Francisco was reached and the left wing of the cynical party triumphed. The only thing the Norwegian seaman could do was quit the ship. If he had made a protest he would have been framed and more than likely deported. Besides he had no witnesses.

Honor remains a tradition of the sea!

In the Driftway

WHEN it became known that President Coolidge was looking for a likely place to spend the summer months, many State legislatures sought to lure him to their respective States with resolutions of invitation. The bare chance of securing the Presidential presence inspired the legislators to the sublimest flights. The legislatures are dilatory in publishing their collected works, but the Minnesota, New Mexico, and South Dakota resolutions have come to the Drifter's hand, and they are worth scanning.

* * * * *

AS a prose poem the Minnesota resolution, despite some undoubted merits, deserves, the Drifter thinks, to rank lowest. It states what it has to offer the President in almost a matter-of-fact tone. The New Mexico legislature's resolution has a certain lilt to it:

> WHEREAS, The tonic atmosphere of New Mexico is tired nature's sweet restorer and its civilization as old as yesterday and as young as tomorrow and its history crammed with antiquity and artistic interest as well as with grandeur of natural scenery, of mountain, and plain, and,
>
> WHEREAS, Its capital city of Santa Fe is the aesthetic capital of America, therefore,
>
> Be and it is hereby Resolved, That President Coolidge be and he is hereby invited to visit New Mexico for such vacation and to establish the federal summer capital in this ancient city.

In spite of these lyric flights, it is easy to see why the President is not in New Mexico today. The Drifter does not imagine that Mr. Coolidge would be attracted to any place because it is the aesthetic capital of America. It might be distinctly uncomfortable to be thrown with the bolsheviks and artists who live in Santa Fe. In the summer time one wants to relax.

* * * * *

BUT, as the world now knows, the South Dakota legislature won the prize with its resolution. It is composed of pithy little sentences describing the attractions of the Black Hills. For instance:

> Their summer climate is ideal, healthful, and invigorating; the temperature moderate in the daytime and invariably cool at night.
>
> These mountains are sublime in lofty peaks, sheer precipices, towering spires, domes, crags, and formations not elsewhere found.

They abound in beautiful flora of an infinite variety.

Fine streams of purest water run through the defiles.

Fishing is excellent. Black brook, lochlavan, and rainbow trout are abundant.

The man who wrote that last sentence knew "Cal's" public weakness. But this one must have been irresistible:

The population in and about these mountains is intelligent and moral with whom neighborly relations are safe and pleasurable.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Reform Movement in Michigan

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You and your readers may be interested to know that the Michigan Chapter of the Sons of the American Revolution has appointed its committees for the coming year, and that on the Committee on Public Welfare and Defense are Truman H. Newberry and Edwin Denby, and on the Committee on Americanization and Patriotic Education is Charles Beecher Warren.

Detroit, June 24 RUSSELL MACCLINCHY

Chicago's Mayors

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You publish a letter charging that ex-Mayor Dever was elected mayor of Chicago on a platform of immediate municipal ownership and within six months thereafter repudiated his promise.

I was chairman of the Local Transportation Committee of the City Council prior to and during the Dever administration and know the facts. Dever made no promise of immediate municipal ownership either in a formal platform or in public utterance. During his term Mr. Dever by the exertion of tremendous effort and the full power of his office procured the passage by the City Council and submitted to a referendum the only municipal-ownership ordinance ever presented to the people of Chicago. This ordinance provided for the acquisition of title to all transportation utilities by the city, eliminated all excess profit in financing, and provided for operation by a board of which the mayor controlled six out of nine members. It was based on a plan which I had submitted to the City Council prior to the Dever administration, whereby in lieu of corporate bonds, which the city could not issue because of the limitations of the State constitution, certificates payable solely out of the earnings of the utilities were to be used to finance their acquisition by the city. The ordinance as finally adopted by the City Council was partly prepared and in all respects was approved by William H. Holly, at that time a law partner of Clarence Darrow, and an avowed advocate of municipal ownership.

The only alternative to the ordinance suggested by its opponents was a plan involving an amendment to the State constitution. For a quarter of a century efforts have been made to procure such an amendment without avail. To procure it would require control of the legislature, the cooperation of the governor, the carrying of elections in city and State, and finally negotiations for the acquisition of the utilities or a suit to condemn.

Some municipal-ownership advocates opposed the ordinance on the ground that the heads of the companies were favorable to the plan. Samuel Insull stayed abroad until shortly before the election and then stated publicly that he was opposed to the municipal-ownership basis of the ordinance but would not oppose the city administration. Privately he stated that he could not afford, because of his vast utility interests, to see any extension of municipal ownership such as this ordinance implied. The ordinance was defeated by more than 100,000 votes and it is my conviction that in large part this was due to the fact that it was regarded as a municipal-ownership ordinance.

In any event there never was a public official who more honestly strove to solve the traction problem in the public interest than did Mr. Dever.

Since your correspondent's letter was published the Insull traction bills, paving the way for a perpetual franchise, have been prepared and passed through the Illinois Senate, with the approval of Mayor Thompson. To my mind the story points its own moral for the liberal citizen who is ready to desert an honest public official because he has not conformed to 100 per cent of his creed.

Chicago, June 18 ULYSSES S. SCHWARTZ

Radio Censorship

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The instance of radio censorship to which you called attention in one of your issues, when a speaker at a dinner of the All Nations Association was cut off for an incidental praise of pacifism, is not by any means the only recent case of radio censorship. Two broadcasting stations recently refused to permit a broadcast of the play "Spread Eagle," and in addition Victor Berger was cut off after he had been speaking for only a few minutes.

Each week that passes renders it more than ever apparent that the labor, Socialist, and pacifist forces of this country must get a broadcasting station of their own. The proposed station WDEBS, which a committee of Socialists, progressive labor leaders, and peace advocates are trying to obtain, would fill the bill in every way. Norman Thomas, the chairman of the committee to raise funds for it, states that the obvious difficulty about securing a license and a wave length can be avoided by buying a station which already has had a wave length assigned to it.

Cambridge, Mass., June 15 ALFRED BAKER LEWIS

Contributors to This Issue

GAETANO SALVEMINI is author of "The Fascist Dictatorship in Italy."

MARSHALL LYNN is Washington correspondent for the Richmond News Leader and the Wilmington (Del.) Every Evening.

FRANK CHALONER AMES has just returned from a five months' voyage on an American freighter as a member of the crew.

W. NORMAN BROWN is professor of Sanskrit at the University of Pennsylvania and has been professor of English in the Prince of Wales College, Jammu, India.

J. FRANK DOBIE is the author of "Texas Legends."

WALTER VOGDES is a California novelist and newspaperman now living in New York.

THERESA WOLFSON is author of "The Woman Worker and the Trade Unions."

KEITH HUTCHISON is associated with the British Library of Information in New York.

HERBERT SOLOW was history editor of the Literary Review of the New York Evening Post.

LOUIS E. VAN NORMAN has been commercial attaché at the American Legation in Bucharest.

Books

Carbolic Acid for India

Mother India. By Katherine Mayo. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.75.

IT is entirely doubtful what effect this book will have. Miss Mayo went to India to find social evils, and she found them; "Mother India" is an outburst of passionate indignation that such things should be, that the British should have suffered them, that the Nationalists, who are wresting the control of the country from foreign hands, should take no more than an academic interest, that the most that exists in the way of reform should be mere talk. With her gift for quick, effective description, and an instinct to ferret out the most noisome details, she paints a revolting picture of a diseased and loathsome country, and, moved in every cell of her being, she lashes alike all who seem to her contributors to the failure to apply the obvious remedies, not sparing even Tagore and Gandhi.

The horrors she relates are of the same sort that the missionaries have for generations been repeating in the West, but her book, in its completeness and devastating effectiveness, is as much more thorough than theirs as carbolic acid is for a disinfectant than distilled water. The only book that can approach hers is one from which she quotes frequently, Abbé Dubois's "Hindu Manners, Customs, and Ceremonies," first published in 1816. Both authors have a brilliant command of the pictographic and both are shocked at India. Often they are shocked by the same things, but in general their sense of values differs, in which respect a student of the history of ideas would find them interesting and contrasting representatives of their respective generations. Dubois looks for moral and religious depravity, accounting social and economic phenomena as secondary; Miss Mayo ignores Indian religions, philosophy, literature, and art—about all of which she seems vastly uninformed—except in so far as she thinks them connected with lapses in hygiene, sanitation, medicine, agricultural methods, stock-breeding, and other concrete social and economic failures.

From the Western point of view her book constitutes an impressive indictment of Indian society; there is no element that is spared. If in regard to enforced widowhood she speaks more favorably of the Sikhs or the Mohammedans than she does of the Hindus, it is only elsewhere to boil over regarding other social abuses of which these portions of the population are guilty, although she may not accuse them specifically. But the chief object of her indignation is the Hindu branch, the followers of the religion Hinduism, comprising roughly about three-fourths of India's 315 millions. They are in the majority and they are practitioners of the greatest number of the social evils she is attacking.

Approximately half her book deals with the woman question in India, the details of which are much more elementary than the phrase suggests in the West. There is child marriage, often involving cohabitation before puberty and child-birth at the earliest possible moment, sometimes at the age of eight. The effects on the mothers and the children are inevitable. As if this were not bad enough, there is added the unbelievable way of the native midwives, whose methods, for sheer filth and benightedness, could not be excelled—yet even educated Indians allow them to be practiced upon their own families. Along with these go enforced widowhood among the Hindus and seclusion of women among Mohammedans and to a lesser degree among Hindus. The chief cause for these evils, she makes her readers feel, is the sensuality of the men, especially the Hindu men; the next important cause the ignorance of the older generation of women, the comparatively few who have survived the treatment and therefore have confidence in it.

In the rest of her book she deals with such problems as the sanctity of animal life, above all of the "mother" cow, who, by her immunity to death, deprives the country of a meat supply and literally eats herself out of pasturage and into yielding a thin trickle of milk, becoming in the end a liability to the country. The most gruesome thing in her history is her old age, uncared for and unfed. And instead of being bettered it is made worse if she is unlucky enough to get into a pinjra pol (animal haven), a "standing and starving ground," the refuge wealthy and pious Hindus found to save the sacred animal from quick death in a Mohammedan slaughter-house. She also reports on the condition of the sixty million "untouchables," whose social status is in some respects even worse than she describes; so too with the hoarding of precious metals, the full economic implications of which she does not develop.

We cannot say that this book reveals itself as the product of a reflective mind. Miss Mayo made of herself a kind of journeying camera through India, selecting for preservation the most horrible and striking scenes that are quickly recordable. But she never gets under the surface to seek for causes in order that suitable remedies may be prescribed. The malignancy of nature, the depressing and debilitating effect of the climate, the economic misery it has brought to the country, the famines, the thousands of years of foreign invasion and internal warfare, the very fierceness of the struggle for life, the range of disease, the threat of sudden and violent death from unapprehendable sources as well as from wild animals and other obvious agents—these as factors in the development of spiritual, mental, and social life are apparently no more to her than mere words. She accepts the easy conclusion that it is India's peculiar religious notions, in especial the doctrine of Karma (Rebirth and Retribution), that are responsible for the apathy in social matters, without apparently realizing that these notions are quite as much effect as they are cause. Her attitude in this respect is much like that of the old-style missionary, whose cause, however, she is always careful never to adopt. Coming from a country barely three centuries old, she cannot visualize the weight of five millennia of tradition in creating the social inertia she attacks, still less the situation responsible for the rise of the tradition.

It is perhaps due to this lack of reflective power that Miss Mayo sees no way out, or at least argues for none, although she implies a kind of faith in laws. The logical conclusion of her diatribe of disgust and despair would seem to be extermination, at least of the Hindu males. Mr. Wells, if the matter should ever receive his attention, would doubtless counsel "education," as did Raja Ram Mohun Roy, the Rev. Mr. Duff, Macaulay, and other reformers or missionaries a century ago when Western education was adopted in the government colleges instead of Oriental. Certainly "education," meaning the imparting of ideas, has done and is doing something to alleviate the miseries of India; so too are economic improvements, such as railroads, irrigation, scientific stock-breeding, and agricultural experimentation. Cooperative societies are freeing the peasant from the money-lender. Western medicine has made some headway. Above all the example of other peoples influences the conduct of the best-educated Indians. Miss Mayo must be a little patient, must take a somewhat longer view. Indians, no more than Westerners, are without a humanitarian spirit; we have historical records to show it has been there for 2,500 years. But first they must learn that things could be different; as they slowly do so, the spirit will be extended to a wider application. Until they do so, even the sufferers will reject the remedies, as her own book abundantly testifies.

The answer Miss Mayo would make to these criticisms is perhaps that it is not her business either to search for causes, which might be utilized by Indian apologists as excuses for doing nothing, or to prescribe remedies, which might be shown impracticable. She is a goad to chastise the errant, but it is the Indians themselves who must discover the difficult road to including the Clayton Act, the Immigration Acts, and the Seaman's Act. He mentions large numbers of Congressmen in recent congresses who have been pledged to support labor policies and oppose anti-labor legislation. One is duly impressed until one remembers that in spite of these victories the right to strike, the elementary objective of a trade-union movement, is hedged about by endless legal restrictions.

This is a matter on which Mr. Walling does not choose to dwell. There are others. One scarcely realizes, after reading this book, that the A. F. of L. is still largely an aristocracy of skilled workers whose importance is rapidly declining in these later stages of the industrial revolution. He does not mention the millions of workers, in the most flourishing industries in America, whom the A. F. of L. has hardly attempted to organize. Nor does he make any reference to the several strong unions, some of which have made remarkable progress, outside the orbit of the A. F. of L.

An apt comparison, though one Mr. Walling would resent, might be made between the American trade unions today and the British movement of the 1860's. The latter was composed almost entirely of skilled mechanics organized on a craft basis; its energies were devoted to obtaining an assured legal status for trade unions; and it was beginning to experiment with political action, working chiefly through the Liberal Party. The suggestion that the A. F. of L. is fifty years or so behind the times is thus not without foundation. The American worker, trade unionist or otherwise, has one tremendous advantage, however, over his more highly organized European comrade. His real wages are very much higher. This advantage leading lights of the A. F. of L. complacently credit to the superior industrial and political methods of their own organization. And, while prosperity lasts, there is nothing to prevent them from sitting tight and inactive upon their comfortable pedestals, sleepily applauding the energies of Mr. Walling in exhibiting them to the world as monuments of American idealism.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Before the War

From Bismarck to the World War. By Erich Brandenburg. Oxford University Press. $7.

German World Policy. By O. Hammann. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

IN Germany the situation must be peculiarly painful for the writers of history. At one and the same time there exist the duty of absolving Germany from the war guilt and the desire to condemn one or another pre-war authority—party or individual—for Germany's part in bringing on the conflict. Otto Hammann, who thinks Germany was "encircled" by her enemies, is almost impatient with the blunders of the Kaiser, who lost that friendship which Bismarck had successfully cultivated in England. Mr. Hammann did long service in the Press Bureau of the Wilhelmstrasse. He knew the Iron Chancellor, Caprivi, Bülow, as well as the more recent architects of German grosse Politik. He has an intimate acquaintance with the diplomatic correspondence of many decades. Erich Brandenburg, whose volume is among the best accounts of German pre-war diplomacy, is somewhat more acidulous than Mr. Hammann in denouncing the Dummheit of German diplomats. His volume, like many another of its type, is sound and careful and based on a wide knowledge of the documentary evidence.

However painlessly Mr. Brandenburg guides the reader through an intricate jungle of diplomatic remains, he rarely brings him forth into the sunlight of sound conclusions. Even those who regard favorably demands for Austro-German unification will deny the connection between the causes of the World War and the righteousness of unification sentiment. "Nationality" is hardly the word in which to epitomize the fundamental causes. In this contribution to the inquest Mr. Brandenburg denounces as the arch-fiends of 1914 Izvolski and Poincaré. Here he will meet readier agreement than in his harshness toward the blundering Grey. And the revisionists will chorus with delight (they did immediately on the appearance of the German edition of the book) on reading the following:

> Our policy was, in fact, too anxious and peace-loving. . . . The French wished to recover Alsace-Lorraine. . . . The Russians wished to open the way to the Straits and to the control of the Balkans. . . . It was they, not Germany, who wished for conquests. . . . Unfortunately we possessed no statesman who was competent to deal with these clever and unscrupulous diplomatists. Austria's rashness and Germany's timid consideration for her last ally gave them the opportunity they wanted. . . .

Some day we shall realize that whoever killed the bird of peace, the funeral had begun forty-four years before the murder. Then the coroners will go back to history.

HERBERT SOLOW

Books in Brief

A Sentimental Journey through France and Italy, with Selections from the Journals, Sermons, and Correspondence of Laurence Sterne. Edited with an Introduction by Wilbur L. Cross. The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy. By Laurence Sterne. Introduction by Wilbur L. Cross. The Travels of Marco Polo. Revised from Marsden's Translation and edited with Introduction by Manuel Komroff. The Dialogues of Plato. Selections from the Translation of Benjamin Jowett. Edited with an Introduction by William Chase Greene. The Physiology of Taste. By Jean Anthelme Brillat-Savarin. Foreword by Frank Crowninshield. The Complete Poems of François Villon. Translated by John Heron Lepper. Including the texts of John Tayne and others. Boni and Liveright. The Black and Gold Library. $3.50 each.

Six volumes of a beautiful and useful series which is to include translations of Apuleius, Saint Augustine, Brantôme, Castiglione, Machiavelli, Terence, the Greek Romances, Aristophanes, Catullus, and others. The octavo size of the volumes will permit the presentation of more material than is usually to be found in the items of a popular series; and the glossy black and gold binding will provide a permanently desirable shelf for scholars and lovers of good books. Few publishing enterprises have been more worthy of praise.

Brother Saul. By Donn Byrne. The Century Company. $2.50.

The pace and color and vigor of the early chapters of this novel are exceptional; the author has taken a familiar story and recreated an era. After Saul's memorable conversion, the drama falls inevitably into a more subdued key and the second half of the story suffers by comparison with what has gone before. Conceding that, however, it still remains a richly wrought and satisfying performance.

Mattock. By James Stevens. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Mr. Stevens adroitly lays bare the mind and emotions of a soldier, but the clinic is not unqualifiedly rewarding to the reader. One feels that the same results could have been secured by more imaginative means. The recital occasionally crosses the borderline into the tedious, so that one is tempted to suggest—in place of "Mattock"—a rereading of Ralph Hale Mottram's "Spanish Farm" trilogy.

The Poilus. By Joseph Delteil. Translated from the French by Jacques Leclercq. Minton, Balch and Company. $3.

The author attempts to present the World War through a series of the experiences and impressions of an ordinary soldier. His success is indifferent, because in spite of occasional telling description, his obvious effort to express himself originally results not in more vivid pictures but merely in fantastic prose. Nor does he add to our knowledge of the life or mind of the French peasant, who, in 1914-1918, returned to the most primitive savagery under compulsion of the most modern ideals.

International Relations Section

The Eastern Edge of Europe

By LOUIS E. VAN NORMAN

TO understand what is happening in Rumania just now it is necessary to get a picture of general reconstruction politics in Southeastern Europe. This does not mean party politics in Rumania alone. All of the new independent units born of the World War face the same general problems, with only local modifying factors. The underlying factors with which political leaders must deal are the same in each case. Cultural, political, and economic levels, languages, legal codes, and religious creeds, not to forget railroad systems, each one differing in purpose and structure from all of the others, must be made uniform and efficient to serve a new modern state. Cutting across these are differing financial and commercial systems to be realigned. Finally there have been all sorts of administrative backgrounds and widely differing methods of official procedure to be welded into one. There is a serious lack of trained public servants for the work to be done.

But the most prolific source of trouble in all of these new nations is yet to be mentioned. It is the belief that the oldest unit in Rumania is the rightful center of the new combination and that it must absorb the new additions rather than acknowledge that a new unit has been born. As for these new lands, they argue that they shou'd be consulted in the formulation of the reconstituted fatherland. We came into the new union, they say, by voluntary acts of our own and we demand our rightful share in the building of the Rumania of the future. There you have the whole story of intransigence in Transylvania and Bessarabia.

The Rumanian peasant, on the whole, is satisfied. He has the land and there is practically no danger of bolshevism with him. "I believe in private property because I've got some"—is his political, economic, and social philosophy. The partitioning of the land was of course an act of justice, but it was also a policy of insurance against bolshevism.

The political parties in Rumania in opposition to the Liberals have all been built up on what have been largely sectional ideas. The Transylvanians were so long in opposition to the government (alien and hostile for nearly a thousand years) that they found it difficult to accustom themselves to an agreement with a government of their own race. Moreover, in spite of their sufferings and the war, the peoples of Transylvania and Bessarabia do remember and are still under the impress, to a certain extent, of the old German-Austrian and Russian ideas, and they have not found it easy to accept the French influence which has always been so dominant in the old Rumanian kingdom.

Since the Bratianus stepped aside from power in March, 1926, Italian influence has been growing in Rumania. General Averescu, Premier until a few weeks ago, is married to an Italian wife, and the increasing popularity of Italian ideas during his premiership was remarkable. Italy loaned money to Rumania. The press of Bucharest applauded "Rumanian solidarity with Italian policy." We have Italy's difference with Jugoslavia over the Albanian puzzle, and there are those not only in Berlin, but in Bucharest and Belgrade and Rome, who claim that the replacing of France by Italy in the thoughts and policies of the Southeast of Europe has seriously impaired the Little Entente. Correctly or not, these observers believe that, if Rumania is detached from her partnership with Jugoslavia and Czecho-Slovakia, the former will not only lose a valuable partner, but Italy's influence will be greatly strengthened in dealings with Bulgaria, Greece, and Turkey.

Averescu's premiership lasted just a few days more than fourteen months—from the middle of March, 1926, to the end of May, 1927. Powerful political party influence at home and lack of success in obtaining foreign loans were probably the chief causes of the fall of his government. The illness of King Ferdinand (which would now seem to be about to terminate fatally) has apparently convinced the real rulers of the kingdom that it would be well to attempt to harmonize the opposition parties and instal at Bucharest a coalition government in which the principal elements of the opposition would be represented. On June 7, therefore, King Ferdinand called upon Prince Stirbey, to form a government, a brother-in-law of the Bratianus, and a friend of Queen Marie. But Stirbey was unable to gain the cooperation of the powerful Peasant Party, and on June 21 King Ferdinand called back Bratianu to the premiership as the only man able to form a stable government, at least until the coming elections.

This large political situation has a greater part to play than is easily apparent in what seems like only a rather melodramatic clash of personalities which the newspapers are now reporting daily to us from Rumania. Bessarabia is probably the new Rumania's most difficult problem. Even to many Rumanians of the old kingdom this fertile, fascinating land is merely a name. It is about the size of our own state of South Carolina and its population numbers approximately three and a half million.

Very few Rumanians and scarcely any foreigners at all ever visit Bessarabia. When I proposed to take an automobile trip through that mysterious land I was strongly urged against such an expedition. There were no railroads, and as for motor roads my well-wishers assured me that such things did not exist. However, in the month of May, accompanied by an English-speaking Rumanian friend, I made a three weeks' tour.

Bessarabia has amazingly fertile soil. Its fruit orchards have been famous for more than a century. Its grain, fish, and caviar are known far and wide. It is literally a sun-burned land, however, and the agonizing dust in summer and appalling mud in winter make travel very difficult. In spite of the dryness we were much impressed by the beautiful gardens and orchards of all sorts of fruit in profusion: prunes, apples, cherries, pears, apricots, and peaches of a most excellent flavor, although not large. The fruit of the province has always been famous. For nearly a century Bessarabia was the fruit orchard of the Russian Empire. We could also see that the walnut groves, for which Bessarabia is famous, were flourishing. Everywhere the need for water was evident. Such little irrigation as is practiced is by windmills—or buckets carried by hand. Apparently there is no fuel in Bessarabia—wood, coal, or oil. Because of this lack the industrial possibilities of the country are limited. There are a few mills and factories making leather, soap, paper, and pottery, and we saw one beet-sugar plant in operation. But grain everywhere (particularly corn and wheat), in spite of the heat, was flourishing.

For almost unnumbered centuries the Bessarabian steppe, known as the Bugeac, was the battleground of the Aryan and Turanian races. All of the invaders of Europe crossed here. Now all is changed, and on both sides of the river Dniester the famous Black Earth region is no longer the home of fighting men or nomads, but of peaceful, hard-working farmers. Of Bessarabia's 3,500,000 people, more than 2,500,000 are Rumanian, but besides these there is a medley of races, tongues, and religions. Imagine a harmonious family made up of Rumanians, Russians, Poles, Serbians, Bulgarians, Germans, English, Swedes, Swiss, French, Greeks, Americans, Tartars, Jews, Gipsies, Turks, and a number of uncouth racial mixtures. Among the faiths represented are Eastern Orthodox, Roman Catholics, Anglicans, Mennonites, Separatists, Georgians, Lutherans, Calvinists, Pietists, and Mohammedans.

Chisinau (known to the Russian as Kishineff), the capital, is connected with Bucharest by a fairly good sleeping-car service. In 1812 when the Russians took over Bessarabia, Chisinau was a mud village of some 5,000 inhabitants. Today it has a population nearly sixty times as great, more than half being of the Jewish race. It is an uneven, dingy, sprawly city, very dirty in spots and very clean in others, with plenty of shade trees, and only one wide street —the Alexandrovskaya. Chisinau has deteriorated sadly since the days when the old landed proprietors came there to do their banking. It was then a rather lively and brilliant town. Since the parceling-out of the land, however, the peasant farmers have built up little trading centers of their own all over the province, and they do not go to Chisinau any more. It still smacks of Russia—the Alexandrovskaya, the long time spent at meals, the heavy eating, the samovar, the everlasting tea-drinking and cigarette smoking, the turning of night into day. But the mass of the population gossips in the Moldavian—or Rumanian—tongue.

As we motored over the execrable roads along the Dniester, which separates Bessarabia from the Russian provinces that make up the Ukraine, we could see the Bolshevik sentinels on the other side. We also noted the fact that, even at that early part of the season, the grain was in a sad way from the drought. From Chisinau to Tighina (known to the Russians as Bender) we made our trip in a gasoline-driven hand-car, reaching the latter place just in time to witness the "normalizing" of the last stretch of Russian wide-gauge railroad track. Over a distance of some forty miles, three thousand soldiers and eight hundred workmen lifted up one rail and replaced it nine centimeters (approximately three inches) nearer to the other, while an Orthodox priest blessed each kilometer of the road as it was completed. The Rumanians are reconstructing all of the Bessarabian lines as well as they can, with limited capital.

The Rumanians in Bessarabia are intensely patriotic. They have had to fight for their Rumanianism so long that it has become almost a religion with them. On the second morning of our stay in Tighina I was awakened very early by childish voices singing. Presently there was a knock and in response to my invitation two children in the Rumanian national costume—a boy and a girl, each about eight years old—marched into my room. The boy bowed with much dignity. "Octavianu," he announced, introducing himself. The girl curtsied and presented herself as "Florica." Then they stood at military "attention," and sang in mellow treble, for my delectation, several stirring patriotic songs. "We always begin the day this way," was the boy's explanation, "and we thought you might like to hear us."

"Tremendous, like the mountain on which its little people creep about"
CLYDE BECK, in The Detroit News.

THE MAGIC MOUNTAIN
By Thomas Mann
Translated by H. T. Lowe-Porter

IT STILL TOWERS
Second large printing. Two volumes, boxed, $6.00

Some sets are still procurable of the special large-paper edition of 200 numbered copies, printed on all-rag paper, bound in parchment with imported paper sides, with photogravure frontispieces (a portrait of Thomas Mann and a facsimile of the last two manuscript pages of The Magic Mountain; the first volume of each set signed by the author. The two volumes, boxed, $25.00

AT ALL BOOKSHOPS
Alfred A. Knopf, Publisher New York
In Canada from The Macmillan Company of Canada, Ltd., St. Martin's House, Toronto

Last month Arabia. Today India holds the Stage!

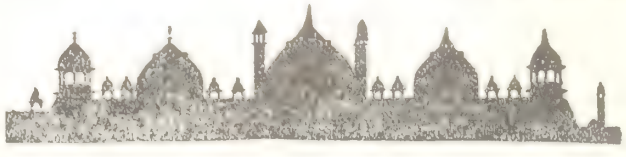
MOTHER INDIA
By Katherine Mayo

Appalling as the facts on hygiene, sanitation, the position of women, child marriages, etc., etc., in Miss Mayo's book appear, they bear the stamp of truth; and the book is as fascinating as the Arabian Nights. 2nd Printing.

"If this book and Dante's Inferno were ever entered in a competition for the imaginative realization of human suffering, Dante would lose the prize."—Chicago Evening Post.

Illustrated $3.75

Harcourt, Brace & Company, 383 Madison Ave. New York



SUMMER PLACES

CAMP TAMIMENT

(Camp for Adults)
FOREST PARK, PA.

Nature's Wonder Spot in the Blue Mountains of Pennsylvania. 20 miles from Delaware Water Gap.

All outdoor sports. 14 splendid tennis courts. 6 cement handball courts. Delightful bathing. Excellent food. Dancing and entertainment in glorious hall on shore of lake.

Daily lecture on Art, Literature, Science et cetera.

Rates moderate. Make early reservations.

New York Office, 7 East 15th St., Phone Stuyvesant 3094

MRS. BERTHA H. MAILLY, Director.

RIVERLAKE LODGE

A Camp Superb
FOR ADULTS

OUTSIDE KINGSTON, N. Y., ON THE HUDSON RIVER AND LAKE ESOPUS

A beautiful place with wonderful views of the Hudson River and mountains, where intelligent people will meet congenial company. Bathing, Boating, Fishing, Tennis, Hand Ball, Dancing and other amusements. Excellent Food. Terms: $35.00 weekly, $7.00 a day. Camp sites and Furnished Rooms or Bungalows by the season. Write for camp booklet.

RIVERLAKE LODGE

70 West 40th St., New York City. Tel. Longacre 3693.
Ulster Park, Ulster County, N. Y. Tel. Kingston 2810.

HARRY WEINBERGER - - HARRY KELLY
Directors

SONSET SCHOOL OF OPINION

SIASCONSET MASSACHUSETTS

A Seashore Vacation with Writers, Editors, Dramatists, Scientists, Philosophers.

SUMMER SCHOOL

SPEAKERS:

Everett D. Martin, Bruce Bliven, Herbert Adams Gibbons, Floyd Dell, Ernest Boyd, Prof. E. L. Baker, H. M. Kallen, Harry E. Barnes, Crystal Eastman, Professor Mortimer T. Adler.

Subject: "THE WORLD WE LIVE IN"

Sea Bathing, Golf Tennis, Saddle Horses. References.

TIMBERLAND

IN THE HEART OF THE ADIRONDACKS
POTTERSVILLE, N. Y.

The Camp Purposely Limited to a Congenial Group of 40

Bungalows and Main House modern in every respect.

Excellent facilities and equipment for all camp sports; also golf.

Rate $27 per week.

Round Trip Fare to Riverside, N. Y., $13.27.

MORRIS HARKAVY
ESTHER R. KAPLAN

N. Y. Office, 55 West 42nd St. Pennsylvania 7663

INDIAN HEAD CAMP

ON FULTON LAKE
WARRENSBURG, N.Y.

Swimming
Fishing
Canoeing
Rowing
Dancing

Baseball
Tennis
Basketball
Handball
Horseback

A Camp for Adults in the Adirondack Mts. $30 per week $5 per day

Look for the Indian Head

Take Albany Night Boat on any Saturday night and meet our sight seeing bus at the Albany pier on Sunday morning for a trip through the Adirondack Mountains, passing through Schenectady, Saratoga, Glens Falls, Lake George and Warrensburgh, without any extra charge. Otherwise N. Y. Central to Lake George, where our cars will meet you.

Write for Camp Booklet

N. Y. Address—R. Helfant, 895 Brook Avenue, Bronx, N. Y. Tel. Melrose 1821

BAILIN'S MAPLEDALE HOTEL

ROSCOE, N. Y. STATION
on the N. Y., O. & W. Line
(Telephone Roscoe 3Y2)

¶ A resort of health, beauty and splendor in the most enchanting heights of the Catskills. ¶ 1,750 feet above sea level. ¶ All conveniences; all camp activities; all recreational treats. Excellent Jewish meals. Fine atmosphere. ¶ Prices $25.00 and up per week. ¶ For information and booklet address B. BAILIN, 3 New St., Coney Island, N. Y.

Rock-Lake Country Club

Formerly CAMP GREATER UTOPIA

Narrowsburg, N.Y. Phone Narrowsburg 47-J
ON BEAUTIFUL ROCK LAKE

A vacation playground for young folks. All water sports, tennis, basketball, handball. Entertainments arranged, social programs different daily. Dancing, everything informal. Meals unrivaled (dietary laws strictly observed). Rates and full information on request.

H. GELBAUM, Manager

IDEAL CAMPING GROUND

at the Scenic Blue Mountain Lake, only an hour's ride from N. Y., also Hotel Accommodations

Refer to AS-ER Campus,
Furnace Wood Road, Peekskill, N. Y., or to New York Office, 391 East 149th Street.
Melrose 1961.

PIONEER LODGE

A Summer Camp for Adults
NEAR THOUSAND ISLANDS

Limited to Fifty—Has All Conveniences in Lodge and Bungalows—All Sports—Tennis. Boating on Large Lake—Golf Within 15 Minutes Walk—Rate $25.00 per Week.

Accessible over night by N. Y. Central

STAR LAKE, N. Y.
ST. LAWRENCE COUNTY

CITY OFFICE
140 W. 42ND STREET
WISCONSIN 2165

TROUT LAKE CAMP AND HOTEL

in the Adirondacks on Lake George, N. Y.
3rd Season on the Crystal Springs, Trout Lake
Free Auto service from Lake George
All land and water sports. Jewish cooking.
Fare N. Y., round trip $12.28—Rates $25 per week.
Make reservations now.
New York Offices, 9 W. 47th St., 805 Freeman St.
Telephones: Bryant 8135—Kilpatrick 4379.
P. O. Diamond Point, N. Y. Telephone Bolton 60 F 21

THE LLOYD, Bellport, L. I.

ON THE GREAT SOUTH BAY
COOL COMFORTABLE CHARMING
ALL SPORTS
For regular guests and week-end parties
Address The Lloyd, Bellport, L. I.
Tel. Bellport 17
(Owners, D. J. & K. M. Meserole)

Lena Barish and
Sam Garlen
Former owners of
Echo Lake Tavern,
ARE NOW CONDUCTING
GREEN MANSIONS

AN ADVERTISER WRITES

". . . and I would like to add that I have had numerous responses to my ad in The Nation, and am developing a clientele who are very pleasant to deal with."

Sincerely yours,

ANN SELEY, Antiques.

SUBURBAN BOARD

CHARMING LINDEN HALL—An exceptional Colonial Home with Solarium—midst spacious grounds, for elderly women, convalescents—stressing quiet, home atmosphere, diet, kindly care, attendance. Dr. Sophie Klenk, 8818 Bayside.

MANHATTAN BEACH HOTEL, N. Y. AT the seashore. Modern; fireproof. Homelike comforts. Outdoor sports; surf bathing. 37 minutes to Times Sq. via B.M.T. Now open for Spring and Summer reservations. Rates moderate. Phone Sheepshead 3000.

DR. ELIZABETH M. BAER announces the opening of her home to any one interested in Eye Re-education. 367 Bay Ave., Patchogue, L. I.

BERKSHIRE HILLS: THE HOWLAND HOUSE, at Kent, Conn., offers a clean, quiet, restful place for vacation; airy rooms, large porches, beautiful country. All conveniences. Rate $25 per week. Booklet on request.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXV NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 20, 1927 No. 3237

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 47

EDITORIALS:
- Patriots and Patrioteers 50
- Poor Haiti! 51
- Are You a New Yorker? 51
- John Drew 52

THE PATRIOTIC RADIO TRUST. By Mauritz A. Hallgren 53

IS FRENCH CATHOLICISM GAINING GROUND? By Ida Treat 55

THE FORWARD TURN. By Mary Austin 57

COMPULSION AT DePAUW. By Ellis Cowling 59

A BIT OF RUSSIAN PATCHWORK. By Karl Borders 60

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 61

CORRESPONDENCE 62

BOOKS:
- Epitaphs. By Alfred Kreymborg 65
- That "Filthy Little Atheist." By W. E. Woodward 65
- The Story of Intolerance. By Norman Thomas 66
- Alloy. By Joseph Wood Krutch 67
- Done in the Round. By Mary Ross 68
- A German View of Grey. By William L. Langer 68
- Books in Brief 69

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTIONS:
- Industrial Exploration: I. Charting the World's Commodity Flow. By Benton Mackaye 70

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER — JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MANAGING EDITOR — LITERARY EDITOR

FREDA KIRCHWEY — MARK VAN DOREN

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

JOHN A. HOBSON — LUDWIG LEWISOHN — H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS — CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

HENRY FORD? He is an enigma still. Did he make his sudden apology to the Jewish race as a means of settling the libel suits that were piling up against him? Or in the hope of propping up an overgrown business? Or must one take at face value the amazing statement that he had just learned that the anti-Semitic campaigns of his Dearborn Independent had aroused resentment among the Jews? In any other man such naivete would be impossible. But, recalling the almost incredible simple-mindedness displayed by this billionaire on the witness-stand in the Chicago Tribune suit ten years ago, one hesitates. He has before this trusted himself and his fortune to lieutenants who proved ill-chosen, has stood by them far too long and then dropped them in cruel and impetuous disgust. The man is so remote from all accidental contact with ordinary human beings, and from the miscellaneous associations which come to literate persons through their casual reading, that it is conceivable that he did not realize to what length of race prejudice his magazine had gone or what universal disgust its blind Judeophobia had inspired. But even if one accept his plea at its face value, what is one to say? Has even an absentee owner of a magazine no responsibility whatever for its contents? That, certainly, would be carrying the doctrine of editorial freedom to lengths which even The Nation would hardly indorse. The United States courts recently condemned the editor and business manager of the New York Daily Worker to jail terms because that paper had published a poem which they, as it happened, had never seen. The Worker's puerile "poem" could not conceivably have harmed any one; the Dearborn Independent's long and reckless sowing of race bitterness has spread its poison to millions. Yet Mr. Ford, who is a billionaire, will not go to jail; and the Communist officials of the Daily Worker are serving their terms.

IS ENGLAND PLANNING A WAR against the United States? Or the United States a war against England? If not, there is no sense in the haggling at Geneva. The admirals, technical experts, and professional diplomats there assembled need to be taken by the coat collars and shaken like small boys. That might give them a new perspective. As it is, they are talking arrant nonsense which happens also to be most perniciously dangerous international dynamite. The background of the story is this: At Washington, in 1922, cruisers were limited in size to 10,000 tons and in armament to 8-inch guns, but their number was left unlimited. And, naturally, a new naval competition began. Today Great Britain has 387,410 tons of cruisers built, building, or authorized—on 304,290 of which work has begun. The United States has about 155,000 tons built, building, or authorized. Jingoes in Congress have repeatedly demanded that we match Britain's building program; and unless something is accomplished at Geneva they will repeat their demand with new ammunition. At Geneva the United States proposed that cruiser tonnage be limited to 300,000 tons, but objected to further limitation of the size of individual cruisers. Great Britain was ready for limitation in size, but not in number. Indeed, her representatives were reported to desire a "limitation" to 500,000 or 600,000 tons!

WHY? DOES GREAT BRITAIN think that she needs this vast tonnage to guard herself against Germany's unarmed merchant marine? Against France, today a third-rate naval power? Against remote Japan? Of course not; the only Power against which she could use so colossal a fleet would be the United States. It is futile to contend that she needs this armada because of her long trade routes. Holland has a long sea route to her East Indies, and gets along very well without a fraction of Britain's absurd half million tons; the United States has a world trade, too, and, exaggerated as have been our own suggestions, we demand no such quota. As naval men argue, Britain needs a vast fleet because we have a big fleet; and our own admirals will follow the same logic inevitably. Every argument advanced by Mr. Bridgeman and the British admirals at Geneva will have its echo in the American Congress next winter. We will "need" ships to match every ship they can build. And in the course of the argument American jingoes will denounce British arrogance; and British chauvinists will sing that Britannia rules the waves, and always has and always must; and Anglo-American friendship will be jarred a little more. The whole business is arrant nonsense. Geneva is proving not a conference to reduce armaments, but a conference to increase navies and to build up international hate. The admirals need harnessing.

KEVIN O'HIGGINS, shot down on his way to mass, was the "strong man" of the Irish Free State. For the Free State he had the ruthless passion which other Irishmen had felt for the Republic. To him it summed up Ireland, and no sacrifice could be too great for it. During his regime as Minister of Justice seventy-seven Republicans paid with their lives for opposition to it; and when his closest friend, Rory O'Connor, leader of the Four Courts rebellion, was sentenced to death, O'Higgins refused to let friendship soften his iron rule. Rory O'Connor died; O'Higgins sat up all night awaiting the execution, and collapsed at the last; and when O'Connor's will was opened it was found that he had left all to the man who had signed his death warrant. It was O'Higgins who fought the Government's battle in the recent Free State elections. He poke everywhere, with the wild passion of his Irish soul, convinced that the Free State's course was right. "Murderer," one listener yelled at him, with reference to the seventy-seven executions. "If necessary," he hurled back, "we will execute seventy-seven more!" He spoke for authority in Ireland, defending the oath of allegiance and the British treaty; but when he went to Geneva as Ireland's representative he was staunch in his refusal to let the London delegates speak for Ireland except as Ireland authorized. The government which he served as Vice President, and as Minister of Justice and of External Affairs, will find it hard to replace him; but his death may make it easier for De Valera's Republicans to find a basis for cooperation with the government parties.

INDIANA IS BREAKING LOOSE at last. D. C. Stephenson, former Grand Dragon of the Indiana Ku Klux Klan and political boss of the State, who, apparently, has been trying to blackmail his way out of prison, has begun to publish savory bits of evidence. Not his political associations, but an injudicious murder, got him into jail. He has begun with a canceled check indorsed by the present Governor of Indiana—part of $10,000 which he says the Klan contributed to help that gentleman into office; he follows with a statement supposedly signed by the chief of Indianapolis's detective force, promising to do certain things if and when appointed to office. Other documents are said to be forthcoming which involve Indiana's junior United States Senator. The fact that Stephenson has now allied himself with the Indianapolis Times, a Scripps-Howard paper, suggests that this time the lid may really come off.

HARRY DAUGHERTY did the country one good turn at least. We presume he was responsible for President Harding's appointment of Dr. Joseph Morton Howell as United States Minister to Egypt. At any rate, the fact that Dr. Howell began his medical practice in Harry Daugherty's home town of Washington Court House, Ohio, is the only clue to his sudden elevation to the diplomatic service in 1921. And since 1921 Dr. Howell has been continuously proving that he belonged to the shirt-sleeve rather than to the tea-cup tradition in diplomacy. He does not like the way in which Britain runs things in "independent" Egypt, and on occasion he says so. Dr. Howell is leaving the diplomatic service, and the Egyptian Temperance Association recently gave him a farewell tea. At this tea Dr. Howell devoted himself to praising prohibition in America, and concluded with a reference to "the poisons now being sold to your people."

> The matter of forcing opium and whiskey [he added] down the throats of the people unable to protect themselves by reason of treaties and legal obligations to which they are really in no wise parties, and from which they are unable, militarily or otherwise, to protect themselves, is nothing short of a crime. Such imperialism deserves the worse censure both by God and man.

One must admit that such language is undiplomatic. But it happens to be true, and we are accordingly grateful to Harry Daugherty of Washington Court House, Ohio.

"THE BELIEF THAT GAS WARFARE is devilish should be abolished," Harry N. Holmes, professor of chemistry in Oberlin College, is reported to have stated to the Institute of Chemistry. Not gas warfare is to be abolished, but the belief that it is essentially wrong and inhuman. In order to bring that about, Professor Holmes said, "it would be well worth while to drop tear gas, obnoxious but not dangerous, on a civilian population which had been given about as much warning as they would get in warfare." A city of 10,000 people should, he thinks, be provided with gas masks and instruction in how to close doors and windows for self-protection, but the actual attack should be made by our army without warning. "The protection," he adds, "might possibly be extended to horses, although this is less important." The result, he is sure, would be "a thoroughly tested [sic] conclusion as to the real merits of gas warfare." Well, we are for the test. What town of 10,000 will be first to apply for the honor and privilege of serving the flag and our beloved country and aiding the campaign for preparedness by being gassed ad lib by the Chemical Warfare Service of the army? But why stop there? Why not protect our country by first-class maneuvers along all military and naval lines? Give the artillery the right to shoot up a town of 10,000 with its huge guns, and the Naval Aviation Corps the privilege of dropping explosive bombs on a passenger liner of battleship size. How can this country be safe from attack without "thoroughly tested conclusions"?

NATIONAL TRADE BARRIERS have been denounced again, first by the Economic Conference at Geneva and then by the International Chamber of Commerce meeting at Stockholm. Just what effect all of this denouncing will have is difficult to foretell. At present it seems that economic conferences are very similar to other kinds of conferences. The same spiritual effluvia that prompt the Los Angeles Friday Morning Breakfast Association or the Illinois Undertakers Convention to pass resolutions favoring the advance of civilization seems to be at work among the economic experts. Beautiful sentiments urging tariff reductions (intended mostly for other countries) are embodied in impressive agreements. And then? Well, it is explained by the expert economic delegates that of course their own nations should not act too rapidly on the resolutions that they passed at Geneva or Stockholm. For the time being, they concede, we must be governed by practical considerations. And so, for example, in almost the same paper that announces the victory for tariff reductions at Stockholm, comes the cynical contradiction that the German tariff bill raising the duties on sugar 150 per cent, on potatoes 100 per cent, etc., has been passed; and the American tariff wall will, we suspect, continue to protect Mr. Mellon. Yet cumulatively these conferences and their resolutions must set to work on public opinion a yeast which in the end will overcome sectionalism and narrow interests.

THE EFFORT TO DECENTRALIZE INDUSTRY through the application of anti-trust laws is commonly illusory, resulting only in the creation of a string of companies with interlocking directors at added cost to the public. And when successful, "trust-busting" is likely to prove an impediment to the development of an industry along economical and progressive lines. At the same time there are certain monopolistic practices which can with great benefit to the public be attacked under our statutes against restraint of trade. The order of the Federal Trade Commission against the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation illustrates both the useless and the useful kinds of attack upon big combinations. We doubt if the ruling that these producers of motion pictures must hereafter refrain from the purchase or operation of theaters for the purpose of coercing exhibitors will have any effect. The corporation is not required to dispose of its present extensive chain of theaters and it will be exceedingly difficult to prove that any specific addition is for the purpose of coercion. On the other hand, the order which requires that the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation cease the practice of requiring exhibitors to engage films in blocks, or get none at all, is enforceable and eminently sound. The practice, probably unknown to the public previous to the order of the Federal Trade Commission, is a bit of unmitigated and outrageous gall, which obviously makes it impossible for the owner of a motion-picture house to cater to the demands of his patrons or to permit the latter to exercise any kind of influence in regard to the pictures put before them. There ought to be no difficulty in ending this impertinence, and we hope the order of the Federal Trade Commission will do it.

THE COWBOYS, or the circus men, took the hint. We suggested some weeks ago that some aspiring Senator or postmaster give the President a pair of old khaki trousers and a soft shirt in order to make his photographed fishing more verisimilitudinous. Thus far we have not read of a soft shirt or a pair of old pants upon the Presidential donation-list. But the cowboys—or the circus men—did better. They gave him a cerise silk shirt, and a green silk scarf, and a pair of chaps with magnificent fringed flanges embroidered with the sacred letters CAL. It was such an outfit as no one had ever seen less than 1,500 miles from South Dakota. (Hollywood is some 1,500 miles away.) It was good enough to be photographed all by itself; but Calvin did better—he put it on, and walked up and down, leading a horse, for an hour before the hard-working photographers. He didn't ride the horse—electric steeds still suffice him—but all dressed up and afoot he certainly added to the local color of the Black Hills. We have only one suggestion left: that next year the President make Hollywood the summer capital.

WHEN GOVERNOR YOUNG of California granted Charlotte Anita Whitney an unconditional pardon we warmly applauded his decision. We hoped that this action would be the first step toward killing the criminal-syndicalism law and similar hysterical post-war legislation. Five men are still serving penitentiary sentences in California under that law. Governor Young, by some sort of mental gymnastics, hurdled over these five men in prison and made a special case of Miss Whitney's conviction that does not seem at all reasonable. The convictions of the five men and that of Miss Whitney were part of a total of 164, all obtained in the same wave of wholesale prosecution. After studying the enforcement of this law, George W. Kirchwey, former dean of the Columbia University Law School, remarked "that the accused were, without exception, inoffensive persons; that in not a single instance were they as individuals shown to be a menace to the peace and order of the community. The defendants were scape-goats, chosen, as in the case of Miss Whitney, because of their excellent character and their purity of purpose, to expiate the sins of the people." If, as Governor Young has well said, it would be "unthinkable" to put Miss Whitney in a cell, is it not deplorable that these five men, convicted under like circumstances, should still be in the penitentiary?

ARE RHODES SCHOLARS FAILURES because they are not "running the country," but instead affect English accents and mannerisms, thus making the home folks doubtful of the merits of a foreign education? According to J. C. Beatty, holder of an Albert Kahn traveling fellowship, the Hon. A. L. Fisher of Oxford thinks that few Rhodes scholars ever become "prominent" Americans and that President Frank Aydelotte of Swarthmore is the only one who has achieved an international reputation. While an improvement in the method of selecting Rhodes men is suggested—that of apportioning scholarships according to population instead of assigning two to each State—one cannot be certain that this will insure an increased ratio of national eminence. Should the American scholar strive to balance his Oxford education and "English manner" with a hundred-per-cent American Rotary club handshake? Few Rhodes scholars are yet past forty, and Mr. Fisher might find still other reasons why they are not developing into cabinet members, heads of big business, Geneva Conference representatives, or even college presidents with international reputations. So long as the gulf between higher academic training and the approved ideal of a successful politician is what it is in America, Mr. Rhodes's dream of "Rhodes scholars running the country" remains a dream.

PARLIAMENT SOLEMN AND SOBER? Dip into Hansard and read the report of a Friday when private members introduce bills which have not received the sanction of the government. On a recent Friday afternoon Mr. Lougher brought up a bill dealing with rear lights on vehicles. This, he said, was an important subject which had "occupied the attention of successive governments for the last half century, and very properly so." Another member agreed, recalling that he had seen a van plunge into "a flock of touring cyclists," and still another extended Mr. Lougher's proposal. Sir Park Goff, however, asserted that horses, cattle, and sheep did not need rear lights tied to their tails, because these animals do not travel by night. A Mr. Lee violently challenged this statement; but Sir Park refused to budge; "they generally lie down at night with the gates shut," he shouted. The bill, one member suggested, should include rear lights for baby carriages as well as bicycles, and should be tied to the coats or skirts of pedestrians. But one proposal which would undoubtedly receive the unanimous approval of all motorists was not brought up—that the man who walked on highroads, especially at night, should be fined for walking instead of riding.

Patriots and Patrioteers

"IT is obvious," Mr. Wilbur, Secretary of the Navy, wrote to Benjamin C. Marsh, secretary of the People's Reconstruction League, "that the purpose of this meeting [a conference on How Civil Rights Have Been Suppressed to Further American Imperialism] is to promote hostility to the United States Government, and I have no desire to participate in such a conference."

And there you have in a nutshell the coward-mind of Calvin Coolidge's America. Don't criticize; don't denounce evils; be silent and let things go from bad to worse—that's patriotism, according to the Secretary of the Navy. And he is not alone. We have millions of people in this country who honestly believe that it is somehow sinful to criticize the President of the United States or the policies of his cabinet officials, and who have persuaded themselves that the men who exposed the oil scandals in President Harding's Cabinet were in some mysterious manner less patriotic than the men, like Charles Evans Hughes and Calvin Coolidge, who sat silently in the Cabinet with the scoundrels who looted and bribed, finding no occasion to express indignation.

No wonder men sneer at "politics," no wonder the word "patriotism" seems to lose its meaning, when the Michigan chapter of the Sons of the American Revolution can appoint to its Committee of Public Welfare and Defense Truman H. Newberry, who bought his way into the United States Senate in so foul-smelling a manner that he dared not keep his seat, and Edwin Denby, who as Secretary of the Navy acted as errand-boy for Messrs. Doheny and Sinclair in their oil-steals; and when the Daughters of the American Revolution, without an iota of understanding of the Spirit of '76, devotes itself to persecuting and libeling those who keep alive the tradition of these degenerate women's ancestors!

Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, honorary president of the League of Women Voters, has done a public service in issuing an open letter to the Daughters of the American Revolution charging that organization with acting as an active distributor of slander and with making "mendacious, brutal attacks upon thousands of Americans who never saw a Bolshevik in their lives." In the Woman Citizen Mrs. Catt takes up the scurrilous charges made by some of these so-called patriotic organizations against those two noble women, Jane Addams and Florence Kelley, and refutes them in detail. It is sad to think that a point-by-point refutation of such libel was necessary. Here are, perhaps, America's greatest women—and people have been found who thought it patriotic to drag their names in the mud. The D. A. R. pamphlets do not frankly state that Miss Addams and Mrs. Kelley are Bolsheviks; but they suggest and insinuate it, as do the publications of the Scabbard and Blade, that reserve officers' association which makes a profession of defaming men and women who seek to better these United States, and of other similarly defamatory "patriotic" organizations. It is only occasionally that these organizations cross the boundaries of the law of libel, though they approach them by every pathway of insinuation. More often, it is the newspapers which use their charges as texts which slip across the legal limits. The Boston Transcript has more than once found itself compelled to make amends for false charges; and a former managing editor of The Nation two years ago compelled the Chicago Tribune to make a substantial financial settlement for false and libelous statements which it had made about his activities in Mexico.

It is perhaps unfortunate that so few leaders of social reform in the United States have cared to prosecute in the courts the men and women who, under a misguided mantle of patriotism, libel and denounce them. But perhaps, on the other hand, they are right in believing that the courts can settle nothing. Back of the courts is public opinion; and what is necessary is rather a new sanification of the public mind than a punitive process against a few misled individuals. America is still haunted, in the mass, by war-time specters; conformity is still regarded as a virtue and dissent as ground for suspicion; and until this fundamental condition, which vitiates the basis of democratic government, is changed, a few libel suits against individuals will not get us far.

New and amazing outbreaks of the mob mind slip into the newspapers every week. When before in the country's history, for instance, would it have been possible for a group of veterans to protest against a war memorial which quoted the prophet Isaiah's hope that some day "Nation shall not lift sword against nation; neither shall they learn war any more," as in Plainfield, New Jersey, in recent months? Was it always possible for a sodden manufacturer to hound out of town universally liked Y. W. C. A. secretaries, as in Fort Wayne, Indiana, recently, apparently because they included discussion of hours of labor on their programs? Despite scores of such discouraging outbreaks of bigotry and mob-mindedness, however, there are as potent signs of an awakening to common sense. Plainfield did not yield to the Legion; Fort Wayne has been through an unprecedented campaign of public education; and Denver, Colorado, whose first citizen has finally been driven from his juvenile court, is awakening to a realization that Judge Lindsey is its greatest municipal asset. It is significant that Mrs. Catt, representing a relatively conservative group of women, should have been moved to her denunciation of the D. A. R.'s campaign of vilification, and that the president general of the D. A. R., instead of developing its loose charges, retired from the battlefield with the watery statement that "Mrs. Catt is just as much entitled to her opinion as I am to mine."

The Nation would, to be sure, go further even than Mrs. Catt. She contents herself with proving that Miss Addams and Mrs. Kelley are not Bolsheviks, and that the epithet "Red Rose of Anarchy," applied to Miss Rose Schneiderman of the Women's Trade Union League, was a gross misnomer. That is true enough; but what of it? Behind that argument might lie the assumption that they would have no right to speak if they were socialists, anarchists, or communists. We would maintain, with Thomas Jefferson, that there is no safety for the republic unless every honest complaint and every honest hope for change can freely be voiced. William Z. Foster, the Communist leader, seems to us far closer to the tradition of the founding fathers than H. M. Haldeman, president of the Better America Federation of California, who has just been indicted for usury. Mr. Foster is really trying to better America—according to his lights, which are not our lights—not to line his own pockets; and his course seems to us more patriotic than hushing up sordid oil or banking scandals. The way to maintain pride in the republic is constantly to hold it up to what are too lightly mouthed as the national ideals. Those who cast aspersions upon such efforts seem to us the real traitors to the spirit of the American republic.

Poor Haiti!

MESSRS. JOLIBOIS, Chauvet, Pressoir, Moravia, Liautaud, Ricourt, and Fouché, patriotic editors of Haitian newspapers, are in jail today because they dared speak out against the shackling of their country. They protested when Archbishop Caruana told newspaper reporters in Havana that President Borno, America's puppet-president, was a public-spirited citizen; and Mr. Borno gave point to their protests by promptly clapping them into jail, boldly asserting that "never in our national life was the press as free as it is today, but I will not stand for my country to be insulted in foreign lands. These men will remain in prison until I think of them again." Under the benign protection of the United States Marine Corps, President Borno can play the Mussolini role to his heart's content.

The fact is that Haiti has never known a stricter censorship than today, and with reason. For the United States is engaged in mopping up, and President Borno is supposed to do the dirty work of keeping things dark. When Franklin Roosevelt wrote a constitution for Haiti in 1916 he still suffered a bit from pre-war inhibitions. He left several loopholes. Among other things, he left the judiciary independent and in Haitian hands. Doubtless the petty Haitian judiciary is, in its way, corrupt, but it is also patriotic. When a big American landowner goes into a Haitian court today, and faces a poverty-stricken Haitian nobody, the nobody nevertheless is likely to have the best of it. And, as American land holdings in Haiti are increasing, it seems obviously desirable to change such a state of things. So the constitution is being amended.

The new constitution makes at least three important changes. Instead of guaranteeing liberty of the press—a guaranty which Mr. Borno has honored chiefly in the breach—it limits the guaranty to conditions "determined by law." Instead of providing for trial by jury in all criminal cases it limits jury trial to cases prescribed by law, and leaves interpretation of laws to the Legislature. (Since no legislative elections have been held since Smedley Butler, pistol in hand, dissolved the Haitian Senate more than ten years ago, legislative functions meanwhile being exercised by presidential appointees, this should leave Mr. Borno very comfortable.) A further constitutional change provides that the President shall appoint all judges except justices of the peace, and that he may remove even his own appointees for cause. This provision is important in its effect upon land titles, particularly American-held titles, which hitherto have suffered in the Haitian courts and now seem assured of due respect. Since Haiti has had only the most irregular system of title registration, this system of presidentially appointed judges to pass upon all land claims should achieve marvellous results. Still another constitutional change extends the normal presidential term from four to six years, and provides that a president may not be reelected after ten years in office. Mr. Borno's term expires in 1930, but, as he will then have served only eight years, this permits him to retain the office until 1936.

Behind all this constitutional patchwork lies the shadow of the sixty-year concession in the Artibonite valley granted to former United States Representative Rodenberg of Illinois. Supposedly it is for the development of water power; and there has been talk of rubber plantations there; but rumors are current in Haiti that it also includes oil lands. It is of no value unless a large number of land claims can be adjudicated satisfactorily to the American concessionaires.

One of the newspapers whose editor is now in jail has claimed that the "annulment of titles which will be made by order of the American Occupation will convey the lands of the peasants to the National Board of Survey and then the Occupation will give them to Mr. Rodenberg." Here lies the explanation of the mass imprisonment of Port-au-Prince's editors, and of President Borno's cavalier declaration that they shall stay in jail until he happens to think of them again. At root, as in all Haiti's recent misery, the interests of United States capitalists are responsible.

Was it for such dirty business that the Marines were brought back from Nicaragua to their old quarters in Haiti? Has the American conscience been so deadened by marine-corps publicity that there will be no stout protest against such bullyragging of a helpless little nation? Is there no voice in America, save those of Haiti's old-times friends like Senators King and Borah, to demand that these things shall stop? Here, rather than in Europe, America's good name is most vitally at stake.

Are You a New Yorker?

BEFORE answering this question the reader is entitled to ask another: What is a New Yorker? There are as many answers to that as people in the metropolis, but there has never been a better one than in the testimony which has been brought out by Charles H. Tuttle, United States Attorney, in his inquiry into the methods of selling theater tickets. The typical New Yorker is there revealed, the person who makes the city what it is, who accepts it as it is, who leads its life and reflects its attitude, in distinction from stray individuals who live in the city more or less indefinitely, without ever belonging to it or wanting to.

For the typical New Yorker is a theater-goer. He plays at least as hard as he works, and among all his pleasures one of the most popular and strenuous is play-going. New York, as everybody knows, is the country's theatrical heart. More and more it is coming to be pretty nearly the country's complete theatrical circulatory system as far as the drama—as distinguished from motion pictures and vaudeville—goes. Yet the theaters presenting the talked-of plays are always crowded. Unlike the situation elsewhere in this country or in Europe, it is rarely possible to go to a theater just before a performance and obtain satisfactory—or even any—seats. Prudent persons don't try to. They know they must make arrangements in advance. But how? The privilege of reserving seats by telephone, to be paid for before the performance, was cut off several years ago. Even when one spends from one to two hours' time, some days in advance, in a personal visit to the theater box-office he often finds poor picking.

Query: Who has the seats? Answer: The theater ticket agencies. These establishments handle tickets for most of the important theaters. They rose to power a few years ago as a means of supplanting the old nuisance of the sidewalk ticket scalper with whom the theaters had formerly worked hand in glove. The new ticket broker was supposed to usher in a reform. Theater-goers were no longer to be gouged ad lib by irresponsible parties. The ticket agents were to charge a uniform fee of fifty cents above the box-office price on each ticket. It was an exorbitant commission—about 20 per cent—but for the typical New Yorker, who thinks he must see every show touted by the press or his friends in its first two weeks, it was better than scrambling for oneself.

Yet it appears that even an exorbitant commission has not been enough for the ticket agencies. The irresponsible sidewalk ticket scalper, who gouged the public in hit-and-miss fashion, has been dispossessed by a responsible, established, experienced blackjacker and stick-up man who has raised banditry on the Rialto to occupy the place of a fine art.

It seems that a party of Washington officials while on a visit last winter to New York were charged what they regarded as excessive prices for some theater tickets. They wondered if the theater ticket agents were paying income taxes on all this velvet, and Mr. Tuttle was induced to make an inquiry. The inquiry has answered the question of the Washington officials in the negative. But it has done far more.

It has proved again the dictum of O. Henry that New York City is the world's best market for the sale of gold bricks; it has shown that the whole process of distributing theater tickets is, in the words of Mr. Tuttle, "honeycombed with lying graft"; it has laid bare a cross-section of the spine of the typical New Yorker and revealed it to be as devoid of bone as a cockroach.

In his absurd hallucination that he must see every play touted by the press or his friends within the first two weeks, and only from a front seat in the orchestra, the typical New Yorker has made possible victimization to an almost incredible extent. The facts brought out by Mr. Tuttle disclose that the first fourteen rows of the orchestra go en masse to the ticket agents and that the latter not only graft off the public but in turn are grafted upon by the men in the box offices. A representative of the Erlanger organization testified that in addition to a salary of $300 a week he averaged about $350 from ticket agents for seeing that they got good seats. In other words the public is paying one inconsequential cog in the theatrical world about $35,000 a year for the privilege of having its pockets picked. And there are scores of others.

What, then, is a New Yorker? One concludes that he is a person who delights to pay through the nose not only for favors but for ordinary rights; who puts his pleasures before his principles (if any); who can be mulcted without retaliation or even protest. Away from home the New Yorker boasts glibly of the wonders of his city. Within its walls he is a supine invertebrate who is bossed and bullied, hounded and herded, humbugged and sandbagged by anyone with a uniform, a flashy tie, or a loud voice; and his utmost repercussion is to go home and scold his wife or kick the dog.

John Drew

THE death of John Drew removes one of the most popular actors from the American stage and closes a long career which had entertained several generations of playgoers. Though he was born to the stage he did not play his first part until, at the age of twenty, he appeared with his parents in Philadelphia in 1873. Tardy as this debut was for one raised in the profession, it did not prevent him from spanning with his career more than one epoch of dramatic history.

His earliest role was in one of the old-fashioned farcical after-pieces; some twenty years later he passed on to Daly's famous company when it was making its first successes with translations from the German; he helped to popularize Pinero and Sutro; and he achieved the last of his important successes in one of the ultra-sophisticated comedies of Maugham. But the length of his career is even more strikingly illustrated by the fact that three generations furnished him with leading women. In the days of his earliest successes he played opposite Ada Rehan, later opposite Maude Adams in Louis N. Parker's "Rosemary," and in "My Wife" he helped Billie Burke to fame. Long after Ada Rehan was dead and after the other two had retired, he was still concealing his age under a suavity and grace of manner that made him seem always young.

Drew had, of course, his limitation, and the roles he played were always light. His Petruccio was famous. But it was in modern high comedy that his talents shone most brightly and he was at his best in plays that required chiefly a fashionable ease of manner. The oft-quoted witticism which credited him with "behaving" upon the stage instead of acting had a certain truth, and he made no attempt to portray the passions. Booth Tarkington once said of him that he would make Simon Legree into a misunderstood gentleman and certainly gentlemen, misunderstood or not, were his metier. No one entered a drawing-room or handled a tea-cup better than he. Urbanity radiated from him, and wit, particularly of the sort which is characterized by a gentle worldliness, seemed to receive an added polish as it passed through his lips.

In one respect he was not entirely fortunate. It so happened that, during the latter part of his career at least, the greatest plays were not of the drawing-room sort; and he was not identified with any of the classics of the modern theater. An age which found its truest expression in social comedy would have provided more opportunities to display his talents at their best and yet, even as it was, he managed to make certain minor pieces more delightful than they otherwise would have been. Thanks in part to him, such plays as, for example, Haddon Chambers's "The Tyranny of Tears" were wholly delightful and he kept alive a tradition of comedy, polite and yet edged, which no one else could interpret so well. In them his style was the exact antithesis of that which is commonly referred to as of "the old school." His manner was conversational to the last degree and he carried to its uttermost possible limits the ideal of naturalistic acting. No one ever made art seem less artificial. He seemed always to enter the stage as though he were entering a private room and one always had the impression that one was merely overhearing by accident what he was saying to his friends. Certainly no actor has spanned more successive generations of friends than John Drew, or will be more generally missed.

The Patriotic Radio Trust

By MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

I

WHO Shall Control the Air? asked Morris L. Ernst in The Nation for April 21, 1926. The only intelligible answer thus far has come in the form of a hearty guffaw from the Radio Trust; why speak of controlling the air when I own the air? Why speak of governmental supervision of broadcasting (to protect your sacred free speech) when I have a complete monopoly on the manufacture and sale of broadcasting apparatus in this country and when I am on the verge of getting a stranglehold on the manufacture of receiving sets? Why worry about broadcasting permits when no one can set up a broadcasting station without first buying equipment from me and at my terms? I developed wireless broadcasting (as a patriotic duty, by the way); it is mine and I intend to keep it.

The Radio Trust climbed to its glory in a simple manner. It rounded up and pooled all but an insignificant handful of the 800 American wireless patents, including fifteen or sixteen basic patents upon which are founded all sending and receiving devices now manufactured. These patents were made available to the members of the trust under what has become known as the cross-licensing system. Rights in almost all British, German, French, Dutch, and other European patents were acquired at the same time. Further maneuvers gave the trust a virtual monopoly on the radio-engineering talent of the country so that today the individual members operate mammoth research laboratories, spend millions of dollars annually, employ hundreds of engineers, the fruits of whose labors, by means of another pooling arrangement, become the property of the trust as a whole.

This gigantic research machine is devoted primarily to the task of keeping outsiders from penetrating the monopoly with revolutionary inventions. Occasionally the machine makes really worthwhile contributions to the radio art, but for the most part it turns out inventions which are duly patented but rarely used except when it becomes necessary to sue an unsuspecting outsider for infringing upon a patent he never knew existed. Small wonder, then, that the Radio Trust controls broadcasting and, with the British Marconi Company, transoceanic wireless communications.

In its regulation-hampered way the Federal Trade Commission is at present unearthing ripe and pertinent facts concerning the radio combination, but even as it does so the trust bowls heedlessly along. The strongest of the independents, the Atwater Kent Company of Philadelphia, still defies the trust and at last reports was arming itself for a life and death struggle in the courts.

The Radio Corporation of America, nucleus of the trust, was incorporated October 17, 1919, for the purpose of engaging in public radio-communication service on land and sea and in the business of buying and selling radio apparatus. Five days later the General Electric Company, parent of the Radio Corporation, brought the first patents into the fold by purchasing the assets of the Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company of America. These assets included rights in all present and future British Marconi patents. The purchase price was 2,000,000 shares each of the common and preferred stock of the Radio Corporation, which went to the British Marconi, owner of the American Marconi Company. Thus British Marconi entered the Radio Trust. The General Electric received as its compensation 135,174 shares of the preferred Radio Corporation stock and 2,000,000 common shares. The following month the Radio Corporation entered into an agreement with British Marconi for the conduct of transoceanic radio traffic. On the same day, November 20, the General Electric brought its own patents into the pool, granting the Radio Corporation a license to use and sell apparatus for radio purposes under all patents, present and future, owned or controlled by the General Electric. In return the General Electric was licensed to make such apparatus as the Radio Corporation's patents might cover.

An agreement dated July 1, 1920, provided for the exchange of patent rights between the General Electric and the American Telephone and Telegraph Company. In general terms, the telephone company was to make and sell broadcasting equipment and the General Electric receiving apparatus for non-commercial purposes. A second agreement of the same date tied up these two concerns with the Radio Corporation and the telephone company's subsidiary, the Western Electric Company. Then, on March 7, 1921, while the trust was angling for the Westinghouse patents, another though minor link was forged in the radio chain. This was the United Fruit Company, which, through the Tropical Radio Telegraph Company, had been operating a wireless system of its own down on the Caribbean. The Wireless Specialty Apparatus Company, a protege of United Fruit was, with its patents, brought in at the same time.

The Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company acquired control of the patents and assets of the International Radio Telegraph Company when the latter was reorganized May 22, 1920. Thirteen months later, June 13, 1921, the Westinghouse extended its rights under the Armstrong-Pupin patents to the General Electric. On June 30 there was a general exchange by the Westinghouse of patent rights with other members of the combination and the same day saw the sale to the Radio Corporation of all patents, licenses under patents, as well as other assets, of the International Radio Company in return for a million shares each of common and preferred Radio Corporation stock. After this the trust busied itself with picking up loose ends. In September, 1922, the Radio Corporation organized the Federal Telegraph Company of Delaware for the purpose of taking over the agreement which the Federal Telegraph Company of California had reached with the then existing Chinese Government for the erection of several broadcasting stations. The deal also provided for an exchange of patent rights between the California company and the trust-owned Delaware company. The last important group of patents, those of the Radio Engineering Company of New York, came in on March 14, 1923, although several others have since been acquired.

Besides arranging for the cross-licensing of patents, these and other agreements provide for the exchange of technical and research information between the various members of the trust, and to make it increasingly difficult for outsiders or "non-licensees" to intrude upon the monopoly still other agreements place severe restrictions on the uses to which trust products may be put. The Radio Corporation apparatus, for example, may be sold to competing companies for shore-to-ship or ship-to-shore communication, but must not be resold or used for tolls and, other things being equal, the Radio Corporation must be given preference in routing business transmitted by such apparatus.

The principal members of the combination, except the telephone company, have been continuously represented on the Radio Corporation's board of directors.

II

Although it has already gathered several thick volumes of testimony on the radio question, the Federal Trade Commission is still struggling with the problem, and indications are that it will not be ready to conclude its hearings, which were started in October, 1925, before the end of another year. Then, if the commission finds that the Radio Trust has been engaging in unfair methods of competition, the battle will in all likelihood be transferred to the courts, there to drag on for many years. The hearings thus far have brought out the contention by representatives and witnesses for the combination that the Radio Corporation of America, the heart of the trust, was organized purely as a patriotic venture. The Radio Corporation itself asserted that it "was created primarily with a motive of carrying on, and it has since carried on, a patriotic service of making a world-wide communication system of radio in which the most important influence rests in the United States of America and with American citizens." The General Electric unburdened itself of the declaration that "the Radio Corporation of America was created in order to carry out the expressed desires and wishes of the United States, communicated by its officers and servants."

During the war with Germany, according to the picture witnesses for both sides have sketched, the Navy Department controlled almost all the wireless facilities in the United States. Under Navy direction a wide-flung system of radio communication was developed, some research work carried on, and many wireless patents collected. At the close of the war the Navy was required to dispose of the radio property it had acquired or developed and to abandon a great part of its communication system. Most of the patents found their way into the Radio Trust pool and the communication system was turned over to the Radio Corporation, which, according to a patent lawyer on the stand for the trust, was organized for that purpose; indeed, it "was practically the order of the Navy Department" that the step be taken. The Navy went even further by lending Rear Admiral W. H. G. Bullard, director of naval communications, to the corporation, and he sat in as a member of its board of directors throughout its first years.

The patriotic touch is suggested in other places in the testimony. It was necessary, for example, to have the control of transoceanic radio traffic in American hands to save valued messages of the United States from the "possible espionage" of foreign countries, most of the cable systems being under alien domination. Moreover, some of the foreign cable companies had knowingly held up American commercial orders to give business houses in their own countries the opportunity of making more favorable bids for these orders; this could be remedied by an American-controlled radio system.

The prize testimony was that revealing the existence of a radio Monroe Doctrine for South America. The four big radio companies of the world, the American Radio Corporation, British Marconi, German Telefunken, and French T. S. F., it was related by Albert G. Davis of the General Electric staff, created a separate company to handle all wireless communications with South America. These firms invested equal amounts of capital in the new company and each was given two places on its board, but a ninth director, to act as chairman, was to be named by the Radio Corporation. This ninth director, Davis said, was given the power of veto over any action taken by the board "and . . . no affirmative action [was] to be taken over the veto of this American, it being the idea that the Monroe Doctrine was a negative doctrine rather than a positive one and that it was the carrying out of that doctrine if we had an American who had power to prevent things being done in South America." Later he explained that because of this arrangement "no foreign group is in a position to use wireless facilities in South America to promote its selfish national interests."

In South America, as in China, the Radio Corporation has appeared on the scene as an alien invader, a bit of exploitation to which neither the Chinese nor the South Americans could resort in the United States. The Radio Act of 1927 specifically provides that no broadcasting station license shall be granted to any organization or company which has an alien on its board of directors or in any of its executive positions or to any company "of which more than one-fifth of the capital stock may be voted by aliens." Great Britain, Japan, and Denmark protested against the Radio Corporation's invasion of China, but so far as public records reveal no one in South America has objected to its intrusion there.

Further evidence of the Government's godfatherly attitude toward the trust is found in the testimony of Emil J. Simon, prominent radio engineer of Cleveland, Ohio, and erstwhile associate of Lee De Forest. He declared that although his company had supplied the Navy with wireless apparatus before the war, since then, or rather since the formation of the Radio Corporation, it had not been awarded one contract. "In the majority of cases my bid was lower," he said, and yet the contracts went to his competitors, General Electric, Westinghouse, and Western Electric. "The reason given," he continued, "was that Government officials considered the apparatus of the other companies to be superior . . . although in each case I had agreed to supply apparatus that fully met the specifications of the Government."

Other testimony by this witness weakened another of the trust's props. The trust contends that the Radio Corporation was entirely responsible for the development of broadcasting, in fact, that broadcasting was unknown before it entered the field. Simon, however, asserted that in 1910, a decade before the trust came into being, De Forest broadcast from the stage of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York the operas "Pagliacci" and "Cavalleria Rusticana" and that he, Simon, was aboard a Royal Mail liner at sea and heard the operas. He added that "the reception was excellent." Incidentally, in a public address on April 30, Admiral Bullard said that "the Navy Department was really the first practical broadcaster in this country."

III

What can be done about the Radio Trust? It can be allowed, of course, to drift along as at present on its good behavior, though modern-day combinations have shown no greater regard for the public welfare than the trusts of yesterday. Certainly the combination, by pooling its engineering talent, has not contributed enough to science or even to its own industry to outweigh the disadvantages imposed upon the public in the way of stifled competition, control of an important class of communications, and possession of arbitrary power to increase prices on its goods. The technical and scientific advance made by the trust has been one of volume rather than quality, more than half of the existing basic radio patents having resulted from individual efforts made before the trust was created.

Piecemeal supervision of the radio industry might serve to keep the trust in check. Separate laws could be passed to break up the system of cross-licensing of patents, to require patent holders either to put their patents to definite and practical use or surrender them to the Government, and to abolish the restrictions now placed by the trusts on the uses of its products. The Federal Trade Commission could prevent unreasonable price boosting by breaking up the monopoly on the manufacture and sale of radio equipment. The commission could also insist upon an open and unrestricted market for the purchase of broadcasting apparatus. The Federal Radio Commission could act to divorce the trust from its connections with telephone and telegraph companies as required by the radio act. The Interstate Commerce Commission could prevent the combination from making unjust discriminations. These things and more could be done, but at best they would be lacking in co-ordination and definite direction. The only other apparent solution is to place the entire industry and radio system under unified control.

The Navy Department did a pretty good job of controlling wireless during the World War, both in giving efficient service and in promoting the science of radio communication. The radio act provides that the President may take over the entire radio system in case of another war. If the Government is deemed competent to operate the radio system in the confusing circumstances which attend all wars, why could it not do as well in time of peace? Moreover, even now the Navy is transmitting press and commercial messages in certain sections of the world for American organizations and citizens. Perhaps the Navy Department would not, for various reasons, be the department to which public radio communications should be entrusted. Other technicalities might prevent the Post Office Department from extending its present jurisdiction over certain classes of communications to include wireless. The importance of the radio question loomed large enough before Congress, however, to inspire the creation of the Federal Radio Commission. This body is essentially concerned only with the broadcasting situation. But having made this start, why not go the whole hog by extending the commission's authority to embrace supervision of wireless patents, regulation of the manufacture and sale of broadcasting and receiving equipment, and absolute control of radio communications, wireless telephony, and the broadcasting of electric power?

The Catholic "Renaissance" in France

By IDA TREAT

Paris, June 9

THERE is considerable talk today about the "Renaissance" of Catholicism in France. The discussion is by no means confined to the ranks of the faithful who yearn for the repentant return of the "elder daughter of the Church" after a century of exile among the riotous husks of anti-clericalism. Even the dyed-in-the-wool Radicals, the time-honored mangeurs de curés, murmur with anxiety and alarm that anti-clericalism itself, the principal plank in the Radical Party platform, shows signs of becoming worm-eaten and threatens to collapse.

Catholicism, in any event, stands today in the limelight. The unprejudiced layman—and the fact that such exist in increasing numbers is in itself a sign of the times—sees on every hand evidence that the tension between Catholics and non-Catholics has temporarily relaxed, a phenomenon without precedent since the "laic laws" were voted a quarter of a century ago.

It may be argued with a show of truth that the present cessation of hostilities represents a temporary truce based entirely on political considerations, and that its longevity depends on the fortunes of the Poincaré-Briand Government and the fluctuations of the foreign policy of the Quai d'Orsay. But, judging by the present, there is no lack of proof in many quarters that the "frères ennemis" have for the time being laid down their arms.

To those who are acquainted with the old spirit of intolerance on the part of anti-clerical France for anything that remotely resembled Catholic propaganda, the utilization of the radio for Catholic broadcasting represents an astonishing concession. Nowadays the non-churchgoers have their Sunday lunch hour enlivened by sermons delivered by prominent Jesuit fathers against a charming background of Bach and Palestrina, broadcast from the station of the Tour Eiffel. The innovation did bring forth a mild protest from the non-Catholic press, coupled with the suggestion that if Catholic sermons are to be tolerated, they should at least be supplemented by those of Jewish rabbis and Protestant pastors—a suggestion which apparently fell on deaf ears, for the Catholic fathers continue to enjoy a monopoly of the radio and throughout Lent, in addition to the customary Sunday morning service, the vesper sermons of the eloquent Père Sanson were broadcast from Notre Dame.

At the same time, the subject appears to have invaded the field of letters. The discussion over the nature of "pure poetry" has brought into special prominence the figure of the Abbé Brémond, former Jesuit and member of the French Academy. That learned body, by choosing Monseigneur Baudrillart, rector of the Université Catholique, as its representative to America, gave recent proof that anti-clericalism does not thrive beneath the dome of the Immortals. The return to Catholicism of the former group of the Nouvelle Revue Française—Jacques Copeau and the late Jacques Riviére—is already history. Jacques Maritain and the néo-Thomistes have recruited certain elements of the older-young literature, with Jean Cocteau and his friends, whose somewhat spectacular conversion was celebrated last year by the publication of two volumes of "Letters" in appropriately rose-pink covers.

The political activity of the various Catholic organizations, and particularly the Féderation Nationale Catholique under the direction of that staunch patriot, General de Castelnau, began to take definite shape in the years that followed the War. In France, as in other countries, the nationalizing of God and the Church during war-time had placed French Catholicism in strict alliance with the nationalistic parties—the Right and the Extreme Right. The role played by the "fighting curés" during the conflict intensified this position and at the same time gained for the Church and its representatives a certain degree of popular favor. When the Viviani Government voted in 1914 to suspend temporarily all measures concerning the enforcement of the "lois laiques" it paved the way for the return of the exiled religious orders, many of which came quietly and unofficially back to France, from Belgium and from the Near East, during the years that followed. When hostilities ended, the Catholic Right felt that the moment had come for a direct attack on the obnoxious laic laws and in fact on the whole religious policy of the government.

The renewal of diplomatic relations with the Vatican constituted the first important step in this direction—a victory easily won, it being an open secret that th elections of both Deschanel and Millerand to the presidency had been assured by Catholic elements rallied by the promise of a papal ambassador. Encouraged by this first success, the Catholic organizations with the Féderation Nationale and the D.R.A.C.—Ligue pour le Droit des Religieux Anciens Combattants—in the lead, staged all over France and particularly in Brittany and the Vendée immense popular demonstrations against the "infamous laic laws;" they placarded the country with posters demanding the return of the religious orders "whose loyalty to France was proved during the war," proclaiming that "la liberté se prend" and that "unjust laws should not be obeyed." Catholic bishops openly encouraged local priests to brave expulsion by refusing to pay rent; others threatened to excommunicate the purchasers of former Church property. Propaganda sheets from the dispossessed orders insisted that their former holdings be restored and demanded the repeal of the 1904 law which robbed them of the opportunity to teach. The problem of applying the laic laws to Alsace-Lorraine where the religious orders had enjoyed a privileged situation under German rule furnished a fresh source of agitation. In March, 1925, the assembly of French bishops and cardinals gave out a statement which represented a veritable declaration of war against the laws of separation. Never since 1904 had the antagonism between the French Church and the French Government appeared more apparent.

But this is an age of Internationals. At the moment when the tension between the Catholic Nationalists and the cartel government seemed strained to the breaking point Rome made its first spectacular intervention in French home affairs. The papal nuncio, Monseigneur Cerretti, disavowed publicly at Notre Dame and in the name of the Holy See the inopportune declaration of the French bishops. The Briand Government had found a new ally. This brusque substitution of papal diplomacy for the warlike tactics of the Catholic Nationalists inserted an entering wedge between the Church and its Nationalist supporters, particularly those of the Extreme Right who had hoped to utilize the anti-clerical question as a means for furthering their own political ends.

To those who have followed the development of the international policy of the Vatican since the war there is nothing surprising or paradoxical in the recent manifestations of this policy in France. Even before the papal encyclical of 1922 had claimed for the international action of the Church the "imposing consecration of centuries" and had aroused the wrath of French conservatives by the much-disputed phrase concerning the "artificial peace," it was evident that the Vatican had learned the lesson of the war: that nationalism in its strictest sense is the enemy of the Church international. When the newly appointed nuncio, Monseigneur Maglione, celebrated his arrival in Paris last winter by an official declaration in favor of Locarno, there was no longer any doubt that the Church had decided to link its destinies in France, as in Germany, with the elements composing the Center—the "anti-clerical" government of the Man of Locarno, Aristide Briand.

This meant, of course, a split with the Extreme Right. It came in the form of the condemnation of the Royalists of l'Action Française—the extremists of the extreme—ostensibly for sins "against morality and the faith." Both League and newspaper were placed under the ban. That this was a political offensive has escaped no one, least of all l'Action Française, today the most "anti-clerical" paper in France. Docile in appearance at first, the Royalists are now resisting with all their might; and there is a certain humor in the sight of these former champions of the Church attacking the chiefs of Catholicism at home and abroad and denouncing with their habitual virulence the unwarranted intrusion of a "foreign power" (sic) in home affairs!

But Rome is no mean adversary. After the Index the Holy Penitentiary has come into action. No absolution for the unrepentant Ligueurs; no admission to the sacraments; exclusion from Catholic organizations. In a word, excommunication awaits all those who refuse to abandon the Royalist group. And these are not empty threats, for some weeks ago the Archbishop of Rouen refused to sit on the same platform with an ex-admiral and prominent Royalist during the dedication of a war memorial. The Bishop of Bordeaux has suspended a Gironde priest—former Carthusian monk and war veteran with many medals—because of his political opinions. Three young Royalists who sold copies of l'Action Française one Sunday after mass in the square of the Cathedral at Meaux were startled by the sudden appearance of the Archbishop himself in pomp and vestments, who proceeded to excommunicate the "public sinners."

On the surface the Royalists still appear to be holding their own. But there is little doubt that a large per cent of their sympathizers who have no taste for martyrdom will end by giving in to Rome. In the meantime the old enemies of l'Action Française, anti-clericals and moderate Catholics alike, "boivent du lait," as they say in France. The Poincaré-Briand Government also has reasons for satisfaction; the opposition at the Right is temporarily disposed of. And at what price? Here it may be well to quote Cardinal Gasparri. "Thus—by suppressing l'Action Française—" states the eminent churchman in an open letter to the Archbishop of Aix, "we will obtain the union of all true Catholics. And thanks to this union we may hope if not for the repeal at least for the amendment of the impious laic laws which are working the desolation of France."

A "union of all true Catholics"—that is to say, the regrouping of French Catholics in a unified political body which will join forces with the Radicals of the defunct Cartel Left to create a new Bloc d'Union Nationale at the Center in view of the 1928 elections. This union of Catholics and anti-clericals, in a strong political Center, with a platform of mutual concessions and a common home and foreign policy—stabilization and Locarno—carries with it the elimination of the parties of opposition. The Church having disposed of l'Action Française, the Communists are now the object of a vigorous governmental offensive, launched a few weeks ago by Sarraut, Minister of the Interior, in an address at Constantine.

In the meantime, Marc Sagnier and the Catholic democrats have come into their own. Their congress in April at Bierville grouped anti-clericals and Catholics, Frenchmen, Germans, and other foreign representatives in the interests of international peace. In a recent meeting in Paris, organized by the Committee of Action for the Society of Nations and presided over jointly by Professor Aulard, historian and anti-clerical, and Monseigneur Julian, Bishop of Arras, an impressive number of priests and laymen celebrated the ideals of "peace and democracy" in an atmosphere of concord and reconciliation which found its most striking expression in the speech of M. Aulard. "A great force has risen in the world," said this time-honored foe of the Church, "a force for peace, a moral force . . . the Catholic Church."

The Church in France has the wind in its sails. Politically speaking, its position is more favorable than it has been for years. That it has already attracted a certain intellectual elite cannot be disputed, nor that it continues to draw upon certain categories of the youth of the middle class. At a time when temporal power appears to totter and the old forms of society show signs of disintegration, it is normal that the more conservative elements through fear of revolution or loss of faith in social progress, who often appear to confuse religion and political order, turn to the Church, its organization and traditions, as toward a factor of stability. The Church in France, thanks to the policy of Rome, is today in a situation that should prove fertile for religious propaganda. But until the effects of that propaganda are visible in the mass of French citizens —indifferent as yet if not frankly hostile—there can be no definite or durable "Renaissance" of Catholicism.

The Forward Turn

By MARY AUSTIN

Though ye have lien among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold.—Ps. 68:13.

EVERY accentuation of a great social movement such as came to a crisis in the granting of votes to women will have its characterizing trait. In this case, the notation of the advanced-woman movement has been sex antagonism. Without visible ancestry, the cry of votes for women, toward the last quarter of the last century, became tinged with acrimony, a feeling of resistance to and rasped resentment against the prevailing attitude of men toward women. No such color can be discovered in the recorded words of the great women leaders, Susan B. Anthony, Frances Willard, Anna Howard Shaw; maiden ladies all, and according to a popular myth of the period, more susceptible than not to such antagonisms. What actually animated these women was a conviction of human injustice in the part allotted to women in the social scheme, a conviction of social inutility. To discover why there sprang up among the hosts of their adherents a sense of being ranked against men as men, of being pitched for battle, we shall have to go back of the leaders of organized propaganda to the obscure beginnings of whatever it was in the deeps of American womankind to make them suffragists at all.

Too much has been made of the long rankling injustice of woman's position in the nineteenth century and earlier. Too little of that injustice was intended as such or can be historically traced to male initiative, to have become legitimately the source of widespread resentment. What every honest feminist now knows is that they simply seized upon existing injustices, sought them out, and flourished them as so many excuses for entitling them to what they so ardently wanted, a working partnership in social affairs. The true root of nineteenth-century feminism is to be found at the source of the feminine appetite for large-scale social participation and the new-found conviction of American women that they were abundantly equal to the execution of their growing aspiration. It is to be found in the two hundred years' history of the democratization of women.

In the beginning of the American experiment females were ranked as either women or ladies, according to the economic standing of their nearest male relatives. But in the United States, where every man was theoretically as good as every other, every wife found herself morally obliged to become a lady as speedily as possible. And since, under pioneer conditions, she had also to perform all the traditional tasks of womankind, largely with her own hands, the situation called forth and extended to the uttermost all the stored energies of the female line. She was a poor creature indeed who by the middle of the century could not scrub and bake and spin and rear her young and be ready on occasion also to present herself as the lady of the house. This immense stimulation of organizing and executive ability among American women, which had received a sharp fillip in the exigencies of the Civil War, in which women played an unprecedented part, whetted both the appetite and the conviction of competence, for which women as a class suddenly demanded satisfaction. And women when they want a thing, far exceed men in the immediacy of their demand and the cogency of their reasons for it.

There was a time, between the end of the Civil War and the appearance of a definitely popular suffrage party, when the forward turn might have taken almost any character. That the various springs of advanced movement coalesced in the effort to secure the vote for women was, in a large measure, due to the fact that Americans had not yet convinced themselves of the futility of political action as a means of realizing some of their dearest aims, so that the vote remained for women, as it had been at the founding for men, a covering symbol of the coveted equality of opportunity. From the literature of that time it is easy to discover that women wanted, and men feared to concede, many things other than the right to participate in general elections and office-holding. Frances Willard wanted so many things that her work as a suffrage leader has been obscured by the struggle for the abolition of strong drink which she precipitated. As one brought up in her train, and taking from her many unconscious lines of direction, I know that prohibition was only the most immediate of her partisanships, and not the all-saving measure it later became to her disciples. Frances Willard was one of those virgins who, by the clean excision of all personal sex persuasions, were released to its larger, socialized aspects in a vision so wide and filled with light that it passed almost entirely beyond the perception of her monumental following. It was not until one was brought into direct contact with the "advanced" sex attitude of pre-war radicalism that one discovered it to be mere muddled groping, compared to what Frances Willard had so intuitively known and intelligently clarified about the time when H. G. Wells and G. B. Shaw were occupied with the contents of nursing bottles. Miss Willard not only knew what she was about but she was past mistress of the art of setting other feet in the way to it, even though they knew not at all whither it led. For women who, like our mothers, feared to tread where they longed, she had a little sacred charm—no other than the text I have set at the head of this essay—weighted with all the power of secret longing and the authority of Holy Writ. I recall as though it were yesterday when my mother's turn came to be shown this mystery, after which it was a foregone conclusion that if my mother's daughter did not cover her own feathers with fine gold, she at least would not lie among the pots.

Miss Willard taught her followers by the hundred thousand to work for suffrage as a means to the larger ends; and there is strong presumptive evidence that the quarrel between the radical and conservative wings of the organized suffrage groups, as to which of them really called the turn to victory, will eventually be settled in favor of the members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union; those deeply convinced, unadvertised small-town women who, more than any group of women in the world, were able to consolidate the consent of their sons and husbands in favor of votes for women.

One wonders, however, if the women who served on sanitary commissions and belonged to the first Prohibition Party would have agreed on suffrage as the main issue had they realized that among their daughters would develop the sex antagonism that sharpened the conflict to its conclusions, and among their granddaughters the sex revolt which has given rise to the exasperated speculation as to whether any younger generation was ever so abandoned as this one. But such a sequence was both logical and predictable, for the advanced thought on the related sex problems of that period was not only of incredible boldness, it was of an innocence so incorrigible that its final implications were missed even by its own prophets.

No mistake that our intelligentsia has made in interpreting our immediate American past has contributed so much to their own obfuscation as that of imputing studied hypocrisy to the sex conventions of the period in which our present revolt from those conventions took its rise. Except of course as hypocrisy plays its part in all social conventions, American women, at the period of which I write, in their progressive conquest of the material environment of marriage, had mastered every one of its implications except the one which involved them in the ever-recurrent, hopelessly inescapable expectancy of maternity. Marriage, for them, still meant children and the demanding, unremitting maternal care unrealizable by the present age of nickel-plated sanitation, prophylactics, and anti-toxins. As for the medical science of that time, it served rather to enlarge the borders of apprehension. Literature of the day makes it plain that women were awake to the pitiful implications of a second child crowding on the nursling years of the first, of the tragic possibilities involved in bearing children to diseased or dissolute husbands, of continuing a defective strain the very existence of which was concealed from the young parents under taboos imposed by the terrible innocent ignorance of the Victorian years, and all this before there was any admitted discussion of possible relief. So overshadowed was marriage in that age by the certainty of children that those of us who attained to college educations did so too often under the maternal admonition: "But, of course, I shall expect that you won't throw it all away on some man!" And in the use of the word man in that connection lay the determining implication.

In those late nineteenth-century decades all the disabilities of excessive child-bearing were charged up to the horrid appetites of the husband. Not only did the current phrases of birth control and contraceptives not come into use until the women of the pioneer suffrage generations were past being interested in them, but nobody, positively nobody, had yet suggested that women are passionately endowed even as men are; not good women! That sexual desire was something to which God in His inscrutable wisdom had sacrificed all women, was so certainly believed by my mother's generation that it was never even successfully camouflaged by preachers and teachers with blague about the sanctity of motherhood. But my own generation still lacked even a vocabulary by which measures of escape could be intelligently discussed. As for the convenient and illuminating terminology of "sex psychology" with which modern youth mitigates its own confusion, everyone knows that it was still some twenty years ahead. And if our fathers were also beginning to hedge the situation in their thoughts, they were, if less innocent than the mothers, no less ignorant and even more disposed to leave the subject as they found it shrouded by its cloud of incommunicability.

Out of this situation, shot through with intimations of knowledge without wisdom, women of my generation came to a half-formulated certainty that the chief obstacle to all they most wished for was to be found in the maleness of men. It was a notion that, once entertained, found plenty to feed upon.

There was, of course, a measure of masculine opposition to women's advance, which did so take its rise. For men are not only so intrigued with the mystery of sex that they habitually pretend to more mystery than really exists, they are temperamentally disinclined to the readjustments of the personal life called for by an alteration of feminine values. Also, men were already ensconced in all the professional, financial, and political situations which women were beginning to covet, unable to yield them easily. All the rhythms of politics and trade were set to their tunes. Women who had attempted these things on their own account were disposed to interpret the natural resistance of competition that they encountered, in terms of sex prejudice. Equally they failed to attribute to themselves a widespread lack of professional technique; and they had not yet made the devastating discovery that women have little professional talent.

By talent I mean the particular aptitudes developed by age-long specialization in particular modes of expression, such as the talent for painting which is just beginning to appear among women, or the talent for musical composition which has not appeared at all. It is probable that this very recent discovery is largely responsible for the retardation of woman's progress which has so visibly set in even among women who honestly believed that a membership in the Woman's Party or the Lucy Stone League and an unremitting habit of industry were all they needed to place them equally among men. But fifteen years ago, if such a lack were admitted—and it was not admitted in many quarters—it was invariably attributed to man's deliberate oppression of woman. Did not all our intelligentsia combine to prove it to us out of history, folk-lore, anthropology, and whatever went by the name of science at that time? Is there any sociological thesis which cannot be so proved by the science of the age which produces it? At any rate, if there were, here and there, a suffragist who suspected that the vote might not mean all to women that they anticipated, she kept it to herself, out of loyalty to the cause or out of realization that there was no one prepared to receive it.

It is possible that the legend of male oppression flattered the male susceptibility, since there was little opposition to it, other than the contention of the antis that if men had never oppressed women it was because women had been so natively inferior as not to need it. Whatever the argument, it all contributed to give to the forward turn of twentieth-century feminism the aspect of a duel between the sexes; woman against man, and the woman's star in the ascendent.

Now that the turn is accomplished, and nothing startlingly political or professional seems to be determined by it, what does stand out in the nature of an achievement is the escape not of one sex from the other but of both from a social complex unwholesomely driven and informed by sex distinctions. Now that political and professional preferment are redistributing themselves along lines that, though not obviously determined by sex tradition, still leave men enormously in the lead, women are beginning to see that the adversary was not the man, not the mate, not even institutionalized marriage, but hopelessly uncontrolled multiplication. What she really fought, that advanced woman of forty years ago, was not so much a manifestation of male dominance as of sexual overemphasis from which there is no true escape except as the man and woman escape together. For Bernard Shaw was right inasmuch as he saw and never failed to point out that woman, even when she seemed to flee at her most furious, was, as much as ever man was, entangled in the moral futilities, the spiritual ecstasies, the utilitarianism, the humiliations of our common sexual life. In this, her latest flight, symbolized but not perfected by political suffrage, she has drawn after her all society, with her wings only slightly silvered by achievement, but still definitely away from the company of the pots and the service of the sacred kitchen stove under which obscured symbol man once saw in her the perpetual breast, the all-sustaining mother. This, I take it, is the meaning of the forward turn of my generation, not any particular quality of achievement but a new front set squarely to a new progress in which the play of the reproductive function will be reduced to more practicable proportions. Practicable, I mean, in the sense of being better adapted to a higher type of social realization. For what could we have done with a society bound blindly upon the wheel of its own increase?

All that votes for women seems to mean at the moment is a marker for the turn at which the redistribution of sex emphasis begins. As one who fought the good fight, I shall be satisfied if only the next turn is not called by men in revolt against the too exigent femininity of women.

Compulsion at DePauw

By ELLIS COWLING

IT seemed that everything was ready for their coming; the freshmen had after weeks of drill learned almost perfectly the manual of arms, the sophomores seemed thoroughly imbued with "the spirit of the bayonet" and versatile in the fine art of thrust and jab. That afternoon was to come the big parade and inspection, and there were whisperings that DePauw University might again win the star of "distinguished college" among the Reserve Officers' Training Corps units of its area. But the president had been out of town and the assistant had his wires crossed in planning chapel for that day. When the austere colonels from the United States army were seated on the front seats of the chapel platform and the students had taken their places, everyone expected to hear a message from one of the guests telling of the pressing need for "preparedness, a better national defense, an adequate preparation for a national emergency"—not that any one wanted war, of course. Instead of this, two students were called upon to give a report of the Methodist Student Conference recently held in Louisville. Evidently they had heard something of militarism, for in no uncertain terms they condemned the system represented by the "honored guests" of the occasion.

The students were surprised, shocked, amused, indignant, depending on individual temperament, and a few left chapel more sober-faced than usual. The events of the half hour had started some questioning in their minds as to whether DePauw, a supposedly Christian institution at Greencastle, Indiana, was justified in making two years' preparation for wholesale killing a prerequisite for graduation. That questioning crystallized into opinions, and opinions into expressed convictions. Little groups met here and there, on the way to class, at the dinner table, in their rooms, asking if there was no way to rid DePauw of militarism.

Two years passed and another president replaced the one who went to China as a Methodist Bishop. The Methodist General Conference had in the meantime passed a resolution which electrified Christian America:

> War is the supreme enemy of mankind. Its futility is beyond question. Its continuance is the suicide of civilization. We are determined to outlaw the whole war system. . . . Our nation and our church can do now what it may never be able to do again. We set ourselves to create the will to peace. . . . Through its educational program our church must mold the present youth of all nations into a peace-loving generation.

Things came to a head in the autumn of 1925. Those who felt the deep wrong of the situation met in order to plan some definite action under the leadership of a senior who had been a soldier, who knew the hell of the battle-field, whose eyes were a bit haunting as he remembered the anguish of it. A resolution was prepared and submitted to the president pleading in the name of Christianity, of the Methodist church, of the principles of democracy, and of humanity that DePauw no longer force her sons to be a part of the war system. A petition, bearing the names of scores of students, which asked that the resolution be made a policy, was also taken to the administrative office. But those who took these documents to the president met unexpected rebuff. They were informed of their inexperience, their shortness of life and immaturity of judgment as compared with those who had lived a little longer. They were told that nothing calling for any such action had been meant by the resolution passed by the General Conference. Since the president had helped formulate it, he knew what had been meant.

The president then called on an influential faculty committee, composed of seven members including an R. O. T. C. officer, to investigate the military problem and make a recommendation. The committee recommended that military training be made optional. The president rejected the report of the committee and hand-picked another whose members were more favorable to the situation as it stood. This committee recommended that the compulsory feature be retained. It was.

One concession, however, was with some difficulty secured. It was granted that "conscientious objectors" might be excused from taking military training provided they took double the usual amount of work required in physical education. No academic credit toward graduation was given for this extra work, which meant that the student must also take four extra academic hours in order to secure the necessary one hundred and twenty for graduation. Academic credit had always been given for military training. Then almost immediately the number of hours of military training required for graduation was increased by one half. The student leaders smiled a bit grimly.

During the college year 1926-27 the Educational Policy Committee of the Faculty, composed of Vice-President Longden, Deans Post and Sweet, and eight professors, voted four times to request the president to bring to the faculty a report asking for the elimination of the compulsory feature of drill. The final vote of this committee was 8 to 2, with one not voting. At last, on May 10, 1927, the faculty was allowed to vote on the issue, and out of a total of sixty voting members the vote stood 19 to 12 to make military training optional. The charter of the University states that the faculty shall determine all requirements for graduation, so everybody supposed that this vote settled the matter. President Murlin himself wrote letters to a number of people, including one to Professor George A. Coe, chairman of the Committee on Militarism in Education, in which he said:

"At the meeting of our faculty on May 10 it was voted that military drill, hitherto required of all freshmen and sophomores, be made optional for next year. This may be released if you so desire."

But supporters of the military were not downed. They appealed to President Murlin again, and he chose to overrule the faculty decision and call for a new vote—a secret vote—on the part of the faculty by mail. The result of this secret mail ballot was 28 to 22 in favor of optional instead of compulsory military training. Three army officers voted in this second count, who had not voted in the open meeting.

Having failed now with the Faculty Committee on Educational Policy, which had voted four times against compulsion, and having failed with the faculty as a whole, which had voted twice, the president bethought him that perhaps the students would be more pliable. He called a special meeting of this year's and next year's student councils and asked them to vote on the question. Of the twenty-seven members but fourteen were present. The vote was 8 to 6 in favor of required military training. Of the eight votes in favor, four were cast by members of Scabbard and Blade, an honorary military fraternity, and two by girl sponsors of military companies, leaving but two who might be expected to be unbiased.

Then the advanced military student officers, while the freshmen and sophomores were lined up in military formation, passed petitions through the ranks asking the faculty and the president to make military drill required for next year. To complete the petitions, they were later passed around by a thorough canvass of the campus. A very large per cent of the men in the sophomore, freshmen, and junior classes, the only ones approached, signed the petitions.

Some students signed them jokingly, not believing they had any significance. Others signed because they feared an unfavorable effect on their grades, others wished incoming freshmen to get the same dose of military compulsion which had been theirs, and some, of course, signed sincerely. But whatever the reasons for this student petition, it gave the president the chance he had been seeking to ask for another secret faculty vote. This time he requested the faculty to allow him permission to continue the compulsory requirement for the next college year. President Murlin's resignation, already accepted, takes effect next June. Many of the faculty refused to vote on this military question ad infinitum, but thirty-four members voted, and the vote was 28 to 6 for letting the president continue compulsory drill.

There remains, however, this question: Does military training have to rest not only on the compulsion of students but on the compulsion of a university faculty as well?

A Bit of Russian Patchwork

By KARL BORDERS

MOTHER VOLGA was at the highest tide in fifty years when we went aboard the steamer Kalenin at Nizhni Novgorod. The buildings of the famous fair across the river were half submerged. Boats of all descriptions were plying the lower streets where a few days before droshkies rumbled over the cobbles. Swarms of stevedores came and went like ants, rustling bags and boxes onto the crowded lower deck. Between their ranks heavily laden peasants crowded their way aboard, bearing half the family possessions on their backs—huge baskets, chickens, goats, babies, and teapots.

You will be told that classes on the trains and boats have been eliminated, that it is a question of whether you wish to pay for more or less elegant and comfortable quarters. As for us, we went second. The cabin was clean and comfortable enough and had the advantage of privacy. There were no sheets or blankets because a party of visiting Americans, traveling first, had been given the entire ship's stock. But we had come down third class from Moscow and, after even one night on a shelf, any kind of bed with springs is a blessing. As for blankets, we were prepared, for no one who has once traveled in Russia will be caught a second time without his blanket and his tea pot.

But if there are still classes in the transportation system, the classes often get most strangely mixed. The medley of forms and faces in the corridor and the dining-room began to take on individuality as we picked our way among the tree-tops down the swollen stream.

Most striking and most garrulous was the old Bolshevik, a dark man with flashing eye and enormous mustaches. His revolutionary activities dated from the time of the Japanese war, as he was proud to relate. He had revolted from the inhuman discipline of the army, deserted and fled in a box car through Siberia. After that the usual story of prisons, secret activities, war, revolution. But behold him now, a man of importance, a member of the Soviet of the City of Kazan, bristling with documents—a member of the ruling party, off to a sanatorium in the Caucasus, there to drink the famous Narzan waters and even to bathe in their miraculous flow.

His were stories of fighting on many fronts, of famine and of wolves, stories to thrill the heart of the romancer and the movie-scenario writer. Once in the forests of the North he and his two companions, bearing a message of importance, were waylaid by a large band of bandits. His comrades mounted the horses and made for safety with the papers, leaving him to cope with the bandits and to guard the remainder of their belongings in the sleigh. He quickly dropped three of his assailants with his rifle. The others made off. Then out of the twilight came worse than bandits —wolves. Again his trusty rifle, first as a long range weapon, then as a club. Toward morning, he struggled in to the nearest cabin, half dead. With this and many like stories, he regaled us.

The conversation turned to priests and religion. At this a quiet young Jew, while protesting his freedom from religious taint, rose to the defense of his people and set our merchant right on some of his religious information.

"Well, not all priests are bad," remarked a young official from the Ukraine. "I remember one very gratefully. Our regiment had cleared a certain village of Wrangel's Whites and were billeted for the night in the homes of the villagers. I lodged with the village priest. I was tired and sleepy but I am always fond of an argument, and finding the old man an interesting conversationalist, we talked and argued religion until long past midnight. Then I lay down and slept like one dead. When I awoke the first sight that greeted me made my heart come into my mouth. The room was full of White officers gathered around the samovar. Our regiment had been driven out by an unexpected force of Whites in the early morning. I felt certain that the end was near. Then I noticed that my uniform was gone and that in its place was a suit of ordinary clothing. But before I had time to speak, the old priest noticed that I was awake and much to my surprise introduced me as his son. I fell into the part, meantime remaining in bed and waiting for the priest to make the next move. The officers wished to know why I was not in the White army, to which the priest replied that he had another son in that army, which was true, and that I had also been in the army but was now unwell and had been furloughed home. Any suspicions the officers may have had were stilled and I lay back on the pillow much relieved in mind. That same day the Whites moved on, my regiment reoccupied the town, and I joined my surprised companions who had thought me dead or taken prisoner. When I thanked the old priest for the kindness he had done me, he replied simply that he, too, had a son. I learned from the villagers that he was an honest man and devoted to the welfare of his people."

Besides the merchant Astrakhan-bound, there were others who drifted in and out of the scene. One man had shifting eyes; his only contribution to the conversation was a comment on river travel in the good old days when it was difficult to get a cabin and when there was hilarious life in the dining-rooms. He told, too, of how he had once won fifty thousand rubles at a gaming table in Moscow. The other was a well-fed merchant, also of the old school, who with little change of costume might have stepped out of the times of Boris Godunov. With his beard and blouse and the good leather belt that accentuated his girth, he was still a romantic figure. Formerly a wealthy grain dealer, he was now employed by the government grain trust and was buying grain in the rich lower Volga valley. He was openly religious. He sipped tea and opened a bottle of wine with a white-haired old priest and his son in the dining-room, and when we talked in private, made light of any hope on the future of Russia under the present regime.

The impression of Russia one gets from such experiences is one of scrambled incongruity. These few short years since the Great War have mixed centuries, periods, and ages so unceremoniously that the effect is often as bewildering as a passage from Alice in Wonderland. Priests and Communists, camels and tractors, peasants and princes travel side by side along the same road. One interesting and reassuring fact emerges. Russia is growing reminiscent of her revolution. The time has not yet come when Reds and Whites arrange joint reunions, and no longer than a month ago twenty men were tried and three condemned to death for murder and rapine committed during that same civil war here in our county in the North Caucasus. Yet when men begin to pluck tales of kindness out of the recollections of horror and hate, and tinge their memories with humor, it is a sign that the wounds of war are healing.

Through all these strange and apparently irreconcilable contradictions you will find purpose and order. Over all the Soviet Government rules supreme with little visible effort, binding this colorful moving mass into a new organism.

In the Driftway

COMMENCEMENT time has passed again and the Drifter is reminded of the strangest and most interesting commencement exercises he ever saw. They took place at the Utica Normal and Industrial Institute, located in the southern section—the black belt—of Mississippi. The school has made itself the center of a farming section which is becoming more prosperous every year. And these farmers, parents of students in the school or neighbors who had been helped by visiting teachers, composed the audience for the program of the day. In a valley which formed almost a perfect amphitheater was the waiting audience. There was a small platform in the center, on which stood seventy-three young people ready to receive their certificates. Close by were two pens of cattle, Holstein and Jersey; a string of Durock Jersey pigs; a neatly constructed henhouse and brooding outfit filled with chickens from one-day-old chicks to full-grown cocks and hens; an improvised garage and workshop, a carpenter shop, kitchen, laundry, and so on through the twenty-six industries taught at the school.

INSTEAD of a salutatory, full of noble and courageous promises, the audience heard a work bell, and at the sound each of the graduates began to work at one or another of the industries. Many of those who were to receive diplomas were working at their machines in overalls. Some kneaded dough, some prepared a meal, others worked in a miniature truck garden with vegetables actually growing in it. An anvil rang, shoes were put on horses, a Ford car running across the stage had a mysterious blowout; swiftly it was repaired by the students in the automechanics department. A laundry machine washed clothes which students later ironed, and, most miraculous of all, in the sewing division a girl measured another girl for a dress, made it, and put it on the girl in twenty-six minutes, and for all the Drifter could tell to the contrary it was a perfect fit.

ABOVE the ring of the anvil, the hum of the machinery, and the voices of those who explained their demonstrations as they went on, another farm demonstration was being conducted. It consisted of a Ford tractor drawing a disk plow and circling the entire audience at fifteen miles an hour, turning up the land seven inches deep. This tractor was followed by a harvester tractor pulling two sets of cultivators, one behind the other. The Drifter was not the only one who watched these activities with absorption. The farmer audience sat enthralled by the proceedings. Their sons and daughters were performing operations which indicated that they had actually learned something while at school, and, more than that, these were operations which touched their parents as closely as the children. For once the school was not an island in the midst of life. It was life itself. THE DRIFTER

Contributors to This Issue

MAURITZ HALLGREN is on the Washington staff of the International News Service.

IDA TREAT is co-author with Ruth Sawtell of "Primitive Hearths in the Pyrenees," just published.

MARY AUSTIN, poet, novelist, and critic, has been a leader of American women for two decades.

ELLIS COWLING is a graduate of DePauw University.

KARL BORDERS is with the Russian Reconstruction Farms.

ALFRED KREYMBORG is the author of "Puppet Plays."

W. E. WOODWARD is the author of "Bunk" and "Lottery."

NORMAN THOMAS is a director of the League for Industrial Democracy.

MARY ROSS is an associate editor of the Survey.

WILLIAM L. LANGER is professor of history at Clark University.

BENTON MACKAYE is a forester, regional planner, and social dreamer.

KEITH HUTCHISON, who contributed the review of "American Labor and American Politics" to The Nation of July 13, is no longer associated, as was there stated, with the British Library of Information in New York.

Correspondence

Fit to Print

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Touching the cases of Upton Sinclair and "Pure Boston," and of David Gordon and purer New York, one may recall the encouragement extended to a young hopeful from the provinces by Church and State of Old England. Shakespeare was lucky enough to have had his first authentic work certified as fit for publication by the Archbishop of Canterbury, who, by the way, happened to have been Francis Bacon's first tutor. The imprimatur, from the third man in the state and the second in the church, was impressed upon no less an effort than "Venus and Adonis"!

Reverting to Boston, however, may I cull for the Athens of America, Cradle of Liberty, the last line of Sonnet xciv, which last line, peculiarly enough, is also to be found verbatim in an anonymous Elizabethan drama, "Richard III"—

"Lilies that fester smell far worse than weeds."

New York, June 27 MARIUS CHARLES UNDERWOOD

Did Mrs. Stowe Make Shoes?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: My source of information as to Harriet Beecher Stowe doing shoemaking and tailoring for her family was the biography of Mrs. Stowe by Martha Foote Crowe and conversations with Mrs. Crowe. It is difficult to enter into a controversy with a man living in the year 1927 who disputes allegations about his mother and her craftsmanship in the year 1847 when he was a babe in arms or unborn. Mr. Stowe believes he is a veracious man. He wishes accuracy of statement regarding his mother. Let him refresh his recollections and write a memoir of how his beloved and lovable mother kept house in Walnut Hills, Cincinnati, whether she called in dressmakers to make her dresses, whether the family footwear was factory-made or done by a journeyman shoemaker, and what was the monthly stipend of her husband, a professor of Biblical exegesis in a struggling Western theological seminary.

"I was married to a man rich in Greek and Hebrew, Latin and Arabic, and alas! in nothing else," she wrote to Mrs. Follen in London. (I am quoting from Constance Mayfield Rourke's "Trumpets of Jubilee.") "I had married into poverty and without a dowry . . . my husband had only a large library of books and a great deal of learning." On arrival of the Stowe family in Brunswick, Maine, Mrs. Rourke informs the world in her just published book, "Mrs. Stowe was obliged to begin the work of the pioneer all over again. She papered the walls of her house, and painted and varnished the floors and the woodwork, and laid carpets and made barrel-chairs and recovered sofas and decorated them with gimp, and rehabilitated pillows and bolsters and bedspreads. . . . In the midst of her labors came a low-spirited letter from Professor Stowe, announcing that he was sick in bed, inquiring what his wife would do in case she was left a widow, as she almost certainly would be, warning her that she would have a mere pittance to live on, and so must not be extravagant. . . . The following spring a clergyman from Harpswell happened to be loitering near the wharf late one afternoon, and saw the entire Stowe family seated on casks, apparently in silence. Tired and worn, unkempt and even dilapidated, with holes as large as silver dollars showing at the heels of her low shoes, Mrs. Stowe made an oblivious center of the group."

With each increase of evidence we are led to believe that in her material poverty Harriet Beecher Stowe was a good deal of a working-woman, having not merely mother wit but deft manual cleverness. Her memory does not require the guardianship of a ninety-year-old son who considers it important that she must not be recorded as having made shoes, of a sort, for her family, and tailored, in a way, for her husband.

Chicago, June 15 CARL SANDBURG

Sissified Sex Literature

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your editorial comment upon my letter in Books gets somewhat off the track. I am grateful for the illustrations drawn from the past, however. They help me to show, even more clearly, what I was trying to express in my criticism of "important" novels.

I am not such a fool as to find fault with a writer for using the facts and follies of humanity as the themes of a novel. I am perfectly well aware of the novels of Fielding, Smollett, Thackeray, and George Eliot. I have read the "Morte d'Arthur." I have also read the other books of those periods. Roger Ascham, who has supplied you with an excellent title to your remarks, I would remind you was living in a period of transition, as we are now. He is as good a witness for the sixteenth century as Bishop Manning is for the present day. He was naturally prejudiced against the work of Sir Thomas Mallory by his intense absorption in Latin and Greek ancient literature. He was the tutor of aristocratic young ladies, and he lived in an age ill-fitted to perceive the significance of the legends of King Arthur's court.

But all this, you will pardon me for pointing out, is immaterial to my original contention. It is the spirit behind the modern sexy novel which I am after. It is the preoccupation with ordure for the sake of rolling in the ordure which I am trying to fetch out from behind all these fine words and phrases about "Importance" and "Art."

I did not labor the point in my letter very heavily, although two of my correspondents have seized upon it for their own uses. It is this: that literature is becoming emasculated by being written mainly for women and largely by women. The majority of men in this country, having been co-educated by women-teachers, are unaware of this directly, but become vaguely impressed that something is the matter later in life. I call it the sissification of literature and life. The point of view of the modern "important" novel like "Ulysses" is feminine in its preoccupation with the nastiness of sex. You allude to the older novelists as dealing with sex. Of course they did. They used it in its place. They did not make it the god in the temple. They treated it as I treat a table when I buy it or make it. They accepted it as a useful thing to have in the house, to take or leave alone, to use and forget. The modern "important" novelist seems to regard sex as the modern woman regards antique furniture—not to use but to worship, to discuss, and to go mad about.

You mention Flaubert, Balzac, and Stendhal. In my opinion the last named does not come in the class of the other two. In any case he is a rather special writer who has something to offer very shrewd and interesting. That, however, is the modern way. Just now Stendhal with his highly seasoned "The Red and the Black" is being discussed as "important," when any mate or engineer of my day at sea really knew more about seduction than Stendhal ever heard of. Some of his technique is distinctly fustian.

"Love," you say, "is most intense when it meets an impediment." Very likely; but who was talking about love? There is precious little love in the modern "important" novels. If the novelist thinks he is going to get away with frustrated love affairs he is mistaken. The young women are out for the whole fetid business, and you can ask any bookseller if you don't believe me. Only the other day an enthusiastic lady told me that the love of the young woman in "The Sun Also Rises" was a beautiful unsullied emotion. Either I am blind or she is crazy.

Katherine Mayo's splendid book about India of today tells us how, when a Hindu is to be "purified" from contact and mutilation by a stranger, he has his eyes, ears, nose and mouth filled by a Brahmin with soft cow-dung. There seems to me to be a parable in this. We have a few potential Hindus right here in our intellectual and literary midst. All those allusions in your editorial to the great books of the past are red herrings across the trail. I happen to have read those authors. They were huge successes in their day, many of them. But are you trying to suggest that the young ladies who waited for the next chapters of "Vanity Fair" or "Barchester Towers" were animated by the same spirit as those who, after one dizzy sniff at "The Sun Also Rises," rush off to buy a copy of the book for themselves? Are you trying to kid me into agreeing that Homer's poem was conceived in the same spirit as Joyce's "Ulysses"?

I will make a prediction—that the tide is on the turn even now, that the trend of accepted fiction will shortly be away from the pornographic, to call things by their right names. Don't misunderstand me, however. Dirt is all right, in the right place, and so long as you don't try to call it art. I like a dirty story as well as the next man. I can tell better ones than the average American, I find. But I don't like to kid myself that it is "important." It isn't. I can do without it. I prefer to leave such stuff unread. It is not necessary to write it. It should be handed on by word of mouth, like the ancient tales of the Druid days. The fashionable craze for highly seasoned sex stories will pass and we shall have something else. Better, I hope. It couldn't be worse.

Westport, Conn., July 4 WILLIAM MCFEE

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is surprising to read that "the 'important' novels of every age have exhibited a preoccupation with adultery." It was not so with Sir Walter Scott, who was for many years the world's favorite novelist. Adultery was not the main theme in the works of Thackeray, Dickens, George Eliot or Victor Hugo. Many others might be named.

A modern playwright was asked why he never chose a virtuous woman for the heroine of any of his dramas. He answered that he could not make a virtuous woman interesting. Shakespeare could, and did.

Dorchester, Mass., July 5 ALICE STONE BLACKWELL

Who Helped the British Miners?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of March 16 you print a letter giving figures of the different amounts contributed for the relief of the British miners by various bodies. We should feel greatly indebted to you if you would, for the sake of justice to the continental workers, add these figures to those given by your correspondent:

AMOUNTS RECEIVED IN AID OF THE BRITISH MINE WORKERS BY THE INTERNATIONAL FEDERATION OF TRADE UNIONS

Countries	Received by I. F. T. U. Dutch Guilders	Received by Miners' International Dutch Guilders	Direct to British T. U. C. Dutch Guilders
Belgium	13,184.80	56,698.26
Canada			1,228.70
Denmark	1[illegible]	13,013.45
Germany	421,023.15	150,0[illegible]
France	[illegible]	[illegible]
Holland	216,025.00	8,366.50
Austria	[illegible]	3,136.95
Sweden	70,8[illegible]
Switzerland	56,818.71	1,[illegible]
Spain	2,8[illegible]	11,[illegible]
Czecho-Slovakia	19,791.88	45,600.00
Australia		[illegible]
United States		12[illegible]	327.57
New Zealand			69,379.80
British India			7,860.00
Mexico			7,392.20
Norway			38,146.50
South Africa			6,000.00
Miscellaneous	1,[illegible]	7,[illegible]	1,[illegible]
	D. G. 1,043,464.95 = $417,386	D. G. 435,577.37 = $174,231	D. G. 131,545.77 = $52,618

We should like to call special attention to the large amount which, relatively speaking, was contributed by Holland, which is a small country, with only some 200,000 trade unionists affiliated with us. Holland's trade-union members affiliated with us gave 118.3 Dutch cents per capita; Denmark's 67.8; Switzerland's 39; Sweden's 18; and Czecho-Slovakia, Germany, Belgium, Austria, Palestine, Spain, Rumania, Canada, Hungary, Poland, France, and Latvia followed.

Amsterdam, April 29 JOH. SASSENBACH,
International Federation of Trade Unions

Mr. Jonas Wants to Yelp

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I want to add my "yelp" to the chorus of the "bloodhounds" who demand the extermination of the "Moscow murderers."

Delenda est! The Moscow so-called communists, who have disgraced communism, have indeed "shown themselves to be the mad dogs of the world." Their extermination is indeed a necessity for the sake of the very cause which they have brought into disrepute. Here, in this capitalistic hell, Sacco and Vanzetti have been struggling for seven long years for their lives and will finally go free. But how long would two revolutionists of their type have lasted in Russia? Not seven weeks. Not even seven days. Here freedom is in chains, but there it is dead. Here justice is violated, but there its very existence is denied.

West Orange, New Jersey, July 4 BARUKH JONAS

In an Algerian Looking Glass

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR:

> Washington preaches naval disarmament, but maintains the most formidable fleet on earth; Washington preaches world peace, but adheres neither to the League of Nations nor to the Hague Court, and rejects every arbitration proposal in advance. London does [illegible] the same thing, with a little more decency and formality. In general, the two great Anglo-Saxon Powers, without any appearance of worrying about the wild contradictions they subscribe to, are giving a fine demonstration of their yearnings for hegemony and of the complete inanity of the disarmament propositions which emanate from them.

This is quoted from an editorial entitled The Polic[illegible] of the United States in this morning's Dépêche Algérienne, occasioned by a cablegram reporting President Coolidge's speech at the United Press dinner. French writers insist upon bracketing the two cases of Mexico and Nicaragua. My attention was called years ago, when a law clerk in southern Colorado, to the fact that Mexican law is based rather on the Code Napoleon than on American jurisprudence. For this reason Mexican legislation and procedure [illegible] us, though better understood by Europeans [illegible] the World War much European investment looking to the [illegible] of land holding and the [illegible] ownership has been based upon them. To a Frenchman the Mexican attempts along these lines since 1917 are merely symptoms of [illegible] in accordance with the spirit of the times. The American attitude seems [illegible] and imperialistic.

Our annexation of Texas seems fairly remote to an American, but the period 1836-[illegible] is not so long ago to a European. He is accustomed to more historical background. From our annexation of Texas to our more recent policy of "good neighborhood" (as the Spanish-speaking populations call it—padrinazgo) in the Caribbean is to him only a step. Nicaragua and Mexico are in the foreground. Between this and the historical background, as a European views it, lie the angling for the Panama Canal Zone, a Spanish war which netted us Porto Rico and special rights in Cuba, and other military interventions in Haiti and Santo Domingo. I attended a series of lectures in Paris last December, in one of which the French geographer Brunhes made the remark: "The Americans accuse us of imperialism. As a matter of fact they have laid their hands on more territory during the past thirty years than any other Power on earth." The obvious American retort to Professor Brunhes would be that France drew two million men out of Africa alone between 1914 and 1918 to help decide a European squabble, and that we have never attempted to use Latin-American manpower for our own ends. Frenchmen to whom I have suggested this fact have made no answer at all. They might justly remark, however, that if we have not made this draft it is perhaps because we have never needed to. Private American business makes plenty of money out of cheap labor and cheap lands bordering on the warm water south of us.

Algiers, Africa, May 27 M. M. KNIGHT

Private School Teachers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have been teaching in private school for six years, and have often compared notes with public-school teachers. I found their conditions far superior to those of the system in which I worked. Private schools employ as many foreigners, beginners, and non-professional people as they can get. Contracts are seldom given, leaving the authorities free to dismiss the teacher when zero weather comes. Salaries are lower than in the public schools, equipment not nearly so good, but they do have a super-abundance of unbearable potentates. My next move will be into the public schools. I am glad The Nation has taken up the cause of the teachers, and I hope soon to see an organization of teachers as strong as that of the bricklayers.

Chicago, May 24 J. M. HAYES

Admiral Bristol, LL.D.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your hearty appraisal of the services of Rear Admiral Mark L. Bristol, recently named Commander-in-chief of the Asiatic fleet, calls for the supplementary information that at the 1927 commencement exercises of Oberlin College, at which President Henry Churchill King presided for the last time before his retirement, Admiral Bristol was awarded the honorary degree of LL.D. by the man who worked with him in the Near East in the years following the war.

Oberlin, Ohio, July 5 ERNEST H. FISK

Pope Manuscripts

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Professor A. E. Case of Yale University and I are attempting a critical edition of Pope's "Essay on Man" and of his "Moral Essays." We are naturally anxious to discover all relevant extant manuscript material, whether in Pope's handwriting or in that of Jonathan Richardson, Jr., and also copies of the poems annotated by either of these men. Thus far we have discovered two manuscripts of the "Essay on Man," one in the Morgan Library, New York, and one in the possession of Mr. Jerome Kern; the annotated copy mentioned in the Grolier Club catalogue (1911); and a small fragment in the British Museum. We have also found certain manuscripts of the "Moral Essays" and certain copies of them annotated by Pope in the Henry E. Huntington Library. Should any reader know of other manuscripts or annotated copies—and there must be some—we should be grateful if they would communicate with us. We are also anxious to trace the original drawing in red chalk made by Pope for the frontispiece to the "Essay on Man," which was once owned by William Mason.

Evanston, Illinois, July 10 F. B. KAYE

Books

Epitaphs

By ALFRED KREYMBORG

DERBY AND CROWN

This man dreamed beneath a derby
ere the dream turned him down
and laid him near the man he envied—
wearing a grassgrown crown.

THEOLOGY

Whether he was Gentile or just an outcast Jew
(the priest who prayed to Heaven to save your soul for you)
no psalm can help now your body below
nor sermon determine what the earth should do.

CAKE ON SUNDAY

Here are some who died in battle:
Bring on Fame
and let it prattle
the pretty speeches children make when you give each one a cake
on a Sunday
'stead of bread:
Fame is Sunday
for the dead.

That "Filthy Little Atheist"

Thomas Paine, Prophet and Martyr of Democracy. By Mary Agnes Best. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

THE popular tendency to remember complex personalities by labels which are usually misleading was never better illustrated than it is in the case of Thomas Paine. Ask any well-dressed, respectable American citizen who Thomas Paine was, and the chances are about ten to one that he will inform you that Paine was a celebrated atheist who lived around Washington's time. If he has a puritanical streak he will probably use the term "filthy little atheist"—a characterization which originated in Roosevelt's indignation at Paine and all his works.

Miss Best, in her admirable life of Paine, does much to put him in his proper historical setting, and to show what manner of man he was. In the first place, he was not filthy. There is abundant evidence to prove that he was cleanly, abstemious, and possessed of good manners. He was a friend of Washington, of Jefferson, of Benjamin Franklin, of James Madison—and it is hardly likely that these befrilled and silky gentlemen would have been on terms of social amity with a "filthy" person. He was not "little" physically; he was even larger than Roosevelt himself. But perhaps our distinguished Rough Rider meant to imply that Paine was "little" mentally. If so, he was still in error, for Paine wrote books of such breadth and power that they sent a wave of seismic convulsions through the social structure of the eighteenth century. One may not agree with Paine, but one cannot say truthfully that the effect of his writings was anything less than titanic.

Paine was a Deist, and on the very first page of his "Age of Reason" he says that he believes in God, and hopes for a life after death. The "Age of Reason" was actually written to combat the growing spirit of atheism that followed the French Revolution. That it has become, after all, a symbol, in the minds of the unknowing, of Paine's atheism and a proof of his profligacy, is one of those curiously discouraging facts that cause one to think less of the mentality of the human race.

Paine's life, and the outlines of his bold conceptions, are well described by Miss Best. She writes vividly, almost too breathlessly. Her knowledge of her subject, and of her period, is evidently large and penetrating. She knows a great deal; and her fault—if it be a fault—is in trying to tell it all at once, like a fast talker.

She has a novelist's sense of drama; and this quality fits in well with a life as colorful and as astonishing as that of Paine. He began his career as a corset-maker—strangest of trades for a man who was destined to set the world in controversy. His acquaintance with Franklin began, apparently, when Paine brought some invention to the notice of our great philosopher. Franklin at that time represented some of the American colonies in London. Paine came to America in 1774, with letters of introduction from Franklin, and he was soon plunged head and ears in the American Revolution. He wrote "Common Sense" in the spring of 1776. A slender pamphlet of a few pages—one may read it in an hour—it had a larger sale in proportion to the American population of that day than any book has ever had since. This best-seller gave Paine a world-wide celebrity.

He was an idealist, a doctrinaire of the first water, a rebel by instinct. But his mind had a clarity and a directness that does not ordinarily go hand in hand with high ideals. He was a thinker of power and perception. For instance, he never admitted that taxation by England was the primary cause of the American Revolution; and this at a time when it was political heresy to say anything else. His idea was that the colonies were grown-up children; that they wanted a government of their own, regardless of what the English intended to do about taxation—and in this he was entirely correct.

Paine went as straight toward revolutions as a moth flies toward a light. If he had lived in our generation we would have heard of him in Russia among the Bolsheviks, writing this and declaiming that, risking his head, and passing through extraordinary adventures. He went to France during the French Revolution and, although he could not speak French, was elected a member of the revolutionary assembly. Next we hear of him in the Luxembourg prison, in imminent danger of the guillotine. But he escaped finally, returned to America, and died peacefully in his bed.

The curious adventures and flights that filled his stirring career pursued him beyond the grave. William Cobbett, the noted English publicist, became a great admirer of Paine's work and decided to carry his body to England for a grand funeral. So Cobbett proceeded to America, had Paine's body dug up surreptitiously, and transported it to England. Before the funeral, which Cobbett promised to embellish with "twenty wagonloads of flowers," Cobbett himself died. The body of Paine was left to Cobbett's son, who became forthwith a bankrupt, and the body was seized by a creditor who wanted to sell it at auction. Soon afterward the creditor fell into bankruptcy in his turn—financial misfortune seems to have been rather common—and the body of Paine passed into unknown hands. Nobody knows where it is today, though it has been long rumored that Paine's skull adorns a bookshelf in the study of a Church of England clergyman.

W. E. WOODWARD

The Story of Intolerance

The Story of Civil Liberty in the United States. By Leon Whipple. The Vanguard Press. 50 cents.

Professional Patriots. Edited by Norman Hapgood. Albert and Charles Boni. $1.50.

MR. WHIPPLE'S fine piece of historical research proves that civil liberties in the United States aren't what they used to be and never were. There is no golden age of freedom from which we Americans have conspicuously fallen. Whether or not we are worse than our fathers, we are not so utterly different but that Mr. Hapgood's sorry troop of Professional Patriots can find in American history plenty of precedent for the substance if not the form of their intolerance.

Various generations of Americans have mobbed Abolitionists, fiendishly lynched Negroes, harried Chinese and other aliens, established a postal censorship, deported men for political opinion, denied to citizens the right of habeas corpus, and nullified for striking workers the "constitutional" rights of assemblage, free speech, and a free press. What has not been done under cover of law has been done by the mob. To the observer from another land, or at any rate from another planet, the astounding fact would be not that such things could happen when passions ran high but that they could happen in almost every case without violating the bills of rights in the federal and many State constitutions which would seem to a layman specifically to guarantee the liberties thus flouted. (But, the visitor might conclude, for the lawyers thus to square our legal practice with our professions of freedom is after all a comparatively simple task in a country where our preachers have squared our every-day ethics with the teachings of Jesus to the general satisfaction of their hearers.)

In this long and melancholy case record no man or group of men appears as the uncompromising defender of liberty in time of power as in time of weakness. In 1855, remarks Mr. Whipple, "we have the interesting paradox of the native Protestant Know-Nothing Party mobbing Irish Catholics in the East and in California Irish Know-Nothings mobbing the 'heathen Chinee' for stealing their country and their jobs." The poor have been the special victims of their own weakness, yet mobs of poor men in the name of a dreadful perversion of democracy have been among the worst and most characteristically American offenders not only against liberty but against humanity. Labor's own bitter experiences at the hands of a master class which when it had power made any bill of rights almost meaningless have very imperfectly taught labor to defend the rights of its colored brothers and sisters. Indeed the chapters dealing with the treatment of the Negroes before and after their emancipation are incomparably the most tragic in the book. If ever a nation might justly be doomed by some stern prophet of the wrath of God it would be our own for the crimes against the blacks which this book sets forth with austere brevity. Perhaps it is part of our doom that our treatment of the Negro has dulled our very capacity to understand or create for ourselves the freedom we love to prate about.

Such heroes of liberty as Jefferson and Lincoln do not emerge from this record quite untarnished. Jefferson and his party did an immense service against the Alien and Sedition Acts, but Jefferson sought power from Congress to deny the writ of habeas corpus at the time of Burr's alleged insurrection, and one of the great advances for freedom of the press was won by his great rival Hamilton in the Crosswell case wherein a Federalist printer was indicted for vilifying President Jefferson. As for Lincoln, in spite of his occasional reluctance, his government went very far in ruling even in the North by military law without the writ of habeas corpus. A good many Ph.D.'s may yet be won by treatises contrasting violations of liberty under Lincoln and under Wilson.

For such theses this book does not give adequate information. It stops, according to plan, with the year 1917 and deals only incidentally with events since that time. It is understood that the struggle for civil liberty in these later crowded years will be dealt with by Roger Baldwin, who has been part of the struggle as no other man has been in America.

Mr. Whipple makes only one generalization: "whoever has power has civil liberty." The record makes him skeptical of the efficacy of any legal or constitutional guaranties. Nevertheless he speaks of the advance of liberty "by progress in education, by extensions of democracy, by the increase of scientific knowledge, by the growth of religious tolerance, by the advances of labor and women, and by the general diffusion of social tolerance." How great, I wonder, does Mr. Whipple consider that progress, and how far would it have gone if it had not tried to embody itself in law?

The very inclusiveness of Mr. Whipple's book and the magnitude of his task almost necessarily lay him open to two charges: first, that he has been obliged in many cases rather uncritically to use partisan statements of fact, and second, that he has included some cases which are doubtful examples of unjust violation of civil liberty. This is particularly true of his cursory and inadequate account of quarrals among the radicals themselves. In such quarrels radicals of all shades have often lost sight of the meaning and importance of freedom, although, as Mr. Whipple admits, in many cases they have worked together in defense of civil liberty. I have no first-hand information concerning the particular cases of Socialist intolerance which he cites, but I have enough general knowledge of these and other similar occurrences to question whether any anarchist criticism tells the whole truth. Even on the record as he gives it, does civil liberty include the right to disturb meetings?

The question suggests the need of a new philosophy of freedom. Our theoretical notions of civil liberty were greatly stimulated by, if they were not born out of, a laissez-faire conception of the state and of the relation of the individual to society. That conception is quite incompatible with present-day facts. No responsible official not a candidate for an insane asylum would uphold the right of some religious fanatic to disregard certain hygienic rules at proved peril to the public health. This, as Mr. Whipple indicates, is an extreme instance. We have no such objective standards to apply for the protection of public opinion. Heresy is of demonstrated advantage to society, and any social order is intolerable which is continually engaged in the conscious effort to deny "the right to know, to utter, and to argue freely according to conscience." Nevertheless the defender of civil liberty must support this right in terms of the good of society as well as of the individual. If what we call Jeffersonian democracy is dependent upon the conception of the state which Jefferson preached but did not always practice it is in a bad way.

"Professional Patriots" might serve as a footnote to this history of civil liberty. The professional patriots whom Mr. Hapgood describes on the basis of material assembled by Sidney Howard and John Hearley are in a sense the lunatic fringe of Rotarian America. Some of them are honest neurasthenics who get the shivers, delightful or otherwise, at the word revolution or the color red. Some of them are press agents and glorified detectives who get an easy living by preying on the fears of moneyed morons. Taken by themselves, as on the whole the record shows, these professional patriots from the almost forgotten Archie Stevenson down to Fred Marvin are more exasperating than successful. Yet the very existence of this lunatic fringe is an evidence of the extent and direction of an underlying movement toward imperialism. The infractions of civil liberty for which they are responsible and the arguments to which they appeal are characteristic of our epoch as were the anti-abolitionist activities of an earlier time.

Mr. Hapgood's book is to be commended for its sober and careful statements of fact. It is to be regretted that it does not give a somewhat better chronological picture of the total situation, which changes from year to year. There are facts, not all of which were known at the time of the publication of this book, which point to the existence of an informal alliance between unscrupulous patrioteers like Freddie Marvin and a variety of military organizations, reserve officers' associations, important sections of the American Legion, and probably high officials of the War Department itself which is a menace to even the most rudimentary conceptions of freedom and to the basic ideas of political discussion. Fortunately these gentry are going to such lengths that they are likely to defeat themselves. Their accepted technique would prove that the Pope is a heretic because he has shaken hands with Protestants. Of this general type of folly "Professional Patriots" gives many illustrations. NORMAN THOMAS

Alloy

The Delectable Mountains. By Struthers Burt. Scribners. $2.00.

"THE DELECTABLE MOUNTAINS" is one of those novels which are the despair of the reviewer because they leave him with feelings inextricably mixed. Not only is it too competently written to be dismissed and yet far too mixed in its style to be conscientiously praised, but its very defects are of a sort which the author has carefully cultivated and which, if he values his popularity, he will certainly not wish to correct. It requires no very great critical discrimination to see that for all the apparent sophistication of his ideas and all the smartness of his style, he manages somehow never to wander far in plot or sentiments from tested formulae, and it is equally easy to perceive that in spite of the superficial brightness and originality of which he is a master there is something tawdry about the brightness and something deceptive about the apparent originality. Yet to be able to adhere more closely to formula than one seems to be doing is one of the secrets of success, and the power to write continuously in sentences that fizzle harmlessly like a succession of squibs is the one most valued by the better-paying magazines. Mr. Burt has other qualities which would enable him to write more impressive fiction, but if he developed them he would displease at least half his readers, and he would be compelled to curb his exuberances to such an extent that he would seem to many not half so clever as they now think him to be.

Reduce the plot of the present novel to an outline and it is commonplace to the last degree. The story of a young man of good family who marries a chorus girl, fails to make a go of the marriage, and finally rejoins her in time for a "came-the-dawn" fade-out against a background of mountains—this has been made the basis of more plays, novels and movies than one cares to remember. Perhaps the plains or the sea have been used more often than the mountains to symbolize nature in these stories, and the illegitimate baby which Mr. Burt introduces just to show that both he and his hero are broadminded is usually omitted from the naïver versions of the story, but neither of these things is important and neither is responsible for the fact that "The Delectable Mountains" is better than such a description would imply. Two things redeem it from mere triviality. In the first place, Mr. Burt is capable of characterization more substantial than the merely popular novelist usually finds necessary, and, in the second place, there are many shrewd and witty remarks. He can give a certain solidity to his social backgrounds, and he is capable in addition of tersely revealing sentences like those which conclude the scene between the hero and the mother whom he has just told of his approaching marriage: "Mrs. Londreth had kissed Stephen good-night with an unwonted lingering tenderness that would have touched him had he not realized that it was a final argument against Mercedes. The Wilmerding silences, and the Wilmerding kisses, were premeditated." But the trouble is that Mr. Burt insists upon being swift when he most needs to be searching and upon being witty more continuously than is either necessary or, for him at least, possible. If you believe him, Mr. Burt is masterful; if you do not, he is merely glib. Events move rapidly, and so do explanations. He can describe a society in a page and explain a character in an epigram. Submit yourself to him and he makes everything perfectly clear; pause a moment to question and you wonder if all that he has told is as probable as he maintains. He does all your thinking for you, and he has an air which suggests that he would rather you left it to him. Without demanding anything of the reader, the book gives him the impression that a great many important things have been settled. The essence of morals, good manners, and practical sociology has all been distilled. A story that must be interesting for the simple reason that it always has been is made the vehicle for all sorts of painless instruction. The society of Philadelphia is contrasted with that of Bohemian New York as well as with the simple West. Why girls leave home is made clear, along with the reasons for supposing that chastity is after all a sort of virtue. There is a touch of spice supplied by an artist's studio and a breath of fresh air brought in by a cowboy. Moreover, the morality is sound without being prudish, and there is a perfectly happy ending upon a sententious, indisputable truism: "Men stumble—so do women." Best of all, the book seems short in spite of the fact that it is nearly five hundred pages in length, because there is never any necessity of reading anything between the lines.

The author, one is led to feel, is so extremely competent that he will explain everything for you, and so clever that he will make it amusing. Undoubtedly, this is good literature and yet, strangely enough, it is not a bore. This sort of thing is much in demand, but in it the vrai bon is inextricably mingled with the faux bon, and, though I am not certain that the capacity to do genuine things well is any rarer than the capacity to compound such popular and deceptive alloys, I am perfectly certain that it is more valuable. JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Done in the Round

To the Lighthouse. By Virginia Woolf. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

SOME writers can etch a character in a few sharp lines against white space; others unroll a whole life in flat, bright patterns like a tapestry. Virginia Woolf has a unique manner of washing away the unessential, as the sea sculptures a bit of broken glass, till the spirit emerges as simple, translucent, yet individual in the dignity of the loneliness which encompasses all consciousness. Her people are done in the round—they emerge until the reader becomes intensely aware of the essence which lies behind the apparent complexities and contradictions of civilized human beings; and they would fade away like the lost Eurydice before any attempt to ticket or classify them or brand them with a label.

"To the Lighthouse" is the quiet story of an English family who are spending the summer in the Hebrides. There is Mrs. Ramsay, about whom the story pivots, as did their life; Mr. Ramsay, who wrote one good book when he was young and ever after was corroded by anxiety lest he should do no more to carve his name in eternity; their eight children; and their guests: Tansley, the conscientious atheist; Augustus Carmichael, poet and student of the Orient; Lily Briscoe, who tries to paint; William Bankes, a meticulous widower; young Minta Doyle, with a hole in the heel of her stocking; and Paul Rayley, who is to marry her before the book is over. If the day is fine they are to go to the lighthouse in the morning. The first half of the story is the reverie of Mrs. Ramsay as she sits in the late afternoon, with James, the youngest, beside her, soothing his anxiety about the weather as she soothes the petulance of her husband. One by one the others impinge upon her consciousness and find rest there without disturbing her own serene depths. It seems impossible that this family, these people, could live except through her.

"Time Passes"—suggests the years that are rolling on as the old house stands untenanted save by the little winds of summer and the great winter gusts. Here are twenty-five pages of as clear and beautiful high prose as are likely to distinguish many a publishing season. Bracketed sentences tell of the events which mark time with the family. One night Mrs. Ramsay died, quite suddenly. Prue, eldest and loveliest of the children, is dead with her baby; Andrew is killed in battle.

And so it was years later, and with an eternity of difference, that the trip to the lighthouse finally happened. Mr. Ramsay came back with Nancy and Cam and James, who had been the little boy who wanted it so badly; and commonplace, faithful Lily Briscoe was there again, and old Augustus Carmichael. Much of this second part of the book is the record of Lily, looking backward and still trying futilely to grasp the present. They all have gone on; they have gone their separate and self-charted ways, as Mrs. Ramsay went hers, lacking her consciousness, her integration, yet impelled by the common need to run their course.

"Mrs. Dalloway," the preceding novel by Virginia Woolf, is a similar study of one woman, done with unity of time and place and person. The somewhat freer method of this later book adds richness without dimming the peculiar quality of luminous insight which characterizes all Mrs. Woolf's novels. She has the rare ability to distil an inner life in patience and repose unclouded by prejudice; to write, in exquisite prose cadences, the poetry of the mind.

MARY ROSS

A German View of Grey

Lord Grey und der Weltkrieg. Von Hermann Lutz. Berlin: Deutsche Verlagsgesellschaft für Politik und Geschichte. Mark 16.

HERE is a truly remarkable study of the famous English statesman—remarkable as a classic example of German thoroughness, but even more remarkable for its breadth of view its generosity, and its good faith. Mr. Lutz is one of the leading German students of the origins of the war and has devoted more of his effort to the problem of English policy than perhaps any of his compatriots. In this really monumental work he has presented the results of years of painstaking research, and it may be said without hesitation that his volume is the most exhaustive as well as the most scholarly treatise on English pre-war policy that is now available.

The author's fundamental idea was apparently to subject Viscount Grey's own apologia to a rigorous scrutiny and to examine his account in the light of what we know from other sources concerning the English policy. In a sense this was unfortunate, for the result is a rather awkward arrangement of the material—first a study of Grey's outlook and political faith prior to his assumption of office, then a detailed analysis of the so-called "free hand," followed by a more systematic survey of European politics and the English attitude from 1906 to 1914, and finally, an exceedingly technical review of the July crisis. The arrangement alone would be difficult for the layman to follow, but he would find it an even more arduous task to keep up with the author's scholarly apparatus. This is essentially a scholar's book; there is no hope that it will ever compete in the public favor with Grey's own "Twenty-five Years."

Mr. Lutz is far above the petty devices of the propagandist. There is no mudslinging. Indeed it can be said that in almost every case the author gives fairly the benefit of the doubt. He is quite ready to palliate Grey's good intentions and subjective honesty. He seems almost reluctant when he shows that on one or two occasions Grey was guilty of telling an untruth, and in several passages he gives a very searching psychological appreciation of the motives actuating Grey's policy. On the other hand, it should be pointed out that he is quite as ready to condemn the policy of the Central Powers as he is that of the Allies. But, in brief, Mr. Lutz takes the sensible view that none of the great Powers pursued a systematic policy consciously hostile to each other. The term "encirclement" as applied to English policy toward Germany seems to him "too dramatic" and he refuses to take the activity of King Edward too seriously.

Of course the book is concerned primarily with Grey's policy, and it must be confessed that when he finishes his analysis there is almost nothing left of Grey's reputation as a great statesman. Lutz positively demolishes it, and shows that, though Grey may have meant well and though he may still believe that he followed the only possible course, he actually was swayed by unreasoning prejudice and suspicion and managed to entangle himself so completely that in the great hour of need he was quite unable to exploit England's pivotal position in the interests of peace. From the very beginning, in 1906, he went further in his relations to France than his colleagues in the Cabinet would have approved. After that he became more and more secretive, and, consumed by an incorrigible distrust of Germany, had allowed himself to become so deeply involved that in 1914 the English "freedom of action" was nothing more than a myth. Of course there was nothing on paper that could be construed as a binding obligation, but, by adducing every scrap of evidence, Lutz in a brilliant chapter shows conclusively that the moral obligation was so clear that no gentleman and no government could deny it. In support of his argument Lutz adduces the opinions of many Englishmen, statesmen and historians alike.

It was the same distrust of Germany and almost naive faith in the good intentions of France and Russia that determined Grey's attitude in 1914. He did nothing to restrain his friends, as anyone can see by reading the British Documents. But according to Mr. Lutz he went further than this purely negative policy. On July 25 he actually encouraged the Russians to carry out a partial mobilization in order to intimidate the Central Powers. The argument at this point is rather unorthodox and very involved. Most revisionist writers would say that even had Grey acted otherwise the net result would have been the same, for the Russians were determined to act and France was unwavering in her support of Russia. Mr. Lutz, however, insists that Sazonov was pacifically inclined until July 28, when Austria declared war on Serbia without giving satisfactory assurances of her readiness to respect the integrity and sovereignty of her opponent. He even holds Germany in part responsible for the Austrian declaration of war, and one is almost tempted to argue from this that Austria was primarily and Germany secondarily to blame for the Russian mobilization. But Mr. Lutz replies that Russia would not have mobilized in any case without a reasonable assurance of French and English support. Had Grey restrained Russia after July 28 the war would have been avoided or at least would have been avoidable. If Grey had told the Russians that, according to his information, the Austrians would not be in a position to act before August 5 time might have been gained for negotiation. In brief, while making out a very serious case against both Austria and Russia, Mr. Lutz draws up an indictment of English policy more impressive than any yet advanced.

The reviewer is not prepared to subscribe to this theory without reservation. There is no question that Sazonov put much store by the attitude of England, but it cannot be shown that Russian action was absolutely conditional on English support. From the very first moment the Russian Government made it perfectly clear that it would not allow Austria to crush

Serbia, wrote Buchanan. And, after all, the Russian Government mobilized before there was any certainty as to English participation. Surely acquiescence in the Russian mobilization could not be taken as a promise of English support. England may have been morally obligated to France from the very beginning, but there is no getting around the fact that the Cabinet would not have approved a statement of England's position earlier in the crisis, and there is no denying that prior to August 2 there was no knowing with certainty what course the English Government would choose. Cambon, at least, spent some anxious hours and it was not until the English promise to protect the French coasts was given that he felt the game had been won.

WILLIAM L. LANGER

Books in Brief

The Girl from Rector's. By George Rector. Doubleday, Page and Company. $3.

Rector's is no more, but its glittering career has been recalled by the son of its founder in an intensely absorbing narrative. Mr. Rector modestly asserts that although Rector's might not have been the center of population at the beginning of this century, at least it was the center of all the population that was worth knowing. Through its revolving doors—the first in New York—came such personages as Berry Wall, Diamond Jim Brady, Lillian Russell, Oscar Hammerstein, George Cohan, Eugene Field, Stephen Crane, O. Henry, and countless others. While delightful for its anecdotes of a past generation, Mr. Rector's book is especially valuable because it hands down some of the famous recipes that gave the house its name.

History of Prostitution. By Paul LaCroix. Translated by Samuel Putnam. Published for subscribers only. Three volumes. Chicago: Pascal Covici.

This history was originally published during the years 1851-1852 under the name of Pierre Dufour, and though it was never acknowledged it has always been attributed to the voluminous journalist and bibliophile Paul LaCroix, now chiefly remembered for the valuable collection of pictures gathered in the five volumes of his "Le Moyen Age et la Renaissance." LaCroix was the author of over twenty historical romances as well as several works of sober history, and the present volumes are, like most of the other products of his enormous industry, remarkable rather for their curious miscellaneous information than for any systematic thoroughness. His anecdotal "history" covers the period from the remotest antiquity to the seventeenth century, and far from confining itself to prostitution as any modern sociologist would define that phenomenon it deals not only with every form of illicit sexual intercourse concerning which the author has been able to uncover a bit of information but with erotic literature as well. LaCroix wrote before the beginning of the modern period of scientific sociological investigation, and though he makes a certain parade of grave moral concern his chief interest is that of the antiquarian, but unscientific as he is, he is still sometimes cited for his facts, and he is not unentertaining reading. There is something reminiscent of Brantôme and a faint anticipation of Havelock Ellis.

American Opinion of France. By Elizabeth B. White. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

Miss White tells the story of cis-Atlantic views on French political and international policy from 1812 to the present. There is nothing in the report she makes after an examination of the press, literature, public addresses, and correspondence of political and other leaders which will upset our notions of the changing status of relations between France and America. She deals unsatisfactorily with cis-Atlantic views of French morality, and even in the political field sins in the direction of overemphasizing pro-French sentiment in the first year of the war.

The Story of a Wonder Man. By Ring Lardner. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.75.

In this hilarious piece of tomfoolery Mr. Lardner quite outdoes himself. It should be made compulsory reading for all who are about to undertake an autobiography; after reading it, no one could possibly take himself seriously.

Red Damask. By Emanie Sachs. Harper and Brothers. $2.

A brilliant study of a family of prosperous German Jews in America. The book gets its title from the material which covers nearly everything in the household and which is symbolic of the formalities of family life.

Marcel Proust. His Life and Work. By Léon Pierre-Quint. Alfred A. Knopf.

This important study of Proust, reviewed in The Nation of May 12, 1926, is now available to English readers in a complete and adequate translation.

THEATER

GILBERT MILLER Presents
ETHEL BARRYMORE
in The Constant Wife
By W. SOMERSET MAUGHAM
AT MAXINE ELLIOTT'S THEATRE
Mats. Tues., Wed. & Thurs. No performances Saturday.
Published by George H. Doran

GILBERT MILLER and A. H. WOODS present
JEANNE EAGELS
in "Her Cardboard Lover"
By JACQUES DEVAL
Adapted by Valerie Wyngate and P. G. Wodehouse
EMPIRE B'way & 40th St., Eves., 8:30
Mats. Wed. & Sat., 2:30

Little Theatre
44th Street West of Broadway
Evgs. 8:30. Mats. Tues. and Thurs. at popular prices.
"One cannot find anywhere in New York more clever ideas, more fresh satire or more verve."—Joseph Wood Krutch in The Nation.
THE GRAND STREET FOLLIES

JANE COWL
in "The Road to Rome"
Playhouse 48th St., E. of B'way. Eves. 8:30
Matinees Wed. & Sat., 2:30

CHANIN'S BILTMORE THEATRE West 47th St. Tel. Chickering 5161
CHARLES L. WAGNER
(In Association with Edgar Selwyn) presents
The BARKER
By KENYON NICHOLSON
with WALTER HUSTON
Mats. Wed. & Sat., 2:30. Eves. at 8:30.

Industrial Exploration

By BENTON MACKAYE

[This series of three articles presents a new approach to world industrial questions. It is the approach not of the economist or the reformer but the explorer. The writer draws an analogy between the labyrinth of modern industrialism and that of the unexplored river system. Each is a wilderness. To the movement of waters within the river system he compares the movement of commodities within the industrial system. Each is a flow. He inquires whether commodity flow and industry can be charted and controlled, as river flow has been charted and controlled. In order to illustrate this new approach the writer has made some thumb-nail estimates of populations and resources. These are the result of a cursory study and are presented as assumptions rather than established facts. Such estimates should serve as a preliminary sketch for the complete chart demanded by industrial exploration.]

I. Charting the World's Commodity Flow

THE explorer Amundsen has inaugurated "a new epoch in world communication." So says the explorer Stefansson. This is the result of the recent "Magellan voyage" of the airship Norge across the North Pole.

Magellan and Columbus were twin voyagers. Each sought the glorious East. Columbus to get east would sail west. He failed. He never reached there; he bumped into America instead. Magellan completed the job. He sailed around America.

The world is far less vast than in Magellan's day, but it is far more complex. A wilderness has been reduced—and conquered. But another wilderness has risen. There are two kinds of wilderness. The dictionary defines both. One kind is "an area of land inhabited only by wild beasts." This is the vast but comparatively simple wilderness which terrestrial exploration has unraveled. The other kind is "a confused mass, heap, or collection." This is the vast and complex wilderness which awaits to be unraveled—the labyrinth of world-wide industry.

This industrial wilderness is the terra incognita of the present day. It is vast, and it is infinitely complex. It is a jungle greater and in some ways more terrible than the one our fathers faced.

Go to the Woolworth tower and look it over. What do you make of it? What this jumble of [illegible]: these belching chimneys; that floating cargo of freight cars; that battleship waiting in the harbor? What is the purpose of this great mass?

"Why," you exclaim, "to give us food and clothing and life!"

Verily, but how?—at what cost?—what manner of living during the process?—what sort of environment as the result?

You can show us how a single factory is run; you can produce the blueprints and show us a sample of the ultimate shirt for which the factory has its being. But can you produce a blueprint for industry as [illegible]? Can you show us a sample, in terms of human life, of the ultimate result which industry is seeking?

In a new way we are pre-Columbian. The industrial wilderness is for us today what the terrestrial wilderness was for the men of 1492. We are up against a new world of mystery—a new kind of geography. It requires a new type of exploration. This is industrial exploration—the charting and unraveling (geographically and technically) of the vast and complex labyrinth of world-wide industry.

"Commodity flow" is to the industrial wilderness what river flow is to the terrestrial wilderness. The river stream, starting at its sources around Itasca Lake (or in the Ozarks or the Alleghenies), flows along the channel and over the waterfall; it emerges finally at one mouth or another of the Mississippi delta. The commodity stream, starting at its sources in some Dakota wheat farm (or a Louisiana cotton field, or an Allegheny forest), flows along the railway and through the factory; it emerges finally in the form of flour (or else of shirts or of shingles) at one "mouth" or another of the industrial system (a corner grocery in New Orleans, a department store in Philadelphia, or a lumber yard in Jersey).

As La Salle and the early French explorers had to unravel the intricate network of river streams making up the Mississippi system, so the industrial explorer of today must unravel the intricate network of commodity streams which forms the industrial system. Each stream is a line of "flow," whether of water or commodity.

Lines of commodity flow are illustrated in the accompanying charts:

Chart 1 shows some main lines of world communication: those in the Northern Hemisphere. It shows the chief rail and ocean lines which encircle the globe. It shows also the possible aerial routes uniting important centers across the Arctic zone.

Chart 2 is a sample chart of commodity flow. Each line shown is a "commodity stream." It is a stream consisting of 1 per cent of the total tonnage of commodities exported from the United States during 1923. But only a part of the stream is shown: the part which lies upon the ocean.

Another part of the stream lies upon the land, along some railroad route. The tonnage leaving Atlantic ports is first, of course, hauled by rail from some point within the United States. Thus the commodity stream is a line of transport, whether by land or water.

But it is more than this. The commodity stream involves more than the industry of transportation. It involves every other industry as well—farming, mining, lumbering, the various forms of manufacturing. These portions of the commodity stream cannot be shown on Chart 2. But they could if the chart were large enough.

Chart 3 shows some major lines of commodity flow. These consist of the chief freight routes (rail and ocean—actual or possible) through which the commodity streams are likely to keep on flowing.

Of Particular Interest to NATION Readers

SOME NEWSPAPERS AND NEWSPAPERMEN

By

Oswald Garrison Villard

EDITOR OF THE NATION

Of the first edition of this book, Robert Morss Lovett wrote: "Mr. Villard is unusually well fitted for his task. He inherited the ownership of a great newspaper. No one ever questioned his journalistic ability or his high view of the responsibilities of the profession, to which he was willing to sacrifice material success. . . . Undoubtedly the chief interest in Mr. Villard's book is in the narratives of successful struggle and the vivid portraits which lend to his subjects the interest of drama and character. He shows how practically all the great newspapers of his country owe their origin to some dominating individual, the New York Times to Ochs, the World to Pulitzer, the Herald to Bennett, the Chicago Tribune to Medill, the Louisville Courier-Journal to Watterson, the Kansas City Star to Nelson."

Mr. Villard belongs to a family that "has had the privilege of serving journalistic ideals for one hundred and five years." He himself has belonged to the profession for thirty years.

New Edition. $3.00

ALFRED A. KNOPF BORZOI BOOKS 730 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

$ $ $ $ $ $ $ $ $ $ $ $ $

YOUR MONEY'S WORTH

A Study in the Waste of the Consumer's Dollar

By Stuart Chase and F. J. Schlink

THIS amazing book lifts the curtain on all the side shows of Main Street and lets you see precisely how The New Salesmanship and High Pressure Advertising are separating you painlessly from your money. Much of the fantastic hokum, deliberate falsehood, misrepresentation and quackery of the Wonderland of Advertising is exposed—the book names cases, offenders and products by the score.

If you are tired playing Alice in a Wonderland of hypnotic words and empty values, read this book. It should enable you to get more for your money than you ever have before. Dr. Henry Seidel Canby, Dorothy Canfield and other noted critics have endorsed it.

Facts are made as entertaining as a detective story, or a magician's performance. This is one book that will tickle your funnybone as well as your bankroll.

Just Published

At all bookstores—$2.00

The Macmillan Co. · New York

Is there something you want that you can't quite afford---

A new tennis racquet, a kodak, one or two of the latest books, some extravagant trifle for your summer wardrobe?

Many Nation readers have found that they can earn extra money for extra pleasures by taking advantage of our exceptional offer to reader-agents. Why not try it yourself?

Dept. 11
THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York
What is your exceptional offer to reader-agents?

Name .....

Address .....

THE SPIRIT AND PRACTICE of the NEW EDUCATION

Twenty interesting articles summarizing the work in the modern schools. The July issue of PROGRESSIVE EDUCATION, a distinguished magazine published quarterly for educators and the general reader.
Sixty Cents a single issue. Two Dollars per year.

CREATIVE EXPRESSION THROUGH MUSIC

Ten valuable articles, one hundred illustrations, showing the latest methods in children's music.
Thirty-five Cents a copy.

THE ENVIRONMENT FOR CREATIVE EDUCATION

Ten articles, still one hundred pictures, showing children at work and at play in ideal surroundings.
Thirty-five Cents a copy.

MID-SUMMER SPECIAL OFFER

PROGRESSIVE EDUCATION for one year, "Creative Expression Through Music," and "The Environment for Creative Education"—ALL FOR TWO DOLLARS.

Published by the most effective agency working for liberal procedure in the schools.

THE PROGRESSIVE EDUCATION ASSOCIATION
10 JACKSON PLACE WASHINGTON, D. C.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

River stream or commodity stream, each is a "flow" from source to destination; each seems to be an inevitable flow, and yet one which—within limits—can be guided. The charting of this flow, as a basis for guidance within natural limits—this is the job of industrial exploration.

The immediate problems concerning the lines of commodity flow seem to relate to their entanglements. There are physical entanglements and political ones.

Physical entanglements may be illustrated by the "bottle-neck." Note the choking and bubbling process which takes place when you try quickly to empty fluid from a bottle. That is what happens in New York City. All roads lead there. They pour in their commodities—over the New York Central, the Pennsylvania, and a dozen other railway lines. The flow pours out again—through the harbor, or else back over the New York Central and the other lines. One-fifth of the export tonnage flow of the United States squeezes out through the port of New York.

But this is only a small fraction of the tonnage which comes in to this city and goes out again, or else remains to be consumed. (Export tonnage is only a small fraction of total tonnage moved.) The more commodity flow moving toward a center, the more people needed to take care of it; the more people, the more flow needed to take care of them.

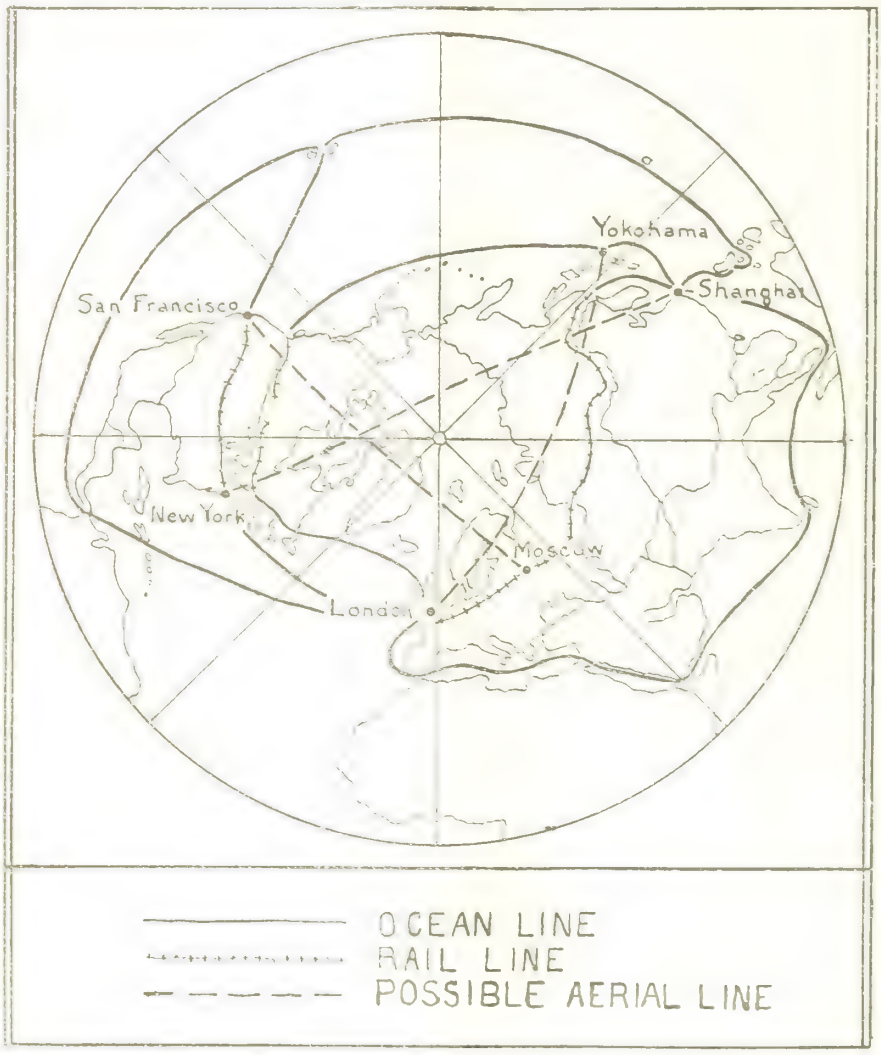
Look at Chart 3. Each seaport or terminal shown (each little black dot) is a focusing center in world-wide commodity flow. Each, in greater or less degree, is a "New York."

Political entanglements also may be spied upon Chart 3. These result not from the flow itself (as in the "bottle-neck") but in its proprietorship. They are illustrated most aptly by cases of parallel (and competing) lines of commodity flow.

The story is told out in the Rocky Mountains of the "war" which once took place between the surveying parties engaged respectively in locating two parellel lines of railway. Not content with pulling up each other's stakes, they had several encounters in which they "hove rocks" at one another. Each surveying party represented a separate group of railway interests.

Chart 3 shows (among others) a certain pair of parallel and potentially competing lines running from Western Europe to India. One of these lines consists of the ocean-trade route from England through Gibraltar, Suez, and the Red Sea. The other consists of the railway from Germany through Constantinople into Mesopotamia, extended by the potential ocean route through the Persian Gulf. Each line at one time represented a separate group of interests. Each group did business under a separate national flag. The interests of the groups somehow became entangled—and no way was found of straightening them. Other groups became involved and other tangles. There were four years of "rock heaving" before the affair was quieted.

To fathom the wilderness of the industrial system we must study some of the methods used to fathom the wilderness of the American continent.



1. LINES OF WORLD COMMUNICATION (NORTHERN HEMISPHERE)

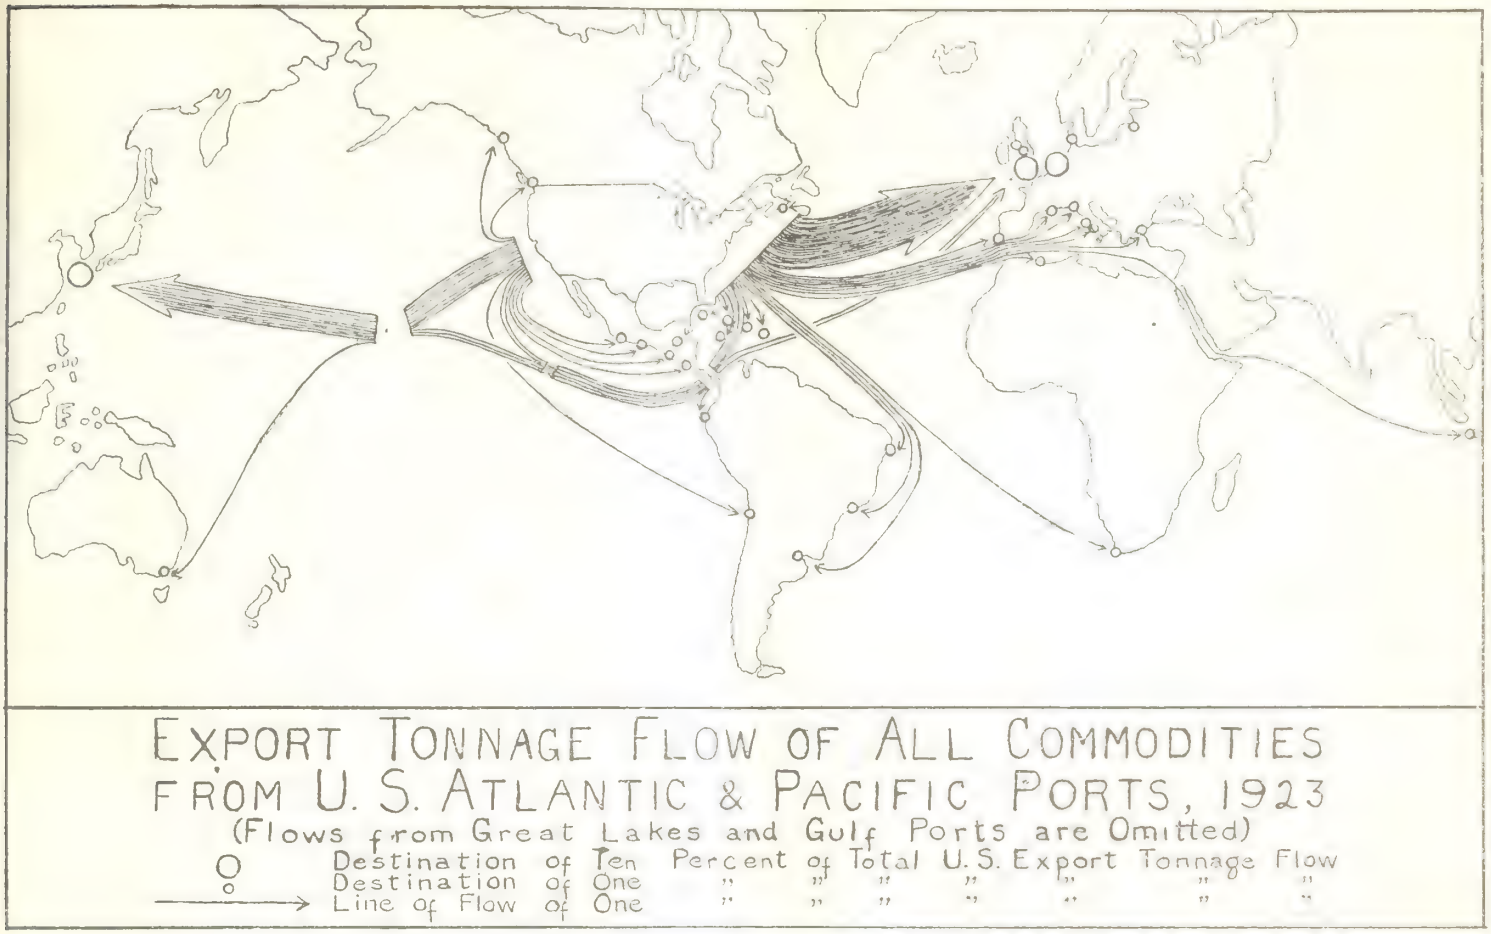
One way was by following the rivers. The river stream was the unerring guide. This was because it always flowed one way—from a definite source to a definite destination. That is how we charted the once uncomprehended Mississippi River system.

The commodity stream also flows always one way—from a definite source to a definite destination. Natural resources form the source; human requirements determine the destination. It is a matter of following back to the sources and following out to the destination.

This requires an exploration—a survey. The ultimate result would be an atlas. The United States Geological Survey has made a "World Atlas of Commercial Geology." There should be a "World Atlas of Commodity Flow." It would consist of three parts: (1) A survey of world requirements; (2) a survey of world resources; (3) a survey of the lines of flow, one by one, from source to destination.

The deep-down question of industry is not merely whether it is technically efficient or inefficient; nor whether it exploits. But is it running wild? What lies behind the wildly accelerating industrial congestions in the world's big ports and cities? What lies behind our modern wars? Commerce perhaps, but what is "commerce"? Is the labyrinth which industry has spun becoming entangled beyond our power to control?

2. A CHART OF COMMODITY FLOW



EXPORT TONNAGE FLOW OF ALL COMMODITIES
FROM U. S. ATLANTIC & PACIFIC PORTS, 1923
(Flows from Great Lakes and Gulf Ports are Omitted)
Destination of Ten Percent of Total U.S. Export Tonnage Flow Destination of One " " " " " " "
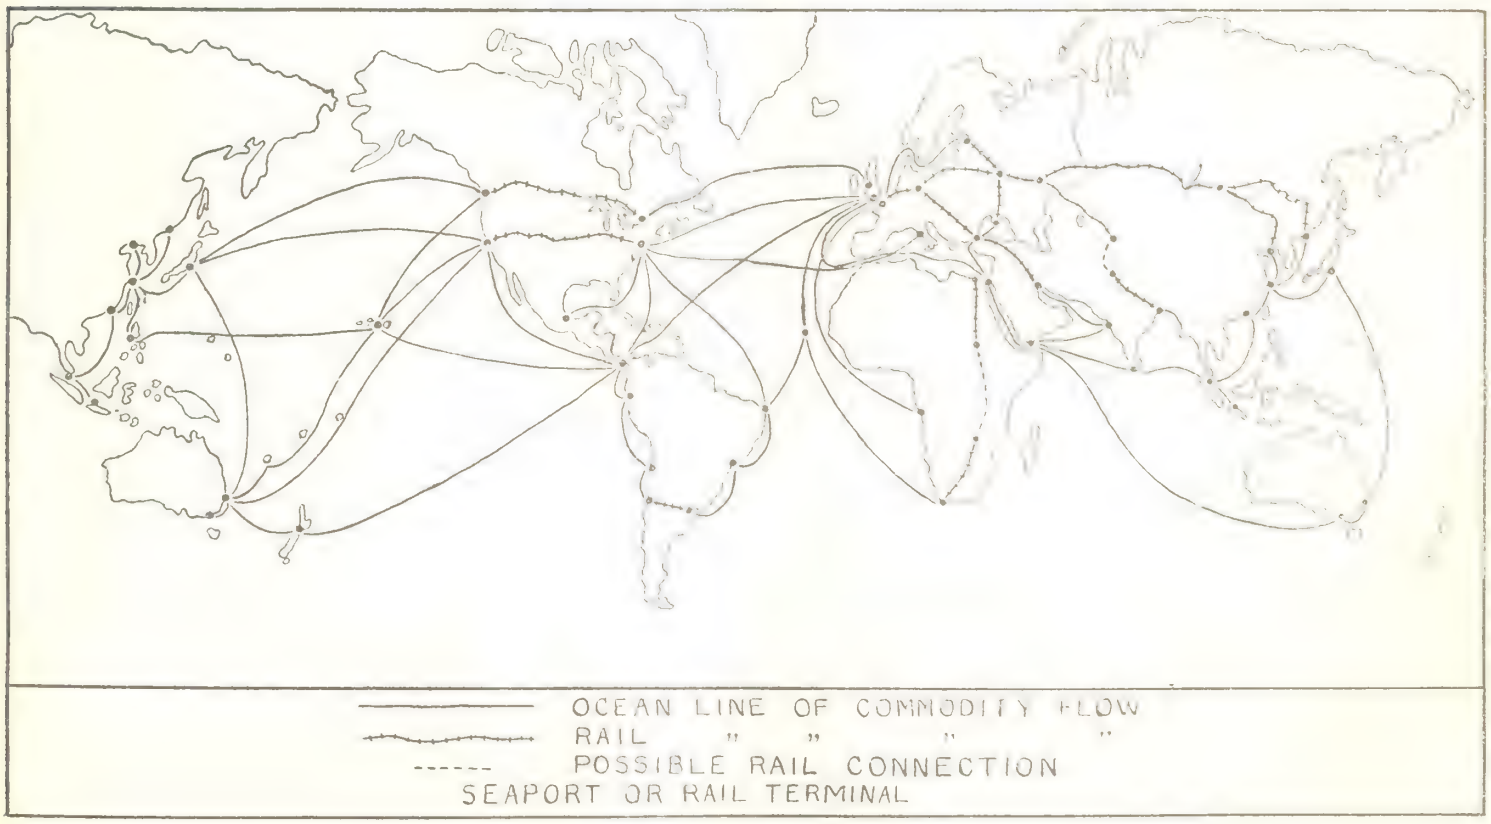
Line of Flow of One " " " " " " "

3. MAJOR LINES OF COMMODITY FLOW



OPEN SHELF

GOOD CHEER, COMRADES! Want to buy, sell, or swap books, bronzes, old china, clocks, curios, etchings, lamps, paintings, prints, oriental rugs? Bus, or stroll to Daca's, 63 Washington Sq. So., N. Y. C. Books always 20 to 80% off. Open eves

BOOKS All books (except text) sent post free anywhere at 15% discount from publishers' prices. List on request.
ISRAEL SOIFER
1211 Clay Avenue New York City

EDUCATIONAL

HESSIAN HILLS SCHOOL
(FORMERLY MT. AIRY SCHOOL)

A Little School in the country where boys and girls from 2 to 12 years may live and learn in a world not only of text books.
Elizabeth Moos, director — Croton-on-Hudson, N. Y.

SPECIALTY SHOPS

CAN YOU COME to see me? I have lovely hand-made Russian and Rumanian dresses and tunics that I'd like to show you. They are smart, cool, comfortable, and quite reasonably priced.
MARITZA, 49 Christopher Street, New York.

FOR SALE

ATTRACTIVE little Russian Dress and Gift Shop of unique character conveniently located in Greenwich Village, for a very reasonable figure on account of owner's ill health. Phone Spring 7578 from 12 to 6, or write Box 834, % The Nation.

MISCELLANEOUS

Use long distance calls to save trips, to get things done. You'll be surprised how little they cost.
BELL LONG DISTANCE SERVICE

HOUSE FOR SALE

FOR SALE—[illegible] story, old Brooklyn Heights brick-and-frame house. On lower Bridge end of Heights where new subway will raise values. Completely remodeled in 4 separate studio apartments, each with modern bathroom. Steam heat, open fireplaces, electricity, gas. Enclosed South porch; deep backyard with trees and shrubbery. $15,000; first mortgage $[illegible], owner to be arranged. Write L. S. G., 64 Pa[illegible] St., Brooklyn, or phone Main 9496 evenings.

CONNECTION WANTED

FOREIGN representative. Teacher, University graduate, [illegible] perfect command French and Spanish, going to Paris in August, year's stay, wishes to represent N. Y. firm or institution. Experience European travels, publishing, translating, social work, music. Best references. Box 832, % The Nation.

POSITIONS WANTED

HIGH-CALIBRED man, intensive personnel experience, writer on industrial problems, seeks connection requiring tact, judgment, and unde[illegible]ing of human nature. Box 828, % The Nation.

WOMAN, several years' experience, editorial, secretarial and executive work, wants after-noon employment in connection with any profession. New York City. Box 835, % The Nation, or phone Butterfield 7529.

SECRETARY-Stenographer, six years' diversified experience in office detail, desires position. World considered. Box 826. The Nation.

TWENTY-ONE year old college student, slightly crippled, desires a summer position. Anywhere, or anything suitable. Martin Green, 328 Hamilton Avenue, Paterson, N. J.

SPORTS Writer, 26, more interested in literature than sports, desires position as assistant to editor of literary publication. University graduate; well-read, cultured. Box 833, The Nation.

FURNISHED ROOM

FURNISHED room for rent in a colonial house in Greenwich Village. Quaint—quiet. $45. Write Box No. 762 or phone Whitehall 7730.

SUMMER PLACES

IDEAL of SMALL CAMPS!

Capacity limited to 150—Inspiring Adirondack setting. Every desirable facility for sports, with seven real clay tennis courts. Excellent living quarters. Unusual social programs. From every angle the camp for the discriminating vacationist.

Rate $30 Per Week

Address ECHO LAKE TAVERN
Warrensburg, New York
Warrensburg 55—Longacre 5432
MAE NUSBL REBECCA NUSBL

Rock-Lake Country Club
Formerly CAMP GREATER UTOPIA
Narrowsburg, N.Y. Phone Narrowsburg 89-R 22
ON BEAUTIFUL ROCK LAKE

A vacation playground for young folks. All water sports, tennis, basketball, handball. Entertainments arranged, social programs varied daily. Dancing; everything informal. Meals unrivaled (dietary laws observed). Rates and full information on request.

H. GELBAUM, Manager

WHY NOT A CAMP
with every convenience and comfort, situated in a rustic woodland bordering an 11 mile lake. All water and land sports, including tennis, golf and horseback riding. Excellent food. At the very reasonable rate of $25. per week.

Pioneer Lodge will be limited to 50 people and will appeal to those who seek a complete change of environment with none of the bustle and noise of either the city or the usual crowded summer camp. It is in the Northwestern Adirondacks, near Thousand Islands.

PIONEER LODGE, Star Lake, N. Y.
Accessible overnight by N. Y. Central
CITY OFFICE
14 WEST 42ND STREET
PHONE WISCONSIN 2165
DIRECTORS
HERMAN BLANC
BILL STERN

THE LLOYD, Bellport, L. I.
ON THE GREAT SOUTH BAY
COOL COMFORTABLE CHARMING
ALL SPORTS
For regular guests and week-end parties
Address The Lloyd, Bellport, L. I.
Tel. Bellport 17
(Owners, D. J. & K. M. Meserole)

Lena Barish and Sam Garlen
Former owners of Echo Lake Tavern,
ARE NOW CONDUCTING
GREEN MANSIONS

FRENCH SCHOOL

Château-Neuvic School
A Church School for American Boys preparing for American Colleges.
Wholesome country life organized in a historic feudal castle. American standards of hygiene and diet; yearly tuition $1,200. Full sports program, including crew.
The Rt. Rev. Charles H. Brent, Bishop of American Churches in Europe, Chairman of Board of Trustees.
Address: Dr. Conrad Chapman, Head Master, Chateau-Neuvic, Neuvic-sur-l'Isle, Dordogne, France

BOOKS

The Great French Revolution
By PETER KROPOTKIN
In most accepted histories of the French Revolution, one merely reads facts and values concerning the events of those days. In Kropotkin's great work of that momentous epoch you are behind the scenes and participate directly in what transpires at the time. The revolution springs into life. You [illegible] people. You feel their struggles against increasing oppression turning into an irresistible torrent of action. You see the [illegible] stream meet and combine with the current of [illegible] aroused by the calculating [illegible] of the [illegible] leaders. You see and understand the [illegible] of the [illegible]
Two Volumes, clothbound, $1.[illegible]
At all Booksellers or $1.[illegible] by mail from the publishers.
VANGUARD PRESS, 80 Fifth Ave., New York

Marx's CAPITAL
The most epoch-making of all works on economics: a critical analysis of the processes of capitalist production and distribution. Marx has done for social science what Darwin did for biology.
Cloth, 3 volumes, 2,086 pages, $7.50 postpaid.
Charles H. Kerr & Company, 347 East Ohio St., Chicago

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXV NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 27, 1927 No. 3238

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 75
EDITORIALS:
From Geneva to Honolulu 78
General von Hoffmann 79
The Elgin Marbles 79
THE WORLD DOES CHANGE. By Hendrik Willem van Loon 80
THERE'S MUD ON INDIANA'S WHITE ROBES. By Louis Fraina Budenz 81
THE NEGRO IN THE INDUSTRIAL SOUTH. By E. Franklin Frazier 83
ICELAND AND INDUSTRY. By Earl Hanson 84
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 86
CORRESPONDENCE 86
BOOKS:
Warm Stone Woman. By Howard McKinley Corning 88
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 88
Exclusive Tour—Personally Conducted. By Ruth S. Alexander 88
The Woman Question. By Johan Smertenko 89
The People's Book. By Gerald Carson 90
If This Were So. By Louis Fischer 90
Guidance. By Harry Alan Potamkin 91
Books in Brief 91
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Industrial Exploration: II. Charting the World's Requirements. By Benton MacKaye 92

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER, Managing Editor — JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH, Literary Editor

FREDA KIRCHWEY — MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

MURDER IS THE FIT WORD to describe the action of the United States marines in Nicaragua. The United States created the anarchy which it is now attempting to suppress. When the Liberals had substantially reconquered the country American marines retook it for the Conservatives, and today they are doing police work for a government which would collapse in sixty seconds if the American forces retired. When President Coolidge's personal envoy, Henry L. Stimson, threatened forcibly to disarm the Liberal troops in May, one Nicaraguan general, Sandino, retired to the hills and kept up the fight. Undoubtedly he has maintained himself by preying on the country; undoubtedly, too, he has the sympathy of the vast majority of his countrymen. And a general who, at the head of 500 barefoot Nicaraguans, defies the United States commands our respect. General Sandino even attacked an outpost of United States marines at Otocal. Heavily outnumbered, but better armed and trained, the marines put up a brilliant resistance. They might, however, have lost but for the arrival of five American bombing planes which swept Sandino's ranks with machine guns—4,000 rounds—and dropped twenty-seven bombs. They left 300 dead Nicaraguans (some, apparently, civilians) for the vultures to feed on, and no one knows how many wounded. The Americans lost one killed and two seriously wounded. And when William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, protested to Secretary Kellogg, that official replied that Sandino's men were "outlaws." What law excuses the use of American marines on Nicaraguan battlefields or of American bombing planes for mass murder?

UNDERNEATH THE SMOOTH SURFACE of life in Europe as the tourist sees it simmers a black cauldron of class bitterness and hate. It boiled over in Vienna in that bloody July week when the workmen of Vienna set out to protest against the acquittal of fascist gunmen and met a murderous police force. The fascists were guilty enough; they had killed workmen marching in a previous parade; but because they were safely anti-radical a reactionary court set them free. Such political acquittals are not uncommon in Europe; and they are fit matter for protest. But Vienna, while it has a Socialist municipal administration, has a police force subject to the Clerical federal government, and the workmen of Vienna had old grudges against that police force before this new outbreak. The police fired into the crowd; the crowd attacked the police—there were gruesome acts on both sides of the barricades—and for two days Vienna was in the throes of a spontaneous revolution which no one, apparently, had planned and no one led. The Palace of Justice was burned, and its papers thrown into the wet streets; police posts were sacked; eighty men met death and hundreds of wounded flooded the Viennese hospitals. For three days the capitals of Europe trembled at successive rumors of new insurrections and of threatened interventions; then the bubble of revolution broke, and the Clerical Government called on the Socialists to help clean up the mess. A few tourists, however, had seen Europe more honestly than Cook's tours ever planned.

IT IS HARD for the public to follow the labyrinth of technicalities that grow up in the courts about some of our most important legal controversies. This is especially true of the oil scandals of the Harding regime, in regard to which most of the legal questions are still in abeyance long after people have all but forgotten the original circumstances. Hence the New York World is performing a public service in its careful reporting of each new development and its frequent summaries of the status of proceedings. Of the two civil suits the one against E. L. Doheny for the recovery of Elk Hills has been won finally by the Government through a decision of the Supreme Court. The same court is now considering the Government's claim for the Teapot Dome tract held by Harry F. Sinclair. Fall and Doheny were acquitted last December when tried for criminally conspiring to defraud the Government, but they are still to be tried for bribery, a charge on which it should be easier to convict. Demurrers to the indictments have just been overruled in this case, but it is not expected that it will come to trial before next year. There also remains for trial the bribery charge against Fall and Sinclair, and final adjudication of the latter's jail sentence for contempt in refusing to answer questions put by the Senate's investigating committee. Justice is slow—we wish we could add that it is sure.

DESTITUTION, MISERY, DESOLATION, ruin. This is the picture that L. C. Speers sends back to the New York Times from the water-logged land of the Mississippi. In one zone, he reports, 200,000 people face actual starvation. This, he says, is the opinion "of every man who can speak with authority." They have no chance to harvest a crop, and their homes, their possessions, and their credit are gone. About two-thirds of the inundated area may perhaps produce a crop of some kind. Meanwhile we hopefully scan the statements of President Coolidge in South Dakota. But we read of no sympathy with or plans for rehabilitating the flood sufferers. There is time for Mr. Coolidge to talk of worms and horses and cowboys, birthday cakes and cerise shirts, but of the flood sufferers, so far as we have observed, there has been no mention. On this problem of national concern the Summer White House has maintained the studied silence of deliberate indifference. It is about time, says the New York World:

> to characterize as it deserves to be characterized the policy of an administration which turned its back on the Lower Mississippi Valley and dodged the responsibility of a rehabilitation program simply because it was afraid of calling Congress. That policy was the result of a second-rate, politically minded caution whose one controlling aim was to avoid anything that might "embarrass" the Administration or be "bad politics" for a super-cautious President whose chief worries were in the corn belt, not the South.

JAPANESE TROOPS have reoccupied the province of Shantung, which, even before Confucius was born there some two and a half millenniums ago, was China's holy province. Not only has Japan occupied the port city of Tsingtao, which she took from Germany in 1914—Germany in turn having forced its cession as compensation for the death of two missionaries in the interior—but she has sent her troops inland along the railway to the provincial capital, Tsinanfu—which happens also to be a strategic junction along the northward line of Chiang Kai-shek's projected advance on Peking. Nor are these troops mere defenders of life and property—they include a complete staff of railway operators, with engineers, telegraphers, and station agents. This is the historic form of land imperialism. Japan, which since the Washington Conference had shown a notable vision of her future as a leader of Asia, has reverted to a futile imitation of Western imperialism. For the moment she has checked Chiang's northward movement; but she has started against herself the economic boycott—the powerful weapon of Chinese Nationalism which sapped the roots of British prestig[illegible] while the various wings of the Nationalists seem to be drawing nearer. The Hankow regime is dropping some of its Communist allies; the Nanking Government, desperate in its efforts to scrape together money, is readier to cooperate; and as usual the "Christian general," Feng Yu-hsiang, is waiting to see how the wind blows. And while the foreign marines idly watch, all the Chinese governments are raising tariff rates and jettisoning treaties at a rate which two years ago would have provoked angry ultimatums and threats of armed force.

"WE HAVE BEEN TREATED with the utmost courtesy by the admirals of the Navy Department, but the controlling viewpoint of these gentlemen is purely that of the professional militarist"—thus the supervisors of the City of San Francisco summed up their argument with the Navy Department over the question of a bridge across San Francisco Bay. It is a matter of tremendous import to the city and the steadily increasing number of commuters who live across the bay that a bridge shall take the place of the ferries at a place above Hunter's Point. But the navy flatly vetoes this great and greatly needed peace-time improvement because in time of war "it might be necessary to make sorties out of the bay in fleet formation"! The supervisors have offered to build a bridge so high that all but the very largest battleships can steam under it. The navy wants to anchor its battleships in a place south of Yerba Buena Island. They cannot deny that they could also anchor them north of that island and so be above the bridge, but they prefer the lower anchorage and that is all there is to it. The needs of a great American city and its populous environs are to be subordinated to the chance that some day we might get into a war with somebody and the fleet might be at anchor below Yerba Buena and might have to make a sortie and might have to make that sortie in fleet formation! Had anybody suggested such a thing in 1900 he would have been termed a lunatic. Naturally, San Francisco is appealing over the heads of the admirals to the Secretaries of War and the Navy and to the President. The Secretaries will not help, we are sure; Mr. Coolidge may.

THE MAYOR OF LYNN, Massachusetts, last summer offered a prize to the city employee who should submit the best plan for reducing the tax rate and increasing the efficiency of the city government. The city treasurer, the city clerk, and the city auditor, acting as judges, awarded a prize to Mrs. Della Clifford, a teacher in the Lynn schools, who submitted a plan for reorganization of the naturalization program. The Board of Education invited Mrs. Clifford to read her prize-winning essay at its meeting on February 8. Immediately thereafter the board went into executive session and voted to announce its intention of dismissing Mrs. Clifford, which it did on March 29. No charges against Mrs. Clifford's work or conduct have been made nor have any been found in the records covering her sixteen years of service in the Lynn schools. There are no charges in the record of the meeting of February 8. In fact, one of the members of the board has issued a signed statement to the effect that no charges were brought against her at that time. Apparently the explanation of Mrs. Clifford's dismissal must be sought in the facts that she is politically opposed to the present mayor, who is chairman ex-officio of the Board of Education, that she ran against him on the Labor ticket, and that she is otherwise active in her support of the unions of organized labor.

IF YOU ARE AN HONEST PROFESSOR of biology in some institution that is in danger of going into the hands of receivers, beware of the Baptist Bible Union. When "truth" and religion clash, contracts and other rights of instructors suffer. Last June Des Moines University experienced a financial crisis and was bought at a discount by the Baptist Bible Union of North America. The first official procedure of the new trustees was to hold an inquisition: Did every faculty member believe the entire Bible literally? Naturally some had stumbled into symbolic interpretations; and this resulted in the exodus of twenty faculty members, some of their own accord and the rest by request. Every position in science was vacated, and Norman MacDowell Grier, professor of biology, was asked to leave despite a two-year contract which specified freedom to teach evolution. If the dismissed teachers are willing to wait a year or two, the American Association of University Professors will conduct an investigation and then very likely write letters informing them that their dismissals were quite unjust. In the meantime the instructors can join the army of ousted teachers, and meditate on what is wrong with our educational system.

IN THE BITUMINOUS COAL FIELDS of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and western Pennsylvania, almost 170,000 miners have been on strike since April 1. Their troubles, however, like the flood news, have been confined to the limbo of short public memory. The public has had little to worry about. Plenty of cheap coal is all it wants from the coal industry, and it has been getting that. But the weekly production of the 400,000 non-union coal miners is falling off, while the 90,000,000 tons of surplus coal that was in reserve at the beginning of the strike is becoming depleted. The public may yet join the coal miners and their families in paying the price of laissez-faire production and its resultant cut-throat competition.

FISHING HAS USUALLY BEEN REGARDED as the most harmless and tranquilizing of occupations. The majority of those addicted to the rod vote the straight ticket of the party they were born to, and history does not record a single conspiracy ever hatched beside a trout-stream. Yet the sharp eye of the radio censor can discover a sinister side in any attempt to discuss too searchingly the principles of even the angler's gentle art and accordingly he has just canceled the talk which Mr. Fred B. Shaw was to deliver from station WABC on "Our Trout, Our President, and Our Fishing Methods." We are inclined to suspect that Mr. Shaw is right when he assumes that his proposed references to His Majesty the President, rather than those to either fish or worms, were the cause of the decree of silence issued against him, but inasmuch as his purpose was to defend rather than attack the methods employed by the first of these the affair baffles our editorial sagacity. Is it merely another example of the lengths to which the broadcasting stations will go in their efforts to protect their hearers from any opinions more controversial than those held by Peter Rabbit, or has the apotheosis of Mr. Coolidge reached the point where even to assume that he needs defense is a sort of sacrilege?

AN "ANGRY PASSENGER," so the newspapers say, caused a collision on the elevated railroad in Brooklyn the other day. The doors of the car in which he was riding had failed to open at two successive stations, and the "angry passenger," seizing the cord of the emergency brake, brought the train to a grinding stop just beyond a curve in the road. The curve and a tree cut off the vision of the motorman of a train behind, and he ran into the stalled cars. A number of persons were slightly hurt. Doubtless there will be many moralists to point to the accident as a judgment upon the "angry passenger" and a warning not to give way to impatience. We see no such moral. On the contrary we propose three rousing cheers for the "angry passenger." Fundamentally the accident was not his fault. The operating methods of the road were more to blame, not to speak of the supineness of the transit authorities in allowing the companies to reduce the guards in the subways and on the elevated railways to one for every two cars, so that passengers are often helpless prisoners when doors fail to work. What New York City needs is not fewer, but more angry passengers. A roiled and pugnacious passenger in every car of the subway and "L" would improve transit conditions 50 per cent in three months. We indorse the movement, and as every campaign must have a slogan, we propose:

> An angry man in every car
> Will soon bring service up to par.

The New York Times condemns the American Trade-Union Delegation to Russia. "Outside of Russia," it says, "plenty of material exists for a dispassionate survey of Soviet conditions. . . . Unfortunately observation and contact have hitherto been productive of more error than enlightenment."

> "MOTHER, may I look at the Bolsheviks?"
> "Yes, my little gusher;
> "But 'ware of Soviet parlor tricks
> "And don't go near to Russia.
>
> "Wash your hands if you touch their tracts;
> "Stop your ears when they speak;
> "Dispassionately survey the facts
> "From afar; but, child, don't peek!
>
> "Nervous Nellie will show you how—
> "Borrow Nellie's glasses;
> "Listen to Winston's bow-wow-wow—
> "But hide if a Russian passes."

THE BODY OF JULIUS SLOWACKI, the "Shelley of Poland," has just been brought back to his native land and his remains consigned to the vaults of the Polish kings on the Wawel Hill at Cracow. This signal honor of repatriation has been given seventy-eight years after his death to a brilliant dreamer who in his lifetime suffered a tempestuous career of exile and desperate poverty. Born in Krzemieniec on August 23, 1809, Slowacki received his education at the University of Vilna. In 1830 his too daring conceptions of freedom forced him to leave the country, and it was during his foreign wanderings that he gave vent to the remarkable spirit of poetry which has placed him with Mickiewicz and Krasinski in the divine trio of Polish poetry. A dramatist of power, his intense nationalism poured forth against his country's oppression. The return of Slowacki's remains to the soil he loved, to the posterity his songs have helped weld together, is one of the happy expressions of Europe's post-war nationalism.

SOMETHING OF THE FIRE OF IRELAND went out when the Countess Markievicz died. Although she married a Polish nobleman she was Irish to the core, and a flame of idealism wherever she went. Born to ease, she began as a Lady Bountiful in Dublin's slums, and there won the sympathies that bound her close to Irish hearts to the end. England condemned her to death after the Easter uprising in 1916, but set her free in time to be the first woman elected to the British Parliament. She never took her seat; she would not swear allegiance to the King. To the end she remained an irreconcilable Republican.

From Geneva to Honolulu

WHILE the Geneva Disarmament Conference is spouting hot lava and suspicion, a less noisy but far more genuine disarmament conference is meeting at Honolulu. The Institute of Pacific Relations is drawing together for the second time a group of unofficial delegates of most of the great Pacific countries. We say "most" advisedly, because this Honolulu conference follows the tradition by omitting from its sessions representatives of Soviet Russia. It was, for Europe, a great thing when Frenchmen and Germans learned to drink beer together and meet as friends, but Europe will not settle down until the same atmosphere of friendly confidence extends to sessions with Russians. It is a great stride forward for Americans and Japanese to light each other's cigarettes while discussing California's immigration laws, and for Englishmen and Chinese to consider over their teacups the future of Shanghai; but there are dangerous reserves to any meeting which first excludes and then elaborately ignores its exclusion of representatives of any great country. And Russia is, indisputably and sometimes menacingly, one of the great Pacific Powers.

When statesmen admit that they disagree, the fact somehow contrives to seem disastrous. Every European diplomatic pow-wow since the war, however violent its private disagreements, has concluded with a solemn assertion of complete agreement. This Honolulu session is franker. It meets avowedly to discuss the points of friction between East and West, "with the hope that an honest attempt to state these differences may lead to a way to reconcile them." It certainly has the courage of its hopes. As a preliminary to its sessions, data have been assembled upon some of the most prickly problems. Professor Eliot Mears of Leland Stanford University has collated American laws affecting Orientals. The Australians have made similar studies; the Japanese have tabulated their laws dealing with foreigners. At least something is gained by the discovery that none of the countries facing the Pacific cares to give aliens the same privileges which it allows its own citizens. Sir Frederick Whyte, first president of the Indian Legislative Assembly, who heads the British delegation, has prepared a monograph on "China and the Foreign Powers" which reveals the painfully honest effort of a born proconsul of empire to understand the raucous language of young Asia.

One must not expect immediate effects from such a conference. No treaties will emerge from it; no battleships will be scrapped as a result of it and no colonies will be relinquished. But it may go far to establish the habit of joint discussion of international problems which is, after all, more important than courts or treaties or battleships. And the habit of joint discussion, shallowly rooted even in Europe, is a growingly important matter in the Pacific. Far as we have progressed since the days of the Boxer expeditions and indemnities we are still in the ultimatum-stage of manners when it comes to China. No foreign Power has been willing to accept the Chinese suggestions of a joint investigation of responsibility for the Nanking affair. The foreigners have assembled the testimony of their own nationals, and have thought that enough.

As Benton MacKaye says elsewhere in this issue of The Nation, there was a time when we had a planet but not a world. There were several worlds. Today the Panama and Suez canals, the Trans-Siberian railway, the ocean-bridging airplanes are knitting the world's civilizations into one fabric. China and India, with half the earth's man-power, are no longer to be remote, romantic countries, nor can we afford to treat them as pariahs. They buy our mineral oil and weave our silk and grow the beans that yield other oils for our industries. Their civil wars climb onto the front pages of our newspapers; perforce we begin to distinguish between Chang and Chiang. America, more or less unconsciously, is accepting their new importance. The Pacific Coast thinks New York provincial because it pays so much more attention to its Lindberghs, Chamberlins, and Byrds than to the Pacific-flying Maitlands, Hegenbergers, and Smiths. San Francisco-to-Hongkong interests it more than New York-to-Paris—and it is thinking in more contemporaneous terms than are we of the Atlantic Coast. It is not without significance that the first five Presidents of the Nineteenth Century had all seen European service; and that from Andrew Jackson's day to Roosevelt's only one President had seen Europe before he entered the White House. We began as an Atlantic colony of Europe, dependent upon Europe for ideas, for literature, for industrial resources. Then we turned our back upon the Eastern ocean and molded an inland nation. Today that nation faces two seas. Already one President of the United States has seen service in Asia before taking the country's helm; others are sure to follow. We will no longer be dominated in our outlook by the traditions of a single ocean; we are, as a nation, a bridge between two civilizations. In our day a Londoner can reach Shanghai more rapidly by passing through the United States than by following the ancient route through the Mediterranean and the Indian Ocean. Such facts mold history.

But East is East, we have been saying, and West is West, and never the twain shall meet. Poet never composed a more dangerous lie. The twain do meet. They meet in the public schools of California, in the treaty ports like Shanghai—and, fortunately, in the Institute of Pacific Relations at Honolulu. They meet, and they modify each other. One of the preliminary studies for the Honolulu meetings was a rather tragic investigation of the second-generation Oriental in America. Boys and girls, put through the mill of the American public-school system, become, psychologically, completely Americanized. They refuse to speak their parents' tongues; they lose all understanding of the land of their origin—but retain the physical stigmata which bar them from most channels of advance in this race-conscious country. One homesick son of Los Angeles who had visited the cherry-blossom country of his fathers, wrote in ecstacy when he returned to familiar sights: "It takes a Hearst paper to make me feel at home." Ridiculous as these extremes sound, they are evidence of the fundamental human kinship. There is no barrier to understanding and sympathy in brain and blood cells. We can meet, we can talk together, we can understand. The college presidents and professors, the ministers, labor leaders, and social workers from both sides of the Pacific who are meeting today in ing against mutual suspicions which are potentially far more dangerous to the human race than those which have flared so vividly at Geneva.

General von Hoffmann

GENERAL Max von Hoffmann, whose death in Germany has been reported, played an extraordinary role in the World War. He was the officer who conducted Lenin and his revolutionary associates in a closed and guarded car from Switzerland to the territory in Russia occupied by the Germans, and there set them loose to undermine the Czar. When that work was successfully accomplished, to a far greater degree than this German general desired, it was again General von Hoffmann who had to meet the emissaries of Lenin to formulate in March, 1918, what was truly the infamous treaty of Brest-Litovsk. For that treaty General von Hoffmann always maintained that he was unjustly blamed; he was, he said, merely carrying out instructions—and that was doubtless true. But he did it in the manner characteristic of the German militarists—a vigorous and extremely unpleasant imitation of Bismarck's method of dealing with his conquered foes. It gave a tremendous chance to the Allies, and they and their propagandists leaped to the opportunity. "See," they said, "what is happening at Brest-Litovsk. This von Hoffmann is just like all the other German leaders; he is despoiling beaten Russia of the entire Ukraine, with its thirty million people; he is demanding and getting one-third of all the Russian industries, one-quarter of her arable land, and about a quarter of her people. This confirms all that we have said as to the character and purposes of the war Germany is waging. She will do the same to us if she wins." And these assertions carried conviction far and wide.

Beyond question the Brest-Litovsk Treaty was one of the worst defeats the Germans sustained—one of the very worst of the war. General von Hoffmann was not willing to admit that, but he did admit grimly that he and his government reckoned without their host in loosing Lenin and his party, whose identity he so carefully guarded on their journey across Europe. He admitted this when he was hiding in a Munich hotel during the fighting which went on after the assassination of President Eisner—hiding and reviling those who were following the teachings of Lenin in the Bavarian capital, and knowing full well that if they should hear of his presence he would immediately be arrested. He still insisted that there was notning to do at Brest-Litovsk but to strip the Bolsheviks of as much territory and power as possible, felt that the Allies should have been grateful to him, and declared that Germany and the Allies should at once wage a holy war to oust his erstwhile protege Lenin and take over the entire Russian Empire for joint administration. Doubtless the British diehards of today would sympathize with him.

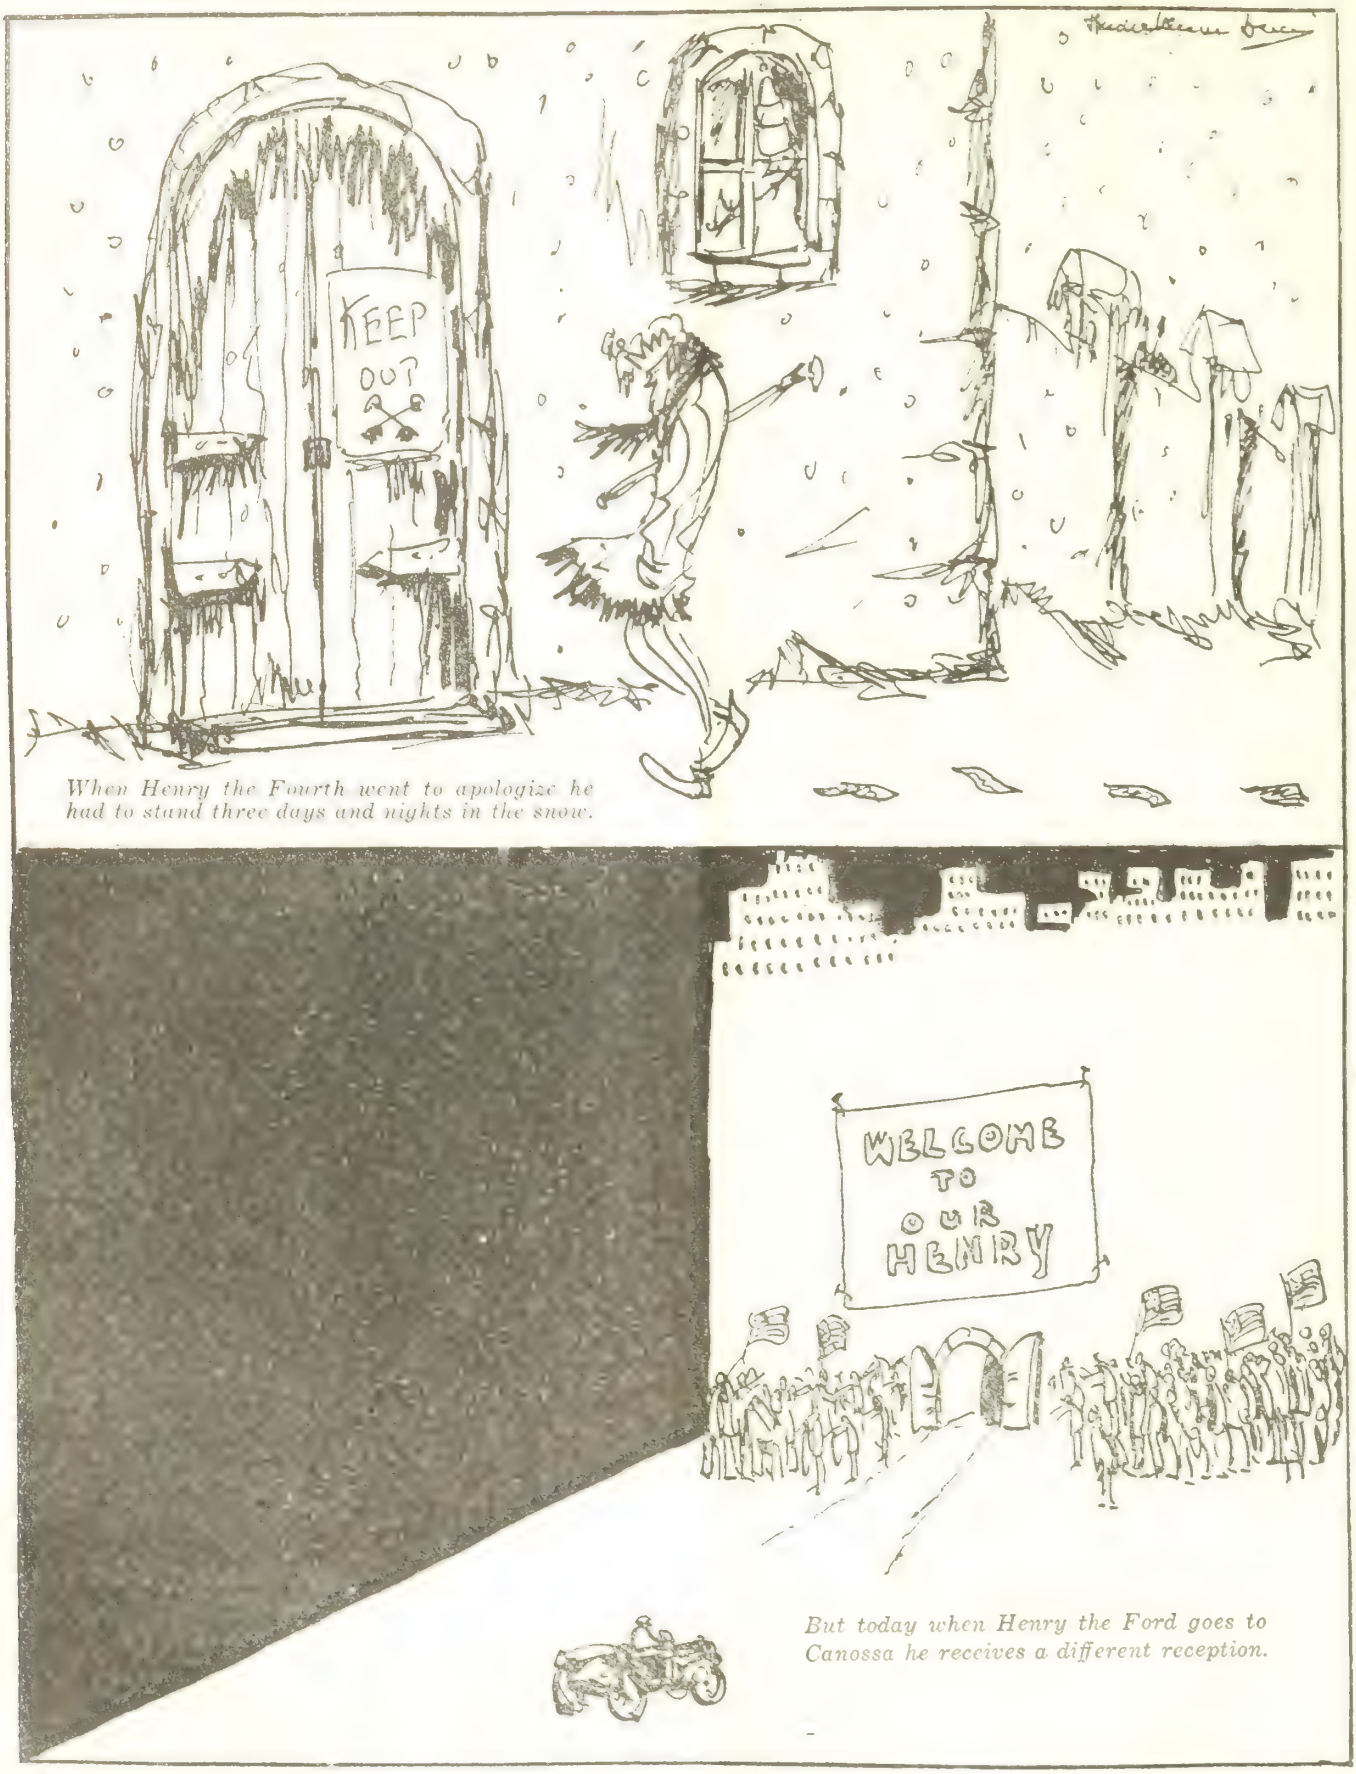
For the rest, General von Hoffmann was a brilliant chief of staff, first to Ludendorff and then to Hindenburg, in all the battles which drove the Russians out of Prussia and into the Masurian Lakes. But the greatest of his services, so far as the outside world is concerned, was the writing of his book, "The War of Lost Opportunities," in which he relentlessly dwelt upon the failure of German military leadership—even violently criticizing his old chief, Ludendorff, for his dreadful blundering on the west front in 1918. The Verdun attack similarly came in for his criticism, as well as the original error in withdrawing two army corps from the movement through Belgium and France to the Marne. The Kaiser and the western front military leaders had tried to excuse this on the ground that these army corps were need by Hindenburg; von Hoffmann was the first to prove that the great victories on the Russian frontier were won without the aid of a single German soldier from the west front.

The Elgin Marbles

THOUGH the conscience of the British empire is not notoriously tender it is now mildly troubled by the fact that Greece has just entered a polite request that the Elgin Marbles be returned to her. Even when, in 1816, Lord Elgin sold to the government the treasures he had stripped from the Acropolis at Athens there were those who thought that they belonged by right to the nation which had created them and who argued that the permission he had from the Turkish authorities to cart them away gave him little moral justification for despoiling a subjected people. And though a century of possession has a tendency to make any theft seem legitimate there is actually less reason now than ever why London should hold what belongs by every right to Athens. Greece is today her own mistress; she could place the sculptures in their proper setting; and there is no longer the danger, actually present in Lord Elgin's time, that they might be destroyed in the course of military operations. England is naturally loath to give up one of the greatest treasures of the British Museum, but she has had them for more than a hundred years and possession has amply repaid her for her guardianship.

It is true, however, that no one could maintain that this was the most flagrant of similar thefts. Visitors to the museum shortly after the war, when so much was being said about the vandalism of the Germans, did not always see the humor of the inscription there upon a certain important monument which was declared to have been "acquired" at the capitulation of Alexandria, and many famous works of art have been "acquired" by means equally dubious. If our memory serves us the French, in a burst of generosity, once returned to their new allies, the Italians, some of the paintings that had happened to catch Napoleon's eye, and by the Treaty of St. Germain the Austrians were compelled to send back some of the treasures which they, also, had carried away from Italy; but in the latter case restoration was largely the result of an application of the principle that to the victor belongs the spoils even though it happen that they were his in the first place, and if any general restoration of works of art to their natural owners should take place there would be many whose history would be as long as that of the famous bronze horses of Venice which were dragged back and forth over Europe by one ravisher after another.

The truth of the matter is that even today public morality lags in this respect, as in all others, far behind private principles. Generals who prided themselves on the discipline of their forces which permitted no looting and who would certainly have been above any temptation to rob their victims for their own benefit, have seen nothing improper when it came to "acquiring" things for their government. Yet loot is loot whatever its nature, and should the British Government see fit to return the Elgin Marbles it would be making, for a government, a magnificent gesture. It would, that is to say, be acting like a decent individual.



When Henry the Fourth went to apologize he had to stand three days and nights in the snow.

But today when Henry the Ford goes to Canossa he receives a different reception.

The World Does Change

1077-1927

There's Mud on Indiana's White Robes

By LOUIS FRANCIS BUDENZ

THESE torrid July days of the Mississippi Valley are feverishly heated in more ways than one in my native Indiana. The white robes of Klandom, which stalked through the corn-fields into the Hoosier State House and the city halls, are undergoing a chemical analysis in the political laboratory. Smut and slime, deep-embedded, are found in their fabric. The hooded Governor of the State is under fire. The mayor of the capital city is awaiting trial for perjury and campaign irregularities. Many another good man and true in public esteem is quaking in his job-holding boots. Inch by inch the "Old Man" is lifting the lid of his little black box.

The history of the rise and fall of the "Old Man" is the history of the metamorphosis of Indiana. Less than a generation ago the spirit of tolerance was abroad. The liberal traditions of Robert Owen and his New Harmony experiment were mildly kept alive in the person of his son. Robert Dale Owen played a modest but respected role in public affairs. James Whitcomb Riley, the Hoosier poet, could still sing of his love and reverence for the radical agitator "Gene" Debs of Terre Haute. Father Francis H. Gavisk, pastor of St. John's Catholic Church in Indianapolis and one-time chairman of the National Conference for Social Work, was generally respected and admired. Local intellectual life was likewise alert and progressive. Literary heroes of the hour rose from its cross-roads and hay-ricks to conquer the publishers and readers of metropolitan cities.

Beneath this superficial surface of broad-mindedness and near-culture there lived a population largely crude and ingrown. Literate but ignorant, Anglo-Saxon but decadent, colorless in imagination and vocabulary but much given to the tinseled pomp of fraternal organizations—these worthy brethren of the Tennessee anti-evolutionists were merely awaiting the whispered message of the Klan.

It was upon this post-war wave of Pecksniffery and prejudice that the "Old Man" rode into overlordship. He made the Invisible Realm of Indiana supreme over the State of Indiana. He became a white-robed Warwick, electing and deposing Republican chairmen, controlling cities and counties, dictating the Republican choice for Governor—with his eyes on the Presidency of the United States as a possible future prize. With irony enough, his first contact with the Klan was due to accident and a Democrat. It was just before the United States entered the war that a blonde, cherubic, immaculately dressed man—D. C. Stephenson by name—set himself up without warning in the city of Evansville. He established a rather elaborate suite of offices there, presumably entering upon the business of securing coal-land leases. Rumor had it—set on foot by himself—that he was wealthy by reason of an oil well or two in Texas. It was not long until he had plunged into politics as a Democrat and in an incredibly short time announced himself as a candidate for Congress. The local organization, disturbed, drafted a leading lawyer of the city for his primary opponent. Whereupon "Steve" magnanimously rushed into print in favor of his rival, and ingratiated himself with the organization by his "generous" action.

About this time, murmurings of the Klan could be heard in southern Indiana. Benjamin Bosse, Democratic mayor of Evansville and State chairman of his party, looked upon it with some favor as a possible means of curbing the growing Negro vote in his district and as a possible stepping-stone to the Governorship. He dispatched the busy Stephenson to Atlanta to look into the prospects of the Invisible Empire. "Steve" went, saw, and conquered—for he returned not as Bosse's agent but as an important unit in the national Klan machine. He moved to Indianapolis, to direct the high-pressure drive for $10 fees, where he blossomed forth as Grand Dragon of the Realm.

Events thereupon followed each other in rapid succession. The individual $10 rolled in by the hundreds of thousands. In his historic letter to the present Governor "Steve" mentions "300,000 grateful and honest Hoosiers" who had written him letters congratulating him on his crusade. The letters were accompanied by cash. Cash and the grateful and honest Hoosiers backing him paved his way to power. Senator James E. Watson, staunch defender of Newberryism and apt pupil of "Joe" Cannon, courted "Steve's" favor and allied himself with the Klan. After a bitter battle the important Marion County committee of the Republican Party capitulated to Stephenson and elected his man, George O. Coffin, as chairman. Money talked there as elsewhere. "Steve" has so far produced one $500 check paid to the committee men, but it is known that there was much more that went the same way. By the campaign of 1924 he had named Clyde Walb as Republican State chairman and Ed Jackson, Secretary of State, as Republican gubernatorial candidate.

Jackson, the present Governor, is a mediocre man with far from mediocre ambitions. Brimming over with good health, his resultant physical composure is sometimes taken for the repose of genius. A politician all his life, his adhesion to the Klan was purely pragmatic. The Stephenson yoke galled his shoulders, and he undoubtedly sighed in relief when "Steve" was found guilty of rape upon Madge Oberholtzer, thus causing her death. The bizarre claim of a frame-up, put forward by Stephenson's high-priced attorneys, failed to impress the jury. The dying statement of the victim and the uncontestable medical testimony on the fatal results of the sadistic lacerations on her body were too eloquent to admit of any other verdict than "Guilty." He was sent to the State prison at Michigan City for life, and it was not until this present month that his voice was to reach effectively outside his prison walls and drag the Governor's name into the mire with his own.

Before these things had come to pass, the Klan-controlled Legislature of 1925 had met and passed into history. "Romanism" was the particular black beast of the Indiana organization. Jews, Negroes, and radicals were thrown into the basket of hatreds and prejudices for good measure.

Shortly after Stephenson's conviction for murder, late in 1925, his friend John L. Duvall was elected mayor of Indianapolis. This was the outcome of the capture of Marion County control by "Steve" and Coffin sometime before. During the campaign the inevitable clothes-pin ticket appeared mysteriously on every front porch on election day morning. It proclaimed Duvall and the Republican ticket to be "100 per cent American" and pledged to "white Protestant Gentile supremacy." Ex-Judge Charles Orbison, Democrat and State prohibition director under Woodrow Wilson, campaigned secretly in various evangelical Protestant churches for Duvall's election. A school-board ticket, appearing frankly as the "Protestant" slate on the ballot, was swept into office with the new mayor.

The "Protestant" school board was in large part the handiwork of Clarence C. Shipp, industrious manufacturer of ventilators for public buildings. The principles of Puritanism are foreign to Mr. Shipp's philosophy and mode of living, but the making and vending of ventilators has become a passion with him as well as a means of profit. Specifications adopted by the board for new school buildings make it difficult for any but the Shippian ventilators to win the awards.

This fact has led to repeated clashes with the State Tax Commission, which has the duty of passing upon all local bond issues of school cities. Zealous Klansmen are frankly impatient with the board-members for not having pitched out of the schools all teachers of the Catholic and Jewish persuasions long ere this. They have been somewhat appeased by the summary dismissal of the Superintendent of Schools, E. U. Graff, an honorable gentleman and able educator.

The Duvall administration, on its part, has been the most inefficient in Indianapolis. Even the preceding rule of the auctioneer-vaudeville artist, Lew Shank, shines in comparison with it. Four city engineers followed each other in kaleidoscopic succession in the course of a year and a half. The city purchasing agent is under indictment for bribery and is about to go to trial. The city market master, who retired under a barrage of charges of corruption, is in a similar predicament. The mayor faces the possibility of a sojourn behind the bars for alleged concealment of campaign contributions. His brother-in-law, the city controller, is linked with him in this charge. The resultant disgust of the citizenry was reflected in the city-manager campaign of this year, which was successful by a five-to-one vote in the special election.

Meanwhile, Stephenson began to grow restive. Reposing in the State prison while his appeal is under advisement in the Supreme Court, he viewed with some misgiving the inaction of his friends in his behalf. They who were in the seats of power through his money and activity were beginning to ignore him. The "Old Man"—that name which he had signed to orders to many of them—was evidently the "Old Man" no longer. Arthur R. Robinson, his friend and one-time legal adviser, had been elevated to Senator Ralston's seat in the United States Senate, presumably through "Steve's" influence. Claude Worley, his confidant, had been named Indianapolis inspector of detectives, through what "Steve" alleges was a written agreement with the Duvall-Coffin forces. Governor Jackson's campaign fund had been enriched by at least $73,000, it now appears from Stephenson's Klan-lined pocketbook.

Suddenly, last year, the ex-Grand Dragon announced that he was "tired of being double-crossed" and would tell all. A photostatic copy of a check from "Steve" to the Governor was circulating freely through the State. There were open charges that at least another $5,000 had been accepted directly by Jackson from the deposed Klan leader. The Indianapolis Times collected a mass of witnesses and evidence apparently corroborating Stephenson's accusations of widespread corruption throughout the State. These were submitted to the Marion County grand jury, in the fall. "Steve" had no faith in that body as then constituted, however, and refused to testify before it when the opportunity finally came. So well did his underground information service still function that he predicted the exact poll of the grand jury on the corruption question, and it is said that his prediction was verified. Although the Governor was openly involved in the accusations going about, the unusual procedure was followed of reimbursing the assistant prosecutor, Ralph Kane, and the special prosecutor, Fred C. Gause, out of the Governor's personal contingent fund. They each received $5,500 for their services in connection with the grand jury investigation. Gause, an ex-judge, now appears as personal adviser to the Governor in his present difficulties. The grand jury reported that "under the peculiar circumstances" hedging it about, it could only exonerate the State officials, but that local officials were undoubtedly involved in some way.

Finally the Times got its hands on some of those Stephenson checks which are now being exposed to the vision of the country. I had the privilege of gazing upon the $2,500 check to Jackson, with the Governor's vertical and precise signature on its back. This is a part of the $10,000 which Stephenson alleges was given to Jackson for campaign purposes but never reported as such by him. The Governor says it was for a horse, but that has been greeted by loud laughter through the State.

The difficulties confronting the Times in its efforts to get at the facts are themselves damning evidence of something rotten in Indiana. The grand jury of this year was dismissed, because one of its members alleged that an attempt had been made to bribe him to exonerate public officials. The 1927 Legislature defeated a resolution to investigate the corruption, by a straight party vote. The Republicans went into caucus and made the investigation a party matter. The Klan judge, Clarence Dearth of Muncie, escaped impeachment by a much narrower margin—that of two votes. He had been sanctimoniously irregular in empaneling juries from kindred souls with himself, and had suppressed liberty of the press by imprisoning newsboys who sold the anti-Klan Muncie Post-Democrat; he confiscated copies of the paper attacking his lordship. A registered communication from an agent of the United States Department of Justice to the Times, returning incriminating documents, was opened by a clerk in the Indianapolis post office and read at the window to someone there. Nothing was ever done about this, either by local postal authorities or Postmaster General New, himself from Indiana.

Aid came to the Times last year in the person of Thomas H. Adams, for thirty years editor and publisher of the Vincennes Commercial. Taking his Republicanism seriously, "Tom" Adams brought the details he had of his party's bad odor to the Republican editors' convention. At first he got a ready hearing, but later his colleagues withdrew from the fight and some attacked his motives.

Stephenson, having released damaging checks and correspondence for publication, now says he will release no more until his case has been passed upon by the Supreme Court. That there is probably "much more" can be gauged from his statement at one time that he had spent $300,000 for the election of candidates and that he has already revealed alleged written agreements with a congressman and city officials for the granting of public offices to his followers in return for this cash.

The Negro in the Industrial South

By E. FRANKLIN FRAZIER

THE sentiment in this country which has favored industrial education for the Negro has been built upon a rationalization of prejudice rather than an intelligent appraisal of the facts of Negro life. In the South industrial education was regarded as the kind of education which would maintain the proper relationship between the two races. The highly industrialized North looked upon industrial education as the proper education for the masses. It has turned out that the majority of the graduates of the so-called industrial schools of the South have gone out as teachers and community leaders; while the wealthy industrialists of the North, who have given generously to the industrial education of the Negro in the South, have seldom given him an opportunity to use his education in their plants.

Therefore it is necessary to make clear the fact that industrial education—so far as the Negro is concerned—was never designed to fit him into the industrial organization of the North or the growing industrialism of the South. It should also be made clear that the name, industrial, as applied to most Negro schools in the South, is used chiefly to placate Southern prejudice. The industrial work in the elementary schools is often an obstruction to real teaching; and North Carolina, with its enlightened attitude towards Negro education, is abolishing most of the farce. On the other hand the "industrial departments" in Negro schools are maintained often as exhibits for white visitors in order to insure appropriations. A further limitation upon the specific social function of these schools is the fact that while they give some training in a few trades, they are not equipped except in two or three cases to instruct in the technical processes of mass production. In many cases time is wasted in learning trades which no longer exist and in cumbrously making by hand articles which are now manufactured more economically and more efficiently by machines. The most effective part of the industrial program serving a specific economic function has been the instruction in scientific methods of agriculture. This has been due not so much to the fact that the graduates of the schools have become farmers as that they as farm demonstrators and in other capacities as community leaders have become teachers for the masses of Negro farmers. But industrial education so far has not been especially designed, as it is generally supposed, to fit the Negro into the industrial organization of the South.

The South is undergoing today an unprecedented industrial development. Not only is the development evidenced by the movement south of the textile industry of New England; but capital is finding a rich harvest wherever it plants the seeds of industry. While the South offers many natural advantages, its strongest inducement is an unlimited supply of labor. In fact, the South advertises to the country her vast reserves of docile native white labor that has not been contaminated by foreign agitators. It is well known how this lack of organization and working-class consciousness has made it easy for capital to exploit labor. Along with the urbanization of the white population has gone the cityward movement of the Negroes. Although this latter phenomenon has been less dramatic in the South than in the North, it is a fact of important consequences for the Negro. One of the most important aspects of the inter-racial problem is the relationship between white and black labor in the industrial South.

The caste system of race relations affects the labor situation as it affects all race relations. The white workers have swallowed the tradition of the vanished slave-holding aristocracy. This has made them easy tools in the hands of political demagogues subservient to the will of organized wealth. In the present industrial development where white labor has become organized it is attempting to secure itself against the exploitation of capital and maintain the subordination of Negro labor. The antipathy of white labor towards the Negro dates from before the Civil War. There was first the hatred of the slave on the part of the poor white class, from whom the industrial laboring force comes. Then there was the opposition of white workmen to both slave and free Negro artisans which was expressed in complaints against the industrial education of freemen, proposed by the abolitionists, and the competition of Negro workers.

Historically, the Negro has been on the side of capital. In the South he has received his education through the philanthropy of Northern capitalists. Even in the South, the white employing class, which has become accommodated to the mass of Negroes in domestic service, has not shown the antagonism of the poor whites. It is also true that the culture of the wealthy has restrained them from the barbarous acts of the lower working classes.

But there are those who see that Negro labor ultimately must seek cooperation with white labor. These same observers have criticized the tactics of the interracial movement because it has sought the cooperation of white employers and white and black intellectuals rather than the workers of the two races. The action of the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce in securing an injunction restraining the city council from enforcing the bill restricting Negro barbers to colored patronage might have been due partly to sentimental attachment to the Negro barber, but it was primarily aimed at the growing power of organized labor which was responsible for the passage of the bill. The action of the Chamber of Commerce cannot be taken—as we shall see—as an indication that the economic improvement of the Negro depends upon an alignment with capital in the South.

The attitude of capital toward Negro labor is well illustrated by the two cases which follow. When an industrial plant was projected in a large Southern city, the Chamber of Commerce sought to make it a non-union job, but failed because the technical skill which was required was too well organized. The unskilled Negro workers who were at first to be paid fifty cents an hour by the outside contractors were forced to accept twenty-five cents an hour through the action of the Chamber of Commerce. In another Southern city when a municipal contract was let to a construction company the city council passed a ruling restricting the wages to be paid Negro labor. The Negro worker does not fare any better at the hands of organized or unorganized white labor. The barbers' union was directly responsible for the passage of the law against Negro barbers. In the first case cited above the white unionists piously washed their hands of the whole affair and made no attempt to organize the black workers. A union official justified this indifference on the ground that the Negroes were not organized! The attempt on the part of a union official to excuse organized labor on the ground that the Atlanta Federation of Labor refused to endorse the action of the barbers' union does not exonerate white labor. White labor is responsible for statutory restrictions in the South affecting the employment and wages of black laborers, such as the Atlanta law making $100 a month the minimum wage for all "white" skilled and semi-skilled city employees, and other laws automatically barring Negro workmen from following certain lines of employment. The white Columbia (S. C.) State, in opposing the recent law passed by the State Senate restricting Negro barbers of the State to colored people, warned the whites that such legislation would cause Negroes and Northern whites to test the constitutionality of all statutory restrictions on the economic activities of Negroes. The decline of craftsmanship and loss of the monopoly of certain trades by Negroes since the Civil War, which have often been attributed to their following the false light of higher education, have been due largely to statutory restrictions. The present caste system in the South places the Negro in the growing industrialism of the South at the mercy of both capital and white labor.

Some leaders of organized labor in the South endeavor to place the blame for the antagonism of white labor on the Negroes. Their chief argument is that the Negro workers are hostile to white labor because their leaders, especially the ministers who wield the greatest influence, are constantly the recipients of doles from the white employers. This is undoubtedly true to some extent; but it is also true with the white religious leaders who accept donations from wealthy men. White labor leaders, as a rule, have not approached the Negro laboring group as fellow workers in attempting to organize them; but have attempted to organize them as an alien subordinate group to be used for their own advancement. Where white labor has honestly undertaken the organization of Negro labor and has been loyal to the black worker, the response has equalled their efforts. An example of honest cooperation is afforded by the following case: In a Southern city the white employers, in letting a large printing contract, attempted to force white unionists to accept ten cents less per hour than the union scale by the threat that they would employ black workers. When the white unionists refused to yield, they used the same ruse to force the black unionists to accept wages beneath the union scale. The black workers proved equally good unionists and the work was divided between the two races at the regular union scale.

But generally we do not find such intelligent and far-sighted cooperation between the two groups. The writer knows of a case in which a white union official obtained the charter of a colored local which was in financial trouble, and chartered a white local. Although the colored local was restored to good standing, the white local has secured a monopoly on the work in that field. The action of the white brick-layers union in Memphis in insisting that bricklaying be taken out of the Negro industrial high school shows that even industrial education for the Negro is not favored when it gives the Negro economic equality with the white worker.

The white employers have not failed to keep white and black workers apart by keeping alive in the former the idea of white supremacy. As the industrialization of the South grows, the white working class will become class-conscious and resist through organization the present unchallenged supremacy of capital. Faced with this situation, white capital will not hesitate to turn to the black worker, as it has always turned in such situations to an unorganized group of workers. The unions will, therefore, be forced to recognize the Negro as they have done—in self-defense—in the North. In the meanwhile the masses of Negroes who are forced into menial and domestic services will be held down to the poverty level by capital and labor. Even the superstructure of Negro business which is being hailed as a significant economic development will rest upon an insecure basis in the absence of an industrial class. Neither the sentimental philanthropy which still lingers in the South nor the growth of scientific social work can eradicate the effects of this economic subordination of the Negro.

Iceland and Industry

By EARL HANSON

A FRIEND in Washington writes: "I hear a Norwegian company has acquired concessions for large-scale water-power developments in Iceland. I hope it's not true. It would be the beginning of the end. With industry comes wealth, and wealth means also poverty. Industry means labor troubles."

The generalizations are true, their application difficult. Should a nation forget its ambitions in order to remain a human and historical curiosity, a playground for romantic tourists and salmon-fishing sportsmen?

The beginning of the end set in some time ago. Fifty years ago there was little poverty in Iceland because there was little concentrated wealth. At the time of my first visit, in 1920, the country hardly knew the meaning of the phrase labor trouble. A month ago I witnessed the May Day demonstration in Reykjavik. Four hundred men and women marched down the street carrying red flags and communistic banners, not a single national flag, singing the "Internationale." A well-organized socialistic party, organized labor with some years of practice in striking, is ready, awaiting the introduction of industry.

What are they fighting for? I interviewed one of the labor leaders. In the end they want nationalization of fishing, of agriculture, and other industry. At present they want changes in the nation's election laws, higher wages for fishermen and laborers, and eight hours' sleep on the trawlers. Eight hours' sleep, sixteen hours' work, eat when they can.

The old, peaceful, picturesque Iceland is disappearing. Progress has come. Industry means further progress. Shall a nation stop progressing in order to remain picturesque? Even the friend in Washington likes to travel in automobiles and Pullman cars.

Diversified industry must come to Iceland. There has been too much dependence upon fishing. Thirty years ago Iceland had not a single steam trawler. Today it has thirty-five. There is over-production, helped along by enormous competition from Norway and the Faroe Islands. The price of fish goes down and everybody in Iceland is hard up.

These are hard times. Shall a nation be at the mercy of the fish merchants of Spain? When Spain gets too much salted codfish money becomes scarce in Iceland. The exchange goes down, business suffers, credit suffers. One cannot remedy the condition with the means at hand—by catching more codfish.

Newfoundland was once helped out of a similar predicament through water power and paper mills. Iceland must be helped through water power, nitrates, aluminum.

Eventually the country will be helped through the development of agriculture. Iceland's soil is fertile. Its hay is rich and fine. Its mutton is good. Its wool is good. Both mutton and wool can be sold in England. Icelanders say their mutton is cheaper and better than that from New Zealand. But it will be some years before agricultural exports can make themselves felt in the finances of the country.

Iceland's population is 100,000. Agriculture supports 40,000. The average density of population is 2.5 per square mile. That of the United States is 36; of the United Kingdom, 469. Agriculture in Iceland could support close to half a million persons. When that figure is reached the island's agricultural exports will go a long way toward feeding England.

Iceland's fisheries could support another half-million—if the fish can be sold. Living, as it does today, on fishing and agriculture, the country can support a million inhabitants. But its finances will be unstable—perhaps even more unstable than they are today. American farmers can tell us that those who depend for their living on the production of humanity's prime necessity, food, lead a precarious existence. A nation like Iceland needs other industry to stabilize its existence.

Today the nation is underpopulated. So is Canada. Canada welcomes immigrants. Iceland does not. Immigrants mean race problems. Iceland has a pure population, growing at the rate of over one per cent a year. In seventy years it will be doubled. The country must be held open and made ready for those future inhabitants. It must be complete and effective, producing both materials and food.

Iceland has few natural resources as we commonly think of them. It has no coal, no timber, no known metal deposits that are commercially exploitable. But it has power, unlimited power—more water power per inhabitant than any other country in Europe. And numberless hot springs and geysers can be used for power, as they are at Lardarello, Tuscany. Skeptics may want to know what good the power is when there are no raw materials. Skeptics would better look around. England weaves millions of yards of cotton and doesn't grow one pound of it. Where power is cheap, it pays to import raw materials. And Iceland, like Norway, can make nitrate fertilizers out of thin air.

Of course industry means labor trouble—until such time as we discover what great stupidity of ours makes it mean that. But industry also means progress. Progress is a shifty word, open to many definitions. As an engineer I can define and measure it—in terms of horse power developed, of automobiles per inhabitant, of miles of telephone wire strung up on poles, of the number of engineers employed. As a doctor I would define and measure it in an entirely different manner. As a financier or a socialist—oh, well, we hide behind our labels and each looks at the world through the glasses of his particular color. I am glad I have a label. If I were merely a human being, I would have to discover some ultimate reason for human existence before I would dare to talk about progress.

The friend in Washington says that industry would mean the beginning of the end for Iceland. The beginning of the end came a hundred years ago when the Icelanders emerged from their condition of near-extermination. The population curve proves the point. Up to 1800 the population curve swung violently up and down, from fifty thousand to forty thousand, back to fifty thousand and down to thirty-seven. Famine, pestilence, and volcanic disturbances harassed the people. The Icelanders could not help themselves.

They were under the iron rule of Danish kings. Denmark enforced a rigid trade monopoly, as rigid as that in Greenland today. Only the state could trade in Iceland. The state didn't make much money at it and wasn't enthusiastic about trading. Icelanders needed trade. Lacking timber, lacking cereals, lacking iron of their own, they needed them from abroad. Lacking commerce and communication, they died by the thousands.

The trade monopoly was partially lifted in 1787. Iceland was thrown open to all Danes. The population curve immediately improved. Slowly and fitfully it began to climb upward. It passed the fifty-thousand mark and climbed—climbed. In 1854 the country was opened to all nationalities. Twenty years later Icelanders gained home rule and freedom in the management of their economic affairs. With the memories of their darkest days only a century old they went energetically to work. Production, communication, and commerce, these were needed for the welfare of the country.

They built a telegraph line, they laid cables, they bought motor boats and steam trawlers, they improved their agricultural methods, they built roads and bought automobiles. Today they need manufacturing. They will get it. Where is the man who can say at what point progress shall stop because it brings its evils?

Since 1890 the population curve has climbed rapidly upward, steadily, healthily. In 1918 Iceland became an independent nation, connected with Denmark only by a personal union, through the circumstance of having the same king. Americans, unused to royalty and its functions, find it hard to understand that a country can be an independent sovereign state while paying a salary to the king of another nation. But many Americans are presidents of two or more commercial and industrial companies that are entirely independent of one another.

As an engineer I am becoming intimately acquainted with the problems of industry in Iceland. Next year I will begin a study of horse power available, of dollars needed for construction, of returns to be expected. I can calculate the effects my projects will have on the national life of Iceland—on the country's economic condition, on the movement of population, on the danger of a serious unemployment problem. Can I calculate their effects on the contentment and happiness of the Icelanders?

If the New Yorker's arrogant pride in Hell Gate Bridge and the proposed Larkin Tower has anything to do with contentment, if my aunt's delight in her new electric washing machine has anything to do with happiness, then the answer is easy.

The trouble is, they haven't.

In the Driftway

YESTERDAY the Drifter sent Charlie Anderson a plug of tobacco. His mind is easier now, for the promise of that plug should have been kept long before this. And the Drifter got the reward of his virtue for he had to look up Charlie's address, and that was almost as good as a vacation. Charles Anderson, Elbow Lake Lookout, Swan River Valley, Montana.

* * * * *

FOR most of a month the Drifter had camped by a lake in Glacier Basin. He had climbed over the snowfields that cling to the high quietness of peaks, followed through still forests the winding trails used only by animals, fished in deep pools of clear green glacial water. Not a human sound—only the occasional crash of a startled deer, sometimes the thunder of a bull elk's hoofs in the night, always the roar of water over rocks, now loud, now soft, enormous music played with the stops of the wind. Then, two days before the Drifter struck camp, Charlie Anderson came quietly out of the woods—a slight gray man with a Swedish accent. He was cutting out the trail to Lagoon Lake, he explained—and went on. Returning in late afternoon, he invited the Drifter to spend the night with him on his way out. He lived on a mountain top about five miles down the trail.

* * * * *

IT was sunset two days later when the Drifter dropped himself and his heavy pack on the yellow windworn grass before the Lookout Man's door. To the east, across the great valley, hazy with the smokes of a dry season, the Swan range lifted thin blue edges; to the west lay the mountains the Drifter had just left, the broad high range of the Missions, shouldered in ice, pearl-shadowed now with the sun's going. Charlie Anderson celebrated his coming by preparing for his guest the most elaborate supper he could conjure out of cans on a mountain 100 miles from a town. After supper Charlie fed the left-over biscuits to a dozen gophers that came running when he called. He'd never figured out, he said, where they got water. It worried him a little. He had to carry it for himself from the spring down in the ravine. Evening closed in, and the Lookout Man, as if by appointment, went to the edge of his mountain and stood still. Very soon a night-jar, with noisy wings, swooped perilously close to his head and flew away. Again and again this happened. The old man was delighted. "They do it just for fun," he said.

* * * * *

FAR into the night the Drifter and his host talked. Charlie came to the valley twenty-two years ago. At first he made a living trapping silver-tips and muskrat and mink. Then he decided that was too cruel, so he took up a homestead down by Holland Lake. Late years he'd been working for the forest service in the summer. He lives in the valley in winter but in May or June he packs up to the mountain above Elbow Lake. He has a fine shelter there that he built himself. Until the fall rains come, he searches out with trained eye the flashes of fire in the valley below. "Most fires, you know," he said, "are started by lightning. It strikes a tree and goes down in the roots and won't show up maybe for three or four weeks."

LONESOME? No. He likes people but he thinks they ought to live alone most of the time. Once a year he goes to town but he can't stand it more than a few days. He'd like to take a trip around the world once, and then "come back and roam the hills the rest of my life."

* * * * *

CHARLES ANDERSON, self-sufficient, impatient of cities, a lover of trees; Elbow Lake Lookout, Swan River, Montana. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Explaining (Some) Men

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It was presumably as a behaviorist that Dr. John B. Watson undertook to "explain" The Nation's series of anonymous confessions by women; and presumably as a neurologist that Dr. Joseph Collins did the same. Science stooped from the empyrean—with these results (it doesn't make much difference which gent said which):

"Among the 20 per cent who find adjustment, I find no militant women, I find no women shouting about their rights to some fanciful career that men—the brutes—have robbed them of. Most of the terrible women one must meet, women with blatant views and voices, who shoulder one about, who can't take life quietly, belong to this large percentage of women who have never made a sex adjustment."

Thus speaks Science. It sounds remarkably like a disgruntled male. Poor fellow! To think of the way Mr. Science has been shouted at, and shouldered about, by these awful modern women. One could just cry to think of it!

And again, speaking through its other mouthpiece, Science says:

"On re-reading these articles I fell into meditation. Which of these women should I have liked to companion?" [It sounds like a parody of George Moore, but remember, girls, this is Science speaking!] "There are two with whom I should have been willing to attempt it. One had strong lusty desires. . . . Another who interests me wrote the twelfth instalment. She seems to have neither ambition nor determination to rule the world. . . ."

Won't those two be pleased! And isn't it sweet of old Science to consider their—er—companionable qualities so thoughtfully. Perhaps if details had been furnished of color of eyes and hair, height, weight, etc., the scientific pronouncement might have been even more profound.

Anyway, Science has spoken. It is remarkable to see Behaviorism and Neurology in such perfect agreement, not only with each other but with the poolroom (that last masculine refuge, now that the polling-place and the barber-shop have been invaded). And now you know your places, girls. Back to the bedroom!

Croton-on-Hudson, N. Y., July 1 FLOYD DELL

Another View of War Guilt

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Alfred von Wegerer, in your issue of April 27, suggests that the fifteen members of the Allied Commission on War Guilt which was appointed in January, 1919, before the conclusion of the Versailles Treaty, be called together again. He feels sure that it would change its verdict, but his discussion is grossly incomplete. He points out that the Russian Orange Book and the French Yellow Book and the British Blue Book issued in 1914 were falsified and incomplete. That's true, but the German White Book was even more so and the Austrian was a close rival. Mr. von Wegerer is shocked because the old English Blue Book included only a quarter of the documents printed in the revised volume; the German White Book of 1914 included 27 documents, about one-fortieth of the 914 included in the revised edition. The Austrian Red Book included 69 out of 352. Furthermore, the memoirs of the former Austrian Field Marshal Conrad von Hotzendorff show that there are still further documents of importance not printed in the official volumes.

The new documents, like the old, show that the Entente Powers prepared for war with their opponents—but for a defensive war. The whole question of war guilt hangs on that word defensive. Von Wegerer and his friends simply drop the decisive adjective and so prove to their own satisfaction that, since all the Powers were preparing for war, they were all equally guilty. The whole enormous literature of war guilt rests upon this single logical trick, this failure to distinguish between offensive and defensive wars.

Today it is even clearer than in 1919 that the Central Powers were the attackers. The corpus delicti lies before us—the secret military convention signed between Germany and Austria-Hungary in 1909, which added to the terms of the Alliance of 1879 a new offensive casus foederis. Austria-Hungary was determined to fight Serbia sometime and both the allies foresaw that Russia would regard such an attempt upon Serbia as a provocation, thus bringing about a general European war. For all these eventualities Germany declared herself ready to support Austria-Hungary with her entire armed force. These agreements are the basis of the war of 1914; this document proves that the Central Powers were not only the attackers of the World War but had planned their attacks since 1909.

Von Wegerer is right; there is more and better material on the war-guilt question available than in 1919. But if the members of the old commission were to restudy the new material and if in selecting and interpreting this material they were not bound by the logical limitations of the von Wegerer group, they would not need to change their old verdict but instead would repeat it with stronger arguments than were then at hand.

Vienna, Austria, May 15 HEINRICH KANNER

Pedants on Pedestals

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Since you have commented upon Professor Bernbaum's remarks about the editing of reprints and translations, perhaps you will allow one of the persons he attacked to add his own comment.

It is a delusion of the professor to suppose that only Ph.D.'s are acquainted with European literature and with the researches of modern scholarship. An enormous amount of work has been done by patient workers in all countries to elucidate literary problems. Unluckily, the form in which this work is communicated to the world is frightfully dull (as a rule) and scares the plain man into hatred of what he thinks is boring and highbrow. Now, even from the point of view of a pedant, is it not a good thing that rather more popular writers should try conscientiously to put these results before the public in such a manner that the public will read them? (I may say that I refuse to accept the view that "culture" should be confined to a little minority of supercilious universitaires; if democracy is not a sham, we all have a right to know what is known.) Does anyone think that it is better to have a laboriously dull introduction instead of a better-written one conveying the same information?

Professor Bernbaum thinks my "Fifteen Joys of Marriage" "amateurish." If it is, the fault lies with the learned authorities I consulted, which included Modern Philology, by the way. How can Professor Bernbaum tell how much or how little I know of French literature? It sounds horribly boasting to say this, but in the past eight years I have written over three hundred articles on topics of French literature from the Chanson de Roland onwards, for a well-known English literary periodical. How does that differ from giving a course of lectures to students, except that I must never repeat myself, must try to be interesting as well as accurate, and am liable to be corrected by correspondents all over the world if I make a mistake, whereas a small audience of undergraduates could hardly be expected to pick up a professor's errors?

The professor's complaint rather looks like an attempt to claim all literary criticism for the professors. But the "expert" note can be overdone. The "experts" have pretty well killed the classics of Greece and Rome by their "expert" comments. Literature is created by literary artists, not by professors. Perhaps those who have at least attempted original composition may see certain things which escape the laborious researcher. For a popular edition (and perhaps for others) it is quite as important to stimulate interest and to refrain from boring the reader as it is to give a precise and complete account of the "latest scholarship." But are these learned authorities always free from error? By no means. I have found even Professor Saintsbury advancing the enormity that the medieval farce of "Maître Pathelin" was the work of Antoine de la Sale! I could add numerous other instances. At this moment there lies on my table a book on Corneille by an American scholar; it is so preposterously dull that I simply cannot read it and the book positively makes me hate Corneille. When all literary criticism is limited to that sort of thing, Professor Bernbaum may rejoice.

RICHARD ALDINGTON

North Reading, Berks, England, June 11

The Social Bar

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: From your recent editorial assertion that the American Bar Association "has no social aspects," I suspect that you are not in touch with all of its activities. As a matter of fact, Negro membership in the association is discouraged because of the distinctly social aspect of the annual meeting, at which leaders of the Southern bar, with their wives, are occasionally hosts and always guests.

The American Bar Association has had the choice of confining its activities to purely professional channels or enlivening them with a touch of social life. So far the social urge has carried the day—with the inevitable result.

Boston, Massachusetts, June 13 LAWRENCE G. BROOKS

Contributors to This Issue

LOUIS FRANCIS BUDENZ, managing editor of Labor Age, was formerly a resident of Indianapolis.

E. FRANKLIN FRAZIER is the director of the Atlanta School of Social Work.

EARL HANSON was born in Berlin of Danish and American parents and later attended the University of Wisconsin.

RUTH S. ALEXANDER writes for The Nation from South Africa.

JOHAN SMERTENKO is a frequent contributor to The Nation.

GERALD CARSON is a literary critic.

LOUIS FISCHER is The Nation's correspondent in Russia.

HARRY ALAN POTAMKIN is the director of the Children's Play Village of Philadelphia.

HOWARD MCKINLEY CORNING is the author of a book of poems called "These People."

BENTON MACKAYE is a regional planner.

Books

Warm Stone Woman

By HOWARD McKINLEY CORNING

Stones that reach from water
Are warmed by kindly sun
That has swift hands for reaching
Where waters run.

But stones that under water
Are not cooled all day through
Leave alone, my brother,
And come not back thereto.

Like women who are taken
With unrest not their own
The warm stone is uncooling
Stone of mother stone.

Leave stones alone, my brother,
And contemplate the pools
If hands of woman taken
No breast of water cools.

First Glance

GREATER attention has been paid, I fancy, to the astounding manner of Robinson Jeffers's poetry than to its still more astounding matter. It was, of course, natural that the critics of "Tamar" and "The Tower Beyond Tragedy" should speak chiefly of those long lines which on first inspection might seem to be the work of a loose writer yet which proved to be so tightly packed with explosive that only disciplined and courageous readers ever understood them all. But it is time, now that Mr. Jeffers has published a third long poem, "The Women at Point Sur" (Boni and Liveright: $2.50), to consider what it is he is saying. Floyd Dell did with some disgust consider the bearings of "The Tower Beyond Tragedy" in an issue of the Modern Quarterly—leaving, however, the last thing unsaid. Mr. Dell found Mr. Jeffers to be a hater of humanity, and charged the generation of readers which likes him with shell-shock. There is nothing social in Mr. Jeffers, said Mr. Dell. But there is, if society be taken to mean the company of all things that live—stones, worms, lightning, mountains, the Pacific Ocean, as well as men and women. And it is worth while to ask why Mr. Jeffers handles his men and women as he does.

He sees them not in themselves—which he says would be madness and which Mr. Dell implies would be the only sanity—but in their relation to the whole conscious universe. And this is how they strike him:

> . . . The old rock under the house, the hills with their hard roots and the ocean hearted
> With sacred quietness from here to Asia
> Make me ashamed to speak of the active little bodies, the coupling bodies, the misty brainfuls
> Of perplexed passion. Humanity is needless.

Humanity, says Mr. Jeffers both in his last book and in this one, is "something to break away from." It is the starting-point of discoveries, something to make a bonfire of in the hope that something hard and perfect will be found in the ashes.

> I say that if the mind centers on humanity
> And is not dulled, but remains powerful enough to feel its own and the others, the mind will go mad.
> . . . I will show you the face of God.
> He is like a man that has an orchard, all the boughs from the river to the hill bending with abundance,
> Apples like globes of sunset, apples like burnt gold from the broken mountain: . . . the man is a madman.
> He has found a worm in one of the apples: he has turned from all the living orchard to love the white worm
> That pricks one apple. I tell you . . . that God has gone mad . . . he has turned to love men.

No wonder, then, that the hero of the present poem, Dr. Barclay, runs crying from his pulpit to wander in the wilderness of the mountains and call upon mankind to burn, break, annihilate mankind.

> . . . Annihilation, the beautiful
> Word, the black crystal structure, prisms of black crystal
> Arranged the one behind the other in the word
> To catch a ray not of this world.

And no wonder that he can look with the disinterested eyes of a madman upon the perplexed passions of those about him—passions which lead to murder, incest, suicide, sadism, infanticide, adultery, lesbianism, and rape. All of these things Dr. Barclay sees with something like glory in his face—they are the bonfire; and all of them Mr. Jeffers shows us with a satisfaction that Mr. Dell would certainly call unsocial.

But there is no need of thundering against Mr. Jeffers. For in the first place he is a powerful poet and hears thunder naturally—thunder that we could not make if we tried. And in the second place his ideas carry their own death. If it is madness to consider humanity in itself, as doubtless it is, it is also madness to consider humanity out of itself. Mr. Jeffers thus far has found no way of resolving the great paradox. That he feels it so strongly is evidence of his quality as an artist. That he cannot get round it is evidence that he may, if he keeps on, give us poems we cannot bear to read. "The Women at Point Sur" is unbearable enough. I have read it with thrills of pleasure at its power and beauty, and I shall read everything else Mr. Jeffers writes. But I may be brought to wonder whether there is need of his trying further in this direction. He seems to be knocking his head to pieces against the night.

MARK VAN DOREN

Exclusive Tour—Personally Conducted

The South Africans. By Sarah Gertrude Millin. Boni and Liveright. $5.00.

THE large, handsome, illustrated American edition of Mrs. Millin's book is more imposing than the English edition, which is half its size and without photographs. Yet the latter, perhaps because of its very unobtrusiveness of outer aspect, left a better taste in one's mouth. So much was honest, unprejudiced, even courageous in Mrs. Millin's presentation of her facts, and she wrote with such spirit and lucidity that one's admiration for a task well done was only momentarily interrupted by facile and superficial generalization. One disagreed with certain statements and questioned others, yet commended the brisk, even brusque, competence of the whole, and took the book no more seriously than it deserved.

On rereading the book in its transatlantic dress, however, one feels compelled, for more reasons than one, to treat it with greater seriousness, and in proportion as one does so one finds the pleasure to be gained from the book lessened and the annoyance increased. In the first place, those unlucky illustrations, a set of photographs included by the courtesy of the Publicity Department of the South African Railways and Harbors, and for the most part exactly as conventional and unrevealing as one would expect, harmonize fatally with the general tone of the book. They are guide-book photographs, which they need not have been, even from remote South Africa, and "The South Africans," as it stands, with its chatty diction, its breezy descriptions of the principal towns, people, political parties, social problems, and racial conflicts of the country, is an admirable guide-book. Dependable within guide-book limits, full of tidbits of information, it even details the extraordinarily cheap railroad trips possible within the Union. That in this capacity it would be most valuable either to an intending visitor or to any stay-at-home who wished to be able, with the minimum of effort, to talk intelligently on South Africa at dinner is indisputable. For that matter, it does contain information as well as entertainment for any reader. It is Mrs. Millin's exclusive, personally conducted tour through South Africa, with a short excursion into Rhodesia, and it is as well done as is to be expected of anything Mrs. Millin undertakes.

Now, since there must be guide-books, there should be good ones. And about "The South Africans," for all its flair and attractiveness, there is something fundamentally superficial, impenitently trivial, which forbids its criticism except on that level. Mrs. Millin's knowledge of three-fourths of South Africa is that of the well-to-do tourist; her knowledge of the South African natives, Asiatics, and colored people is that of the average European in South Africa who has never come into social contact with any of them save as employer. Any deeper knowledge would have led to the excision from these pages of a score of bright, untenable certainties. Thus, for instance, Mrs. Millin allows herself to write: "There are no idle rich in South Africa. There are no leisured classes. There are no upper classes. There are no lower classes." The statement is unsound and half true, and should not have been made. Mrs. Millin is writing, of course, of white South Africa, and in a country the whole of the white population of which could be housed in a fifth part of New York the classes are small numerically. But though they are small, the concentric circles of them, which through the generations scarcely are aware of each other, are as well-fenced and as proud of their impenetrability as need be. Our idle rich, it is true, tend to go where glory and the shinier cabarets await them. But the old Dutch families keep themselves to themselves with quiet conviction, and so do the old or less new English ones, and if they admit an outsider do so with a very definite condescension and equally definite mental reservations. "The mixture as before," in fact. How, given as a basis the two most deeply, quietly, universally conservative nations in all Europe, should it not be so? A pioneer does not put off his prejudices with his citified clothes. Again, Mrs. Millin says: "The South African who has gone overseas with romantic ideas about finding there a culture denied him in his own country returns home feeling that, after all, a human being is a human being, and may be met, kind for kind, if not so frequently in South Africa, not less than in Europe or America." Here the sweeping statement is even less than half true, though there is a difficulty, even something of an absurdity, in the rebuttal of it in so many words. How does one feel culture in a country or define it? The fact that there is one sculptor in Cape Town and a number of them in London or Paris or Berlin is not merely a numerical fact; nor is its significance for Cape Town as a whole to be measured numerically. The South African who returns from overseas with the comfortable but fallacious conviction just quoted has surely missed, or at least left out of account, certain aspects of culture that have their importance for the human spirit. And again, Mrs. Millin, in that section of her book which is the least satisfactory, since it is the most important, says, in her summing up of the position of the natives: "But in the end, of course, they will do as they are told to do." This simply is not true. There was a time when it was so, but it came to an end some years ago. From the passing of the Native Land Act in 1913 the native ceased to trust the white man's good intentions with regard to himself; during the Great War he learned that his respect for the power and wisdom of the white man had been exaggerated. Since the Act of Union one piece of harsh legislation after another has forced him into race-consciousness and into an embittered, determined independence. During the coming year Kadalie, a native from Uganda who has organized the natives into trade unions and made of them a large and powerful organization, is to lecture in America, as well as in England. Those who hear him will have an opportunity to realize for themselves how little likely, from now on, the natives of South Africa are to do as they are told—unless, of course, they are told with machine-guns.

RUTH S. ALEXANDER

The Woman Question

Islanders. By Helen Hull. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

MISS HULL has taken the contemporary woman question as the underlying theme for her fiction. In "Labyrinth" she gave us one of the most intelligent studies of the problems which face the modern, educated, capable, and married woman. She portrayed the struggle and the pain which accompany the divided duties of wife and mother and independent worker. "Islanders" continues the discussion by projecting another phase of this thesis; and yet, in a sense, this novel goes back to the more fundamental question of the status of woman in the mind of man as well as in his social organism.

The stirring plot that combines the elements of historical narrative and the novel of manners serves to indicate the cruel contradictions in our conception of woman's position. Miss Hull shows that the chivalrous view of woman, which sees her as a frail being to be protected from peril and kept from the onerous tasks of life, is the illusion of a secure and affluent society. Actually, when the family is in difficulties its women are, primitive fashion, forced to bear most of the ignoble drudgery and the dangerous hardships of the struggle for existence—all the while facing the mirage of our double standard.

Ellen, the heroine, like her mother before her, experiences in a protracted lifetime all the sorrows that are the lot of American women. Her father leaves her to wrest a living from the soil while he goes to seek his fortune in the gold rush of '48; her fiancé, also an argonaut, dooms her to a barren and soured existence because, as a man, he thinks more lightly of his plighted troth than she; her brother, under the guise of protecting her interests, squanders the little fortune that comes to her—and yet, throughout the laborious years, in the eyes of the world she is a beggar and a recipient of favors. Ellen struggles constantly against this situation, but helplessly, because at first she does not recognize its causes or its cure. When she finally realizes that her soul suffering and her physical discomforts are due to the inconsistencies of the false dual standard, it is too late to rearrange her own life. Then she determines that her grandniece must profit by her experience.

> Ever since I thought about it's being an island women get stuck on all their lives, I said, "Anne must get off." And I want to live to see you. It's been as good as getting off myself, thinking about you. I couldn't get off, poor Alice never could, but it's different now. . . . There's more to the world than a few feelings in you. . . . Folks think a girl can just sit around, shriveling up, till some man's ready to marry her. Why, you can't even know how to love, that way.

Anne has the spirit of the Dacey women in her and, despite the temptations which her own beauty and wealth throw in her way, she carries out the ambitions of her great-aunt. She establishes herself independently. Incidentally, she finds a husband and the passionate attentions that her flirtatious nature craves. This is the weakest part of Miss Hull's work. She not merely utilizes a hack trick to bring about her happy ending, she defeats the purpose of her own thesis by begging the question. In other respects, "Islanders" is not as fine a work as "Labyrinth." It lacks the latter's dramatic organization of plot; it insists on its thesis to the point of redundancy; and it suffers from an over-emphasis on the emotions of its characters.

JOHAN SMERTENKO

The People's Book

Colonel Bob Ingersoll. By Cameron Rogers. Doubleday, Page and Company. $3.

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL had to wait twenty-eight years for a dispassionate biographer. This circumstance affords a good measure of the man. A polemic figure of tremendous size in his own generation, Ingersoll had the faculty of provoking people to be themselves with such candor and violence that he has always before been approached in the spirit of embattled partisanship.

Mr. Rogers, whose book on Whitman doubtless led him to examine the career of Whitman's friend Ingersoll, has taken up the pleasant biographical task of rescuing Ingersoll from—precisely from what? The intellectual battles of today are being fought upon such distant terrain that it is hard to endow the statement with due weight and emphasis that Mr. Rogers's task is to rescue Colonel Ingersoll from the opprobrium of being an agnostic. And yet his freethinking is precisely the important aspect of Ingersoll. If one were writing a history of American thought it would be infinitely more interesting and important to record that Ingersoll brought rationalism to the people than that he was an eminent lawyer, or that he was a colonel in the Civil War, or that he brought a golden voice to the service of the Republican Party.

If the present reviewer has any remonstrance to address to Mr. Rogers it is on the score that he has not separated out these values in a sufficiently positive spirit. His book runs along in cheerful narrative style, the "story" of a life wherein Ingersoll's part in the Civil War and the politics of his day, and his reputation as a silver tongue, occupy an equal position with his extraordinary influence upon popular feeling about the dogmas of orthodox evangelical Christianity. Ingersoll brought the idea of the free mind to the people. He was the people's book.

If one were to construct a shelf for collateral reading it would include a diverse company—say, Ethan Allen, Franklin, Jefferson, the Comte de Volney, Ambrose Bierce, W. C. Brann, E. W. Howe, and Upton Sinclair—all of whom, like Ingersoll, have been read by the American people and all of whom represent a shift of thought and feeling which began and spread through society some two hundred years ago. To bring a large matter into brief compass, that shift was from faith to reason, from miracle to common sense, from an anthropomorphic God to the vague benevolence of "natural religion," from metaphysics to science. After a thousand years of dreaming about another world men became enamored of this one and of those faculties which helped them to subdue and abide in it.

It was a somewhat large and incautious remark, then, that the writer of the jacket for Mr. Rogers's book made when he wrote that Ingersoll was "the first of those hard-hitting, sham-hating Americans whose banner is now borne by H. L. Mencken, Clarence Darrow, and Sinclair Lewis." That is warmly said; but it is too generous. It would be easy to collect a double handful of iconoclastic, hard-bitten paragraphs from Allen, Franklin, Paine, Thoreau, or Margaret Fuller to show that while Mr. Mencken and Mr. Darrow may have built their own style, they assuredly did not originate the skeptical temper of which they happen to represent a contemporary aspect. And, too, it is mispraise of Ingersoll not to give proper weight to the fact that he worked in a definite tradition. Colonel Ingersoll made his appeal for freedom of mind in terms of hope and love and kindliness; Mr. Mencken his in terms of a perverse and rough-neck jargon about urbanity and what he calls "civilization." Each is real. Each represents something peculiar to the genius of his times; one cannot think of Ingersoll patronizing his constituency, or of Mr. Mencken willingly appearing at the grave of a little child.

I have tried to indicate that Mr. Rogers is a little disappointing in interpretation and in his general ideas about his subject. He did not always command his material; his own background was not always rich enough to give him the help which he required of it. Though still a young man—this biographer of Whitman and Ingersoll was born in 1900—Mr. Rogers does not adhere to the young philosophy of nil admirari. He has regarded Colonel Ingersoll from a most sympathetic point of view and committed to paper a portrait of a warm-hearted, bluff, comradely son of the early West, which, I suspect, would not be quite recognizable either to Ingersoll's rationalist friends or to his clerical enemies.

GERALD CARSON

If This Were So

Bolshevist Russia. By Anton Karlgren. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

THIS is a bitter book, written by a bigot. Professor Karlgren has foolishly painted the picture of Soviet Russia so black that nobody can accept it as the truth. For if what he says were a fact the Bolshevik regime would long ago have crumbled or would now be on the verge of collapse.

His method is characterized by the legend under the full-page frontispiece. It reads: "A Bolshevist Village-Meeting—An Artisan Preaching Communism to a Number of Interested Children. The Grown-ups Stay at Home." Standing in the foreground of the picture is a tall workingman, and beside him, as chairgirl of the meeting, is a child of about twelve, dressed in the bloomers, white blouse, and tie of the Pioneers or Soviet Scouts. In her left arm she holds a banner on which is inscribed the Russian word for pioneers. All around are children, many of them wearing the Pioneer uniform. This is obviously a children's Pioneer gathering being lectured by a worker. Grown-ups have no special business here, yet in the background there appear very clearly a number of men and women whom curiosity has brought to the scene. When Dr. Karlgren wrote "The grown-ups stay at home" he was trying to convey the impression that the peasants boycott Communist gatherings and are anti-Bolshevik. But his words actually tell a double lie which is all the more unethical because it presumes on the ignorance of persons unable to read the Russian on the banner and unacquainted with the dress of the Pioneers.

Throughout my marginal notes on this book occur: "Exaggeration," "Misstatement," "False," "Bunk," "Bosh." On page 64, for instance, the author declares that in March, 1921, Lenin put through the New Economic Policy (NEP), "without having consulted the innermost party circles." Well, if the learned scholar consults volumes 17 and 18 of Lenin's collected works, as published by the Gosisdat, Moscow, he will find scores of pages devoted to a discussion of the problem which were written or spoken before the introduction of the NEP, and if Dr. Karlgren knew anything about Communist Party affairs he would be aware that the question of the NEP was threshed out in inner-party circles for months before it was proclaimed.

This is one of many naked misstatements. There are dozens of contradictions. On page 142 the author treats of government stores and cooperatives, always interchanging the terms, and says: "The level of prices in the government stores was far and away higher than that of private traders." In the very same paragraph he cites the results of an inquiry which proved that in the Ukraine, Ural, and a number of other districts prices in cooperative agencies were from "8 to 10 per cent below those of the private traders," and then adds: "The state, therefore, takes, at any rate very nearly, the same shameless price as the private traders." Very nearly the same price is not far and away a higher price.

Here is a typical bit of presentation. Production, the author explains elaborately, has not increased. Then he shows that the increase in the quantity of industrial production has been attained at the expense of its quality. Finally he points out that higher output has done the Bolsheviks no good anyway, because they are guilty of the great crime of returning to the workingman in the form of wages what they have managed to get out of him in the form of increased productivity.

Some of Dr. Karlgren's stories about his visits to rural districts are too ridiculous to be creditable. His picture of the inhabitants of a village who "lay trembling in their huts behind bolted doors" because young Communists were singing the "International" and yelling on the Red Main Street is grotesque. The author himself presents sufficient evidence to show that the mujiks are outspoken and articulate, and that far from dreading the Bolsheviks they sometimes kill off too obnoxious specimens.

Of course the good doctor occasionally slips and is forced to admit in hurried sentences that, for instance, wages have risen to 100 per cent of the pre-war norm plus 32 per cent more in social benefits. To be sure, "the authorities have been compelled to give workmen [these wage increases] in order to keep up their spirits," but this single statement destroys a whole chapter built up on laboriously distorted facts. The peasants, too, have more land than formerly they had. Nevertheless, everybody hates the Bolsheviks, and their collapse is imminent, especially since the Jews run the whole show.

Apart from his own jaundiced observations during "some months in 1924," the author's sources are the Soviet newspapers and Communist officials. From these he quotes copiously. Everyone knows that the Russian dailies are filled with self-criticism. You can get your best anti-Bolshevik arguments from the Bolsheviks, simply because they admit their own weaknesses as the first step toward the elimination of those weaknesses. But to quote only what they say in condemnation of their errors and to omit every mention of what they say in praise of their accomplishments is not the whole truth, and therefore no truth. If the situation were as distressing as Dr. Karlgren's citations from Bolshevik pronouncements make it appear to be, then Stalin, Kalinin, et al. could hang their caps on the Kremlin battlements and jump into the Moskva. A man in his senses will not paint Soviet Russia a paradise, yet when you essay to make it out a hell no one with an ounce of critical gray matter can take you seriously.

LOUIS FISCHER

Guidance

Artistic Ideals. By Daniel Gregory Mason. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.50.

MR. MASON has intended his present volume as a source- and guide-book in idealism for young artists. Accordingly he has dealt with the generalities of conduct rather than with the details of method. His own words are leads for the many quotations which serve more to repeat than to develop. To guide the young artist to a salutary philosophy of conduct more is needed than the restatement of a general, and often sentimental, view. It is well, for instance, to warn him against seeking popular approval. But this warning must be stringently qualified by the further warning that the popular is often an excellent source if not a criterion. It was this general contempt for "the public" that withheld the American artist from an interest in American forms. The young artist begins with an inclination to withdraw. One should be wary of offering any advice that might intensify this inclination or justify it in the lives of earlier artists. If any pressure is to be brought upon the young artist, it should be a pressure toward participation. This is all the more urgent today in an environment which tends of itself to force the sensitive artist farther and farther away from it. The great problem of the artist today is, how shall he turn the pressure upon the environment? To sustain and increase the pressure upon the artist away from the environment is to insure an inverted art.

Independence, spontaneity, workmanship, originality, universality, fellowship are good chapter-headings, but they are in themselves deceptive. Mr. Mason has not related them to the actual details of the artist's immediate task. He has used the wrong, if the more usual, method. Had he concerned himself with the demands of the task he might have achieved definitions of artistic ideals which are more positive and less dangerous. As it is, the advice he offers separates itself into general terms—sentimentalized caricatures rather than a comprehensive portrait of idealism. The book is not saved by the quotations, for they are more interesting as expression than as idea. Moreover, Mr. Mason is not discriminate in his selection of sources. Huneker is hardly the man to offer to young artists as an authority on arduous integrity. And if Edwin Markham, why not Edgar Guest? Nor is Van Wyck Brooks, to whom the book is dedicated, a safe source. Mr. Mason's account of Jack London's failure is typical of his personification of a single motive and a disregard for congenital inabilities. Jack London failed more because of his inherent incapacity than from the "passion to beat the enemy at his own game." Happily, this is the usual elimination; the task itself is the test and the judgment. And, happily again, the worthy artist learns from his own contacts how much of the world to accept and how to conduct himself. Precept and example can teach him no moral attitude to his art. They can, however, teach him much to help him toward an aesthetic attitude. And of this Mr. Mason has said little; wherever it appears in the book, he sees it through moral spectacles.

HARRY ALAN POTAMKIN

Books in Brief

The Drifting Home. By Ernest R. Groves. Houghton Mifflin Company.

"There are three kinds of American homes," Mr. Groves declares, " the good, bad, and bewildered." It is to the parents of the last grouping that "The Drifting Home" is addressed. The book's good sound sense, its testing of scientific technique by human values, and its thoughtful attack on current problems should win it a wide public.

Studies in Florentine Painting: The Fourteenth Century. By Richard Offner. Frederic Fairchild Sherman. $25.

Ten brief technical studies devoted, for the most part, to the consideration of little-known masters are included in this profusely and handsomely illustrated volume. The author is chiefly concerned with the problem of attribution, but attribution, as he truly remarks in one of the essays, has more than antiquarian significance, since it is, in effect, "a differentiation of aesthetic experience." His method—the minute study of catalogable details—is objective. He reproduces details to substantiate his contentions, and his cautious temper gives additional weight to his contentions. In so far as he has a general thesis it is that the tendency to consider all Florentine paintings of the fourteenth century as the work of Giotto and his followers ignores the existence of a group of painters whose style is the result of a "sentimental empiricism" diametrically opposed to the formalized drama of the giottesque.

Industrial Exploration

By BENTON MACKAYE

[This is the second of three articles, the first of which appeared last week. The concluding article will be published next week.]

II. Charting the World's Requirements

THERE was a time when we had a planet but not a world. There were several worlds. One was on the Mediterranean. A second was in India. Columbus found a third. There were still others. Now there is but one—mechanically. And it is becoming more contracted every day.

Not only contracted but crystallized. Along with steam and wire and gasoline there seems to be forthcoming, for good or ill, an unconscious and inevitable effort toward world crystallization. This shows itself especially in industry. A number of world-scale industrial enterprises have been achieved, or projected—the Panama and Suez canals; the Trans-Siberian and the Cape-to-Cairo railways; continental systems of giant power; industrialization of agriculture. These things suggest an unconscious groping toward a controlled integration of world industry.

Whether this will kill or make us depends apparently on whether or not we can control it. To control a thing we first must see it. It must be visualized. That is the point of industrial exploration: to visualize, to unfold what now exists—potentially. That is the province of the "World Atlas of Commodity Flow," suggested in my first article. It would visualize and chart for us, on the basis of underlying physical facts and forces, an unseen integrated industrial system, just as the explorer charts for us an unseen river system.

The potential industrial system sought would possess certain attributes: It would avoid entanglements—physical and human. It would avoid waste—physical and human. It would comprise the most direct flow from source to destination of industrial commodities.

The most direct flow, other things being equal, is the shortest. But it is more than this. It is the one which eliminates not only waste of mileage but waste of motion generally; not merely waste in transportation but in manufacture and in every step of industry between resource and consumer.

What are the ends or objects of industry? Food and clothing and life—and nothing else. Not pecuniary profit. Profit is nothing except as a means to something else. Where profit is a motive for good industrial service—well and good; otherwise it has no function. Human requirements—whether bread, shirts, houses, books, or pictures—are the things ultimately desired to be forthcoming at the destination of the commodity stream.

What are the means of industry? Human energy and effort. Also solar energy, whether coming through coal beds or waterfalls or oil pools. Also stuff to work upon—plants and animals and wood and iron. The ultimate means of industry consist in nature's gifts—the material resources and the energy resources of the world.

All humans have certain basic needs: food, clothing, and some degree of shelter. On these they can exist. But they require more in order truly to live.

Combinations of peoples and climates and natural resources result in what we call "civilizations." Each civilization seems to have its own requirements. What are the civilizations of the world, and what are their requirements? This is the basic question of industrial exploration. All we can do here is to list in a crude and arbitrary fashion the civilizations of the world, and note the fact that each of them has its own path in the eternal pursuit of human happiness.

Here, then, is a rough-and-ready list of present world civilizations. Their locations and proportionate populations are shown on Charts 4 and 5.

4. WORLD CIVILIZATIONS (NORTHERN HEMISPHERE)

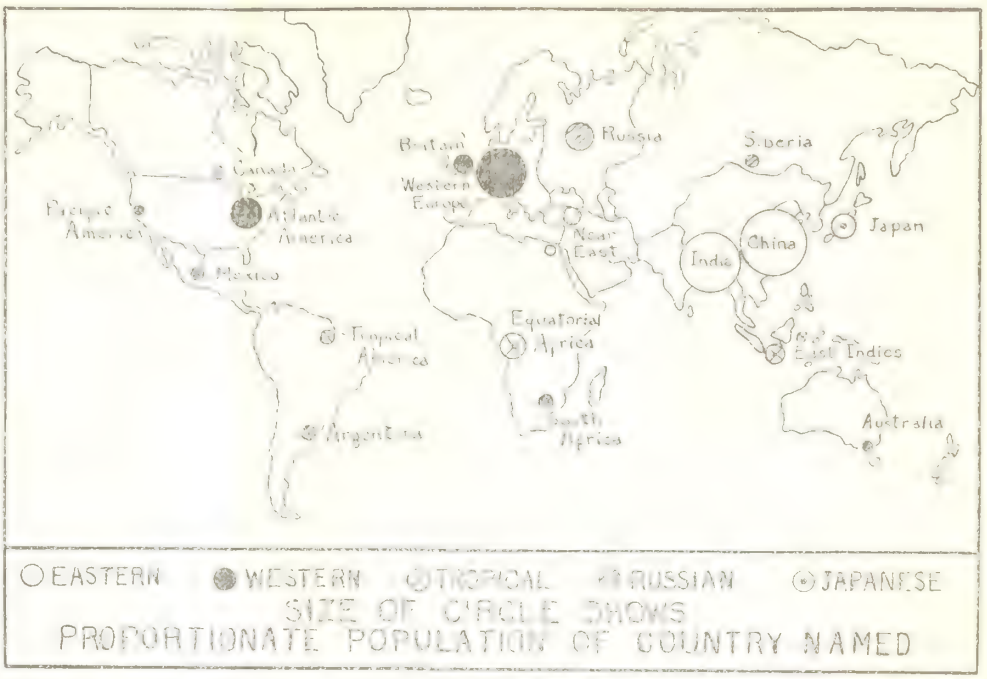
The East: China, chiefly within the temperate zone; India, mostly in the torrid zone; and their associated countries. Two distinct races: Mongolian and Aryan. Both so-called "colored." Both with an outlook on the universe and life distinctly different from that of the West. Some one has said that China has developed the deepest notion of the relation of man to man; India, of man to God; and the West, of man to nature. The Chinese and Indians together constitute nearly half the population of the earth.

The West: Western Europe and its transplants in the Americas, Africa, and Oceania, where the aboriginal civilizations have been annihilated or else "benevolently assimilated." An iron civilization in contrast with the non-iron civilization of the East. The Western peoples (outside the Tropics) form nearly a third of the earth's population.



5. WORLD CIVILIZATIONS (MERCATOR'S PROJECTION)

The Tropics: The remnants of aboriginal civilizations and the beginnings of western civilization along the coasts and up the rivers of Equatorial South America and Africa; and in the East Indian islands. Spanish and Portuguese influence in South America; French in Africa; British and Dutch in the Indies. About 7 per cent of the earth's total people.

The Russians: A land people and a northern people: a bridge between East and West across Siberia. A combination of Slav, Jew, and Nordic. A people whose ideas and traditions of social integration have come to the surface as in no other country. About 6 per cent of the earth's total.

The Japanese: An island people. Mongolian. East of the East, suddenly vaccinated with the West. A non-iron civilization pierced by an iron one. About 4 per cent of the earth's total.

Such are the world's people. What are their requirements?

They all need food, clothes, and roofs. Almost all of them eat wheat for breakfast; most of the Eastern people also eat rice. Beef and meat are relished by the Westerners especially. Cotton forms a universal garment. Woolens are naturally added for those living outside the torrid zone. Wood is the almost universal house maker—inside if not out. The need of iron is a complicated story. It is not required basically to keep out the cold; its need depends upon the extent to which a particular civilization is an "iron" one.

There is one more class of wants that is usually omitted in the lists. It is not, strictly speaking, a material want at all. The artist might call it "beauty." The man of science might call it "environment." We insist upon some measure—however meager—of household order, of interior harmony, of desirable setting for hours of leisure and of living.

We think we demand it in our civilization. We like to ponder on the colorful background and setting of America: the colonial mansions; the early New England community; the Virginia plantation; the march of the covered wagon. We go further. We borrow from other civilizations. We picture the Parthenon and the Athenian Acropolis; Venice; the English lake country. We picture more vaguely but not less luringly the elusive image of the Far East—even as Columbus and Magellan did. "That romantic Eastern civilization, the pursuit of which had brought them around the world."

These, crudely, are the people's varying needs: what are their wants?

They want "things" to put in their houses. Some things satisfy more basic wants than others: a bed, a table, and for the "iron" folks a stove. The more iron things they have the more paper things they think they need to keep track of all the rest.

They want personal service: medical care; some manner of police and fire protection; legal protection usually; mails and transportation; educational facilities; often they want help with the household chores.

No attempt is made to classify the things and the services which various peoples need or want. This must vary with the civilization—the climate and resources, the thoughts and yearnings of the people themselves.

A survey of world requirements is basic in industrial exploration. What is the prospective population of each country? What are its per capita requirements as to food and clothing and "things"? What are its per family requirements in the matter of houses and furnishings and services?

It is a matter of budgeting and (like any other estimating) of making the best guesses that we can. What are real requirements and what are fake requirements? What is for weal and what for woe? What is wealth and what is "illth"?

Such a charting of world requirements would form one of the chapters of any "World Atlas of Commodity Flow." Another charting would be needed at the other end of the commodity stream: a charting of the world's natural resources.

OPEN SHELF

GOOD CHEER, COMRADES! Want to buy, sell, or swap books, bronzes, old china, clocks, curios, etchings, lamps, paintings, prints, oriental rugs? Bus, or stroll to Daca's, 63 Washington Sq. So., N. Y. C. Books always 20 to 80% off. Open eves.

BOOKS All books (except text) sent post free anywhere at 15% discount from publishers' prices. List on request
ISRAEL SOIFER
1244 Clay Avenue New York City

HOUSES FOR SALE

FOR SALE: ten room house in most beautiful residential part of New Rochelle. Lawn, trees, shrubs, garden. Near station and bathing beach. A home that will be appreciated by people of good taste. Little cash required. Winer, 79 Pintard Ave. Phone New Rochelle 7410.

FOR SALE: Six-room house, furnished attic retreat, sun parlor, garage, latest oil burner, metal weather stripped throughout. Grounds 40 by 100. Normal Hill section, Jamaica. Ideal for any professional. Telephone Republic 4983.

EDUCATIONAL

SELECT A SUBURB WHICH HAS A PROGRESSIVE SCHOOL

Brookside School
224 Orange Road
Montclair, N. J.

Nursery groups to eighth grade for boys and girls. Cooperative organization. Hot luncheons. School bus.

[illegible] Brookside
ANNA J. GANNETT, Director

GERMAN [illegible] IT NOW
I make it easy [illegible] of leading German university. Highest [illegible] Dr. W. [illegible] Riverside Drive, N. Y. C.

HOUSES FOR RENT

AN IDEAL RETREAT

Unusually artistic studio bungalow; open fireplace; hot and cold water; modern plumbing; completely furnished; 5 rooms and large porch; swimming pool and tennis court; sound bathing nearby. Situated in hills of Westport, Connecticut. Available for balance of season—until November 1st if desired. Convenient commutation. One hour ten minutes from Grand Central. Moderate rental. Box 843, c/o The Nation.

COTTAGE TO RENT

GREAT KILLS, STATEN ISLAND

FOR RENT—Bungalow, neatly furnished, 4 rooms and large porch, bath, electricity, fireplace, garden, ocean bathing, fishing, tennis. Telephone Beekman 3974.

ROOM WANTED

TWO thoroughly refined Jewish American girls desire comfortable room, with kitchen privileges. American family. Must be conveniently located, and reasonable. Box 841, c/o The Nation.

VOCATIONAL SERVICE AGENCY

GERTRUDE R. STEIN, INC., AGENCY
18 East 41st St., New York.
Executive secretaries, economic research, social service, vocational guidance, and other professional and clerical positions.

WANTED

WANTED COUNTRY HOME and companions for healthy 15 year old boy who needs tutoring in Plane Geometry and English. M. Tucker, 18 E. 10th St., N. Y. C., or phone Stuyvesant 4208.

PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

WOULD like to typewrite Mss. at home, evenings. College student—knowledge scientific and medical terminology. Box 839, c/o The Nation.

HELP WANTED

COUNTRY editor desires cultured secretary who can make substantial investment to retire liabilities and rebuild four weekly newspapers. Box D, Smithtown Branch, L. I.

MEMBERSHIP in West Indian co-operative trading and colonization [illegible] able, ambitious men who desire permanent, [illegible] ential work with future. Box 842, c/o The Nation.

POSITIONS WANTED

PH.D. and graduate fellow in philosophy, ousted from professorship because of liberalism, seeks temporary or permanent position. Consult Box 837, c/o The Nation, for highest scholastic and executive references, including O. G. Villard.

EDITORIAL, research history, science, economics, literature: anything literary. Wide newspaper experience, established author; returned seven months West Indies. Excellent references. E. T., Room 822, 126 West 45th St., New York City.

ROOMS TO RENT

CHARMING sitting-bedroom, semi-private bath; folding daybed, fireplace; quaint, quiet, cool. In Colonial house, Greenwich Village. Summer or winter; [illegible] Box [illegible] c/o The Nation, phone Watkins 7-[illegible].

SHARE APARTMENT

YOUNG woman will share attractively furnished apartment, 3 rooms and bath. New apartment building connected with Union Settlement. Cool, easily accessible. Very reasonable. Box 840, c/o The Nation.

MISCELLANEOUS

Use long distance calls to save trips, to get things done. You'll be surprised how little they cost.
BELL LONG DISTANCE SERVICE

THE NATION'S INDEX
to Volume CXXIV

[illegible] is now ready. One copy will be sent [illegible] library on the subscription list of The Nation. Other subscribers who wish a copy should send [illegible] to The Subscription Department
THE NATION
20 Vesey Street New York City

Hotels! Camps! Resorts!

There are between thirty and forty thousand Nation readers
and their families,
many of whom may
be interested in spending their summer
or a part of it
at your place.
If you did not advertise
in The Nation last year,
try The Nation this year.
Rates on request.
Dept. S. R., The Nation.

The Pleasure Is Ours

"I must beg your patience with the matter of my frequent changes of address, which is necessitated by the nature of my work, that of structural iron worker foreman.

"Physically and in the world of my daily activities I live and move actively, strenuously and somewhat hazardously. Your paper carries out these functions in my mental life. I cannot tolerate even the thought of being without it."

W. P. A., San Francisco, Cal.

Nor can we tolerate the thought of W. P. A. or anyone else being without The Nation. We gladly change addresses as often as you like.

And if you wish to try W. P. A.'s active, strenuous, and somewhat hazardous form of mental exercise here is a coupon for your convenience.

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York

Please send The Nation for ten weeks.

I enclose $1.

Name . . . . . .

Address . . . . . .

. . . . . .

$3 Canadian $3.50 Foreign $6

7-27-27

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXV NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 3, 1927 No. 3239

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 95
EDITORIALS:
Nicaragua's New Bondage 98
To Disarm, Disarm 99
Hoboken Takes a Joke 99
A Rare Citizen 100
GENEVA. By Hendrik Willem van Loon ..... [illegible]
BRITAIN'S FOLLY TOWARD RUSSIA. By J. Ramsay MacDonald 102
ENGLAND—TOO BITTER TO COMPROMISE? By Freda Kirchwey 103
THE NORTHWEST STANDS PAT. By Robert S. Allen 104
WHY THE MODERN WOMAN IS UNIQUE. By Ellsworth Huntington 105
HAVE YOU A LITTLE MS.? By Johan Smertenko 108
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 111
CORRESPONDENCE 112
BOOKS AND MUSIC
This Rock. By Hal Saunders White 114
The Great German Puzzle. By Oswald Garrison Villard 114
Equal Responsibility. By Harry Elmer Barnes 114
Fiction, Not Literature. By Llewelyn Powys 115
A Critique of Science. By Paul Weiss 115
The Constitution Today. By Jane Perry Clark ..... [illegible]
Finis Coronat Opus. By Carleton Beals ..... [illegible]
Books in Brief 117
The Beethoven Festival at Bonn. By Henrietta Straus 118
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Industrial Exploration: III. Charting the World's Resources. By Benton MacKaye ..... [illegible]

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor Literary Editor

FREDA KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates. Five dollars per annum prepaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE, it seems to us, descends to lower and lower levels in his Western antics. Now he has been photographed and filmed as a placer-miner washing for gold in a stream to which years ago there was a wild rush of fortune-seekers, and as a fisherman (without worms). To show how his publicity technique has grown, the dispatches report that when he fouled his line on a bush he called to the camera men to cut that out. Even some of his greatest admirers admit that he has not been upholding the dignity of his high office since he went to the Black Hills and began his circus performances in the hope that he could charm the Western farmers into forgetting their woes. The press, too, continues quite outspoken. Thus, the New York Evening Post, a mouthpiece of Cyrus H. K. Curtis of Saturday Evening Post fame, declares that neither East nor West "really liked or approved the cowboy stunt," this after quoting with approval some sarcastic remarks by the Racine Journal-News. It then adds, "there ought to be a warning signal hoisted in the Black Hills when East and West are at one in declaring that they do not at all like the particular brand of publicity being used there." We cannot, however, feel any real surprise at the President's performances. From the day when he stole the credit for stopping the Boston police strike he has known that you can put anything over on the American public of today. Why should he stop at public play-acting, not to say buffoonery? We notice with interest, however, that a Washington news service entirely devoted to him has sent out the tip that official Washington is now not so sure after all that Mr. Coolidge will be renominated.

THE EARL OF OXFORD, whom the world will continue to recognize more easily as H. H. Asquith, recently excused himself from attendance at a summer assembly of English Liberals on the plea of "physical immobility." This was in effect an announcement of the final withdrawal from public activity of one who had filled a prominent place in England for a full generation: the man who as head of the Government in 1914 carried the British Empire into the war, the last of the Gladstonian Liberals. At 75 years of age Lord Oxford lies stricken. Paralysis has broken a constitution which was the envy of his contemporaries in Parliament; and the man whose boast it was that for thirty years he never missed a public engagement on account of ill health will not again appear on the platform or speak from his place in the House of Lords. His retirement is not an event of any political consequence, for Lord Oxford had clearly hung on as party leader too long, and in his last encounter with Lloyd George, after the general strike of 1926, he was out-maneuvered by his younger rival and humiliated through the pettiness of his immediate associates. Since the great constitutional battle over the House of Peers sixteen years ago English Liberalism has owed him little. The Asquith mind was the mind of 1880, or 1850, indescribably remote from the issues, the movements, and the interests of today. Moreover, we cannot forget that it was Asquith who gave way over Ireland, over conscription, and over post-war free trade (in the Paris resolutions of 1915), so that in a just accounting Liberals must admit that the capitulation in respect of their vital principles was made by their own nominal champion. There is, however, this to be said, with emphasis and respect. The last of the old Liberal prime ministers belongs to the great parliamentary line, in that he has cherished a fine ideal of national service, has wielded an impressive weapon of eloquence, and was never known to be guilty of a word or a personal action which his opponents could object to as tending to the cheapening of political life.

"LET'S GO HOME, MAMMA; I'M HUNGRY," said five-year-old Michael, Rumania's new king immediately after his inauguration. If he reigns as long as Queen Victoria he will never make a more appropriate speech. Kings don't; they can't. They belong by definition to a tinselled picture-world, and it was only an accident that a palace guard overheard and repeated the tired little king's human plea. Rumania is not ruled by kings; it never was. It is ruled by its landed gentry, relics of feudal Europe, and kings and queens and princesses are mere paid puppets. Their speeches are written for them—sometimes in tongues they barely know. Michael speaks French, German, and English, the reports say—there is no hint that he speaks the tongue of the Rumanians. His great-uncle, Rumania's first king, was a poverty-stricken Hohenzollern prince before the Rumanian nobles hired him to head their state. Michael's grandfather Ferdinand never had real power. He was not even allowed to marry the woman he loved—though Carmen Sylva, the old queen, supported his plea—but was forced to mate with Queen Marie, whom, according to most accounts, he hated to the end. Marie's eldest son Carol had more than a streak of his father's humanness. During the war he left the front to marry the daughter of a commoner. His employers forced the dissolution of that marriage and paired him with a Greek princess, Michael's mother, but Carol escaped the country and refused to return. He refused to be bribed back to the dull life of royalty. So his son is king, and behind the scenes—a little more visibly than when King Ferdinand was alive—Premier Bratiano, millionaire landowner, continues to pull the strings.

J. B. POWELL, American editor of the China Weekly Review of Shanghai, continues to be punished for his opposition to military intervention in China. The British-American Tobacco Company withdrew its advertising, then the National City Bank. The biggest American bank now advertises in Shanghai only in the violently interventionist British organ, the North China Daily News. The Nation, inquiring whether such matters of policy were determined in Shanghai or in New York, received in reply this masterpiece of verbose evasion, signed by Lee E. Olwell, vice-president of the National City Bank:

> Answering your question, in the operation of our foreign branches, the problem of local advertising is decided, as far as certain cities are concerned, by Head Office, and in the case of other branches, by the branch manager on the ground, or, more often, when the managers are at Head Office for conference.
>
> We have no hard-and-fast rule as to whether Head Office or Local Office should exercise control. Head Office is sometimes completely guided by the local manager's advice, and sometimes only partly. We at Head Office find it impossible to keep thoroughly au courant with changing conditions in regard to publications and advertising problems in the cities throughout the world, and look to our managers for information and cooperation in this respect.

The letter sounded as if "Head Office" had something to conceal. And it did. We learn that the letter cancelling the National City Bank's advertising contract with the China Weekly Review came from New York. It is the Wall Street head office of the bank which is putting the screws upon an American editor who dares stand for Americanism in China despite the local clamor of Briticized Shanghailanders.

JAPAN'S POPULATION is increasing at the rate of nearly 900,000 a year. Since the production of rice and barley, Japan's staple foods, does not keep pace, the Government has appointed a huge commission of fifty-odd members to investigate the food and population problems. Its product can be foretold. It will recommend further encouragement to settlers in the thinly populated districts of Hokkaido, Korea, and Formosa, where no one wants to go, and the cultivation at home of waste—and economically ineffective—lands. The problem will continue; for it is fundamentally a part of Japan's delayed industrial revolution. As long ago as 1732 Japan supported a population of 30 millions. Great Britain and Ireland in 1801 had only 16 millions; they have 47 millions today—and it is the industrial revolution which has made this three-fold increase possible. Japan's population has not doubled in two centuries—and her industrial revolution has hardly begun. If industrialization continues she will become more and more dependent on foreign foodstuffs. "Overpopulation" is a much-abused term. In modern times "overpopulation" is usually a symptom of industrial prosperity. Rhode Island is more densely populated than any part of Japan; the most crowded part of China is the prosperous Canton delta. It is, however, distressing that the human race, faced with the possibility of greater ease and leisure, unconcernedly breeds itself back into a misery approaching that of the past. A high birth rate is no sign of wisdom. Surely the French are in that respect the most civilized people on earth.

JOSEPH PAUL CUCKOSCHAY was defeated the other evening by William Harrison Dempsey, or if you prefer to give them their ring names, Jack Sharkey was knocked out by Jack Dempsey. That is clear enough. But behold how the sporting world talks of this: "The Manassa Mauler showered blows upon the Garrulous Gob's body"; this was resented by the "Loquacious Lithuanian and he countered to Jack's head." "The Tiger landed several lefts to the Sailor's midriff and a sharp exchange followed," etc., etc. Forty-five seconds of the seventh round had passed when the "Manassa Mauler landed the deciding blow, a solid left to Jack's jaw," which sent the "bold blustering, trombone-tooting Boston Bucko into oblivion." At this point we thought that this must refer to two other men, but our sport-dialect interpreter declares that it was really Mr. Dempsey and Mr. Sharkey who were fighting all the time.

MOST NORTHERN NEGROES stay "in their place." Yet even such perfect behavior is not enough to satisfy the American citizens of Seabright, New Jersey. In Seabright Negroes, decorous or indecorous, are simply not wanted, and if they do not realize this, well, we have a John Hall story. About three months ago Hall opposed a Klan lynching of another Negro near his home in Smithfield, Virginia. Following this he moved north to Seabright, hoping that he would be able to live peaceably. The Virginia Klan, however, determined that his "crime" should follow him and they forwarded his Virginia "anti-lynching record" to the Seabright Klan officials. Hall then received a threat telling him to leave town; he stayed and received more threats. Gradually this duress made him morose and melancholy and, finally, violently insane. The New Jersey State Hospital, however, refused to admit Hall because he was not a "legal" resident. Since the residents of Seabright did not want an insane man running wild in the community, there was only one thing left: John Hall's relatives must take him back to Smithfield. This they were induced to do, and now, having ousted Hall, the Jersey Klan is happy. And why not? It has discovered a new technique for getting rid of intelligent and outspoken and, therefore, undesirable Negroes.

AT LAST there is a sign of revolt against the increasing lawlessness of our police forces. From Wichita, Kansas, comes the good news that thirty-seven of the leading members of the bar of that city have organized to "de-Russianize the Police Department." Whether that slur on Russia is justified or not, these lawyers have been stirred

.o action not only by the "third degree" but by the constant violation of every right of the citizen and of the person under arrest. People are arrested right and left on merest suspicion, then finger-printed and photographed before any charge has been filed against them. In many cases, the lawyers say, the persons arrested are promptly discharged because of total lack of evidence but their photographs and finger-prints remain in the Rogue's Gallery. Attorneys are constantly denied their right to see prisoners who are illegally held incomunicado. One case cited is that of a laboring man who was kept incomunicado for three days. Meanwhile his family was frantic at his disappearance, but he was not allowed to communicate with them until the police admitted that they had no evidence and released him. This sort of thing would bring about a revolution in England where they know and value their rights. In Wichita the new organization announces that it will teach its fellow-citizens what their rights are. Probably there is not a single large police force in America which does not daily violate the laws and the Constitution it is sworn to enforce.

THERE MUST BE NO LETDOWN IN the militarizing of the youthful minds of America, even in the summer time. This is the dictum of the United States Army and Navy "intelligence" departments. Of course, the fact that the regulations requiring compulsory attendance at military drill in many colleges cannot be used for these camps is for the present a handicap. So military drill is slated with swimming and boating, tennis and track, baseball for some and polo for others; in fact, there are sports and recreation to suit every individual taste—a vacationist's Utopia with all expenses paid by the good old U. S. Army. If time permits, there may be some incidental rifle practice and also a little private contact between the straw dummy's stomach and the bayonet (just as in real war); then, to top the delightful summer sports program, there are a few psychology lectures on the proper attitude of a true patriot in time of war. In other words, say the militarists, we may have to coax the students to the Citizens Military Training Camps by camouflaging military drill under vacation programs, but we do get the fundamentals put across! And no one can gainsay them.

GOVERNOR FULLER of Massachusetts has been making an industrious, personal study of the Sacco-Vanzetti case in addition to the inquiry which his committee has been conducting, and it is unthinkable that out of these efforts—if intelligence and a desire to do justice have prevailed—there will come any decision but to set the prisoners free. There is a tendency after a lapse of seven years since the crime to emphasize unduly new phases and possibilities in regard to it. It seems to us that the already-known and undisputed facts are overwhelming in their force. Sacco and Vanzetti, as John Lawrence Hurley of the Suffolk Law School said six years ago, were convicted upon atmosphere, not evidence. The case against them consisted mainly of the testimony of identification witnesses and revolver experts. To us the testimony of the eye witnesses is practically valueless. They all saw the crime from factory windows or a considerable distance away, and when bullets began to fly were undoubtedly more concerned with their own safety than in trying to fix in memory the faces of the bandits, largely concealed by slouch hats. Not one of the identifying witnesses pretended to have known Sacco or Vanzetti before—the only circumstance that could give weight to such testimony. As to the revolver experts, the State's best witness, as it has since come out, was induced by the prosecuting attorney to make a statement which if not a deliberate falsehood was at least obviously misleading to the jury. Sacco and Vanzetti are not guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, as the law requires for their death. Thousands of persons entertain many doubts, both reasonable and sincere, in their behalf. The state of Massachusetts cannot ignore these doubts without making its reputation for justice a byword and a hissing in the civilized world.

HOW MUCH LOVE do the States have for their children? Not very much, if we judge by their legislation concerning children's compensation. Five States, the National Consumers League points out, make no provision for injured minors, while 17 States exclude illegally employed minors from compensation. In the remaining States, the study shows, compensation laws are "unequal, insufficient, and unjust. In 18 States the injured minor who is permanently totally disabled receives compensation for less than ten years"—he thus becomes an object of charity before he reaches the age of 30. "In 21 States," the report continues, "if he is permanently partially disabled, and his earning power has permanently decreased, his compensation ceases before he reaches the age of 25." "The intelligence that created mass production can make it safe," the authors of the report conclude. "When will it make work safe for the minors throughout this country? Mississippi and South Carolina, which have no compensation law, can enact one next year. Louisiana and Rhode Island, which exclude illegally employed minors from compensation, can amend their laws in 1928. What will they do?"

AS SURELY AS CHICKENS come home to roost, so certain is our Latin American policy to be attacked in future in any gathering in which persons from south of the Rio Grande are present, if any degree of freedom of expression prevails. Thus it is natural that the recent Pan-American Labor Congress, although meeting in Washington in the shadow of the Department of State, should have gone on record as against the Monroe Doctrine as interpreted in recent years. The original resolution, introduced by delegates representing Venezuela, Nicaragua, and Santo Domingo, charged the United States with thirty-five invasions in Latin America since 1898. The resolution was slightly toned down in committee, but as passed by the congress it attacked the use of the Monroe Doctrine to protect investments by citizens of the United States in Latin America. As worded presumably by Luis Morones, Secretary of Commerce, Labor, and Industry in Mexico, the resolution took issue with the recent assumption in Washington that "the person and property of a citizen of the United States are a part of the general domain of the United States as a nation, even when abroad." William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, made a fatuous attempt to uphold the Monroe Doctrine as intended to defend Latin American republics against European invasion. In practice it is used to justify the United States in policing and bossing her southern neighbors on the ground that otherwise some European nation would intervene. The assumption is not true, and if it were, would not justify our aggression.

Nicaragua's New Bondage

THEY are now engaged in proving that the 300 Nicaraguans whom American marines and bombing planes murdered on July 17 were "bandits." That is the immemorial habit of imperialist usurpers—the British called the Boers bandits and the Irish republicans mere gunmen; the French called the heroic Riffians bandits and doubtless the ancient Egyptians applied similar names to the armies they defeated. It does not alter the fact that American marines ought not to be doing police duty in Nicaragua, and that Latin American hearts from Cape Horn to the Rio Grande beat in sympathy with any Latin who fights the Yankee invasion of a Latin country.

If, however, the authorities in Washington are sincerely interested in tracing down [illegible] we suggest that they turn their attention to a document signed more or less at their own suggestion on March 31 last—between Dr. Zavala, financial agent for the American-aided Diaz regime in Nicaragua, and representatives of the Guaranty Trust Company and of J. and W. Seligman and Company of New York. It compares favorably, to be sure, with the usurious loans recently made in Los Angeles by leaders of the Better American Federation and the best local banking circles; but as government financing we have never seen anything to equal it.

This extraordinary contract, to begin with, opens a 6 per cent credit of $1,000,000 for a period of one year, which may under certain conditions be extended for another six months. Of course no one would ask a bank to lend the money that belongs to its depositors without securing good collateral. In this case one may feel sure that no depositor will complain—the bankers have taken all Nicaragua has—serape, sombrero, sandals, and shirts. Two months before the negotiation of this loan the Nicaraguan Congress had voted certain emergency taxes—an export tax on all coffee up to 65 cents per 100 pounds; a 50 per cent increase in customs duties on tobacco, wines, and liquors; a 12½ increase in other import duties. All these were mortgaged to the bankers as collateral for this credit.

But this was not all. As further collateral the bankers put a mortgage on 50 per cent of the surplus of the national treasury revenues. (Fifty per cent had similarly been mortgaged to New York bankers in 1917.) And, since Mr. Diaz, even with American marines to do his police work for him, is unlikely to have a surplus, the bankers went further still. They got a mortgage on [illegible] National Bank of Nicaragua, an American corporation with a paid-in capital of $300,000 and a [illegible] on all its dividends. They went still further. They added a mortgage on the entire capital stock of the Pacific Railways of Nicaragua, which, efficiently managed by the J. G. White Corporation, associated with the Seligmans, is worth more than the total amount of the credit extended by the bankers!

According to the former Nicaraguan Consul General in New York City, the bankers were not satisfied with [illegible]. The deposits of the bank and the railroad in Canadian and other banks, said to total more than $400,000, were transferred to New York City, for the benefit of the credit-givers. (One wonders whether the money which the bankers lent to Nicaragua was actually the Nicaraguan money which they had transferred from other coffers to their own.) And then they capped the climax. They included in the contract an agreement which substantially said that they would not only mortgage half Nicaragua for their million-dollar loan but would furthermore spend the money for Nicaragua. They explained frankly that the money would be used primarily to equip, arm, and maintain the Diaz soldiers (thus some one may have hoped, eventually making it unnecessary for American marines to uphold that tottering regime). Money for other purposes will be released only upon approval by a special committee of three, two of whom are Americans! One of these Americans is the American manager of the National Bank of Nicaragua; the other is the American High Commissioner. Now the office of High Commissioner was instituted, we understand, in connection with the financial plan of 1920—drawn up by the Nicaraguan Government with another consortium of New York [illegible] States appoints the High Commissioner, who, nevertheless (possibly in order to avoid difficulties with the law) is not considered an official of the Department of State. The Department of State insists upon this fine-drawn distinction between appointee and official; but in any case, the net result is that the bankers use a government appointee as their agent and representative in Nicaragua.

The contract is long, and contains more serfdom for Nicaragua. Among other things it provides that for five years the two New York banking houses have an option on all new Nicaraguan financing.

Here, we submit, is an interesting case study for any government official seriously interested in the problem of [illegible] in Nicaragua. It would be an excellent thing indeed, if the Department of State would give this matter its serious attention, and inform the public upon the results of its cogitations. For this kind of oppression concerns the American people as a whole far more profoundly than the effort of a barefooted army to support itself on a jungle countryside where an American planter happens to have a small property. It was, we take it, to this loan that Mr. Hoover referred when, last spring, he made the unwelcome remark about loans for unproductive purposes which Mr. Kellogg so bitterly resented. Such loans, which, made with State Department approval, involve the utilization by bankers of State Department designees, involve us in a constant risk of bloody intervention. Suppose Nicaragua should seek to finance herself from other banks, violating its agreement with the New York bankers; suppose it should seek to spend [illegible] in ways of which the High Commissioner, named by the State Department, did not approve—what then? More work for the marines!

[illegible] complained that they are unjustly accused of shaping State Department policy. Sometimes, they say, the State Department begs them to make loans to help its previously determined policies. By an incredible series of blunders the State Department is now committed to maintaining Adolfo Diaz in office as its puppet president of Nicaragua. Surely no sane business man would want to risk money on so feeble a character as Don Adolfo. Is the State Department of the United States itself primarily responsible for this shoddy pawnbroking?

To Disarm, Disarm

WRITING in the London Nation on the eve of the Geneva Disarmament Conference, Commander Kenworthy, M. P., himself a distinguished naval officer, expressed the fervent hope that whatever else the British Government might do it would not send high naval officers to carry on the negotiations. But that is just what Mr. Baldwin did. He chose the civilian First Lord of the Admiralty, surrounded him by admirals and captains, and added for good measure Robert Cecil who, knowing better, can always be counted on to compromise with wrong. Mr. Coolidge did the same thing. He picked as the only civilian delegate, Hugh Gibson, a delightful personality, a promising but still second-rate diplomat, and then added a lot of naval officers the chief of whom, Admiral Hilary P. Jones, is of the type of mind which thinks it absolute treason to criticize any action of the Navy Department or of the United States Government. The Japanese were craftier; nevertheless their delegation comprises almost the same mixture of diplomats and naval officers.

So what has happened at Geneva is merely what was to be expected—the navy men have dominated and we have seen a disarmament conference on the verge of disruption or of becoming a conference for the increase instead of decrease of fleets. Experts these naval men are called and as such widely regarded. Yet they have actually expected sensible people to believe that they can plot and plan exact ratios of battleships, cruisers, submarines, and all the rest —as if they could foresee proportions and situations ten or twenty years hence. They, of course, did not foresee in the last war that they would need a fleet of mine-layers and have to build monitors and endless patrol boats; nor did any naval officer, least of all in Berlin, suspect the power and range of the submarine, or the uselessness of battleships, or the necessity for aircraft-carriers. No one has ever been able to prophecy what a war by sea or land will bring forth; it cannot be done. But if it could be, the very last persons who should be called into a naval disarmament conference are the navy men. One might just as well ask medical men to take part in an assembly to decide how much work should be taken away from them and handed over to the osteopaths. It is demanding too much of human nature. These officers have been trained to consider themselves essential to the life of a nation; they are convinced of the absurdity that nations only exist if they have "adequate" armaments (which "adequate" no naval or military officer has yet defined since wars began) and, therefore, they are bound to resent, consciously or subconsciously, the demand that they help to do away with their profession. So would a fundamentalist minister feel if he were invited to take part in a conference to reduce his kind by one half.

So Mr. Coolidge—whatever may yet come out of Geneva —blundered frightfully in not picking a strong body of civilians committed to disarmament and told to achieve it or to come home on their shields. The practical men and women of this world are not always the experts by any means, least of all experts who have a direct personal stake in their own findings. Mr. Coolidge had the example of Mr. Hughes at the Washington Conference before him and a proposal was worked out for Geneva, but it lacked either as powerful a personality or as dramatic a setting, and in Washington civilians dominated. It ought to be plain now that the way to obtain disarmament is not to ask it of men who make their living out of the war business, but of men and women—yes, women—who really believe in peace so much that they will gladly take risks and if necessary suffer for their beliefs. Dyed-in-the-wool peace-lovers and not fighting men are the ones to achieve peace, as long as our practical business men and so-called statesmen refuse to see that war impoverishes everybody taking part and actually threatens the existence of civilization itself.

The way to disarm is to disarm. A truly Christian, peace-loving nation would do so without regard to the policies of others. The United States did so from 1820 to 1860 and had no fleet worthy of the name from 1870 to 1898. Nobody ever attacked us, nobody ever exploited us, yet several nations could have helped themselves to all our Atlantic seaports had they so desired. They respected us far more then than now when we have joined the imperialistic, big-armament game. Yet we actually have, among the many other childish moves at Geneva, a revival of President Wilson's stupid and wicked threat that if the others do not do as we wish we shall build the greatest fleet in the world and show them how vast our resources are. Well, fortunately, there is Congress to be reckoned with, and Senator Borah has already let it be known that so far as his influence goes we shall do nothing of the sort. In that direction lies that same naval madness which brought Germany and England into conflict. If on the other hand President Coolidge really desires to give proof to the world of our pacific intentions as a nation, he will decrease armaments of his own accord without fear of the nations to whom we swore eternal fealty ten years ago and against whom we ought never to be plotting and arming. There are no naval rivals other than Japan, France, and England.

Hoboken Takes a Joke

IT'S a rare vaudeville show that doesn't have its little joke about Hoboken. The "Mile Square City," as its boosters affectionately refer to it, has probably served as the butt of more professional jesting than any other city in the country. Indeed, if the jokes about the city were laid end to end, they would probably encompass the globe and find a tragic terminus in—Hoboken.

It might have been an aimless thrust in the beginning but ridicule, like brickbats, eventually leaves its mark, and in the American credo of 1927 Hoboken is a place to laugh at unless one is soberly in search of good beer. Long ago Hoboken stopped protesting against the ridicule. Slowly, its sensitiveness dulled and finally it accepted the comic myth and saw itself as others see it, a toy Germany. At intervals an incident or event uproots the city's sense of isolation. The latest of these events concerns eighty-four Chinese seamen.

The eighty-four Chinese were hired to work as members of the crew of the steamship Rotterdam of the Holland-America Line at the home port. The white stokers and others of the crew had called a strike. When hired, the Chinese were not told they were replacing strikers but somewhere in mid-ocean they became aware of this fact and it surprised them. As seamen, the law permits them sixty days ashore in which to search for another ship, and when the Rotterdam docked at Hoboken on June 28 they attempted to exercise this right. Company guards warned them to remain on the ship. One of the seamen knew enough English and law to quote their rights. The guards were unimpressed. The Chinese thereupon walked off the ship. Three of the company guards clubbed the nearest of them. The others began to run. A call was sent to Police Headquarters for a riot squad and within two minutes a wagonload of policemen with drawn clubs and blackjacks descended on the Chinese and began a ruthless assault. The Chinese were unarmed. They were clubbed, blackjacked, and beaten with fists until ten of them required hospital treatment. A number escaped in the confusion. Fifty-four were seized and taken to the Hoboken police jail.

A local newspaper reporter, who is little more than a press agent for the hermetically sealed political ring, sent the first account to New York through a news agency. He described the episode as a "mutinous attempt by armed Chinamen to obtain shore leave." The following day New York reporters went to Hoboken. It was learned that the Chinese were being held in jail without any charge having been lodged against them; that they were denied the legal right of a hearing within twenty-four hours; that they were being held incomunicado "at the request of the Holland-America Line"; and that counsel retained by the Chinese Seamen's Institute of New York to defend them was not permitted to see or interview any of them. Of some bearing on the case, it may be added that steamship companies are liable to a $1,000 fine for every Asiatic that they permit to obtain illegal entry into the United States.

Meanwhile some of the facts in the case managed to squeeze between columns of aviation in the New York papers. New York reporters came to headquarters and asked questions. The police became apprehensive. After three days in jail the prisoners were taken in groups of three or four in patrol wagons guarded by twice as many policemen back to the steamship Rotterdam and there transferred to a tug and removed to Ellis Island.

Hoboken offered no reason for the transfer. Commissioner Uhl at Ellis Island simply stated that the men were being held at the request of the Holland-America Line. Mr. Uhl added that the interest of immigration authorities in the jailing of the fifty-four seamen was "purely a friendly one." The reporters forgot to ask Commissioner Uhl what expression his enmity would take.

Several days later, Chung Lum, the secretary of the Chinese Seamens' Institute of New York, received a telegram, apparently smuggled through from one of the imprisoned men urging his immediate aid. Chung Lum retained a lawyer, Hugo Pollock, to see what could be done about safeguarding the interests of the prisoners. Pollock visited Ellis Island and identified himself as counsel for the jailed seamen. A. W. Brough, inspector in charge of the Chinese Division, refused permission to Mr. Pollock to interview his clients.

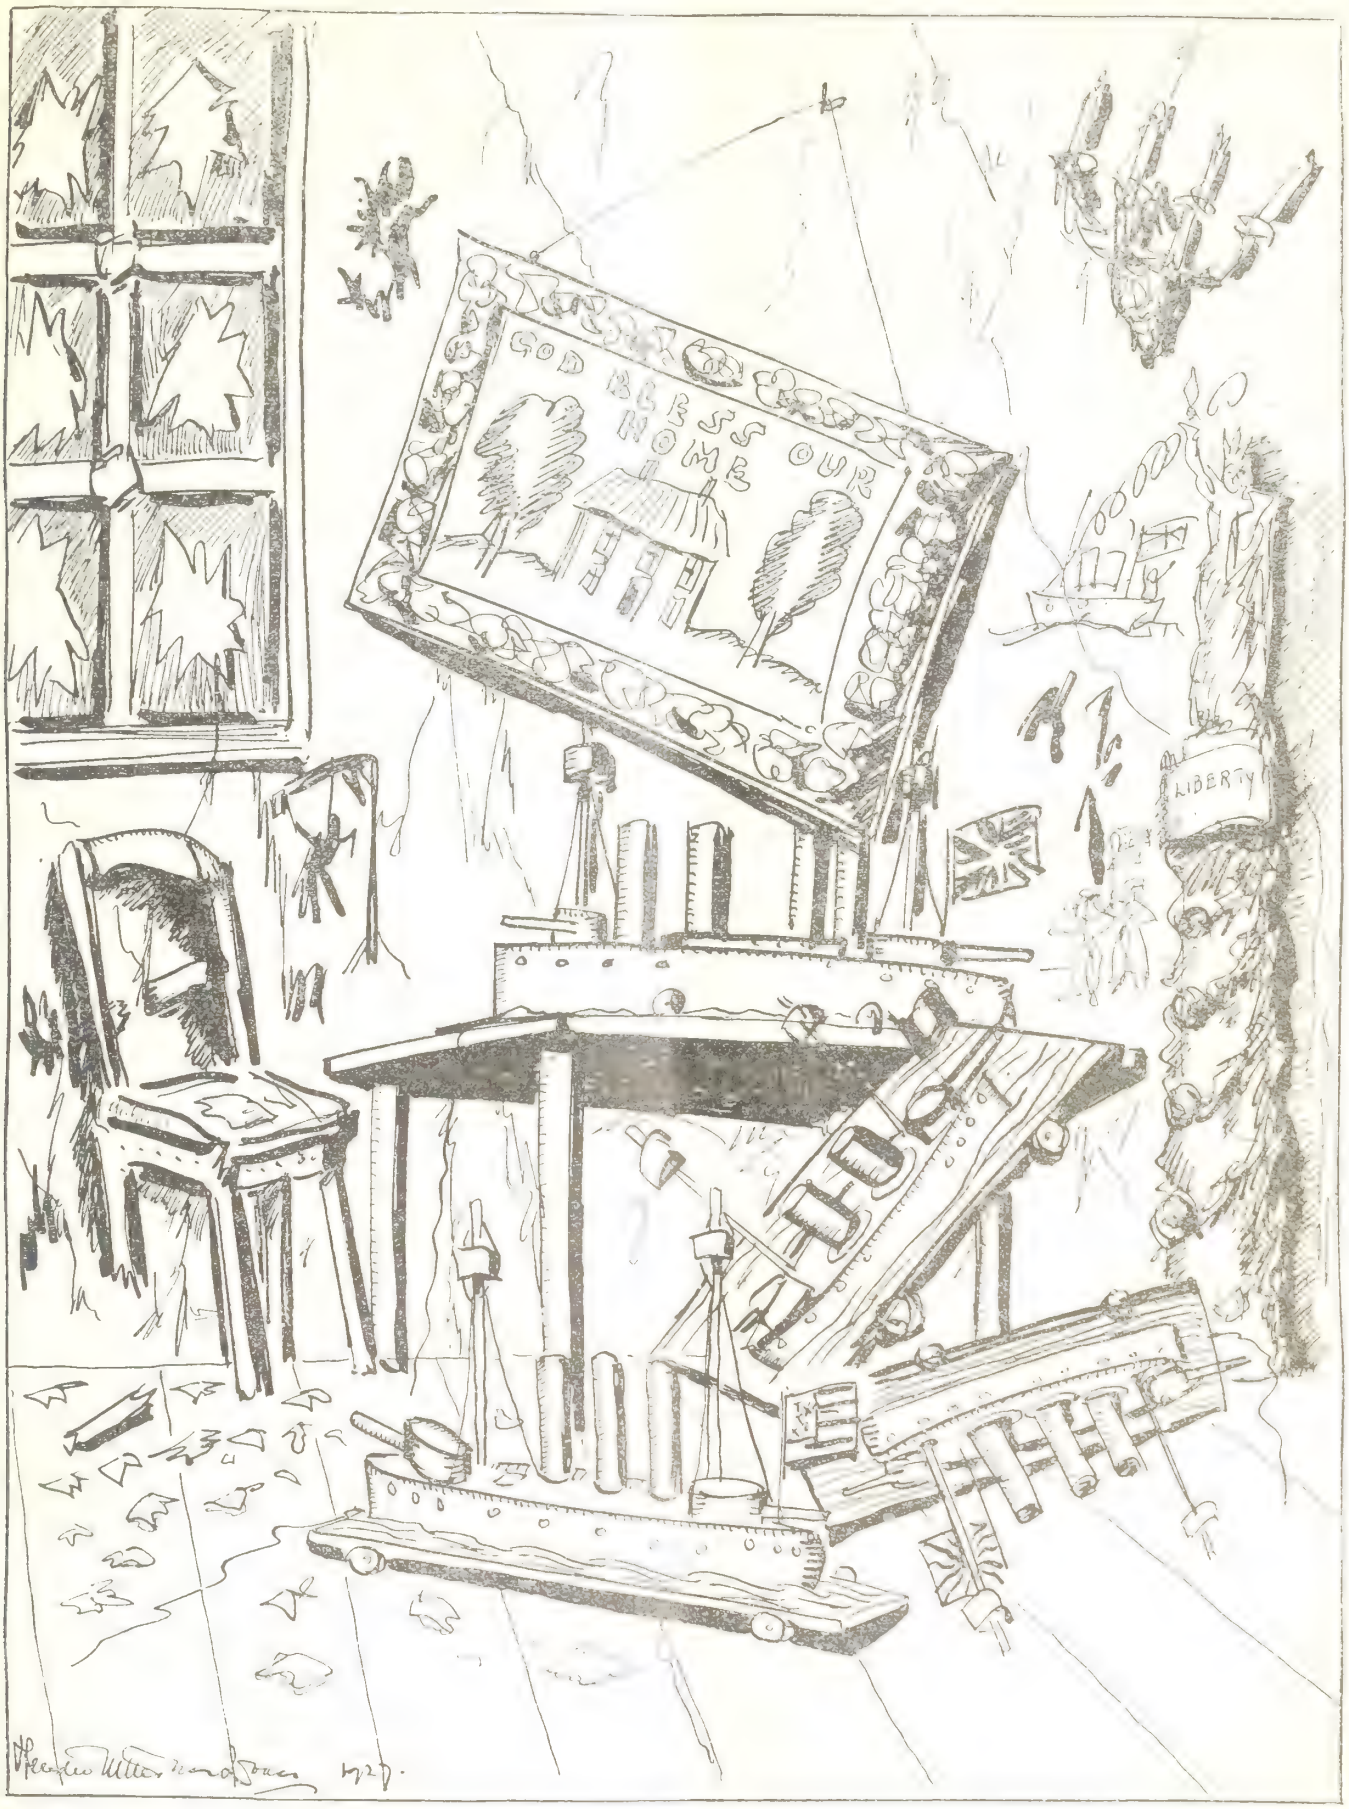
Meanwhile the Holland-America Line discontinued its request for the detention of sixteen of the fifty-four men. The sixteen were taken back to Holland on another of the line's ships. The remaining thirty-eight at this writing are still at Ellis Island "awaiting the convenience of the Holland-America Line." Mr. Pollock, however, has interested Senator Copeland and Representative La Guardia, both of whom have asked the Washington immigration officials to investigate.

A Rare Citizen

GEORGE FOSTER PEABODY'S seventy-fifth birthday has deservedly called forth widespread congratulations and generous recognition of the public services of a singularly useful and modest man. Known to the political world because of his connection as national treasurer of the second Wilson campaign and for a similar association with many reform movements in the city and State of New York, he is none the less, because of his lack of an itch for publicity, not as well known to the public as he deserves to be. Take, for instance, his services as chairman of the State of New York Reservation Commission at Saratoga Springs during the years from 1910 to 1915. If the State of New York bestowed medals of honor for public service of great worth, Governor Smith must long since have pinned one upon Mr. Peabody. When the State decided to undertake the venture in public ownership of acquiring the mineral-springs reservation, Mr. Peabody found a dreadfully run-down resort chiefly known for gambling and horse racing and general dissipation during race weeks. Mr. Peabody was one of the first to see the necessity for rescuing the place from the private and local management under which it had gone far downhill and raising it to the level of the great European spas. This has been done, thanks to his vision and the devotion which led him to remove his home to Saratoga Springs and to give himself unsparingly to this great task. It is now a place to be proud of, to which people of limited means may go and obtain relief.

But this is only one of Mr. Peabody's many public services. A Georgian by birth, he retired from banking and railroading years ago as soon as he had amassed a competence, in order to be free to give all his time to public work. Naturally he was profoundly drawn to the educational problems of the South. For that section his labors have been invaluable not only as trustee of such institutions as Hampton Institute, Penn Normal, the Fort Valley Industrial School, and the University of Georgia, of all of which he is a trustee, but as a member of the Southern Education Board and one of the moving spirits of the educational pilgrimages and conferences in the South out of which grew both the Southern Education and the General Education boards. To Robert C. Ogden fell the leadership in these undertakings, but to them Mr. Peabody brought wisdom, judgment, and a rare knowledge of both whites and blacks and of public sentiment North and South. Entirely free from racial prejudice, he has been one of those Southern men who have realized that the lasting progress of the South depends upon the complete cooperation of both races and education for white and colored peoples alike. To a deeply religious nature—religious in the best sense—he has added a devotion to democracy which knows no compromise of the principles of human brotherhood.

To us Mr. Peabody's career means most because he eschewed mere money-making in order to enter the noblest of professions, the ranks of those who freely give their abilities and talents to the general welfare without thought either of personal aggrandisement or popularity. Men and women such as he prove every day that the profit motive is not necessary to bring out the noblest traits in the human being. Incidentally, they find out for themselves that their profession brings in the richest dividends in precious friendships, ennobling experiences, and heart's content.



Geneva

It is nice that the children seem to be having such a good time. But that is not exactly what we sent them there for.

Britain's Folly Toward Russia

By J. RAMSAY MacDONALD

London, July 6

EVERYONE with an eye to see below the surface of things must be disquieted by the position of affairs in Europe. There is peace in the sense that there is no fighting, and every trouble that comes up is either successfully shelved for the time being or is patched up temporarily. But there is no settlement and no removal of the causes of unsettlement. That old fever morass of the Balkans is undrained; the great Powers live on a footing of hand-to-mouth cooperation which is rather between individuals than between national policies. The condition of the atmosphere is not one whit changed from what it was before 1914, although the clouds charged with lightning may be different. And we are settling down to that state of affairs. The League of Nations—its agendas, its discussions, the influence to which it responds—is steadily being made to fit into the old world of diplomacy. A new mind coming into authority in 1924 found difficulties in specific problems; coming into authority now it would find difficulties in established habits. The latter presents a far more formidable task than the former.

There is one major specific point, however, that requires bold and well-considered treatment. I refer to the position of Russia. Until this is put on a satisfactory footing there will be no security for Europe, but that will not be done so long as foreign secretaries are possessed of the childish idea that they are dressed in nice starched muslin frocks and should associate only with well-brought-up lambs of their own flock. Moral reflections about Moscow are really beside the mark except in so far as they are caused by events which arise out of political policy. Russia has been in revolution and still is intermittently. Thanks to the reaction of the czarist regime, the revolution was cruel and bitter; thanks to the interfering follies of neighboring nations (and particularly of our own when we were blessed with the Coalition Government with a Liberal at its head), the revolutionary mind has been kept long alive. The latest outburst of revolutionary execution which shocked the feelings of every decent human being was the natural result of our breaking off relations with Moscow and the slackness of other governments in controlling the activities of the White Russians to whom they were giving asylum. Those horrible crimes have again given an opportunity to gushing journalists—the very last people who are entitled to do this—to work upon public feeling and to darken counsel regarding the Russian problem. The perpetration of horrors and the doing of injustice is so well distributed among the nations of the world that they ought to be chary in how they judge these cases.

Two things have been the main contributors to the unfortunate attitude of this country to Moscow. The first, and far and away the most important, has been the fact that the Red scares have been of profit to the Tory Party. On a Red scare they came into office; on Red scares they hope to remain in office. The second is an instinctive repulsion on the part of the class which our present Government represents to the class in control in Moscow. There is a third reason, as an explanation for the action of this Government, a very minor one, moreover, and that is the equivocal position of the Russian Government itself regarding propaganda. As the result of its raid on Arcos, our Government found nothing. Not a scrap of paper picked from private pockets or seized from safes contained information that was new to any well-informed private person or government department. Not a transaction, either proper or improper, of which we were not previously well aware was revealed by the Government's raid. The fuss having been made, however, its consequences had to be swallowed, and the Russian representatives had to be told to quit. So we are exactly where we were in 1920, when, having spent over £100,000,000 trying in vain to overthrow the Soviet Government, we decided to back out and let things take their course.

Revolutionary propaganda from Moscow and by organizations like the Third International (the official status of which the Moscow Government dares not repudiate if the point is pushed) cannot be tolerated. But it was the Labor Government—the subject of Red scares—that came to closest grips with this, and, had its policy been pursued, the danger undoubtedly would have been removed by now. The position today is that Moscow has some reason for believing that certain European governments are trying to form a hostile combination against it, and this affords a justification for an intensification of revolutionary propaganda. If it is outlawed for building up, it has as a recompense an open world for its propaganda of unsettlement. We cannot have it both ways. We can either recognize Russia and insist upon its doing team work, or decline to recognize it and allow it to follow whatever course seems best to it. Great Britain's Russian policy is dictated by the minds that conceived the Trade Union Bill and the proposals to put reaction in permanent control of our constitutional machinery by gerrymandering the House of Lords.

The right policy is so simple. We have to help Russia over its revolution. Russia at this moment is (or, had it been properly handled, would be) in the throes of "the morning after." Those who still dream of a world revolution are bound to come up against those who wish to establish the Russia of the revolution amongst world states. Those charged with the tasks of government know that Russia must make its peace with the world and must accept the obligations of a state to neighbors properly jealous of their sovereign independence. Russia is anxious to do this, but it is not allowed. The revolution which on the inside dies down into normal conditions, is galvanized into an unnaturally prolonged life by the policy of foreign states. External propaganda, which those in responsible positions know to be an impossible policy, is kept alive by the conduct of foreign Powers, and the political elements in Russia are weakened and the revolutionary high priesthood strengthened in consequence. Moscow can be induced to do many things—even to pay its debts as honestly as some other European states, and from a more exhausted exchequer; it can be forced to do nothing except keep its spirit of revolutionary menace alive.

England—Too Bitter to Compromise?

By FREDA KIRCHWEY

London, July 11

A SOBER study of the situation in England today would doubtless discover innumerable contradictions and cross-currents. Nothing is simple—least of all the heavy, complicated, yet strangely powerful machinery that moves the British Government. Yet something simple lies behind the events of the past weeks, something that the most casual intruder must feel. Listening through several afternoons and evenings to the debate in the Commons on the trade-disputes bill and in the Lords on the reform bill, I had a sharp sense of grim, bitter enmity, too real and too unappeasable to be hidden by the forms of Parliamentary politeness or by the swift irony that so often took the place of blunt attack. Labor and the Government are at war. The Government, stronger for the moment, is using its temporary control to throw up barricades against the growing power of Labor. It is hiding its purpose behind phrases—"individual liberty," "the right of every Englishman"—phrases it hopes the country will swallow. It is fighting cleverly. It is suave and dignified; it enjoys, one feels, goading the Opposition into ill-tempered, unmannerly rebuttal. But it is fighting no less tensely for all that. If the Prime Minister ever cared to be fair, as some of his opponents believe, he does so no longer. The Government is afraid, and it is showing its fear as governments always do. One of the most clear-headed Labor sympathizers I know said: "I think England has lost the art of compromise."

The trade-disputes bill needs no new analysis. The Government claims that it is aimed only to prevent extreme revolutionary action in the form of a general strike. But everyone else admits, and the Government cannot effectively deny, that the bill is so worded as to be applicable to any great strike. It would, for instance, make illegal a miners' strike which included among its demands a return to the statutory seven-hour day, won by a strike in 1911 and lost in last year's lockout. The bill even borrows the useful American labor injunction to make its effect more swift and telling. It makes peaceful picketing practically illegal by prohibiting any act which may cause in the mind of a person a reasonable apprehension of injury . . . and the expression 'injury' includes injury other than physical or material injury." It even attempts by its limitations on the political levy (the device by which trade-union members are taxed to support the Labor Party) to choke off the sources of financial strength of a rival party which cannot fill its chest by the sale of honors to industrial leaders. The bill is constructed to block Labor's advance both industrially and politically. It is the act of a terrified giant.

The attempted Lords' "reform" is more fantastic and far more fundamental. Introduced directly in the upper House without consulting the Commons or the electorate, it has aroused such indignant opposition that its withdrawal seems certain.[1] The proposals to fix the membership of the House of Lords at a definite number—never to be raised by King or Commons—to insure a permanent majority of hereditary peers, and to give such a chamber joint power with the Commons to determine what is a money bill, was too distasteful a dose for the Liberals; and even a group of younger Conservatives—genially referred to by the Daily Herald as the "Y.M.C.A.'s"—choked over it. It hardly required Ramsay MacDonald's smashing attack to bring the Government to a point of retreat; it was wobbling before he began. But for all that the danger is not over. If it can do so without alienating the country, the Government will certainly attempt to barricade the House of Lords against Labor.

England is still a country where the lower classes expect little and give much. From housemaids to railway conductors—everywhere one meets a polite subservience that must astonish and impress any American. By contrast, the behavior of Labor's representatives in Parliament takes on particular significance. The Conservative and Liberal members have, for the most part, an easy air of humor and educated poise. The Labor members vary from professional men and seasoned politicians to provincial workers fresh from factory and union hall. Their accents and manners cover a range equally wide. But every one of them—the rough and untutored as well as the suave and learned—speaks his mind with aggressive self-confidence.

Left-wing critics charge that the conservative Labor members are always ready to compromise; that only the pressure of the rank and file and the threat of loss of funds stiffened them to oppose the trade-disputes bill. Conservatives insist that there is no real working-class feeling against the bill and that the Opposition in Parliament is merely making empty and insincere gestures of disapproval. These views may, with all their contradictions, contain fragments of the truth. The Labor members doubtless represent as many shades of opinion and probity as any group. But the general effect they create is one of courage and honest, outspoken attack. Their weapons are weak—mere words, flung at empty benches belonging to men who, when the time for division comes, will wander in from the lobbies and vote "no" on amendments and "yes" on the Government's proposals. But while those words are heard with smiling complaisance by the Government, they may fall with more effect outside the ancient walls of the Houses of Parliament. That is what Labor hopes when it speaks, directly and unpleasantly, to the indifferent benches opposite.

I heard Ellen Wilkinson attack the picketing clause of the trade-disputes bill. Her speech showed plainly the gulf that opens between the Government and its opponents when labor is discussed. "There seems to be an extraordinary impression," she said, "that workmen like strikes and that they strike for the fun of the thing." She described the effect of a strike on the lives of the men and women who leave their jobs, and discussed their feeling toward fellow-workers who refuse to join in a war "with an even more ruthless enemy than that faced on the battlefield." She went on, crisply addressing the previous speaker:

[1] It has since been withdrawn.—EDITOR, The Nation.

> Members of the honorable gentleman's class who are brought up with a regard for esprit de corps, whose schools and colleges teach them that they have to stand by their fellows, regard what is a point of honor for themselves as a crime when it is done by the working classes of England, and they produce clauses like this in order to emphasize to the workers of this country that such fine sentiments are not for working people but are merely reserved for gentlemen.

And she inquired why it was that the "blackleg" alone should be carefully protected by the Government from forms of persuasion that might injure his "self-respect."

Ellen Wilkinson is small and lean, but she is eloquent. She bent forward as she ended and shook her dark red hair at the men across the gangway.

> I can conceive of nothing cleverer than this attempt to get into the minds of the working people the understanding that they had better put up with any conditions, however unjust, because they do not know what is waiting for them if they object. We congratulate the Attorney General because nature gave him the face of one of the Cheeryble Brothers, but I say this quite firmly, that behind the face of Mr. Pickwick or the Cheeryble cherub who comes here and smiles upon us, he has the mind and heart of a Mephistopheles.

On the Government bench, side by side like two well-fed schoolboys, Winston Churchill, the Attorney General, and Joynson-Hicks, the Home Secretary, sat and smiled. Then Joynson-Hicks rose and addressed the House and his opponent with ironical gallantry:

> I apologize to the House [he said] for rising before having quite digested the compliment which the honorable lady has paid to my right honorable and learned friend the Attorney General. But does not the speech of the honorable lady bring home to the House the kind of thing with which the non-striker has to put up? Fancy the honorable lady being let loose in a mining area during a strike and firing off a speech of that kind in regard to the unfortunate men whom she terms, with all the withering irony of which she is capable, "blacklegs." . . . The honorable lady opposite will not think me uncomplimentary when I say that, when I listen to her, I sometimes am reminded of Madame Defarge, and the tumbrils on their way to the guillotine. I think the honorable lady would go on with her knitting if the Home Secretary rode in one of the tumbrils. I do not in the least dispute the power and authority of the honorable lady, but it is quite clear that her mind is warped. Her mind is the mind of the trade-union leaders, and they will not see any right or fairness in the minds of the men who do not go on strike, and who are called by them the opprobrious epithet of "blackleg." The blackleg is the man who desires to continue his work for the sake of his wife and family.

Those two fragments show well enough the temper of the present Parliament: Labor, stubborn and resentful, flinging itself against a smooth wall of bland, assured conservatism, helpless to win from its opponents understanding of something which, after all, cannot be understood but must be felt; the Government, polite, almost playful, appearing to listen and weigh and reason, and then at the end falling back on the unimpeachable argument of its huge majority.

Has England lost the art of compromise? Or is she facing issues on which no compromise is possible? Labor leaders say that the trade-disputes bill checked a visible tendency toward conciliation and cooperation in industry. But even the most conservative trade unionists base their willingness to cooperate on a determination ultimately to take control of the Government and of industry as well. Can conservatism compromise with that purpose? One has a feeling in watching the sharp engagements of the last few weeks that they are incidents in a struggle which cannot in the long run be ended by England's historic genius either for compromise or for muddling through.

The Northwest Stands Pat

By ROBERT S. ALLEN

THERE are two shows going on in the Northwest this summer. One has all the trappings, big star, favorable press, skilful staging, unlimited props and equipment of the kind designed to make a popular appeal, such as cowboy chaps, birthday cakes, Indian ceremonies, and the like. The other is back stage—in fact so far back stage that only now and again, and mostly inadvertently, can be heard the murmurs and the deep tones of the lines that characterize its significant scenes.

Mr. Coolidge and his stage managers may be cordially received as guests and hospitably entertained—though the gross exaggerations that have characterized everything about the trip also hold good on this score—but the embattled farmers will not be soft-soaped. A few years ago the farmer was more or less alone in his demand for economic adjustment. Today this cry is heard from all sides in the Northwest country: bankers, business men, labor, the professions.

"The lawyer or the doctor or the business man may have all the work he can handle," said a leading lawyer of the region, speaking before the Minnesota bar association in St. Paul, "but if his clients are bankrupt he is no better off than they are. And that is exactly the condition we and the farmers of this section are in today."

Throughout the Northwest the antics of the President, the blurbs of his yes-men, and the yammer of the sycophantic press leave the farmers cold. In Minnesota, in Wisconsin, in Iowa, in Idaho, in North Dakota and South Dakota, meetings are being held and the Administration and its four horsemen, Coolidge, Mellon, Jardine, and Hoover, are being discussed in no uncertain terms. The farmers, awaiting the approaching harvests that begin in a few weeks, are holding their picnics and gatherings, and at these meetings are listening to their leaders detail the story of their betrayal and looting by the Administration and the interests it represents. These speeches are invariably followed by questions from the eager listeners and open discussions. The observations that one may hear leave no doubt as to how the great mass of farmers feel about the veto of the McNary-Haugen bill, or their attitude toward a compromise sop.

The Northwest country wants neither sop nor soap. It wants—presidential approval or no presidential approval—legislation that it feels will count for something in giving relief. Government-subsidized cooperatives don't mean a thing to these bankrupt farmers and merchants. Right or wrong, they want their share of tariff protection. Too long, they say, have they stood by and seen industry walk away with the swag. If there is going to be tariff protection for some, then the Northwest country demands its share.

"Any legislative plan, to be acceptable to farmers, must in a clear and effective way make provision for full tariff protection for at least the key branches of the agricultural industry. Anything else will be rejected as a mere legislative gesture," said Frank W. Murphy, chairman of the Board of the American Council of Agriculture and chairman of the Legislative Committee of the Corn Belt Federation of farm organizations, at the farm-relief-legislation conference held recently in St. Paul.

Mr. Coolidge undoubtedly had his agents at this St. Paul gathering and received a comprehensive report of what took place. But it was really too bad that he did not avail himself of the invitation to be present. His impressions of the Northwest country, and the attitude of the embattled farmers, would without doubt have experienced some painful jolts. No bouquets were cast in his direction—although there were many things tossed his way—at this meeting, attended by half a score of United States Senators who will be the balance of power in the Senate at the next session of Congress, twice as many Representatives, and delegations from organizations from fifteen agricultural States. The bitterness and resentment of these delegates was held in leash by the leaders. Watched by a carping and hostile press, every effort was made to maintain a dignified restraint. Yet every criticism and denunciation of Coolidge and his Cabinet that was uttered was greeted with cheers and vigorous applause.

These people were not Reds, or radicals. Most came from States that had rejected the La Follette presidential bid. They are Republicans and have no hesitancy in saying so. Some of their leaders fought the so-called radical Nonpartisan League a few years back. Yet today they are filled with ire and hostility, and no worm-fishing or cowboy-chaps show that Mr. Coolidge can stage will satisfy them. Their pocket books are empty, their mortgages are increasing, and they want an end to that sort of thing.

"Two years ago when I was running for re-election," Representative Dickinson related in his speech before the St. Paul conference, "a merchant in my town told me he was going to vote against me because I was too radical. He opposed my support of the McNary-Haugen bill. The other day I was talking to him and he told me he was going to vote against me because I wasn't radical enough."

And although the leaders urged conciliation in the public pronouncement of the conferences, they could not prevent this blunt declaration, unanimously approved in the resolutions adopted by the large crowd present:

> The veto of this measure, after its passage by a bipartisan majority of both houses of Congress, clearly repudiates the Republican platform on which President Coolidge was elected. The veto message which seeks to defend the President's act consists from the beginning to the end of indefensible and conflicting arguments which had been answered to the satisfaction of Congress during months of debate on the measure.

These are the real sentiments of the farmers. The Northwest country stands pat and means business.

Why the American Woman Is Unique

By ELLSWORTH HUNTINGTON

MANY Europeans think that Americans are boisterous, bustling, active, and conceited, but not very deep. We ourselves say that we have tremendous energy, ambition, and power of achievement. Our women, especially, are said to be bolder, less domestic, more ambitious, and more dominating than those of the Old World; or braver, more progressive, more adaptable, less submissive, and more competent, if you prefer another set of adjectives. All this seems to mean that so far as there is any genuine deep-seated difference between the people of the United States and of other countries, it is largely a matter of temperament. But is there really any such temperamental difference, and if there is, do women show it more strongly than men?

It seems to me that the differences thus roughly defined are real, and that their main causes are, first, natural selection arising through migration; second, geographic conditions; and third, a peculiarly stimulative social environment. The stimulating quality of the social environment seems to owe much of its character to the two other causes, which are biological on the one hand and geographical on the other.

Much of our thought regarding the peculiarities of America is clogged by the fact that the natural selection arising from migration has never been adequately analyzed. All the inhabitants of the United States, aside from the Indians, are either immigrants from the Old World or the descendants of such immigrants. Even if our ancestors came in the Mayflower, we are separated from them by only eight or nine generations. In these facts, perhaps, may lie certain important reasons for the peculiarly optimistic and buoyant spirit of America and for the position of American women as pioneers in feminine progress.

When the question of going to a new land arises, one of the first problems is health. People in poor health, as a rule, have little or no thought of migrating; they do not dare. The health of the women has more to do with the matter than that of the men. Many a man might go alone to a new land, but will not take his wife if she has any physical weakness. The more difficult the migration, the greater is the selection on account of health. How real this is may be judged from the experience of the Pilgrims who came over in the Mayflower. By the end of the first winter after their arrival in America, forty-four of the 102 original passengers had died; by the end of a year, half had succumbed. That means an extremely rigorous selection, for those who were less strong in one way or another must have been the first to succumb. One of the most noteworthy and typical facts about the experience of the Pilgrims was that the selection was more severe among women than among men. Of the eighteen married women who came in that first shipload, practically all of them being relatively young, thirteen died during the first sad year. Of course this is an extreme case, but it illustrates a great principle. All through the pioneer period, a similar though less severe selection took place. Practically none save those with strong and vigorous constitutions came to America, and among those who came the hardships of the first few years still further weeded out the less vigorous, especially among the women and children.

Migration imposes not only a physical selection but a temperamental selection which may be still more important. Suppose that your community becomes interested in Australia. Many people begin to talk about migrating there. When it comes to the crucial point, who will go? Certainly not the families in which both the husband and wife are of a timid disposition. The chances are that a certain number of men who are of an optimistic, adventurous disposition will want to go. When they talk the matter over with their wives or sweethearts, a good many will promptly be dissuaded because the woman in the case does not happen to have the pioneer spirit. Since women are naturally more conservative than men, a relatively higher degree of the adventurous, optimistic, adaptable spirit is required to make them pull up stakes and go to a far country than is required of the men. The result is that not only does any hard migration cause a selection on the basis of what we may call the pioneer spirit but the selection is more radical among women than among men.

After migrants once reach a new land, many become discouraged and go back. Generally the ones who do this are less optimistic, less adaptable, less courageous, or otherwise less fitted for a new land than are their comrades. Thus those who finally compose the new population at the end of every migration tend to be of unusually strong physique and of an unusually buoyant and adaptable spirit. Moreover, the fact that migration is almost always harder for women than for men makes the difference between the women in the new land and the old greater than between the men.

The ordinary laws of heredity tend to perpetuate the conditions which thus arise. Among the earlier immigrants to a new land there is little chance to marry anyone who does not possess pioneer traits. Of course there are exceptions to all rules. Some timid and unadaptable people undoubtedly came to America even in the early days, and a great many later, but we are talking of averages. The average immigrant to the United States almost certainly exhibited the pioneer temperament to a greater degree than did the people who stayed in the Old World. Adventurous or optimistic parents tend to have adventurous or optimistic children, especially when both parents have the same quality. Moreover, biologists have found many qualities which are inherited more or less separately by the two sexes. Professor Roland B. Dixon of Harvard has shown this kind of inheritance pertains to the shape of the skull. Thus distinct types of head-form are transmitted for generation after generation among the men and the women of the same group. For example, if the men of a long-headed race should all take broad-headed wives, their male and female descendants would apparently differ in the form of their heads. Many generations later the percentage of long heads would be relatively high among the men and low among the women, while the women would show relatively more broad heads and few long ones. If such sex-linked inheritance should be verified so far as the external form of the head is concerned, there is no reason why it should not also be true of traits of temperament. Thus, although the final demonstration still remains to be made, many bits of evidence suggest that migration, natural selection, and biological inheritance may form a chain of conditions whereby one sex may advance along a different line or along the same line to a different degree from the other. During the colonial era of what is now the United States the women may have taken such a step with the result that their average temperament approached the typical adventurous masculine temperament more nearly than is the case with their sisters in the Old World. It is as if the men who came to America were relatively long-headed compared with those who remained behind, while the women were relatively still more long-headed. In that case the relatively long-headed quality of the women might persist indefinitely.

If the preceding reasoning is well grounded, it indicates a genuine biological basis for the difference which we seem to see between the average woman of America, Australia, or Canada and the average woman in the Old World. Of course, as time goes on, selection becomes less strenuous. When the agents of steamship companies circulate among all sorts of people and make it easy for almost anyone to go to a new land, as they did in the days before the Great War, the selection becomes relatively unimportant. But even in our day, the difficulties of migration across the Atlantic seem to be great enough to cause at least a slight temperamental difference between the average person who comes to America and those of the same class who stay at home. Now, too, as in the past, the selection among women is probably more severe than it is among men.

Geography, as well as biology, appears to take a hand in making Americans different from other people. The rich new land, the mineral resources, the forests, and the other material sources of wealth in America are often set forth as the main cause of American activity. We are told that the presence of such wealth stimulates people in a most extraordinary fashion. Undoubtedly the chance to get gold for the mere work of digging, rich land for the mere labor of filing a claim, and fabulous wealth by merely putting meager savings into good investments has stimulated many a lethargic man to unwonted action. All this may help to explain why the American people, both men and women, are temperamentally different from those of Europe. But unfortunately for this argument, the very people who use it are likely in the next breath to say that the ease of life in the tropics is the reason why tropical people are temperamentally sluggish. This is obviously the exact reverse of the argument as to the effect of natural wealth in making the people of the United States active.

For this reason, and for others, I have gradually come to the conclusion that the material resources of America have had far more effect upon the American temperament through the indirect means of natural selection than through their direct effects. They have acted as a magnet to draw from the Old World many enterprising, money-loving people. By attracting one type of people more strongly than another, they have probably been one of the main determinants of the American temperament.

Another geographical condition—climate—seems much like natural resources in its effect on the people of America. In this case, however, the direct effects are perhaps as important as the indirect, while women may be influenced somewhat more than men. To begin with the indirect or selective effect, many tales of the rigors of the New England climate went back to England from the early Puritans. Although no exact investigation has been made, it seems only reasonable to believe that for a long time those tales had a good deal to do with deterring all but the more adventurous and more hardy type of people from coming to the Northern colonies. In later days a similar effect was produced by the widespread idea that the region west of the Mississippi River was a worthless desert. An analysis of the sections of the United States toward which immigrants from different countries have gravitated shows clearly that people who cross the ocean tend to settle in climates as much like their own as possible. Of course the majority of immigrants come to New York and the neighboring cities, but when they spread out from there, the Italians, for example, are more likely to go south than are the Swedes and Norwegians. Whether the selective effect of climate is greater upon women that upon men is not evident.

A more important effect of climate is its influence upon health and especially upon the nerves. During the past decade or two we have found that variations in health from day to day, week to week, season to season, and year to year depend upon the weather far more than upon any other factor. It needs no demonstration to show that health and temperament are closely connected. People doubtless have permanent temperaments which they acquire by inheritance or by long training, but they also have temporary temperaments which make them grouchy and pessimistic today and cheery and optimistic tomorrow. A long, monotonous, rainy spell tends to produce the pessimistic stage; whereas the snappiness of a clear day in October makes people optimistic. All of us have experienced the temperamental ups and downs of the weather. We know how the end of the winter often finds us nervously played out, while in autumn we are active and energetic.

Perhaps the most important feature of the climate of the Northeastern United States compared with that of the rest of the world is the high degree of variability. This quarter of the United States is the stormiest inhabited part of the world. This does not mean the rainiest or the coldest, but the part where ordinary storms follow one another most frequently, and bring the most rapid changes of weather. These changes are highly stimulating. Of course they may be too extreme, but when they are of reasonable magnitude, and when people have become accustomed to them, the change from rain to sunshine, from warm south winds to cool northwest winds, and from a score of other conditions to their opposites has a bracing effect. Such changes not only promote health but stimulate physical and mental activity. In fact, the stimulation is often so great as to be nervously harmful. The extreme contrasts between winter and summer often produce a similar effect. Thus we are stimulated to excessive activity and often feel that we must be doing something before we have thoroughly thought out its consequences.

Recent climatic studies suggest that women are more sensitive to climate than are men. For example, some years ago I compared the weather with the daily work of hundreds of men and women in several Connecticut factories. In every case the same seasonal trend appeared—poor work in midwinter; good work in the spring, culminating in June; a drop during the summer in warm years, but not in other years; greatest efficiency in the late fall.

When the amount of work was compared with the temperature, humidity, and variability of individual days, certain highly systematic relationships were found. In general, men and women responded to the weather in the same way, but the women were more sensitive. Similar evidence of sensitiveness is found in the fact that when women go from one climate to another the periodic physiological functions are affected, becoming more regular and comfortable in some climates and irregular and painful in others, such as that of India. If further investigation should confirm these results, we should expect the typical American woman not only to have the optimistic, adventurous, pioneer spirit as the result of natural selection but also to possess a high degree of nervous energy.

It is often assumed that the feeling of nervous tension is due largely to our highly stimulating sociological environment. Almost no one, for example, can go to New York City without experiencing a thrill of energy, an impulse to get busy somehow or other and keep pace with the crowd. This is unquestionably the direct result of contact with a great city where high standards of activity and achievement prevail. Women, by reason of their more sensitive nervous organization, presumably feel the thrill of New York, Chicago, and other great American cities even more than men. Thus sociological conditions are a factor in making American women alert and progressive.

But how have the sociological conditions of the United States become so stimulating? Are they the cause of the character of the people or are the people themselves the cause of their own sociological environment? It seems to me that our social organization owes a great deal of its character to the fact that our people still possess a large share of the pioneer spirit arising through natural selection, and are kept keyed up through the stimulus of our variable climate. These conditions almost inevitably produce an active, stimulating environment. Such an environment in turn stimulates still greater activity. This then, as I see it, is the cycle by which the American people have been brought to their present degree of activity and progress. Since women are more influenced than men at various points in the cycle, they surpass the men in the degree to which they differ from their sisters elsewhere.

Thus far the picture that we have drawn has much on which we may congratulate ourselves. Undoubtedly, we Americans as a people, and our women in particular, are over-stimulated. Nevertheless our inheritance, our resources, and our climate do help us to achieve. But there is one very disquieting element. The women of the most active types are the ones who have the fewest children. It is known that the graduates of women's colleges on an average have only one to one and a half children apiece. As a group, they come nowhere near replacing themselves; their type is dying out. The same thing seems to be true of practically every group of women who stand out as leaders in social and cultural activities. Of course, there are exceptions, but we are talking about averages which include the unmarried women, the married women who are childless, and the married women who have children. On an average, the highly selected, energetic, pioneer type of woman, and the type which responds most readily to the nervous stimulus of our climate, are the very ones whose other useful activities so fill their lives that only a small place is left for children. If this condition should continue to increase at its present rate, a few more generations would apparently see the elimination of the special qualities which today place the world's leadership in the hands of the American woman.

Have You a Little MS?

or

The Most Tragicall Historie of Charley Blot, Author

By JOHAN SMERTENKO

ANOTHER academic friend of mine has just received that thrilling letter from the center of Puritan probity which fulfills the dream of every novice in authorship. Beneath the large letter-head, advertising that the epistle came from none other than the Boston firm of Bliedem and Bliedem, Publishers, the magic words read as follows:

> Dear Professor Burrow:
>
> I was struck by your interesting contribution on "Lost Teeth in Literature" which appeared in the last issue of the Littlered Quarterly. If you are planning to expand the essay into a book, enlarging it to about 30,000 words, I shall be glad to consider the manuscript for early publication.
>
> Trusting that you will let us hear about "Lost Teeth in Literature" immediately and that you will permit us to examine any other manuscripts you may have with a view to immediate publication, I remain
>
> Yours sincerely,
>
> I. VERILY BLIEDEM, Pres.,
> BLIEDEM & BLIEDEM, Publishers

Now the shrewdness and the strength of appeal in this letter may be partially estimated by the following facts: Item Adam Burrow is the most careful and precise Yankee on our English faculty. Item Adam received this letter in the late morning mail. Item He showed it to me at the club that noon as he was gulping his lunch, with the words: "Wrote and promised the manuscript by spring. Must be rushing off to the library to get to work on it." This by way of excuse for interrupting a five years' ritual consisting of a leisurely, gossipy luncheon which was invariably followed by a game of chess. Again, Item He had not noticed that the number of words requested for this book was about half that contained in an average volume. Item He ignored that he had never heard of Bliedem and Bliedem, Publishers before and that in his own well-stocked library there was not a single work bearing the imprint of this firm.

These signs that my self-imposed task of disillusioning Burrow would be neither welcome nor easy were further emphasized by Adam's well-bred triumph in showing me his letter. After all, his gesture seemed to say, what are your successes in the public prints as compared with this overture to consider my unborn book? Here is the great I. Verily Bliedem himself practically accepting a volume on lost teeth from the foretaste I have given him in my essay. Such is human frailty that I doubt not the practical Burrow had a vision of fame and fortune to come as he walked down the campus to post his letter. And it seemed cruel to break in on his dream with the facts that I had in my possession.

The crude but unavoidable truth was that Bliedem and Bliedem, Publishers are one of the dozen dishonest printing concerns in America which ply a sort of confidence game on the outskirts of the publishing field. Most of them, significantly enough, are located in Boston, for the former seat of American culture still imparts an air of literary sanctity and quality even to its least worthy products, and also because the typical New Englander would rather write a book than inherit a farm. Nowadays, however, a large share of their business comes to these publishers from the would-be authors of the South and the Middle West. The greatest number of their victims is derived from the academic class, including both students and teachers, although clergymen, social workers, and contributors to the evanescent poetry magazines also fall readily into their clutches.

As editor of a Middle-Western magazine which sought to develop and give expression to native talent I came to know a great many of the victims. They would shyly offer me their forlorn-looking books, apologizing for the imprint, in order to show me the specimens of their work which these contained. Without encouragement would come the story of their deception, identical in each case, since the imposters base their methods on that human constant, vanity, and need neither great cunning nor overmuch originality for their confidence game.

Carefully watching the undergraduate, alumni, missionary, and other specialized periodicals, these birds of prey swoop down on the contributors with an invitation to present a manuscript for their perusal and possible publication. The lovelorn sophomore who sweats out that inevitable lyric in spring, the aged raconteur whose trivial anecdotes of pioneer days have bored two generations, the academic seeker-out of inconsequential information for unread bulletins, the prosy preacher with his barrel full of sermons —all these and many others are approached and hooked even as Adam Burrow was tempted.

With joy and eagerness the invitation is accepted, the manuscript promised; with toil and trepidation the one commits an additional twenty poems, the other shakes musty memory for the plums of gossip, the researcher delves for further useless statistics, the moralizer compiles his wisest saws and instances! Fortunately, thinks each author as he struggles, these kindest of publishers have seen fit to ask for only half the quantity that goes to make the average book; otherwise, not even this fecund brain could accomplish the task. Such is the conclusion if the luckless wight stops to think at all. Adam Burrow had not yet come to this stage when I called his attention to the easy requirement in Bliedem's letter as a tactful beginning to my disclosures. But Adam airily dismissed the hint. He did not desire to discuss the letter at all. He was anxious to get started on the monumental task of expanding the field of knowledge about lost teeth. I persisted; we argued; we quarreled. Only as a last resort did I inform him of the experiences of our colleague whose identity I shall disguise through the personage of Charles Blot.

Charles Blot, successful football coach, had received just such an invitation to contribute a manuscript to the firm of Bliedem and had sent precisely the same reply as friend Burrow. The fact that no one suspected Charley Blot of harboring literary ambitions simply served to increase the secrecy of these negotiations, for Charley was naturally extremely sensitive of his more imposing title, Professor of Physical Education. When Bliedem and Bliedem, Publishers, wrote him concerning his sketchy article in our alumni journal on "Common Faults in Football Training," he grasped the opportunity to enter on a plane of intellectual equality with the other academicians of our college. He, too, promised the manuscript for spring.

No Dante will ever imagine or describe the painful and prodigious task which was thus readily undertaken; but the same character which brings to our football teams their annual championships finally brought forth a volume which was duly dispatched to Boston. I. Verily Bliedem himself immediately acknowledged its arrival and promised quick perusal and an early report.

A month passed and Charley began to doubt. Six weeks; Charley despaired. Then one day this letter overwhelmed Coach Blot with the joy that knows no peer:

My dear Professor Blot:

It gives me great pleasure to report that our editorial department has found your manuscript satisfactory and suitable for immediate publication.

Heartiest Congratulations!

I personally believe that "Football Faults," as we have decided to entitle the book, will make a great volume and a successful one. If the conditions of the inclosed contract meet with your approval, will you please sign it that we may proceed with the publication of your work.

Cordially yours,

I. Verily Bliedem, Pres.
Bliedem and Bliedem, Publishers

With a singing heart and misty eyes, Charley Blot, the hardened and shrewd tactician of the gridiron examined his contract. Here was riches. The book would be sold at three dollars. The author was to receive a 15 per cent royalty on the first edition and 20 per cent on all succeeding editions. Other clauses promised him free copies, generous discounts on personal purchases, protection in foreign countries, profits on translations and moving picture sales—in brief, all those advantages and privileges that come to an author who is lucky enough to have the Bliedems as his publishers. Toward the end of the contract, however, there was a clause that Charley read twice—and yet again.

WHEREAS, the aforesaid book, FOOTBALL FAULTS, is necessarily limited in its appeal, the party of the second part agrees to pay and herewith pays unto the party of the first part the sum of EIGHT HUNDRED ($800.00) DOLLARS to defray in part the expenses of printing ONE THOUSAND (1,000) copies of the aforesaid book, FOOTBALL FAULTS.

And underneath this, in typewriting:

This sum may be paid in three instalments, namely: 1. An initial payment of four hundred ($400.00) dollars at the time of entering into the above contract; 2. A second payment of two hundred ($200.00) dollars upon receipt of galley proofs; 3. A final payment of two hundred ($200.00) dollars upon receipt of page proofs.

The contract was already signed by I. Verily Bliedem, President, and Will I. Bliedem, treasurer. There remained an inviting space for the author's name.

Charles turned to Betty Blot for advice. Betty, whose reputation as a thrifty housewife almost equalled her husband's fame as a football mentor, did not hesitate long. Charles Blot, author, was worth $800 even at a time when football coaches drew only professional salaries and dollars were regarded with wholesome respect.

Days passed; proofs came and went; checks were endorsed and cashed. Great stress was laid by Bliedem on haste in all these negotiations. But after $800 was paid there was a long lapse in correspondence and activity. Finally, just as Blot was about to investigate the causes of delay, he received this letter.

Dear Professor:

It occurs to me just as we go to press with our next "best seller," FOOTBALL FAULTS, that since the book will undoubtedly be put to constant and heavy use, it would be advisable to bring out this edition at least in durable cloth covers instead of the paper binding we had planned for the volume. The additional cost will be more than made up by the increased appeal of the book.

What do you think? Let us know immediately your own opinion on the matter.

With best wishes,

I. Verily Bliedem, Pres.
Bliedem and Bliedem, Publishers.

"A paper book," said Betty Blot when Charles showed her the letter, "why that's no book at all!"

Charley wired Bliedem: "Agree with you cloth cover preferable."

Evidently this carefully worded message forced the astute Bliedem into the open. For his telegram read: "Bindery estimates your share of increased expense $150. Authorize expenditure and send check. Presses await your reply."

"I guess he's caught us in punt formation," said Charley as he handed the telegram to his helpmate. Feeling that a too-ready acquiescence would encourage further demands, Blot wrote his publishers a frank but dignified letter objecting to this additional charge and indicating that it bordered on extortion. In a few days he had his answer:

My dear Professor:

You probably did not realize that your tardy reply was putting us to great expense in holding up the presses with the forms of your book. Please bear in mind that many other volumes are awaiting publication until your work is disposed of and try to avoid any unnecessary delay in the future.

I am personally very much surprised that you did not know it is the invariable practise in the publishing field to decide with each individual author the character of binding to be used and that naturally some bindings are more expensive than others.

In all such cases as yours, where the author bears a small part of the publishing costs, he is charged proportionately for the binding he chooses. Some of our poets ask for specially stamped boards; other rare works are bound in morocco. Surely you will agree with our policy of charging each one according to his demands.

Our president, I. Verily Bliedem, joins me in urging you to send your check immediately that we may bring out your very valuable work at the most propitious time and go on to the numerous other books on our heavy list.

Sincerely yours,

Will I. Bliedem, Treas.
Bliedem and Bliedem, Publishers.

It was at this point that Charley took me into his confidence. I urged the services of a lawyer and we three went into consultation. After examining the contract the attorney informed us that Bliedem had managed to conform to all the technicalities of the law in his confidence game. On the other hand, in his letters he had drawn the string too taut. In this last, for instance, he was progressively more vulnerable in each of his statements. Thus it is anything but the practice of reputable publishers to request payment from authors for bringing out their works; in America it is assumed that a book will have some durable binding; and finally, it was outright deception on his part to assert that the presses waited on the reply, for printing is a separate process from binding.

Over the lawyer's signature we sent an answer pointing out these facts, refusing the requested payment, and threatening suit if the book was not properly published. There was no acknowledgment of this letter. When the silence had lasted for more than a month the lawyer wrote again, demanding that Bliedem and Bliedem, Publishers, live up to their contract or return the manuscript and money. He gave them a fortnight to fulfill their obligations.

About a week later Charles received six copies of his book. Our worst expectations of its appearance were exceeded by the reality. Between ill-fitting covers and on the cheapest kind of paper appeared one of the most incompetent printing jobs I have ever seen. The form would have disgraced any contents, no matter how bad. To add to his discomfiture Blot learned that the college bookstore had been sent a consignment of twenty-five copies of his work. It took all of our influence and eloquence to persuade the merchant not to place these on sale.

Were it not for the inspired idea which came to his attorney, Charles Blot would have suffered a total loss of his money as well as the indignity of having so ill-favored a book circulated among football men. But, calculating that the swindlers would greedily try to make every possible cent of Blot's money, the lawyer came to the conclusion that they would not print the entire edition of one thousand copies which their contract called for. He communicated with a Boston detective agency and an investigation proved his suspicions well founded. Some job printer was persuaded to turn over Bliedem's written order that 100 copies of "Football Faults" be printed and the type distributed.

With this evidence in his possession Blot's lawyer sent an ultimatum to the publishers. They were to refund the money or stand both civil and criminal trial. Knowing the author would dislike the publicity of these proceedings almost as much as they did, our publishers were neither polite nor penitent in reply. Nevertheless they offered to return $500 for a full settlement of the case. Much against his inclination both as a public-spirited citizen and a duped author, Charles Blot accepted the proposal with a proviso that all of the books printed should be turned over to him for destruction. Soon afterward we went through the tragi-comic ceremony of burning these volumes, and only a carbon copy of the manuscript remains as the testimony to Charley Blot, author.

Adam Burrow heard me in silence. When I was through, he put his hand on my shoulder and said, "I think there is just time enough for a quick game of chess."

Lest the reader consider that the "tragicall historie" here presented is a venture into imaginative literature, I hasten to add in all seriousness that it is no farther from the actual truth than a superficial disguise of the main characters and, furthermore, that it is one of thousands of cases which have occurred in America during the past fifteen years. The disguise is made necessary by the natural aversion of the victims to the publicity which is incurred in a specific exposé. But even more conducive to this indirect treatment is the fact that, though obviously guilty of deceit and knavery, these swindlers are, in the main, legally invulnerable. It would therefore be considered libelous to disclose the identity of the bogus publishers who annually find more than 300 victims for their confidence game despite their manifest dishonesty. Even the United States Department of Justice, which for years sought to prosecute them on one of the many complaints that are constantly made, confesses itself baffled.

In fact, to date, legal action has succeeded in driving only two concerns out of business. Both were emboldened to overstep the bounds of legal security by the ease with which they had previously evaded all prosecution. The first fell as a result of a situation similar to that depicted in the experiences of Charley Blot. The second firm made its misstep in assuring one author the sale of a specified number of copies and thereby became liable to the charge of false representation. The victim, who had paid $1,650 as "her share of the publishing expenses" and given an additional sum of $350 as a personal loan to "expedite the printing of the work," forced her publishers into bankruptcy when she won her suit; but it is doubtful whether she recovered one-third of her money—and the company is again operating. These cases and another faker, now under investigation by the Department of Justice, who has been particularly active recently among the feminine poets of the renascent South, are exceptional. The other firms are content to keep within the limits permitted them by law under the contracts which they make with their authors. These contracts are so cleverly drawn that the apparent advantages offered to the writer are really disabilities, whereas the inconspicuous modifications of one clause or another actually negate all promises and invalidate all the claims that the author may have against the publishers who are thus pledged to a minimum of expenditure and gain a maximum of profit.

When the bogus publisher "accepts" a manuscript to be brought out at the writer's expense, he swindles the author by failing to render all of the important service that the reputable firms are able to perform, despite the fact that his charges are from two to ten times greater than an ordinary printer's would be for the same work. The faker has no salesmen visiting bookstores in an effort to place his stock before the public; he knows that the experienced bookseller will have none of it. Piling injury upon injury, he turns this inability to distribute the books to profit by charging for storage. He does no advertising; he seldom publishes a catalogue; and he hardly ever sends the books out for review through fear that some undiplomatic critic will disclose that it is more injurious to the reputation of a novice to appear under the imprint of this publisher than to admit the possession of an universally rejected manuscript. Whatever circulation such books receive is generally achieved by the writer himself who sends out as many autographed complimentary copies as he can afford to pay for. One victim, now a respected author with several legitimately published works to his credit, recently informed me that in addition to the $600 paid for bringing out his 48-page book of verse, he spent $300 in distributing half the edition and would now pay twenty times as much to retrieve the horrid witnesses of his ineptitude and vanity.

In the Driftway

THE DRIFTER has a friend who has a friend who has a friend—how many friends removed the Drifter is uncertain. But the ultimate friend who interests the Drifter so much that he wishes he knew him intimately is a Chinese philosopher. In his spare time, and being Chinese he has hardly anything else, he thinks about the Sphericality of Time. How time can be both spare and spherical is confusing to the Drifter. He will, however, spell Time with a capital T to indicate the philosophy of this Chinese, and ask the reader to ignore all the other times he may write as many times as they occur.

* * * * *

TO an American, the Drifter supposes, Time is linear and is measured off into hours and minutes that have no more width than the feet and inches on a yardstick. This endless line is forever unwinding itself like ticker tape, and the great game of life is to see how much you can write on the tape as it goes by. If you can crowd it so full of words that they cannot be read, you have a fair chance of winning the game. You are allowed as many secretaries as you can afford to help fill up your strip of tape; you train them not to waste a second. If an American could be found who cared about the Sphericality of Time, he probably would not allow himself to think of anything so useless. Spherical or not, he would feel that it must not be wasted.

* * * * *

TO a European, however, Time would have at least two dimensions. It would cover the surface of life with an ample cloth on which there would always be room to spread an abundant dinner, in five or more courses, with wine. To a Russian, who is less and more than a European, it would be thick and solid, with sharp corners, like a block of wood that might be burned or buried, but could never be filled. And to a true Oriental, it appears, Time can be spherical; full and graceful, with the symmetry of independent things, existing in its own right like a planet, to be studied and admired but not touched. The Drifter would like to hear and if possible he would like also to understand the theory of the Sphericality of Time. His interest is such that he even promises to read a translation of any volume that his friend's friend's friend may have published on the subject. But he feels that so wise a man would not need to confide his discoveries to print. A man to whom time is spherical would not be bitten by the serpent of words. He would be content to know the truth in his own mind; or (if a scientist is too modest to claim knowledge) he would be content to suppose.

* * * * *

"THE serpent of words;" the Drifter hopes his reader or readers noticed that striking phrase. He does not pretend to have originated it, but he cannot remember to which of half a dozen aesthetic reviews of the young intellectuals to credit it. Words are coming in for a large share of abuse from writers who say they are unable to be as original as their talent would otherwise make them, because the language is so old. Words are "worn counters" that have lost their freshness and meaning. Yet if the Drifter is not mistaken, those who rail most loudly against them use them most profusely. They express their protest by using them in strange combinations, misspelled, or decapitalized; but to the Drifters' surprise they have made little or no attempt to invent new words.

* * * * *

THE DRIFTER would like to see the neo-primitives discard entirely these obstacles to their originality and revert to picture writing, which they should find fresh, vivid, and difficult enough to suit their jaded palates. Our cave-dwelling ancestors must have had a great thrill of creative pride when they sent a picture of a man entering a dwelling from which arose the smoke of a cooking-fire, with three suns going down behind it, by way of inviting a neighbor to dinner three days in advance; and if the Drifter's possible readers object that hospitality had not reached so refined a stage in the days of caves, he contributes the suggestion for their own summer entertaining. He himself can never think of picture writing without regretting the simplified Chinese alphabet. The reform, while leaving the language at a degree of difficulty which paralyzes the imagination, would surely strip it of its most charming associations. The one character for whose loss the Drifter could not be consoled stands for the Chinese word meaning gossip. It is a simple and tasteful picture of three women. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Bondage

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Years ago Rose Field, a brother of the immortal Gene, wrote a book called "The Bondage of Ballinger." Ballinger's bondage was books.

One night when he brought home a new book his wife, a patient and long-suffering victim of this bondage, said: "Ballinger, I understand the affection you have for your bondage; it gives you great joy, I know. But there is one thing that is absolutely certain—it will have to be curbed or it will not last; it cannot subsist upon an empty larder."

Ballinger, unlike most slaves, and perhaps most people, could see a point, even if it was directed against himself. He said he would try and do his best to curb it; that as a starter he would take back the book he had brought home and get the money for it. When he returned at night, however, he had Fox's "History of the Martyrs," for which he had exchanged the other book, paying one dollar and fifty cents to boot.

The plight of the Ballingers became a town topic. A wealthy gentleman who wanted to do Ballinger a good turn, and reap a little glory himself, proposed to Ballinger that he should found a town library, buy Ballinger's books, and put them in it, and call them "the Ballinger Collection." Ballinger, with a lump in his throat, a tear in his eye, and a quaver in his voice, said: "Would you sell your children?" The wealthy gentleman said, "No, of course not." "Then why do you ask me to? These are my only children," replied Ballinger.

A month or two ago, the partner of my many sorrows and few joys (I was 75 today) and I were trying to do what Briand and other European financiers have been trying to do since the war, balance the budget. In discussing ways and means for the accomplishment of that result, the Madame said: "Why not quit buying The Nation? Fifteen cents a week, sixty cents a month, seven dollars and twenty cents a year—that would buy you a pair of shoes, or go quite a way in buying you a pair of pants, both of which you sadly need."

"Quit buying The Nation?" I said in astonishment. "My friend, counsellor and guide, which I have been following for half a century! Impossible! The shoes can be patched so that they will not show much, and the pants, too, and the patch won't show when I put on my top coat."

I thought of the bondage of Ballinger, and I mentioned it to her. With a far-away look she said: "I see, I see, I understand, I understand."

I am still buying The Nation.

Lombard, Ill., July 5 L. KNIGHT

The Docile American Business Man

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Stockholm conference of the International Chamber of Commerce has dissolved and the members of the American delegation have spread over the face of Europe. Some are looking from the rails of steamers at the mountains and black waters of Norwegian fjords; some are headed for Paris or London or Rome; but none, as far as I know, are going toward Moscow.

A group of them intended to go. Aboard the George Washington, on their way to Stockholm, they listened to a few facts about Russia and the opportunities there for American business men from Colonel Hugh L. Cooper. Several delegates determined to see for themselves, and then to report to their associates, what the workers' republic looked like. They even thought their opinion might be valuable to the Government.

Some doubt was expressed, however, concerning the possible attitude of the Department of State toward such a junket; so the delegates, "unwilling," as one of them expressed it, "to embarrass Secretary Kellogg in any way," decided to make the necessary inquiries through the American Embassy at Stockholm. They discovered, to their mild surprise, that Secretary Kellogg would not countenance any such plan.

Promptly and without protest they abandoned the trip; delegates from American chambers of commerce do not, it seems, question why. But, as an extremely unofficial observer, it occurred to me that this was an amazing stand for even our timorous Department of State to take. Have we reached the point where independent groups of American business men may not on their own initiative visit Russia? Or is it assumed by Secretary Kellogg that business men would naturally be mistaken for official representatives of the United States Government and that Russia might consider herself recognized?

I assume that this bit of State Department gossip did not get into the American press.

Oslo, Norway, July 4 FREDA KIRCHWEY

The Negro Peril

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: More than a tenth part of the American population are Negro people, but not even a twentieth part, perhaps not one-fiftieth, of American Communists are Negroes. A New York newspaper has just "discovered" the names and addresses of a few of these colored Communists with a resultant alarm and cry of "Help! murder! Congress must do something about it!"; yet a much smaller proportion of Negroes than of whites have heeded the call of Communism, in spite of the relatively much more unfavorable situation of the Negro population.

In order to make this Russian menace sound still more alarming, one newspaper, speaking of Negro students that have gone to be educated in the Eastern University at Moscow, says: "From 50 to 100 of these instruments of propaganda have been shipped out of the United States." In fact only five American Negro students could, after a long campaign, be induced to take advantage of the Soviet Government's world-wide offer for people to come and study under free scholarships in their university at Moscow—but more than 1,200 other students of other colors accepted: white, yellow, eastern and western—American white people, English white people, German white people, French white people, and many people from Asia. Only one Negro from Africa accepted. One of the five American Negro students died, so that the remaining "peril" is: one African, four live American Negroes and one dead one!

I suspect that the reason why so much noise is made whenever anybody is reported to be trying to "arouse" American Negroes, is that most American whites feel, deep down in their souls, that the Negroes ought to be aroused. We fear those whom we oppress: we are afraid that they may do what we think they ought to do. Not a single newspaper (with the exception, strange to relate, of one newspaper of Richmond, Virginia, which commented on the radical leanings of the Negro Labor Congress two years ago) has emphasized this point: that the way, and the only way, to prevent Moscow or somebody else from ultimately arousing the American Negro is to treat the Negro with more justice. A people treated as Negroes are treated in America, is certainly (as is stated by a Cincinnati paper, but in a different spirit) "the weakest place in the American armor." If the American Negro proves, ultimately, to be more open to "foreign" intrigue than are other elements of the population, it will be the failure of America rather than of the Negro.

More can be done in one year by defending the Negro against being burned alive in Mississippi and Missouri and from jim-crowism and insult in Cincinnati than could ever be done in a generation of "acts of Congress" and activities of the Department of Justice.

New York, July 10 WILLIAM PICKENS

Catholic Schools

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As a graduate of a Catholic high school and a reader of your weekly for many years, I am surprised that any reader of The Nation could advance the arguments used by Mr. Swift against the Catholic schools. Such ideas belong in the official organ of the Ku Klux Klan, not in a liberal journal. Surely the record of public achievement of graduates of Catholic schools is sufficient to dispel the idea that the church seeks to discipline or mold their minds to agree with its own political aspirations, even supposing the impossible situation of the church having political aspirations. We are not living in the Middle Ages. Since the foundation of our republic, has there ever been a Catholic disloyal to the principles of Americanism? I need only point to the records of men like Taney, White, Sherman, Meade, Sheridan, and our own Al Smith.

The Catholic schools are here to stay. They are protected by the Constitution. Furthermore, this country will eventually elect a Catholic President, casting aside the shackles of religious bigotry. It will then remain for a Jew to be elected to the highest office in the land, and we shall have a realization of the true principles of Americanism, the principles of Thomas Jefferson.

Philadelphia, July 10 BRENDAN O'DWYER

From the Long-Range Weather Prophet

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I wish to thank you for your editorial of July 13. It is about the best treatment of the matter of long-range weather forecasting which has come to my attention.

When it is realized that the atmospheric meteorologists who control the governmental monopoly of weather bureaus as well as the chairs of meteorology in the universities, have failed to make any progress whatever in the direction of long-range weather forecasting, have in fact never been able to divorce themselves from the empirical methods which characterize all governmental forecasting of weather, it comes with ill grace for them to attack the fundamental proposition which I have advanced and on which my entire work is based—that long-range weather forecasting is a series of problems in thermal engineering in which the solutions of the great technicians of steam and internal combustion can be successfully applied.

Beyond this statement lies the discovery that the "lags" in the massing effects of the great ocean currents are as measurable as the time it takes for the crest of the Mississippi flood to pass from St. Louis to the Gulf. The longer the oceanic current, the greater the "lag." Since the curve of solar radiation is the primary cause of the oceanic changes, the measurement of the "lag" is the measurement of the time in advance for which the general terms of forecasts can be made.

I have no secrets. As rapidly as research has developed new material in this most interesting field, and tests have sustained the soundness of the deductions, I have made the information public. I still have a year of research material undergoing this rigid test. If any one thing is to be assigned to my credit, it is that I have taken the mystery out of long-range weather forecasting and have established it on the soundest lines of advanced engineering practice.

Washington, D. C., July 9 HERBERT JANVRIN BROWNE

Contemporary Verse

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Please permit us as editors of a poetry magazine to compliment you on your editorial Has Poetry Retired? The several score poems submitted to us daily prove there is no dearth of poetic expression. That more poems are not published is the fault of publishers and editors. The blame for the fact that more thoughtful "major" poems are not published must be laid chiefly at the same door. Our experience and that of other editors with whom we have matched notes prove that the few editors who prefer significant poems to pretty pictures and pleasing melodies find no difficulty in securing them. Poetry that deals vigorously with contemporary American themes has simply ceased to be a novelty, become less "newsy"—largely because so much more of it is written.

Our more mentally alert and aggressive poets, however, are writing for the most part poems that are more difficult to understand. Poetry's victories of about a decade ago were for the most part rather cheap. A very simple novelty of theme or treatment was enough to win attention for poems. The better poets now are more analytical, pioneering on the frontiers of consciousness, endeavoring with the psychologists to capture for man the new world of man's making. Not all, however, of the trend is, as you state, "so completely pessimistic, or rather, so deeply skeptical." Many, such as Lola Ridge and G. Merrill Root, who have each given us an important book in the past months, have found a faith in the labor movement.

Norwalk, Conn., June 25 RALPH CHEYNEY
LUCIA TRENT
Editors, Contemporary Verse

Enlightenment in Philadelphia

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Strange things are happening in Philadelphia. Witness the recent accusation by Lieutenant Colonel Thomas J. Dickinson that school history texts are unfair and incorrect toward Germany. And witness the remarkable resourcefulness displayed by James M. Beck. Mr. Beck presided at a session of the American Academy of Social and Political Science. The topics under discussion were American relations with the Caribbean countries and Mexico. At the close of the meetings, after a dozen men had delivered formal papers, Mr. Beck was struck by a great light.

"I am sorry that no Mexicans have been invited to present their views," said he. "If there are Mexicans present, we should be glad to have them speak. But in their absence, I will ask the consul from Panama to explain Central America's attitude toward our policies."

Thirdly, both Victor Cutter, president of the United Fruit Company, and Guy Stevens of the oil producers' interest in Mexico have disclaimed any desire for armed intervention by this country. No one asked them, unfortunately, whether they personally would be willing to urge the fruit and oil men to sign a manifesto, similar to that of the missionaries in China, opposing the use of force by the United States to maintain the fruit and oil concessions.

Philadelphia, April 24 HARRY EMERSON WILDES

Massachusetts—There She Stands

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Two years ago the very best citizens of Massachusetts held up Southern provincialism for contempt and ridicule because the local prosecutor in the Scopes case referred to Mr. Darrow and his associates as "foreigners." Now Mr. John C. Hull, Speaker of the Massachusetts House of Representatives, in addressing a meeting of best citizens, voices what he says is the State's demand of all outsiders interested in the fate of Sacco and Vanzetti: "We would respectfully ask you to mind your own business." Whereupon, gentlemen in this neck of the woods are informed and believe, seven hundred and fifty best citizens leaped to their feet and cheered Mr. Hull to the rafters. Is it possible that the very best citizens of Massachusetts are as narrow as "common" folks in the South?

Alexandria, Virginia, July 15 JOSEPH B. DAY

Give the People Their Own War Power

By

THOMAS HALL SHASTID, M. D., LL. B., etc.

ALMOST the whole world is filled, now-a-days, with questions and discussions on peace and war. Especially, How can the world attain, if at all, to permanent peace? Yet not one person in ten thousand understands that, in no country on the globe, have the people themselves any vote, or legal say-so of any sort or kind, on war. What would happen if, in the four or five dominant nations of the world, the war-making power were removed from the hands of just a few politicians and placed in the hands of the people generally? To answer that question Dr. Shastid has written this book.

A volume that no one can read without a profound modification of all his peace-and-war views.

A peace book, yet a WAHR book.

Price, postpaid, $2.00

GEORGE WAHR, Publisher
ANN ARBOR, MICH.

Books and Music

This Rock

By HAL SAUNDERS WHITE

I tell you strangeness, the mystery older than love,
Inhabits this rock
So solidly angled, so legibly written upon by the sea.
Neither comfort of calm while the tides gather
Nor sea-weed's uninvited caress and dependence
Could give it pride of resolute standing.
Nothing in all the accomplished ages
Has tempted this rock to battle the sea;
Or to retreat.
No voice has whispered within it
That kindness transcendent
Has stationed it, stanchioned and braced,
To buttress this passive land.
Never, out of its virtue,
Has it opposed any wave's triumph. . . .
It has never willed to remain.

The Great German Puzzle

German After-War Problems. By Kuno Francke. Harvard University Press, 1927. $1.50.

THE veteran Harvard professor and head of the Germanic Museum has brought together in this little volume four essays which are the result of his visits to Germany in 1924, 1925, and 1926. They deal with intellectual currents in contemporary Germany, with the voice of hope of Count Keyserling, with German character in connection with the German-American, and with the German after-the-war imagination. Three of these essays appeared in the Atlantic Monthly; all four are worthy of more permanent, or better, separate form. That they are written in the best of spirit, with rare understanding and knowledge of both countries, and in attractive style, goes without saying. That they are genuinely critical adds to their worth.

Naturally one turns to the essay on German character first. Tomes have been written about it; no explanation of the extraordinary contradictions within it is satisfactory. Professor Francke realizes that the Germans are "non-political" and considers this not "a title of honor but an unfortunate limitation." The Germans have been unable to do that "sober persistent work in building up a free, national commonwealth such as the English people has engaged in for centuries"; only in rare moments has the whole German nation been united in common action. The unification of Germany Professor Francke considers a remarkable Bismarckian achievement but lacking "true political wisdom." So was, of course, his taking of Alsace-Lorraine, and his persecution of the Social Democrats and of all true liberals. Professor Francke falls back on the "depth of the individual personality" as the "peculiar virtue" of the German. He cites Luther, Bach, Schiller, Goethe, Kant, von Kleist, Wagner—all the long roll of German great men to prove that "politically sterile Germany has brought forth cultural values which benefit all striving men in all countries. . . ." To this he adds German respect for scholarship, intellectual training, etc., and the constructive power of the spirit.

I confess I do not find the explanation convincing. Other countries have had their great men and have placed great value upon cultural training, and yet have not failed either in political life, or in their relations with other countries. Of what does it avail a country to worship the professorial career and acclaim the spirit, and then to have there before a political charlatan and pessimist like the Kaiser and let him quite as standing? We Americans, at least, with our worship of incredibly dull and banal Coolidge, lay no claim to exalting the intellect above the successful flyer, prize-fighter, or golf champion. We sincerely do our best to put America Ueber Alles, and if we put the thought to music we frankly jazz it. No, the explanation of those extraordinarily irritating cross-currents in the German character and of his usually bad international manners is still to seek. Who can really explain it?

Mr. Francke's book is a masterpiece of printing and reflects great credit upon the Harvard University Press.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Equal Responsibility?

Recent Revelations of European Diplomacy. By G. P. Gooch. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.

THE author of this useful volume is one of the ablest of living Englishmen. He has done distinguished work as a historian of modern historiography, as a keen expositor of early modern English political thought, as the author of the best history of contemporary European diplomacy, as the biographer of Lord Courtney, and as the editor of the papers of Lord John Russell, the Cambridge History of British Foreign Policy, and the recently published British Documents on the crisis of 1914. Moreover, he has been prominent in English political life and has studied extensively abroad, so that his knowledge of European statesmen, history, and politics furnishes an illuminating contrast to the ignorance of Viscount Grey on these same subjects. A book by such a man on the outbreak of the World War is an international event.

The book is the outgrowth and expansion of a brochure of the same title published in 1922. In successive chapters the author lists and characterizes, country by country, the diplomatic documents, memoirs, diaries, and monographs published since 1918 which bear upon the problem of responsibility for the World War. A concluding chapter sets forth Dr. Gooch's conclusions as to the matter of responsibility for the World War, and it is worthy of careful and respectful analysis. It represents the contemporary verdict of the moderate and informed English opinion intermediate between the slashing assault on the Entente Epic by Morel and his group on the one hand and the pitiable apologetics of "die-hards" and "straw-clutchers" of the stripe of Headlam-Morley and Seton-Watson on the other.

In the first place one will be struck with the fact that the conclusions in the present volume are almost word for word identical with those expressed in Dr. Gooch's pamphlet of 1922 and in his "History of Modern Europe" written the same year. Yet there has been as much progress in the way of demolishing Entente mythology between 1922 and 1927 as there was between 1918 and 1922. At the same time Dr. Gooch thoroughly repudiates the war-time version of unique Austro-German responsibility and comes out four-square as an exponent of divided or equal responsibility in the literal sense of that term. Now this conclusion is sweet, amiable, and comforting, and better adapted than any other to serve as the basis for the wiping away of war-time prejudices. It is also as destructive of all the foundations of the Treaties of Versailles, St. Germain, and the Trianon as the position of the most pro-German extremists. Yet do not believe that the facts as to war responsibility, as we now know them, warrant stopping at the thesis of divided or equal responsibility, much as one might wish to do so from strategic and pedagogical considerations.

In the light of what we now know about Serbian plots and intrigues, it is doubtful if the Austrian determination to attack Serbia in 1914 was as "short-sighted" as Dr. Gooch contends. Nor is it accurate to represent Russia as a consistent and solicitous protector of "brave and innocent little Serbia" in the light of 1908, and of the Russo-Turkish negotiations of 1911. France, says Dr. Gooch, "had no desire for war and took no step to precipitate it." We should like to ask Dr. Gooch to suggest how any country could have given more evidence of a desire for a war at the proper time than did France from March, 1912, to August, 1914, or how Poincaré could have acted more decisively than he did to precipitate war in 1914.

But the proof of the bankruptcy of the case for equal responsibility is most clearly revealed when Dr. Gooch admits that it cannot be sustained except upon the hypothesis that it is as defensible to slay for purposes of robbery as to shoot in self-defense. "It is true that while Austria fought under the banner of self-preservation, Russia, whom nobody threatened to attack, marched out to battle in the name of prestige; but in the accepted scale of national values, safety, honor, and prestige are motive-forces of approximately the same weight." Dr. Gooch's work may veritably be regarded as the requiem of the thesis of equal responsibility. This hypothesis could not have a more learned, persuasive, reasonable, and conciliatory exponent; but even he can sustain it only on the basis of considerations and evaluations which he would indignantly repudiate with respect to any other subject under the sun.

HARRY ELMER BARNES

Fiction, Not Literature

Your Cuckoo Sings by Kind. By Valentine Dobrée. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

NOW that every year, every month, sees so many novels published it is more than ever necessary clearly to understand what it is that separates ordinary story-telling from the gift of producing fiction which may be judged as literature. At every chance there are to be found popular critics ready to applaud as lasting works of art volumes that are in their essence limited and banal. It is not sufficient for a novel to describe some aspect of life in an interesting way. If it is to take its place among those precious volumes which some inscrutable instinct of the human race is diligent to preserve, it must reveal in its treatment that passionate intensity, that passionate consciousness, belonging alone to genius.

The admirable title of this book, and the sympathetic tone in which it is written, might well persuade many people to regard it as a work of lasting merit. This it is not. Mr. Dobrée has tenderness, moral indignation, a knowledge of psychology, but he lacks the deep imaginative insight that can pierce through the surface of existence. He can portray with precision ordinary events and experiences, but never once does he, or do his characters, reveal themselves as capable of that inspired vision which in really great writing does so much to illumine the uncertain wayfaring of our race. Once again it is shown that the whole matter depends upon style. This ambiguous word can always be made the test of the temper of an author. Read a page from any great writer and in a few sentences there will be revealed a certain clear tone or ring, like the clash of a sword on iron, which is different enough from the confused murmur arising from what is ordinary and undistinguished. Marcel Proust has it, Thomas Mann has it, and sometimes even Mr. James Joyce, but it is not to be found in "The Constant Nymph," nor in "Elmer Gantry," no, not even in "A Passage to India." Books of this kind, in spite of the universal applause that greets them, are essentially books of a period and they will not bide. I write this because I wish to make quite clear what I mean when I say that I consider "Your Cuckoo Sings by Kind" as a work that has little more virtue in it than many another good up-to-date work of fiction. Perhaps it is best to regard it in the light of propaganda favoring a more sensitive and enlightened attitude in the direction and management of young children, an attitude that would never create monstrous images of sin out of childish misdemeanors.

Mr. Dobrée has presented a most horrible woman in his Mrs. Harris, but she is so ordinary, so exactly like the kind of person one has continually to be avoiding in actual life, that from the first it is evident that no new thing is to be revealed through her. Also, possibly, the author shows himself more clearly on the side of the angels than is justified in a world of "cold art." The bedroom scene describing the arrival of Sir William's letter demanding the release of his children is, to say the least of it, grim. An evil and domesticated woman spreading herself about on a double bed thinking of pickled eggs and the prospect of cutting her big toe nails. It has power, but not power enough to reconcile us to our deep disgust.

Maybe it would be clearer and fairer if I selected certain sentences as illustrations of what I mean when I assert that Mr. Dobrée has not as yet an appreciation of what style means. "An absurd little photograph, taken by a village photographer, reached him out in India. It was as far from the truth as a faked mist which some city photographers wilfully create about their clients, only at the other extreme, producing a tabloid, constipated race of beings." Or again, "Still, none of them could quite understand how it was Mrs. Dean came to be their particular friend and equally to be at home with Mrs. Thing-ummy-bob." Or again, "She learned the pleasures of the indulgence of the imagination, the easy, inconsequent, lie-in-a-hammock kind." To conclude, I am inclined to think that Mr. Dobrée's own imagination is of the "lie-in-a-hammock kind"; and yet there are occasions when he writes with simple dignity —for example, when the unfortunate Christina, clinging to Mrs. Dean's hands, exclaims: "There is virtue in your hands, Aunt Frances, like cold water when one is thirsty."

LLEWELYN POWYS

A Critique of Science

The Logic of Modern Physics. By P. W. Bridgman. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

THE cataclysmic reformulations and somewhat paradoxical discoveries of recent years have made necessary a reinterpretation of the fundamentals of science. Mr. Bridgman has made this searching analysis for physics. Only his long training in the laboratory could have made possible the knowledge, insight, and accuracy with which he has clarified its basic notions. He has tried to purge this science of all unnecessary (because experimentally useless) concepts, and to eliminate from them all those implications which have no value, functionally speaking. Here science is reduced to its essentials; it is at its fighting weight, using only those ideas which have experimental efficacy.

The broadest principle of physics is that of "connectivity . . . that it is possible to correlate any of the phenomena of nature with other phenomena"; while "the mere statement of a correlation between phenomena" is the essence of scientific explanation. He holds that the past history of events is vital to their present behavior, and that isolation is impossible because "phenomena in any system are effected by motion in respect to the entire universe"; that reference systems describe the "same event if the discontinuous boundaries of the event are the same, irrespective of the appearance of the event in the two systems"; that the concepts of energy, heat current, and electromagnetic field are practically sterile, and that "light means nothing more than things lighted," so that "it is meaningless or trivial to ascribe physical reality to light in intermediate space, and light as a thing traveling must be recognized to be a pure invention."

Physics, for him, no longer points to a closed, simple, geometrical universe, where apriori mathematicians usurp the place of the Omniscient. Different levels of experience require different concepts. As the imperceptible is approached, those concepts which before were obviously independent yield no experimental differences and thus have no separate physical significance. It is the functional independence and applicability, not the number or simplicity of the concepts, that is now seen to be important. Simplicity may be a great stimulus for investigation, but the world is proving to be more complex than was expected; not everything seems capable of analysis into simpler components, nor are all relations capable of statement in terms of elementary mathematical equations. To conquer the new, additional concepts must often be forged. What surety is there that these are capable of generalization or reduction?

This urge toward the limitation of meaning to verifiable properties impels Mr. Bridgman to question the contentions of the modern Pythagoreans. Because mathematics presupposes a descriptive background before it can be applied, and because it seems to make statements regarding properties (such as the character of the inside of an electron), in places where physical concepts have no experimental value, he considers their view of physics to be erroneous. This is to be parsimonious with a vengeance. Mathematics, like all theoretical sciences, must be applied with discretion and must always take a universe for granted, which, of course, does not deny that all functional properties may be described in terms of it.

Some day, perhaps, a Kant will arise who will deal not only with the independence and meaning of the concepts but with their internal and mutual consistency and their possible completeness. He will describe the boundaries, assumptions, and methodology of science and will limit its pretensions and disclose its presuppositions, and not until then will physics be correctly and thoroughly understood. Part of the task has now been attempted, but in a work which is difficult and much too short. "The Logic of Physics" is a hard book; it demands much knowledge and patience with a not always felicitous style. Vital concepts such as space, force, and mass get scant attention, while the theoretical and practical methodology of physics is almost entirely ignored. Yet the book is as important as it is difficult and as enlightening as it is brief; the functional meanings have been so ably treated that an important part of the prolegomena is already completed.

PAUL WEISS

The Constitution Today

The Living Constitution. By Howard Lee McBain. The Workers Education Bureau Press. $1.50.

THE Constitution of the United States has long suffered from a plethora of encomium and invective, so that a new book on the subject appears at first a somewhat dubious hazard. It is a relief, then, to find in the first of the series of books to be published by the Workers' Education Bureau at its own press no mere handbook from which the hundred percenter may glean a few more platitudes to show that the American Constitution is the nostrum of all the ills of mankind, nor yet another attempt to furnish ammunition for those who would hurl misprision at that much-berated document. Instead, it is a reasoned discussion of the actualities of the system of government under which we live, and furnishes meat for the serious student of political science as well as for the tyro in the field.

Professor McBain is essentially a realist in his political thinking, for he envisages politics and government as they are, not only as they might be. To him the Constitution is far from a static document, but is alive in the sense that all life implies ever-continuing change. Judicial interpretation, political party influence, custom, and the action or inaction of Congress and the President have instituted a never-ending process of variation from the hoary document drafted in 1787. It is the task of Professor McBain to show wherein some of these changes lie, and in the attempt he often walks in where angels might fear to tread. For example, in the general introductory chapter on written constitutions which gives a background of theory for the practical considerations to follow, he shows that, contrary to general opinion, the British constitution is not as flexible as it seems and the American written document, on the other hand, is more so.

Brief and filled with solid material as the book is, it is pervaded by a genial good humor which but rarely deserts the author. Often he writes with his tongue in his cheek at the obvious absurdities of the situation. Only now and then does he forget to stand aside and smile from his wide perspective, as when he calls Senator Borah "our arch-isolationist, trouble-making, diplomacy-bungling chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations." Professor McBain, with an unfailing charm of style, has shown in the compass of less than three hundred pages that "the Constitution of the United States was not handed down on Mount Sinai by the Lord God of Hosts," but that it is a human instrument, lacking in perfection and perfectibility, yet good withal. He has also shown that political science may be accurate and painstaking and yet be literature.

JANE FERRY CLARK

Finis Coronat Opus

Diplomatic Episodes in Mexico, Belgium, and Chile. By Henry Lane Wilson. Doubleday, Page and Company. $4.

SOME of the interest that induces kitchen-maids to read Snippy Stories to learn of the grand manners and peccadillos of duchesses attaches to these Chilean and Belgian episodes, told in the best, therefore sometimes boring, form of diplomatic memoirs. Mr. Wilson walks with lofty superiority, exhaling the aroma of the true hand-on-the-breast diplomat, an aroma easily sniffed by admiring yokel editors still imbued with the Old Guard patriotism of the nineties whose highest manifestation of humor is heresy-hunting. Other diplomats may wither under the blazing tropic sun; Mr. Wilson proceeds composed and unflushed as September Morn. The mental qualities of Francisco Madero, President of Mexico, may develop into a "homicidal, dangerous form of lunacy," but Mr. Wilson, through every tragic occurrence, retains such calm judgment that he puts a lily-white wreath of innocence upon the head of Victoriano Huerta, the most brutal President since Santa Ana. Add to anecdotes descriptions of mountain scenery, stylistically inferior to Baedeker or Terry, quote tinsel poetry before old castles, inform the reader that the commercial possibilities of Panama "leap beyond the bounds of imagination," thrill to the "drum beats of England encircling the world," pat everyone on the back who has pleasant manners, remind the reader that somebody's death was "a shock to all," accuse the high-bred lady of being "withal an excellent mother and wife and a model of virtue," remember the exact number of courses served by Leopold and other nonentities, have all services close "impressively," in short, keep to the social column gush, and in the years to come backwoods school-teachers will be able to hold up another model son of the patria for emulation.

Mr. Wilson's analysis of the Diaz regime is exceedingly superficial, and though he remarks that fully 80 per cent of the population "was without an abiding-place except by sufferance," he shows no sympathy for the struggles of that 80 per cent for liberation; nor does he for one moment feel, let alone understand, the great forces sweeping Mexico; nor does he at any point mention, let alone grasp, the magnitude of the problems represented by the destructive conflict between modern industrialism represented by American capital and the semi-feudal system south of the Rio Grande. Neither does he, in the midst of his bombastic concern for American property, reveal the scandalous manner in which many of the American concessions were illegally or unjustly acquired, or make known the exaggerated and questionable character of some of the claims he pressed, not diplomatically but irritably and angrily. Certainly, Mr. Wilson could not be expected to reveal his backdoor connections, via his brother, with the associates of the Guggenheims (smelter competitors of the Madero family), or tell of the clique of surviving Cientifico grafters with whom he hobnobbed, or give the true composition of the adulatory Committee of the American Colony which whitewashed him. Mr. Wilson's strongest alibi is the subsequent blundering of Woodrow Wilson and Bryan.

Mr. Wilson wishes, above all, to exonerate himself and Huerta of the oft-repeated charge of not having taken proper steps to safeguard Madero's life. The officer of the guard, when Madero was shot down, was promptly promoted; Huerta perpetrated other savage assassinations. As for Mr. Wilson, in a most trying moment of Madero's career the ambassador seized upon a doubtful rumor that the Government intended to arrest and execute ex-President Francisco de la Barra, and insultingly sent a hostile note of warning. De la Barra's safety was none of Wilson's official business; but in the case of Madero, Wilson had direct and grave responsibility, since he had, through the Spanish minister, asked the President to resign and so became sponsor for Huerta's treason. But in a crucial hour a note requesting that Madero's life be respected, a note scribbled by Wilson's wife on a visiting card, sufficed—so much confidence did Wilson have in the drunken assassin newly at the helm and in ladies' visiting cards! Wilson, at the tearful importunity of Madero's wife, whom he told that Madero was "a very wicked man," later made two lukewarm efforts, and while he easily saved the lives of associates of Madero, the latter—shortly after Wilson received Huerta and his brummagem crew under the American Embassy roof in a blaze of festive lights and Stars and Stripes to determine the personnel of the new cabinet—went down to a vilely treacherous death. Mr. Wilson might have made a good engraved-card ambassador to Diaz; as poison-cup ambassador to Madero he helped spill years of bloodshed across Mexican history.

CARLETON BEALS

Books in Brief

The Green Rising. By W. B. Bizzell. The Macmillan Company. $2.

A former president of an agricultural college, now head of the university of a rural State, Oklahoma, Dr. Bizzell has the background necessary for an adequate interpretation of the present agrarian movement. His book is clear, accurate, and tolerant—the best introduction so far published to contemporary agricultural problems. After tracing the history of agrarianism, the author shows that the present tendencies in the field are world wide, although taking on somewhat different aspects in various countries. He discusses conditions in the United States in detail and gives the arguments for and against proposed solutions of the agrarian problem. His own view favors tariff adjustment, scientific classification and utilization of land, balanced production, adequate credit for productive purposes, and the development of cooperative marketing.

Palmerston. By Philip Guedalla. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $5.

In Lord Palmerston Mr. Guedalla has a fine subject for his vivid phrasing and swift allusiveness. For this statesman carried the dignity and audacities of the aristocratic life of the eighteenth century more than halfway through the nineteenth. "A Regency beau, he spoke in debate when Pitt and Mr. Fox had not long fallen silent, and he was Secretary at War against Napoleon." He was a Minister at 25, and held high office, with some intervals of opposition, until his death at 81. The wicked Crimean War was in large part his doing, and he was the promulgator of the great doctrine, "Civis Romanus Sum," which has led England into trouble and conquest in all parts of the earth. He had some admirable qualities with the familiar defects of his age and caste. But to say, as Mr. Guedalla does, that "The life of Palmerston was the life of England and, to a large extent, of Europe in the last sixteen years of the eighteenth and the first sixty-five of the nineteenth centuries" is a wild exaggeration of the importance of "high politics."

A History of Hebrew Civilization. By Alfred Bertholet. Translated by A. K. Dallas. Brentano's. $4.50.

This book is an attempt to narrate the life-story of the ancient Hebrews along broader lines than those followed in the usual works on either the history or the religion of Israel. "Civilization" is here employed in the sense of the original term (Kulturgeschichte) as the sum total of a people's experiences, customs, activities, and thinking. The period of history under review extends from the beginnings of Hebrew settlement in Palestine until the end of Old Testament times. A proper setting for the understanding of the origins of Israelitish culture is provided by a preliminary description of the civilization which the Hebrews gradually supplanted and absorbed. After the Israelites had fully possessed themselves of the land the distinctive characteristics of their own civilization are exhibited in their family and domestic life, in the trades and callings that were followed, in the forms of their social intercourse, in their political institutions, in their jurisprudence, education, and artistic interests, and in their religion. So wide a survey, if it were to preserve due proportion in the treatment of its several parts and to maintain uniform accuracy in details, could be made only by a competent scholar like Professor Bertholet.

Canadian Labor Laws and the Treaty. By Bryce M. Stewart. Columbia University Press. $6.

The chief purpose of Mr. Stewart's book is to put, side by side, the ideals for labor of the International Labor Bureau of the League of Nations and the measure of conformity to these achieved by Canada. The successive chapters deal with working hours, provision for a weekly day of rest, restriction on child labor, a living wage, and so on. While, in some respects, labor legislation in Canada follows English precedents, organized labor is weak as a political force. In both the federal and the provincial parliaments the labor members are few and the labor unions lack the privileges of the English unions. Legislation as to conditions of labor is often in advance of enforcement, while federal and provincial powers sometimes seem to overlap. Canada, already the sixth industrial country in the League of Nations, is developing a vast mining industry, especially in the precious metals, and this will bring increased attention to laws respecting labor.

The Sociology of Rural Life. By Horace Boies Hawthorn. The Century Company. $3.75.

That socialization of rural life offers a guaranty against peasantry and a promise of individual satisfaction for the farm dweller is the thesis of this book. The author deals at length with economic and other factors involved in his theory and discusses various agencies of socialization, such as the church, the farm organization, the lyceum, and the country newspaper. The standard of measurement employed is chiefly "vital and constructive social contacts," which doubtless will appeal to the "men of vision upon our social watch-towers."

The Farmer's Campaign for Credit. By Clara Eliot. D. Appleton Company. $3.

Here is a scholarly and useful summary of the efforts, chiefly during the last decade, to provide a credit system adequate to the needs of agriculture in a highly organized society. Special attention is given to the agricultural depression, which the author rightly attributes largely "to matters of war finance and of overstimulated agricultural production." Membership in the Federal Reserve System by eligible banks generally, and the existence of an intermediate credit system—which did not come into being until 1923—would, the author believes, have done much to mitigate the severity of the crisis. Her suggestions for the future are chiefly in the way of warning with reference to experiments favoring "commodity paper," to attempts to utilize credit to maintain the prices of specific commodities, and to the view that banks have no responsibility for price movements. Both bankers and farm leaders will be benefited by reading this book on a subject on which neither class as a whole is very well informed.

Music

The Beethoven Festival at Bonn

BEGINNING and ending with the Missa Solemnis, Bonn has just concluded her annual tribute to her greatest son, Ludwig van Beethoven. This year the tribute became a rite, for this year marks the centenary of his passing. It is not surprising, therefore, that the five concerts were sold out long in advance, or that, to satisfy public demand, they had to be immediately repeated, thus prolonging the Festival. And so for ten days hundreds of visitors have been crowding the narrow, winding streets of this famous old university town on the Rhine, while hundreds of flags of all colors have braved wind and rain to welcome them. Among these gaily colored banners, however, were a few in black and white—an unconvincing reminder that Ludwig van Beethoven had died. Nor did the memorial services preceding the Festival and the wreaths around Beethoven's statue add to this conviction. Never, indeed, could the great master have seemed more alive when he walked the cobble-stones of his native town in the flesh than he did at this moment. The shop windows were fairly plastered with his photographs, with his music, and with the numerous books that had been written about him. Posters bearing his picture greeted one at every turn of the street. His name was on everyone's lips, on concert hall and public building, on even the boats that plow up and down the Rhine; while the crowds bore witness to the living place he still holds.

On the evening of Sunday, May 22, came the first concert—the Missa Solemnis, given by the local chorus and orchestra of Bonn under the city's musical director, F. Max Anton, with guest soloists from Vienna, Munich, and other cities. The program of the second evening presented the First and Third Symphonies, under Siegmund von Hausegger of Munich, and the piano concerto, Op. 72, No. 5, played by Elly Ney; the program of the third evening, two string quartets by the Wendling Quartet from Stuttgart, and the Trio for piano, clarinet, and 'cello, Op. 11, with Mme. Ney assisting; that of the fourth evening, the Ninth Symphony with the local chorus (Fritz Busch of Dresden conducting), preceded by the violin concerto in D, Op. 61, played by Adolph Busch, brother of the conductor; while the fifth concert took place the next morning, ending the series with the piano sonata in C minor, Op. 111, played by Edwin Fischer of Berlin, the song cycle, An die Ferne Geliebte, sung by Karl Erb, tenor of the Munich Opera, and, last of all, the Septet in E, Op. 20.

From a purely virtuoso standpoint, the climax of the Festival was achieved by Adolph Busch in his playing of the violin concerto. Purity of tone and [illegible] finish, and a refreshing simplicity of manner distinguished his performance throughout. His colleagues of the Festival might well have learned from him, for mannerisms clouded his brother's reading of the Ninth Symphony, and [illegible] Hausegger's readings of the First and Third; while the soloists were lacking in much of the musical and spiritual qualities above noted. One could not but regret that Bonn had not called upon Germany's greatest artists for [illegible] occasion.

However, the audience was deeply appreciative of all that it heard. Elly Ney, herself born in Bonn, received a rousing welcome from her townspeople; and each succeeding artist had a like ovation. To this writer the Mass and the chorus in the Ninth Symphony sounded painfully high—their intentions obscured by the Master's physical affliction. On the other hand, I was reminded in the earlier works, such as the Trio, with its bürgerliche themes and fresh humor, how much the young Beethoven belonged to this gay and singing province where "folly grows on the banks of the Rhine." And it was this spirit of the youthful Beethoven, as yet in harmony with its surroundings, that marked this Festival at Bonn from other festivals in his honor, just as the humble little house in the Bonnergasse, where it was first manifested, marks Bonn itself from all other cities.

HENRIETTA STRAUS

THEATER

GILBERT MILLER Presents
ETHEL BARRYMORE
in The Constant Wife
By W. SOMERSET MAUGHAM
AT MAXINE ELLIOTT'S THEATRE
Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:30.

GILBERT MILLER and A. H. WOODS present
JEANNE EAGELS
In "Her Cardboard Lover"
By JACQUES DEVAL
Adapted by Valerie Wyngate and P. G. Wodehouse
EMPIRE B'way & 40th St. Eves., 8:30
Mats. Wed. & Sat., 2:30

Little Theatre
44th Street West of Broadway
Evgs. 8:30. Mats. Tues. and Thurs. at popular prices.
THE GRAND STREET FOLLIES
"One cannot find anywhere in New York more clever ideas, more fresh satire or more verve."—Joseph Wood Krutch in The Nation.

CHANIN'S BILTMORE THEATRE W. 47th St. Tel. Chickering 8141
CHARLES L. WAGNER
In Association with Edgar Selwyn presents
The BARKER
By KENYON NICHOLSON
with WALTER HUSTON
Mats. Wed. & Sat. Thurs. at 2:30

MOTION PICTURE

2ND BIG WEEK AMERICAN PREMIER TOLSTOY'S
"POWER OF DARKNESS"
ENACTED BY MOSCOW ART PLAYERS
Presented by Rachel Wilson Productions, Inc. of Dr. Oliver C
ONE PERFORMANCE DAILY, Incl. Sun., 10:15 P. M.
Popular Prices—One until 6 P. M. and 75c. thereafter.
Now and then, there's all that.
85th STREET CINEMA Phone

International Relations Section

Industrial Exploration

By BENTON MACKAYE

[This is the concluding article in a series of three appearing in successive issues.]

III. Charting the World's Resources

NATURAL resources form the source; human requirements determine the destination—the source and destination of the commodity stream.

Industrial exploration consists in charting the commodity stream, and the system of such streams constituting the system of industry. The commodity stream has three parts: source, destination, and "flow" between. We have considered the flow, and also the destination: now for the source.

Water, soil, forests, ores. These supply the matter of life. Chart 6 shows the major world centers of the primary staples: foods, textiles, and building requisites. The size of each circle shows the proportionate potential supply in each country of the staple named.

Wheat and rice form the principal cereals. About 97 per cent of the world's rice crop is located in the Far Eastern countries which also produce and consume a large quantity of wheat. Outside of these countries the largest center of wheat production is Western Europe. This region, however, consumes more wheat than it produces and so draws upon the supplies of North America, Argentina, India, and Australia.

Three-fifths of the world's cotton is grown in the United States from Virginia to Texas; India and China together supply another fifth. The rest comes from Egypt, Turkestan, Brazil, and elsewhere. A third of the world's wool is supplied from the far southern countries of Argentina, Australia, and South Africa, which again contribute to make up the deficiency of Western Europe.

The bottom map of Chart 6 (building requisites) presents a rough measure of the forest and mineral resources of each country. The proportions indicated by the circles showing the wood supply are based on estimates of the potential forest growth in each country. The proportions for iron and for coal are based on the estimated iron ore and coal reserves in each country. Coal obviously is not a building material, but neither is iron until it has been smelted by coal (i.e. coke). Coal and iron ore are in effect the "ingredients" of metallic iron. They are basic requisites both for buildings and for "things."

The United States of America stands out, potentially, as the prime world region in the iron ingredients. Add Cuba and Newfoundland and the strength would be doubled. North America potentially far outstrips Europe as an iron power. Brazil is supposed to contain the largest iron ore deposits in the world, but South America as a whole contains almost no coal. China's coal supply is huge; it equals that of Atlantic America, but the amount of iron in sight is comparatively meager. Therefore the United States and Europe stand out as the natural seats of "iron civilization."

The outstanding regions of surplus wood and timber appear to be Siberia and Russia, the Pacific coast of North America, and (for tropical woods) Brazil. Ultimately, when timber culture replaces timber mining, there will be relocations. Rubber (with gasoline and automobiles) is vital in iron civilization. The world crop at present comes almost wholly from India and the East Indies.

The sun's energy comes to us through different channels. Energy possessed by human beings comes through wheat and corn and foods, which come in turn through the sun's rays and sun-drawn waters. But aside from humans (and animals) the sun's energy comes to us, for the most part, through coal and falling water and petroleum. The proportionate potential horse-power from these three combined is shown, for each country, in Chart 7.

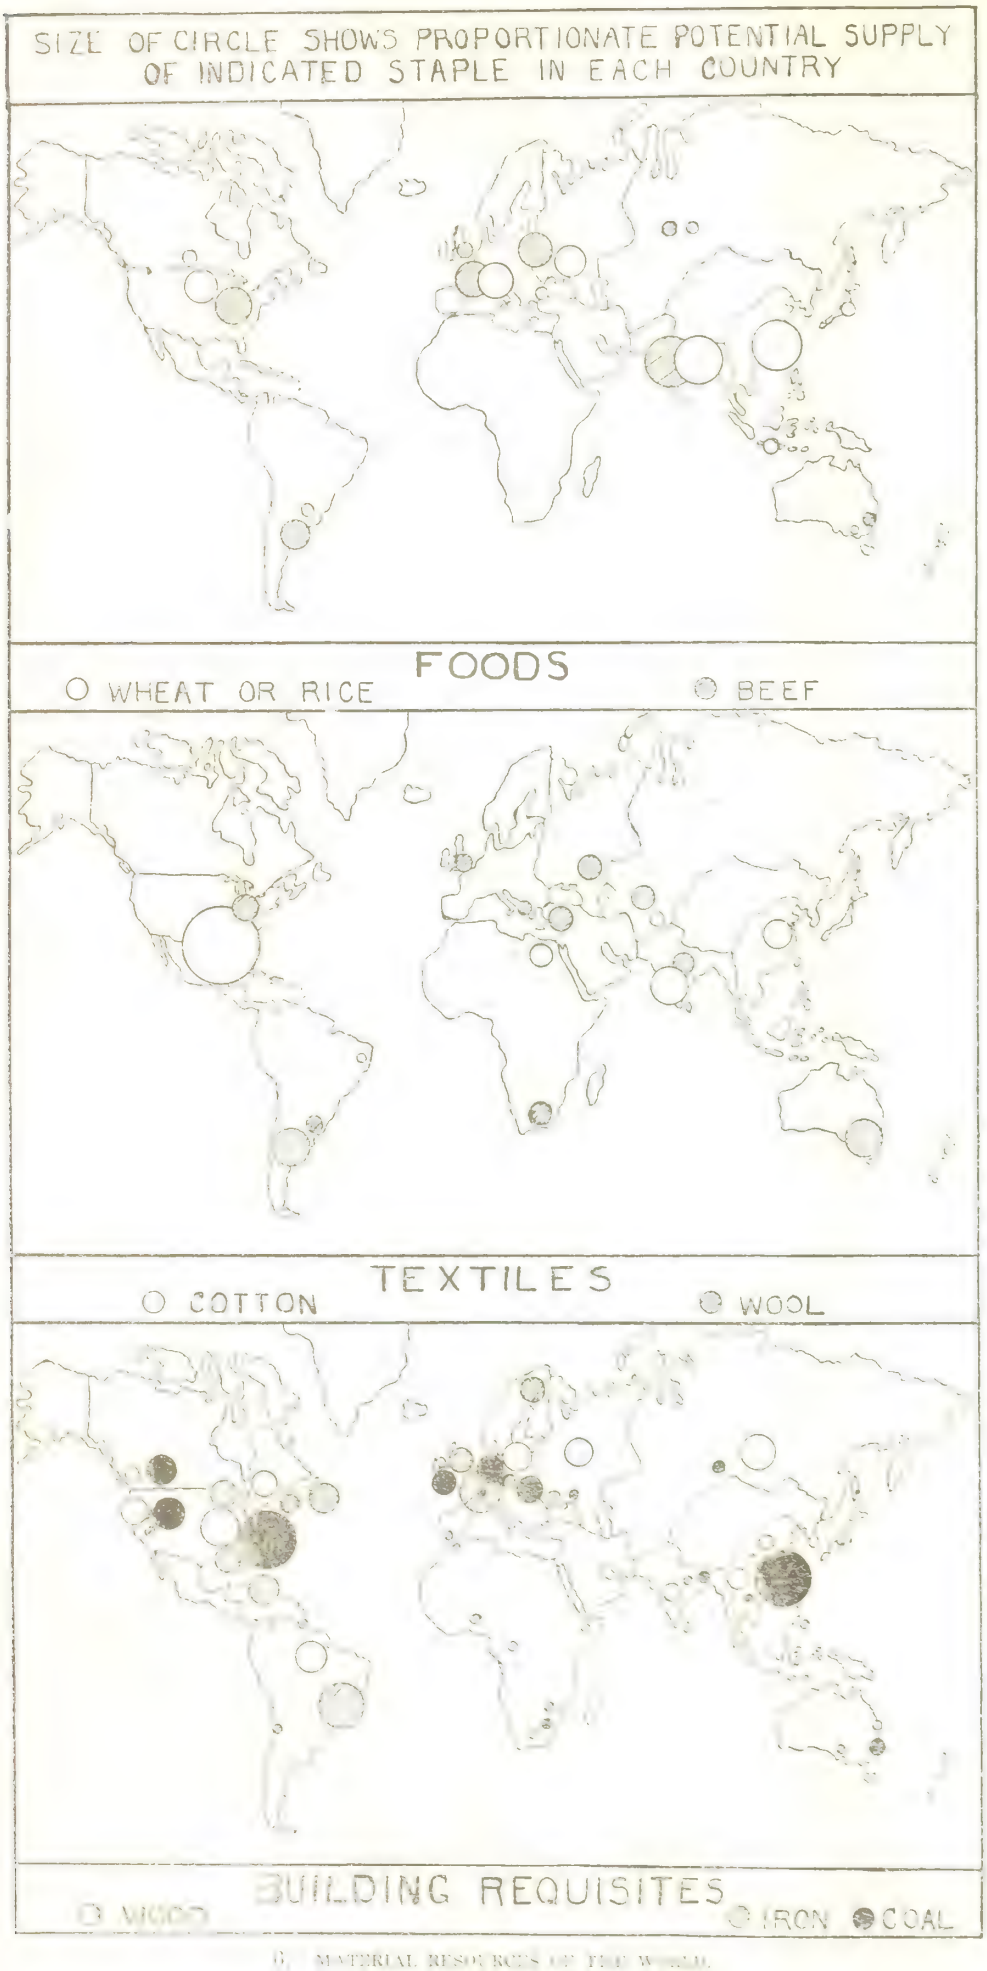
Again the United States stands out. She has more than a fourth of the world's total potential horse-power, the bulk of it to be derived from the energy stored in coal. Europe in toto possesses about a sixth of the world's horsepower; China a fifth: in each case coming principally from coal. But China's coal again is largely impotent. For the iron is not there to work upon—neither to smelt nor fashion into "things." China is a future cotton factory perhaps, but not, as discoveries show thus far, a first-class iron civilization.

Water-power outshines coal only in Africa and in South America. Practically all the energy in Africa is water-power: 28 per cent of the world's water-power is in the Congo region alone. South America's power, chiefly from water, forms but a meager proportion of the world's total energy. Petroleum does not count heavily in the world's total potential energy. But it has a virtue which the other giants do not have—mobility. And it may become more immediately spectacular than both the other forms of horse-power put together.

Natural resources, like human requirements, vary with climate, with country, with civilization. What resources go with the various civilizations of the world? We have already roughly charted them (Charts 6 and 7). These results have been combined so as to show, in a crude and off-hand fashion, the potential strength of each country in terms of a percentage of the planet's aggregate resources. In making this estimate, agricultural resources (as measured by the production of foods and textiles) have been reckoned as a third of the planet's total; timber growth and "iron ingredients" as a third; and total horse-power as a third.

The results are shown on Chart 8. The size of each circle shows the estimated percentage in each country of the planet's aggregate resources. What do the charts tell us about the various countries and civilizations?

The East: China and India. These countries (according to the estimate) contain nearly a fifth of the world's total resources (chiefly foods, cotton, and wood). India's resources are well balanced but China's are somewhat lopsided on account of the superfluity of coal. These countries contain but a handful of iron as compared with the Western countries. They are the last stronghold of the non-iron civilization.



6. MATERIAL RESOURCES OF THE WORLD.

The West: Western Europe and its transplants. The transplant in North America contains the lion's share of world resources (nearly a third). There is a good balance of the main staples plus tremendous surpluses of cotton, iron, and coal. Britain and Western Europe together contain less than a sixth of the world's total resources. Their supplies of iron nearly equal those of North America but they are deficient in foods, textiles, and wood. These are supplied mainly from the United States and Canada, and from the three southern satellites of the West (Argentina, South Africa, and Australia).

The Tropics: Northern South America, Equatorial Africa, and the East Indies contain about a tenth of the earth's resources (chiefly hard wood in the Amazon and water-power in the Congo and rubber in the East Indies).

The Russians: Russia, Siberia, and Turkestan. Less than a tenth of the earth's resources. A balanced but very meager supply of iron and coal in Russia, and a little coal (unbalanced with iron) in Siberia. A surplus of wood in both countries. The Russians promise to be largely self-sufficient, though they must exchange their surplus wheat and wood for iron products made by their Western neighbors.

The Japanese: Japan is a head without a body. Her resources, figured on a world scale, are almost non-existent. She must depend on China and the mainland.

Such is our estimate of world resources: a putting together of the best official guesses that could readily be found. It presents a crude comparison of the East and West. Each has its requirements and its resources. China and India represent the East; America and Europe, the West. The Russians are both; so are the Japanese but in a different way. The tropical and far southern countries have come to be adjuncts of the West.

The countries of theNorthern Hemisphere make the bulk of the world—nine-tenths of the population, five-sixths of the resources. They present some interesting contrasts. The East is top-heavy in population: China and India contain about 45 per cent of the earth's people but less than 20 per cent of its resources. America is top-heavy in resources; 32 per cent of the resources but only 7 per cent of the population. Western Europe (with Britain) is not top-heavy either way, though proportionate population somewhat exceeds proportionate resources.

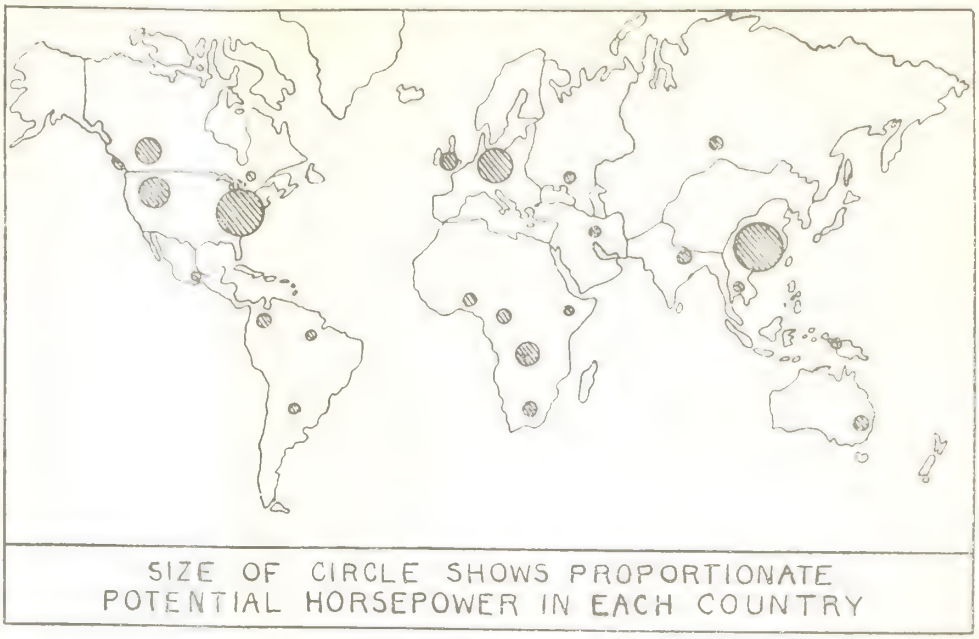
How does all this affect our exploration? How does it affect commodity flow? Will the present flow into Western Europe of surplus foods and textiles from America and India and the South go on indefinitely?—or will Europe's surplus population itself begin to "flow" sufficiently to equalize the situation? Will the surplus populations of the Eastern countries also get to flowing; or will they equalize matters within their own realm? Is there a "yellow peril" to America from the flow of Oriental population? Will a surplus flow of steel from America and Europe smother an Oriental civilization by an iron one? Is there also a "white peril"?

These are a few of the questions about commodity flow which are unearthed by the crudest sort of charting.



7. ENERGY RESOURCES OF THE WORLD.

And another point is brought out: Commodity flow lies at the bottom of population flow. Development of potential commodities creates employment, and population ever follows the prospective job.

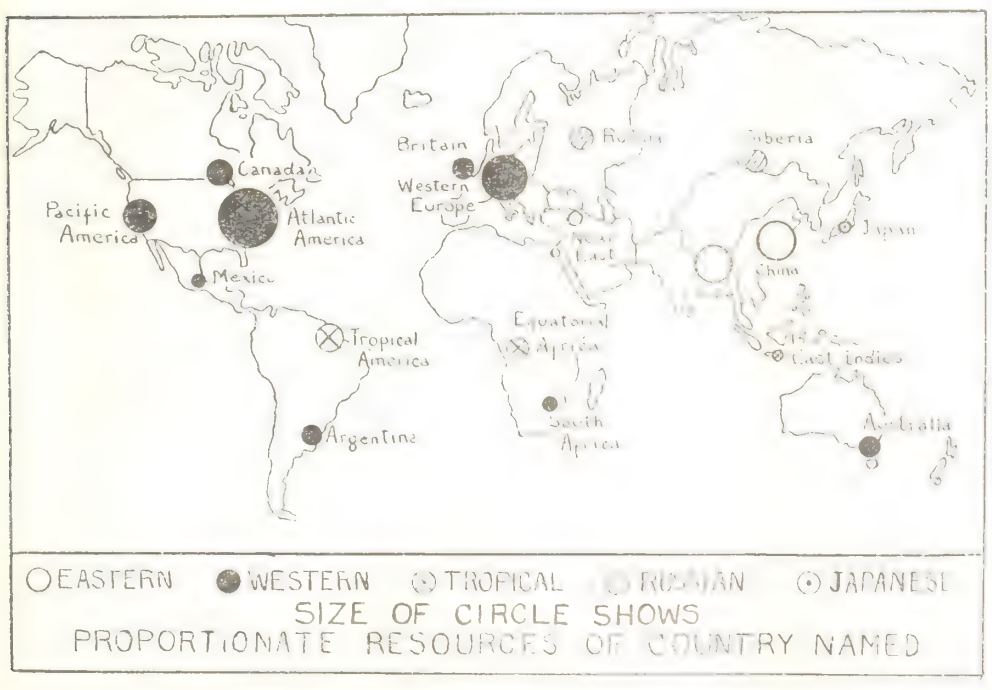
The situation here described brings matters straight home. Here in the eastern half of the United States (with our Dakota wheat, Iowa beef, Mississippi cotton, Ohio wool, Messaba and Birmingham iron, West Virginia coal, and all that goes between) we probably have the biggest single collection of life's sources that exists upon the planet. But we have, compared with other lands, only a handful of people.

How about the prospective industrial development of this world region? Will the prospective flow of commodities and population run wild and overwhelm us in one great industrial and metropolitan flood?—or will the flow somehow be controlled?

What sort of place to live in is America going to be? Can the forces of iron industrial civilization be controlled so as to effect, without undue waste of man-power, a plenty or a sufficiency of food and clothes and homes, and at the same time develop the fullest and best in the true American environment?

This is one and the same question which confronts the Chinese in Shanghai. Can the forces of this same iron industrialism, issuing out of America and the West, be controlled, in China, so as to effect plenty for the average Chinese human being without impairing the fullest and best in the Oriental environment? This question has its counterpart in every land where industrial civilization is going on its way.

Will this Western iron civilization, as Oswald Spengler suggests, harden and crumble away. Will it, as others predict, collapse in a series of convulsions? Or can it somehow save itself; can a mold be found on which a coming industry may be built? There is, in the mountain pass, a "most serviceable" line or grade on which to build a railway. But to find it takes the eye of the engineer explorer. It takes the same eye, only with more potent vision, to find and visualize a new mold for industry.



8. RESOURCE STRENGTH OF CIVILIZATIONS.

The traffic in the streets of New York City and the traffic in the streets of Shanghai are parts of one great flow. Wherever it appears (as at the corner of Broadway and 42nd Street) its problems belong not to the particular city, not to the state, not even to the nation, but to the world. The tracing and charting of this flow—each stream from source to destination—constitutes the field of a coming quest: not terrestrial but industrial exploration.

Contributors to This Issue

J. RAMSAY MACDONALD is the leader of the Labor Party in the British Parliament and former Premier of Great Britain.

FREDA KIRCHWEY, managing editor of The Nation, is in Europe for the summer.

ROBERT S. ALLEN was at the Northwestern Agricultural Conference in St. Paul for the Christian Science Monitor.

ELLSWORTH HUNTINGTON is a geographer and a member of the faculty of Yale University.

JOHAN SMERTENKO is a critic who contributes frequently to The Nation.

HARRY ELMER BARNES is the author of "The Genesis of the World War," and a professor at Smith Col

PAUL WEISS is a contributor of philosophical articles to current magazines.

JOHN PERRY CLARK is a secretary of the International Immigration Service.

CARLETON BEALS, who lives in Mexico City, has recently published a volume of his early Mexican experiences, "Brimstone and Chili."

LLEWELYN POWYS, author of "The Verdict of Bridlegoose" and other books, is living in Dorsetshire, England.

HAL SAUNDERS WHITE is a member of the faculty of New York University.

HENRIETTA STRAUS, The Nation's music critic, is now attending the music festivals in Europe.

BENTON MACKAYE is a regional planner.

BOOKS

PERFECT SIGHT WITHOUT GLASSES

By W. H. BATES, M.D.

The author of this book presents evidence that all errors of refraction are caused by strain—and cured by rest and relaxation.

The complete method of treatment is described so clearly that the reader can usually discard his glasses and improve his vision.

At leading bookstores. Price $5 Postpaid

Central Fixation Publishing Company

[illegible] Madison Avenue New York

THE EVOLUTION OF MAN, by Wilhelm Boelsche

A clear, concise, and complete [illegible] the work of [illegible]

Charles H. Kerr & Co., 347 East Ohio St., Chicago, Ill.

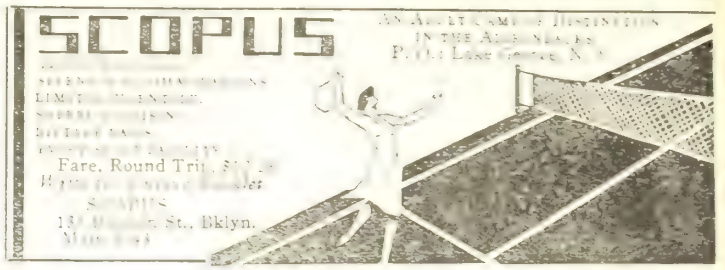
MT. AIRY COMMUNITY

IF Cooperation has a weakness

[illegible]

Enquire HARRY KELLY, 70 Fifth Ave., Tel. Chelsea 0432

SUMMER PLACES



TIMBERLAND

IN THE HEART OF THE ADIRONDACKS

[illegible] Bungalows and Main House. Exercise [illegible] equipment [illegible] all sports. [illegible] $27 per week. [illegible]

From Troy [illegible] to Rynessus, N. Y., [illegible] $4.25.

MORRIS HARKAVY N. Y. Office, 55 West 42nd St.
ESTHER R. KAPLAN Pennsylvania [illegible]

Mail your reservations to POTTERSVILLE, N. Y.

FRENCH SCHOOL

Château-Neuvic School

A Classic School for American Boys [illegible] for American [illegible]

[illegible] life organized in a historic feudal castle. [illegible] of the [illegible] and [illegible] $1,000. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

[illegible] Bishop of American Churches in France, Chairman of Board of Trustees.

Address: Dr. Conrad Chapman, Head Master,
Château-Neuvic, Neuvic-sur-l'Isle, Dordogne, France

MISCELLANEOUS

REAL HARRIS HOMESPUNS Direct from the Makers at Manufacturer's Price
Suit Lengths Cut to Order. Price $2.20 per Yard. Postage Paid
NEWALL, 150 Stornoway, Scotland. Write for [illegible] enclosed

Is there something you want that you can't quite afford---

[illegible] a book, one or two of the latest books, entertainment [illegible] your summer wardrobe?

Many Nation readers have found that they can earn extra money for extra pleasures by taking advantage of our exceptional offer to readers. Why not try it yourself?

Dept. 11
THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York
What is your [illegible] offer to readers?

Name ...

Address ...

...

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXV NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 10, 1927 No. 3240

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS
EDITORIALS:
Lindbergh's Story
Russian Oil Lubricant and Lenaism
The Disgrace at Geneva
The Vanishing American Dairy
THE VIENNESE SHAMBLES. By G. E. R. Gedye
MORE CHINESE ATROCITIES! By J. G. Sayre
THE UNFAMILIAR HOUSE. By John Gould Fletcher
HAD DARROW BEEN A JOURNALIST. By One Who Is
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter
CORRESPONDENCE
BOOKS:
Adulterations and Quackeries. By Morris L. Ernst
An African Pioneer. By Rebecca Hourwich
A Journalist Looks Backward. By Oswald Garrison Villard
Marat the Radical. By Leo Gershoy
The Great Illusion. By Scott Buchanan
In the Time of Aurangzeb. By W. Norman Brown
Pragmatic Politics. By Lewis Rockow
The Biography of a Character. By W. K. Ferguson
Books in Brief 138
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Price-Fixing in Queensland. By Maurice A. Hallgren

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Managing Editor Literary Editor
FREDA KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

GOVERNOR Fuller, as we go to press, is writing his decision in the case of Sacco and Vanzetti. No more important state document has been penned in this country in years; it is hard to recall any act of a Governor of an American State which has had any such international effect as Governor Fuller's decision is bound to have. Millions upon millions the world over will have their opinion of the United States definitely formed by it. As it goes, so they will decide whether justice is dead in America, whether it can be as ruthlessly trampled under foot here as liberty has been in Italy, Spain, Hungary, Turkey, and all the other despotically governed countries, or whether it still lives. It is a decision which will as surely be heard around the world as was the shot at Concord. It is a pleasure to say that Governor Fuller has recognized its importance; that he has made as painstaking and careful an inquiry as anyone could possibly ask. He has gone to the scene and tested for himself the distance of the identifying witnesses from the place of the shooting. He has interviewed judge, jurors, and counsel, and has twice called upon Sacco and Vanzetti in jail. We have high hopes that he will see justice done, and if he does he will be acclaimed the world over as one of America's great men.

BITTER, INDEED, for Secretary Kellogg must be the confession he has just had to make to the House Foreign Affairs Committee that there has been gross mismanagement of the Foreign Service in the interest of diplomatic "career men" as against the men of the consular branch of the service who are entitled to promotion. One would think that a Secretary of State would know what was happening in his department without having to discover it because of a resolution of Congress. But in response to a resolution of inquiry, Mr. Kellogg finds that whereas there are 110 persons in the diplomatic service and 380 in the consular, actually 76 diplomats have been promoted since 1924 (70 per cent of those in the service), as against 138 consuls, approximately only 36 per cent of the consular appointees. More than that, these promotions were made by a personnel board of six members; four of these insiders have promoted themselves; three "career men," Joseph C. Grew, J. Wright Butler, and Hugh R. Wilson, have been sent as ambassador or minister to Turkey, Hungary, and Switzerland, respectively. William Dawson, the single consular representative, has been promoted from grade two to grade one.

MR. KELLOGG has to admit that this result of the promotion policy has been "different from that which had been expected," but he holds that there has been "unintentional injustice," as a result of which there are forty-four cases in which "officers of the diplomatic branch have been advanced over their consular colleagues." To rectify this he has ordered the immediate promotion of forty-four more men in the consular branch of the service, but this will hardly cure the situation. As we have before this pointed out, the diplomatic "career men" are trying to control the service, to get the best plums for themselves, and to prevent any outside appointments from civil life to high posts. This spirit cannot be met merely by balancing promotions in the two branches of the corps. It must be ruthlessly frowned upon by the President and Secretary of State, or the new permanent diplomatic service will be a curse to the country and create an unbearably bureaucratic and priggish group of representatives of the United States abroad.

WRITING in the Atlantic Monthly, Willis Sharp agrees that the current criticism of the supineness, cowardice, and loss of critical faculty of the daily press is correct. Fortunately there are some offsets; there are still examples in the smaller cities of old-fashioned journalistic courage and devotion to the public service, not yet rendered impossible by the economic destruction of the editor's liberty and independence. The other day in Canton, Ohio, a handsome new building to house the Canton Daily News was dedicated to the memory of Don R. Mellett, its editor, who paid with his life for his fearless attacks upon the criminals of Canton and their allies, the police of the city. About the same time the former chief of police of Canton was sentenced to death for his share in the cowardly assassination of Mr. Mellet, who deserves a public memorial as well as the private one now dedicated. And when we read every day of the fresh revelations of the wholesale political corruption in Indiana now being exposed by D. C. Stephenson, the Grand Dragon of the Indiana Ku Klux Klan, who is in jail for life, we cannot fail to recall that this exposure is due to two unpurchasable editors, Boyd Gurley of the Indianapolis Times, a Scripps-Howard daily, and Thomas L. Adams of the Vincennes Commercial. Mr. Adams started the fight; Mr. Gurley helped to carry it on. Both risked a good deal; both deserve medals of honor from their State; both merit the acclaim of all good journalists. Incidentally, with one Governor of Indiana in the penitentiary, these editors have been able to call upon the present Governor Jackson either to explain his connection with Stephenson or to resign. It will not be the fault of these editors if there is not a political uprising in Indiana.

FOUND GUILTY of Anti-Fascist propaganda in America, Mario Chiossone, deported from Boston at the request of Italian authorities, has just been sentenced to twelve years in prison. Cases like this amply justify the fears of another anti-Fascist, Armando Borghi, who still enjoys sanctuary in the United States, but who is scheduled for deportation. According to the American Civil Liberties Union, which is appealing to the Department of Labor on Borghi's behalf, he is an Italian citizen, an anti-Fascist editor who entered this country as a temporary visitor on November 9, 1926. He is held for deportation on charges that he remained in the United States beyond the four months allowed him and that he is an anarchist, here in violation of the immigration act. Borghi has stated that after consulting counsel, he believed his visa was good for one year. When he attempted to have his passport extended the Italian Consul at Boston took it away instead, stating that he was "not qualified to be an Italian citizen" because of his anti-Fascist views. He is a philosophical anarchist, opposed to violence. Borghi's house in Italy was burned by the Fascists; his son is not allowed to leave the country, held as hostage for his father's return. Deportation for Borghi may mean death—for the crime of lese majeste against the Most High Mussolini. Certainly it will mean a long prison sentence. There was a time when the United States offered asylum for political refugees, and their record in this country is a long and honorable one. The Civil Liberties Union (100 Fifth Avenue, New York City), in soliciting funds for Borghi's defense, is only attempting to uphold this time-honored custom.

JOAN OF ARC with a duenna is the decree of a Paris judge. A seventeen-year-old girl, cast for the part of Joan in the film, "The Marvelous Life of Joan of Arc," has been permitted to take the part, over the objections of her guardian, provided a governess be in constant attendance on her while she is acting the role. This is certainly rewriting history. As we recollect, Joan as a child cared for her flocks alone, except for the mysterious voices in the sky, went unaccompanied to the Governor of Vaucouleurs to beg him to take her to the Dauphin, and was so importunate that at last not alone but—Heavens!—in the company of six men-at-arms she went to the future king of France. Alone, except for an army of 5,000 men, she set out for Orleans; at the head of her troops she entered the city; and after the Dauphin had been crowned at Rheims—when Joan alone stood by his side—she stood alone at the stake and suffered the flames that consumed her. In all this dramatic story there is no mention of a duenna, a chaperon, a governess, a keeper. Joan at all times was surrounded by rough and doubtless unscrupulous soldiers. Yet the legend most emphatically has it that not a hair of her head was harmed—until the English burned her at the stake. She was protected at all times by the pure fire of passionate endeavor; which is one of the things that distinguishes Joan the Maid from the movie reproduction of her life.

NEW YORK CITY ought to pass on some of its pressing municipal problems to its suburban neighbor, Scarsdale. For the "city fathers" of Scarsdale have too little to do. They have so much of too little to do that they are occupying themselves with nonsense—and probably illegal nonsense at that. On the advice of a Mrs. Somebody-or-Other, a so-called "health expert," the village officers have passed an ordinance prohibiting the sale of "hot dogs" on the streets. The ordinance is, in fact, directed against a single individual who has been doing a thriving business in frankfurter rolls in front of the high school. No epidemic has swept away great numbers of the students in consequence; for all anybody knows the students' health may have been the better for their "hot dogs." But this is an age of fads, and a "health expert" has to interfere with public habits about once in so often to prove she is one. Fortunately the "hot dog" vendor has not been compliant. He has a State license as a peddler, and has appealed to the courts. We think he will win. If not, it seems likely that "city fathers" and village grandmothers from Dan to Danbury will shortly issue prohibitions ruling out of our diet anything and everything from pig's knuckles to milk toast.

WHO IS THE LUCKIEST BOY in the world? We nominate David Putnam, and do not expect anybody to contradict us. Does David spend half his waking hours in the school room, laboriously poring over the map of Haiti or Greenland or Baffins Bay? Does he, with infinite tongue-twisting and soul-sweating, learn the "Products" of any of these countries or of half a dozen others? Not David. He wakes up early and interviews a pirate chief; he breakfasts on polar-bear sandwiches and a cup of bread-fruit juice; he spends the morning looking for buried treasure and the afternoon inspecting extinct salamanders. In between times, when bright and strange sights pall a little, he may snatch a look at an arithmetic or composition book. But for geographies he has no use whatever. He goes to the distant places of the earth where geographies are being made. Just at present he is a member of the Putnam expedition to the Arctic, engaged in helping with the work of mapping Mill Island in Baffins Bay and conducting archeological inspections of interesting Eskimo ruins of one thousand years ago. On July 30 members of the expedition, in the midst of a thick fog, killed and dragged to the ship an 800-pound polar bear which was subsequently skinned and the great skeleton was prepared for taking back home. David did not shoot the bear, but it is safe to assume that while the work on the carcass was going on he was not far away. That is his particular good fortune—to be in the center of adventures which other boys can only read about.

A PICTURESQUE FIGURE in the world of exploration, science, art, and letters is removed in the death of Sir Harry Johnston. Thirty books stand to his credit; his paintings were frequently hung in the Royal Academy; he was the inventor of the slogan, "The Cape to Cairo," and the master of eleven modern languages, several ancient tongues, and various African dialects. For twenty years he explored in Africa or held positions in the British consular service until ill-health compelled his retirement. During that time he crossed Angola with the Earl of Mayo's expedition into the unknown southern Congo basin; visited, in the next year, Stanley in the Congo; made the first thorough exploration of the "birth of the Nile"; helped to found the British Central Africa Protectorate; and made many important discoveries of African fauna and flora. From 1899 to 1901 he was Commander-in-Chief of the Uganda Protectorate. That would seem to record a full enough life for any one man, but in addition to his scientific labors and writing, he gave much time to biological research and music! As for his books, they by no means all bore on his African adventures. In 1910 he made a thoughtful and useful study of the American Negro—not as valuable as those of Sir Sydney, now Baron Olivier, but none the less worth while as the viewpoint of an extraordinarily well-informed foreign observer. By all odds his most interesting books were his novels, the first of which, "The Gay Dombeys," was an immediate success. Then came "Mrs. Warren's Daughter," a narrative continuation of Shaw's "Mrs. Warren's Profession," and "The Veneerings"—all written after his sixtieth birthday. "The Gay Dombeys" were presented as descendants of the characters in "Nicholas Nickleby" and "Dombey and Son." It is a glowing and vivid picture of life in the last quarter of the nineteenth century and a most admirable protest against the ruthless imperialistic exploitation of backward peoples.

THE PROLIFIC AND POPULAR Italian novelist, Matilde Serao, died in Naples on July 15, after a writing career of half a century during which she produced thirty volumes (including twenty novels) and made herself one of the most influential of Italian journalists. Many of her novels, dealing for the most part with life in Rome and Naples, were translated into English, French, and other European languages, and though her great public was found among the middle classes, who were not repelled by her rapid, journalistic style, she won general recognition for her vivid, natural descriptions of life and character. As a journalist she introduced into Italy syndicated columns of "advice to correspondents" and in various ways made her name familiar to the Italian people.

WE STOP THE PRESS to record Mr. Coolidge's oddly worded refusal to run again. If it is final, it is a most praiseworthy and patriotic act thus to uphold the third term tradition, as to which we shall speak at length next week.

Lindbergh's Story

I was born in Detroit, Michigan, on February 4, 1902. My father was practicing law in Little Falls, Minnesota, at the time. When I was less than two months old my parents took me to their farm, on the western banks of the Mississippi River, two miles south of Little Falls.

THIS is the opening paragraph of Lindbergh's story.* It is typical of the rest—a plain, straightforward narrative with no effort at ornamentation or effect. The publishers say that—unlike most such books—Lindbergh wrote the entire account himself. There is no reason to doubt it. Had anybody else attempted the task he would have tried to make the story "vivid," "colorful," "dramatic," "picturesque." Lindbergh's is a plain tale plainly told, and though one might wish for some insight into the man's emotions and psychology, that is the last thing which Lindbergh could give us, and it is comforting that he didn't try to.

Lindbergh left the University of Wisconsin in the middle of his sophomore year to become a flying student of the Nebraska Aircraft Corporation. That was in 1922, when he was twenty years of age. His aeronautical education was mostly picked up as an assistant to other men, going about the country giving exhibitions at country fairs. Lindbergh bought his first plane the following spring when for $500 he picked up a "Jenny" from the Government that had cost nearly twenty times that to build. The next year he spent "barnstorming" on his own account, and then put in twelve months in the army aviation schools in Texas, from which he was graduated as a second lieutenant in the Air Service Reserve Corps.

Next Lindbergh went into the air-mail service, where he was just previous to setting out on his transatlantic flight. Of that flight his written account is brief and contains little not already known, although it corrects some versions of the exploit. It was not true, for instance, that Lindbergh took off with practically no food. He says:

> In addition to food for the actual flight, I carried five tins of concentrated army rations, each of which contained one day's food and which could be made to last much longer if necessary. I carried two canteens of water; one containing a quart for use during the actual flight and the other containing a gallon for emergency. In addition to this water, I had an Armbust cup, which is a device for condensing the moisture from human breath into drinking water. The cup is cloth covered and contains a series of baffle plates through which the breath is blown. The cup is immersed in water and then removed and blown through. The evaporation of the water on the outside cools the cup walls and baffle plates on which the breath moisture collects and runs down to the bottom of the cup.

Perhaps the most revealing pages of the book are a couple in which the resourcefulness and perseverance of the young man appear in his account of the trial trips of the Spirit of St. Louis previous to the transatlantic flight:

> I decided to run one more test before landing, and had it about half-way completed when I allowed the data board to come too close to the window where a gust of air carried it out of the cockpit. I was flying over mesquite, over five miles from Camp Kearney, at about 1,200-foot altitude at the time, and could only spiral around and watch the board flutter down into the top of a mesquite bush. There was a small clearing about 200 yards from the bush, in which it was possible to land a slow ship. I landed at Camp Kearney and sent for one of the cabin Hisso Standards used by the Ryan Airlines for their passenger service between San Diego and Los Angeles. When the Standard arrived I flew over and landed in the clearing near the lost board which was clearly visible from the air; but, after a fifteen minute search, I was unable to locate it from the ground in the thick mesquite. So I took off my coat and spread it over the top of another bush, then took the air again with the Standard to locate the board in relation to the coat.
>
> I had no difficulty in locating them both and found them to be about fifty yards apart. I landed again but could not locate the board, so moved my coat to the spot where I thought it should be and took off again. This time I had placed the coat within twenty feet of the data board, but it required several minutes' search in the thick mesquite to finally locate it.

* "We." By Charles A. Lindbergh. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50

Russian Oil—Lubricant and Irritant

BEFORE the Soviet nationalization act of 1918 Russian oil was a lubricant of high quality and eminent respectability. Today it finds itself playing the part of an international irritant, causing hot friction between the British-owned Royal Dutch-Shell group and portions of the Standard Oil group. And its character, alas, is tainted. Russian petroleum, according to Sir Henri Deterding, managing director of the Royal Dutch-Shell group, is "stolen property" and anyone purchasing it, as part of the Standard Oil is now successfully doing, is acting against "the interests of humanity and general trade honesty."

Yet despite this righteous crusade of Sir Henri, despite his appeal to the "ethics" of the oil trade, despite the supposed slump in the "moral" qualities of Soviet petroleum, it gushes forth unconcerned in greater and greater quantities each succeeding year. In 1926-1927 there were produced 10,461,000 metric tons, which is more than twice the 1922 production of 5,000,000 tons. Likewise Russian oil exports have shown a steady increase. In 1913 Russia exported 57,800,000 poods of oil; in 1925, 81,000,000 poods. England, strange to say, is Russia's best customer, taking 34,000,000 of the 81,000,000 poods. Even more interesting and incongruous is the fact that the Bolshevik Naphtha Syndicate now supplies oil for the navies of four capitalistic Powers: Great Britain, France, Italy, and Greece.

At present, it seems, the Standard Oil of New York and the Vacuum Oil are the favored agents for distribution. For this privilege the United States companies hold themselves ready to lend to the Soviet Government from $50,000,000 to $75,000,000. But what they get in return is even more important. Their contracts give them exclusive selling rights to Russian fuel oil to compete directly with Deterding's Anglo-Persian Oil Company from Trebizond to Port Said and Aden to Colombo. No wonder, therefore, that Sir Henri Deterding becomes agitated over morality and the "interests of humanity."

This Anglo-American rivalry for Russian oil is, of course, not new. And the story, as it shows the relationship between oil imperialism and the international policies of foreign offices, is most significant. To begin with it should be remembered that a major part of the "stolen property" belonged to the Royal Dutch before the Russian Revolution. Sir Henri was well on his way to being the "Napoleon of Petroleum," the sole master of the great oil wealth of the Caucasus, when the Soviet Government nationalized his holdings. Sir Henri's chief competitor at that time in Caucasian oil claims was the Standard Oil of New Jersey, through its interests in Nobel and Company which then controlled about 40 per cent of the production of Baku. In 1920 the Standard of New Jersey, hardly considering the Soviet Government seriously, purchased the Nobel holdings in Baku outright. Since this was two years after the nationalization act, the Standard's rights were never recognized by the Bolsheviks. W. C. Teagle, president of the Standard, has been much more subtle in his attitude toward Soviet laws since then.

With their lands thus taken away, both the Standard Oil and the Royal Dutch brought pressure to bear on the State Department and Foreign Office in the United States and England respectively. This was particularly evident in the United States since the property of American organizations other than the Standard Oil was never nationalized. When Secretary Hughes, therefore, demanded denationalization of appropriated properties in Soviet Russia he could have been acting only for the Standard Oil, whose legal adviser he was before he entered the State Department. England, too, refused then to recognize Russia. Sir Henri Deterding, however, was not quite so harsh; he did not exactly adhere to the Standard's banner bearing the device "Hands off Red Oil." In June, 1922, the world suddenly learned that Sir Henri was on the verge of obtaining a monopoly concession on all Soviet oil lands. It took quick work to head off this sly trick. The State Department graciously loaned Ambassador Child to the Standard Oil at the Genoa Conference. Secretary Hughes, speaking for the Standard through Child, then said that the United States would never consent to any scheme unless it took account of the principle of the open door for all and recognized equal rights for all. The Belgian and French delegates rallied to the "open door" policy and Sir Henri lost his chance to get a monopoly hold on the Soviet lands. One month later at the Hague Conference the influence of the State Department was used to carry a resolution which prohibited any single nation from accepting a monopoly concession in the Soviet oil fields. Three times Secretary Hughes came to the Standard's aid and three times he was successful—but it is interesting to conjecture the number of marines it would have been necessary to use in the event that the other oil trusts had not been willing to agree to his proposals.

Since the Hague Conference, increased Russian efficiency and industry have made Baku petroleum more than ever appealing. Simply stated, Soviet oil is cheaper and more conveniently located with respect to European markets than any other oil supply. And the appeal has been growing stronger since 1922; each year finds another company head dealing in the besmirched oil. They are probably men of simple faith, incapable of weighing the subtle metaphysical distinctions between "stolen" and "honest" property—the lubricating qualities are so nearly alike. The French Minister of Marine has already declared that he does not sympathize with the attitude of the Royal Dutch; that future transactions will be continued in the previous style: that the only criterion will remain the lowest price. The Standard Oil of New Jersey, however, has as yet been unable to accept any of the liberal Russian concessions, although it did bid for the Emba field last year. It is, unfortunately, linked to the Royal Dutch by a co-operative price agreement—they both sell in the same European countries and by a price regulation avoid cut-throat competition. Sir Henri Deterding thus has a weapon to hold over the New Jersey company. The situation is not without an element of humor, with part of the Rockefeller companies supporting Sir Henri and part opposed to him. It reveals, Soviet officials say, a new usefulness of the divided trust—divided under our anti-trust laws.

This division and rancor among the capitalist oil companies naturally pleases Stalin and the Central Executive Committee in Moscow; they are for once holding the upper hand. If they can force a crisis, they will. With blundering diplomats representing the great oil interests, they may.

The Disgrace at Geneva

IN one of his most self-satisfied moods President Woodrow Wilson, who was then leading the country to preparedness and into the war, declared that the trouble with the pacifists was that they did not know how to get what they wanted, whereas he and his school knew exactly what they wanted and just how they were going to get it. To that boast fate returned the answer in our loss of all our war objectives, save one, and the disaster of Versailles. He died broken and defeated. We recall this incident now because the collapse of the Geneva naval disarmament illustrates again how little the men who believe that national safety lies only in the sword know where they are going and how they are going to get peace. They boast that they are the practical men and the pacifists mere theorists. There were no pacifists at Geneva, just practical statesmen and practical naval men, and they have not only not disarmed, they have fanned anew the embers of international hostility and ill-will. The situation appears worse than when they met; they have even jeopardized a renewal of the battleship agreement when it expires in 1930. If the conference breaks up it will be with ill-will on our side; on the side of the English the charge is made that one of our admirals from the first primed the American correspondents with attacks upon the British. The New York World reports from Washington that there is no concealing the fact that official circles blame the Washington battleship lobby for part of the failure. In England Austen Chamberlain has officially stated that the British position was entirely misrepresented over here.

It would seem as if this fiasco—and it will be a fiasco even if some compromise is patched up—of the one independent and bold excursion into international affairs by President Coolidge ought finally to open the eyes of some of his adorers to the grave danger of having a pitifully weak and inept man in the Presidency. From the beginning his conduct of our foreign affairs has been futile to a degree. He insured the disaster at Geneva by the composition of the delegation he sent there. Having aroused Latin-America against us to a pitch of enmity never before known, he now makes us the laughing stock of Europe and has seriously endangered the relations of the two great English-speaking nations. We recognize the joint guilt of the jingo Conservative Government of England. But talk about good intentions and inefficiency! What could be worse? With as able an ambassador as Mr. Houghton in London, Mr. Coolidge could certainly have discovered in advance the exact prospects of success for such a conference.

All of which brings us back to Ambassador Houghton's admirable plea at the Harvard commencement for a hundred-year peace pact between ourselves and the three leading nations of Europe. If there could be a Locarno between England, France, Belgium, and Germany why not one between the United States, England, and France, to say nothing of Germany? What has become of our hundred per cent patriot warriors of ten years ago? They were then for arresting any one who dared to criticize our British ally. Now they are with the admirals for a new armament rivalry with that same beloved ally! As we write the Navy Department announces the award of contracts for five more cruisers. They can only be used in a real war against France, England, or Japan—our allies of 1917-18, those who helped us to make the world so safe for democracy!

The Vanishing American Daily

THE number of daily newspapers of general circulation published in this country in the English language continues to decrease at a remarkable rate. In Pittsburgh the number of dailies has just been reduced from five to three—only one morning daily remaining for a city of 637,000 people. Writing in the Editor and Publisher, Arthur Robb notes the fact that in the first six months of this year the number has decreased from 2,001 to 1,952, the largest decrease for six months recorded by that journal in the nine years in which it has been watching this striking new development in the American press. Of the forty-nine dailies that have disappeared six were morning and forty-three evening newspapers; in addition, fourteen Sunday newspapers have come to their end. Mr. Robb points out that fewer than a dozen of these suspensions were due to failure; the rest were entirely the product of that trend toward consolidation which, in our judgment, has only just begun to make itself felt.

The modern publisher of a daily is caught in a vicious circle. He must meet steadily rising costs, which means winning more readers in order to gain more advertising and to raise his rates on what he gets. Soon he finds that his territory cannot, or will not, supply sufficient advertising to support richly all the dailies within it, so he sells to a rival sheet or buys it. Where this does not take place we see an effort to meet the situation by the creation of chains of newspapers for the familiar purpose of cutting down the overhead. A most striking example of this has just been afforded by the purchase of the Atlanta Constitution by ex-Senator Luke Lea of Tennessee, who owns three other newspapers.

Another interesting fact brought out by Mr. Robb is that the evening newspapers of the country had on March 31, last, a combined circulation of 23,422,792 copies a day, a gain of 1,660,817 over the figures for October 1, 1926, as contrasted with a combined morning-daily circulation of 13,607,486 copies. The morning journals gained only 271,690 copies in the same period. When one considers the rise of the tabloid it would appear that there had been a loss of circulation by the old-line daily morning newspapers during this time. Turning to advertising, Mr. Robb finds that the average rate charged by the evening newspapers has not increased but decreased. In this respect the morning papers are ahead of their evening rivals, for they show an average rise in advertising rate during the last six months of ten cents per million agate lines.

It is impossible to believe that this rate of decrease of the dailies is anything else than exceptional. If there were to be 100 disappearances during the present year, the situation would be alarming. But we cannot today believe that the daily newspapers of the country are going to be wiped out in twenty years. It is altogether probable also that if there should be many disappearances new dailies would be started, only to be confronted, however, with those same economic tendencies which are bringing about the present consolidations and suspensions. None the less, Mr. Robb's figures are of great importance, for they foreshadow greater and greater concentration of the news-disseminating power in the hands of fewer and fewer and richer and richer men—not a pleasant fact for a democracy to contemplate.

The Viennese Shambles

By G. E. R. GEDYE

Vienna, July 15

THE Ringstrasse in Vienna is always a temptation. No city in the world but Vienna has the Bummel—beside the true Bummeler the flâneur is perpetual motion itself—and the Ringstrasse calls aloud to idlers to idle. Never more so, of course, than in summer, when the shady trees become a standing menace to industry. On July 15—Bloody Friday—I listened to my hurt to the call of the Ringstrasse, not for the first time.

On this day the street had a different call for a few hundred thousand people. The night before, three nationalists from the Burgenland, which is still suspected of pro-Hungarian tendencies, had been found guiltless of all crime though they had fired on a procession of workers after provocation, but not in self-defense, and killed a war invalid and a little boy. The Socialist papers had for days been opening their mouths as loudly as is the custom with all Vienna papers, crying out that "class justice" was about to be administered. The verdict confirmed its jeremiads and spontaneously the workers left the factories as soon as they entered them to indulge in what is more or less the recognized way in Vienna of showing the workers' displeasure— a "solemn Protest" Bummel on the Ringstrasse ending up with a march round the (temporarily deserted) Parliament House and prolonged "boos" for the reaktionäre Government. That explains why I found my morning Bummel last Friday disturbed by solemn-faced, pathetically earnest workers. How to explain why, within half an hour, bullets were whistling between the trees, showers of stones rattling on the macadam and, before sundown, hundreds of human beings with ghastly, torn bodies crowding the hospitals till new arrivals were turned away, is far harder.

Certainly sonorous Viennese cries of "Pfui" rang through the air for over half an hour while imperturbable policemen took it as part of their lot to be screeched at by pretty factory girls and haggard-faced workmen because one more Viennese jury had helped to earn Vienna the title of "the murderer's paradise" by declaring killing no crime. Certainly a squad of mounted police—always the red rag to an angry but non-violent mob—rode through the marching men and women with their sabers drawn without any obvious necessity, giving rise to the [illegible] cry, "They're riding us down," and shortly afterwards to a shower of brickbats. These things I saw. But, in a side street close by, a shot had already fallen—the police say from a communist revolver, the Socialists declare from a nervous policeman—and wilder cries of "the police are shooting down the workers" had arisen. I walked towards the place where the shot had come from, and found myself in a different milieu—among an army of typical Continental roughs, all with huge stones, heavy sticks, and pieces of plank in their hands, screaming "Revenge! Revenge! They're killing the comrades." Among them all the [illegible] working men of the best type, and young girls rather enjoying the excitement. Then simultaneously began the ridiculously childish pop of police pistols, the hum of stones flying to greet them, and the battle had begun. The rest of the story everyone knows—the burning of the Palace of Justice and the newspaper offices, the issue of carbines to the police and the afternoon of fearful volleys, the night of sniping, the motor cars filled with shooting police, and the outlying battles of next day.

There are a few things upon which everyone is agreed. The violence was the last thing which the Austrian Social Democratic Party—the best organized, best disciplined, and incomparably the best led labor party of the world—desired. Its foremost leaders and its rank and file, at the continued risk of their lives, tried to stop the holocaust, in vain. Yet no one who regularly reads the bitter articles of the Left Press of Vienna (countered, it is true, by the equally savage and senseless articles of the Right) can acquit them of creating an atmosphere in which the workers were obliged to suspect the real aim of the authorities to be treachery and violence, the crushing of workers, and the destruction of their hardly won freedom. I have never seen any police in the world except the British deal as a general thing so tactfully with crowds and demonstrations as those of Vienna—but there is a widespread feeling that there was some error of tact and tactics in the employment, quite foreign to the Vienna practice, of mounted police at the start. Even distinctly anti-Socialist papers have expressed criticism. Given the Continental custom of meeting mob violence with pistol shots, there is little to be said in criticism of the pistol shooting. Nor, considering the terrible incendiarism, can objection well be raised—again, given Continental standards—to the issue of rifles at midday. There does seem to be some ground for taking seriously the vehement Socialist accusations of unnecessary and savagely revengeful employment of these carbines by men whose blood was up, and of the accusation that soft-nosed, partially uncased bullets intended only for target practice—quantities of which I have seen at Social Democratic headquarters—were employed by the police. All these matters will have to be dealt with by an inquiry before anything approaching judgment may be pronounced by a layman. There are also allegations that one or two individuals of the "Republican Protection Guard"—the Republikanische Schutzwehr—made use of arms which they are not supposed to possess.

Without implying any accusation for which there would be, in fact, no sort of basis, it can be said that neither of the sworn enemies of the Social Democrats—the Communists and the Fascists—could have wished for anything better than what has occurred. The work of men like Fritz Adler, Otto Bauer, Seitz the Mayor, and all the giants of the Second International, whose fortress and spiritual home, in an alien, steadily more reactionary Europe, is Vienna, is threatened with ruin and is bound to have been seriously impaired. The Austrian Socialist Party is doctrinaire—the gospel according to Karl Marx is still an article of faith—and its very strength sometimes leads it to adopt a dictatorial tone in ex cathedra pronouncements. Yet in its essence it is democratic—a strange, new, raw democracy it looks to Americans and Englishmen. The days of proscription are still too recent, the victory too hardly won, perhaps, for much tolerance to be exhibited. Yet surely a little less personal abuse, a shade of something approaching dignity in political controversy might be attempted in this city of so old and so rich a culture. If the Social Democrats could dare to take the lead in maturing the palate of their followers, they would render an enormous service to the wonderful city to which they are devoted.

Austrian Social Democracy is threatened with many dangers always. It has been struck by one which it never foresaw, though it might well have done so. If one of the few remaining centers of resistance to reaction and dictatorship under the leadership of a party whose permanent municipal majority has enabled it to establish in Vienna social institutions which are a model to the world, should be dangerously weakened as the result of this disaster of a July morning, the immediate advantage will be reaped by the Communists—who are of less importance in Austria than anywhere in Central Europe—and the ultimate by reaction. The Party is going to survive the blow, but with a serious loss of prestige.

More Chinese Atrocities!

By J. G. SAYRE

[Within recent months the world has heard much of Chinese atrocities—aggressions upon American lives and property by orientals. But attacks have not always been by Chinese upon Americans. Americans have attacked Chinese. The article below is a review of that side of the story.]

FROM the Shasta [California] Republican of December 18, 1856:

> Hundreds of Chinamen have been slaughtered in cold blood in the last five years by the desperadoes that infest our State. The murder of Chinamen was almost of daily occurrence; yet in all this time we have heard of but two or three cases where guilty parties were brought to justice and punishd according to law. Many persons have avowed themselves opposed to the execution of white men for the murder of Chinamen.

California in the seventies made a record for herself in handling the Chinese problem. In Los Angeles on October 24, 1871, a police officer was shot when interfering in a quarrel between two Chinese. A hundred armed whites laid siege to the Chinese quarter, hanged fifteen Chinese, and killed two more for good measure. The sheriff and civil authorities gave up trying to restrain the mob. On February 6, 1872, thirty-two whites were indicted for murder in this affair. Two days later one man was found guilty of manslaughter and the rest were acquitted. Four days after the riot of October 24 a mob broke into the Chinese warehouses, ripped open bales, and beat up all the Chinese in the vicinity. A newspaper account said: "The floors were strewn with sugar, rice, and refuse, and sprinkled with gore." Damages were estimated at $10,000 to $12,000. There were no arrests.

There were anti-Chinese riots for the next three years in Los Angeles. On May 28, 1873, two sportive citizens, Brannen and Manning, murdered a Chinese, Ah Tuck. Newspaper accounts said that the murder was committed without motive. Brannen was pronounced insane. On July 9, 1873, a rancher near Los Angeles missed $400 and tried to get a confession of theft from his Chinese servant by beating him and hanging him to a tree several times until he was nearly choked to death. The Chinese was stubborn and the rancher dragged him to a police station. When the magistrate heard the facts he was immediately convinced of the innocence of the Chinese and fined the rancher $20 for assault. On the 21st of August, 1873, a gang of boys stoned a Chinese who was working in a garden. This seemed too tame, so one of the boys shot and killed him. The boy received two years in prison. On December 13, 1874, an Italian who had murdered a Chinese was given seven years and recommended to mercy.

The San Francisco Bulletin on September 29, 1876, said: "We ask why it is that these people (the Chinese) are beaten and maltreated at high noon on our streets and 'no arrests' invariably recorded." Eleven outrages committed between 1873 and 1876, at which no arrests were made, are cited. From 1877 to 1879 in San Francisco the Sand Lot orator, Denis Kearney, roared his slogan "The Chinese must go!" and incited mobs to murder and destruction.

On September 2, 1885, occurred the most horrible and bloody outrage in the disgraceful history of all our dealings with the oriental in our midst. At Rock Springs, Wyoming, twenty-eight Chinese were murdered, fifteen wounded, and several hundred driven from their homes. Property valued at $150,000 was destroyed or appropriated. The report of Francis E. Warren, Governor of the State at that time, is contained in U. S. Documents, series No. 2379, p. 1227:

> Nearly a score of dead bodies of Chinamen (or the dismembered parts of bodies enough to make up that number) had been picked up where shot on the plains, or had been exhumed from the ashes and from the earth that had fallen in from the dirt roofs, where they had been roasted to death in their own homes; and the opinion prevailed that fully as many more were as yet under the ruins. Not a living Chinese, man, woman, or child, was left in the town where 700 to 900 had lived the day before, and not a single house, shanty, or structure that had ever been inhabited by a Chinaman was left unburned. The smell of burning human flesh was sickening and almost unendurable and was plainly discernible for more than a mile along the railroad both east and west. A small number only of Chinese had received a few moments' notice in which to leave town, but the larger number had none whatever and no time to pack up or secure their household effects and clothing, nor, in fact, their money. A great number were attacked at the mouths of the several mines as they came out—half-naked as coal miners sometimes work—and they were obliged to run for their lives into the sand hills surrounding the town, some being killed as they ran. The Chinese quarters and their persons had been robbed during and subsequent to the trouble.

The sheriff arrived in the evening and could not raise a posse to preserve law and order. The rioting began because Chinese working in the mines had refused to join the white miners on strike.

The rioting in Rock Springs had been done in broad daylight. The coroner testified to the coroner's jury a few days later: "Eleven persons, unknown, have been burned to death and five persons, unknown, have been shot by persons unknown." Several arrests were made. Bail was fixed at $500. The coroner and the justice were the same person. There were no convictions.

Only the arrival of the militia on the morning of September 5 prevented a similar massacre in Evanston, Wyoming. A threat of punishment to all Chinese who remained in Cheyenne after October 1 was made by workmen on September 26. Anti-Chinese demonstrations were held in nearly every town in Wyoming during September.

On September 7, 1885, at Squak Valley, Washington, a camp of thirty-seven Chinese hop-pickers was attacked by five whites and three Indians. Three Chinese were killed and three wounded; the rest fled. The perpetrators of this act were tried and convicted. Four days later at the Coal Creek mines, not far away, one Chinese was choked to death and the clothes of forty-nine were burned. On September 9 the Black Diamond miners drove out the Chinese miners from their midst, injuring nine. The arrival of Federal troops prevented similar outbreaks in Seattle on November 4.

Meanwhile anti-Chinese agitation in Tacoma, more organized than elsewhere, was inflaming the white population. The papers printed hot editorials; numerous public meetings were held at which speeches were made inciting people to violence; bitter resolutions were passed. The Chinese population intimidated by the reports of attacks in other places dwindled in a few days from 700 to about 250. On November 3 the goods of these people were thrown onto wagons and they were driven out of the city to the prairie at Lake View. The day was cold and rainy. Several were sick and two died of exposure. The next day they were loaded into box cars and shipped to Portland. On November 6 Chinatown in Tacoma was burned. The U. S. Marshal arrested the mayor of Tacoma and twenty-six others on charges of conspiring to insurrection and riot; depriving Chinese subjects of equal protection under the law; and destroying property. These men were never tried.

At Orofino, Idaho, in September, 1885, a merchant of Pierce City was murdered under mysterious circumstances. To procure a confession a Chinese was hung by the neck until he confessed facts implicating five. On the way to the trial they were attacked by a mob, disguised as Nez Perces Indians, and were surrendered by the sheriff and deputies. One Chinese offered $5,000 to the daughter of the dead man and $10,000 to the mob to be let off; but all were lynched.

On August 6, 1886, an outrage was perpetrated against Chinese on Douglas Island in the vicinity of Juneau, Alaska. Nearly a hundred were attacked by a body of armed ruffians and ordered to leave. When they refused they were driven to the seashore, put on a small schooner, and set adrift. They landed on a barren coast, but were rescued and returned to their places of employment. Their lives were threatened. Neither the United States authorities nor their employers could furnish sufficient protection, so they were forced to leave once more. Losses in money and property were placed at $13,762.65.

At Log Cabin Bar, Oregon, in the latter part of May, 1887, a camp of Chinese miners on Snake River was attacked. There was direct proof of the murder of two and indirect proof of the murder of several others. The camp was robbed and between $5,000 and $10,000 worth of gold dust stolen. Indictments were found against six men. They were never tried.

In 1887, after over thirty years of outrage against the Chinese people in our country, the United States paid the Chinese Government $276,619.75 indemnity. The greater part of the persecution of the Chinese has never been recorded. The examples given here are of course only the outstanding ones. Between 1872 and 1888 in anti-Chinese outrages in which sixty-two Chinese were killed, three persons were found guilty of manslaughter; one was declared insane; and in five cases no one was ever brought to trial. In these cases alone there was almost $200,000 worth of damages. The Chinese Government, which during all this time had often made reparation to the United States for injuries suffered by American citizens in China, was truly patient to endure the persecution of its subjects so long, and in the end to accept a mere $276,619.75 for full indemnity. But we won't wait till they finish their civil war to exact our dues. It all depends on whose ox does the goring.

The Unfamiliar House

By JOHN GOULD FLETCHER

To an unfamiliar house once more these feet have wandered,
That set forth on the road so many years gone by.
And once again as stranger have I pondered
On the serene blue depths of an unfamiliar sky.
Here where a dead youth passed, unspent yet shattered,
I walk my roads neglected once again,
And whether that strange past or the nearer past much mattered
I do not know. Here I am loosed from pain.

Between me and the boy that held forlornly to his vision
Now stands a lofty shining unsurmountable wall;
I stare at it in vain—neither sympathy nor derision
Alters its mass at all.
The oak-trees stand as they have stood, unchanging,
The dumb stretch of the dusky sun-browned earth
Still breathes in brooding harmony with all my hopes, far ranging,
As on that ever-vanished day when time first brought me birth.

And people come. They still have kept their places
In which they stood a dozen years ago;
But when I grasp their hands and stare into their faces
They seem more strange than once of old; I know
That time and the years sift wrinkles: now I wonder
What lasts between us, changing day on day.
Once was it so with me, to live though torn asunder
From all I might have shared—there is no other way.

And when I pass, from a dark hearthstone going,
Blue in the rosy dusk the hickory-smoke will glide:
But I will be borne from it on the flowing
Drift of a darker tide.
No more than smoke can I blur still these blue skies' changless splendor,
No more than a faint blue cloud of smoke within these hearts I last.
The mirror fronts me, frozen, cold, untender.
There are no ghosts left now; the past is but the past.

Had Darrow Been a Journalist

By ONE WHO IS

The author of this article is the editorial head of a newspaper generally regarded as among the ten or a dozen most important in the United States.

SOME weeks ago The Nation published a sketch of the intellectual development of Clarence Darrow [April 20]. While the enthusiasm of the writer left me somewhat cold, for many of Mr. Darrow's present-day preoccupations either repel or do not interest me, I was impressed by the distinguished lawyer's successful demonstration of his intent to be "captain of his soul"—if he admits the existence of a soul, which is perhaps doubtful. At any rate he has a very acute mind which he has successfully held free from domination, economic or otherwise, by any other force than his own convictions. Speaking of the moment when Darrow turned from the easy and profitable practice of corporation law to defend Eugene V. Debs after the Pullman strike, the author of the article said: "With one stroke he cut himself off from all hope of a conventional success at the bar and threw himself into the task of defending Debs."

True enough. The greater rewards of the law have been denied Darrow, as he undoubtedly foresaw when he took his stand. Not for him have been the private cars of railroad solicitors or the spacious offices and innumerable associate counsel of the legal advisers to powerful corporations. We read of no such firm names as "Darrow, Darrow, Plumb, Hays and Darrow." Yet he has pursued his chosen pathway without being overtaken by destitution, poverty, or disgrace. At least the courts are open to him. No judge has refused to recognize his appearance as an attorney on the plea that the views held by him were out of harmony with those of the great majority of the members of the bar. His pleadings in court are not suppressed with the curt objection: "We can't afford to have a fellow of Darrow's views appear on this court record." Because an attorney is an officer of the court it has not yet been suggested that his personal and professional opinions must coincide with those of the bench on pain of being stricken from the rolls. He has never been subjected to the ignominy of having to repudiate his innermost convictions at the behest of some board of directors or to sacrifice his livelihood. If blacklisted by the corporations, as he doubtless is, he is still able to find clients among the common people. And the courts in which he earns his daily bread are open as freely to him as, let us say, to Elihu Root, his most perfect antithesis.

But suppose Darrow had been a journalist?

He says himself that he embarked on the profession of the law without any particular ideals. He saw in it mainly an easy way for one with a talent for controversy to earn a living. Idealism was awakened in him later, when he saw justice thwarted and prejudice enthroned by the subservience of the bar to the dominance of wealth and privilege. Debs, left defenseless in the city which had just hanged the anarchists and ostracized their counsel, appealed to his sense of fair play. His former easy conception of the real ethics of the law was shattered. He accepted the duty which fate placed before him, and has never been known to bewail the effect that decision had upon his later career.

Had he been a journalist he would not have long bewailed the results of his righteous decision for the very simple reason that either he would have reversed it or starved. For a quarter of a century after the Debs strike there were in Chicago newspaper men to whom all hope of advancement had been denied because they had defended Debs in their newspapers as Darrow did in the courts. At that time there were four or five morning papers in the city. Today there are but two. The gag can be, and is, applied even more effectively today to the young writer who thinks that he will find in journalism the opportunity to express the convictions within him and to defend the causes which he believes to be just. Woe unto him if the convictions clash with those of Main Street or the causes are looked upon as revolutionary by Rotary or the Union League Club!

For some years past American newspapers have periodically expressed earnest devotion to the cause of academic freedom in our colleges. Educators like Dr. Meiklejohn who came under the ban of boards of trustees or subservient faculties are sure of a sympathetic hearing and a large measure of defense in the press. But the very papers that uphold the right to freedom of expression in the colleges discourage and even suppress it among members of their editorial staffs. They not only refuse to the writer, be he editor or reporter, the privilege of expressing his views in their columns. That is entirely within the proprietor's rights, for he can no more be expected to maintain a newspaper for the expression of other people's opinions than the Mayo brothers should be expected to supply their patients with Christian Science tracts. But today the public expression—outside his office or the columns of his paper—of opinions antagonistic to those which the average newspaper editor holds to be safe and sane seriously affects the prospects of the newspaper man unfortunate enough to have convictions and rash enough to express them.

I know, for example, a young man, at the very beginning of a career which I am confident will be brilliant, though not in daily journalism, who is under a serious cloud because he made a first-hand study of conditions in Russia and reported truthfully what he had seen. In no sense a partisan of the Soviet Government, and without a particle of sympathy for communism in theory or in practice as exemplified in Russia, he was at once termed "bolshevist" and timid editors closed their columns to him. The nation-saving societies, whose secretaries see red whenever Russia is named, have him on their lists, and it is easy to foresee a closed market for his literary wares unless he shall go through a painful purgatory of recantation. In the editorial sanctums of the organs of prosperity he is about as welcome as one who should bring a defense of Sacco and Vanzetti to the Boston Transcript.

Some weekly papers, notably The Nation, offer a medium of expression to many of these to whom the columns of the dailies are closed. But I wonder whether either their editors or their contributors know to how great an extent those who write for their columns are suspect in the daily sanctums? I have personally heard the suggestion that a well-known writer should undertake a series for which he is admirably equipped put aside because he was publicly associated with the New Republic. And the pity of it was that the editor who professed the objection is himself no narrow reactionary. He merely recognized the attitude of those to whom he was responsible. Perhaps they had never clearly defined that attitude. All the worse. For in such event the timorous editor—and most of us are that—goes further in the direction of conservatism even than he need. If his employers disapprove of red he will take no chances on even the palest pink.

The youth who is planning to adopt daily journalism for his life's work should do so only with a clear understanding that the chances are strongly against his ever being able to use his calling as a means of impressing his own convictions on even a small section of public opinion. If he shall come to own his own paper he can do so to his heart's content—provided the responsibilities and profits of proprietorship do not incline him to adopt the views of the business community as his own. Or he may be fortunate enough to secure a connection with a newspaper the policies of which accord with his own opinions—against this the chances are as infinity to one unless his own opinions are those of Babbitt. The prudent course, measured by worldly standards, is for him to accept at the outset the fact that he accepts employment—as a lawyer accepts a retainer—to defend not his own views but those of his employers, however repugnant the latter may be to him. But more. On issues not pertinent to his client's case the lawyer usually may speak or write as he will. The editor of a Republican paper who should make speeches for a Democratic candidate, or even serve inconspicuously on a campaign committee of that pernicious party, would speedily find his editorial chair untenable. There have been exceptions. I recall that at one time a New York paper was supporting Van Wyck for Mayor, but its chief editorial writer was given a leave of absence to conduct the opposition campaign of Henry George. But that occurred under the ownership of Hearst, of whom anything out of the ordinary may be expected.

As has been pointed out, a Darrow, viewed askance by one class of clients, is at liberty to find and serve others. The newspaper man in such case is in much the position a lawyer would be in if he were disbarred. The great workshops of presses, types, telegraphs, circulation systems, and other features of the organization that go to make up a newspaper are closed to him. He may write, but how can he publish? More important, he may write, but how can he sell his stuff and thereby live?

I who write this am an editor whose period of active service coincides almost exactly with that of Darrow. At one time—and that the crucial moment in his career—our political and social convictions were almost identical. He has grown more radical and could easily afford to; I have grown more conservative—I admit it ruefully to myself—under the persistent economic pressure of journalistic conditions. Among my fellows on the press I am looked upon as one whose lot has been easy, whose career has been influential, whose expressions have been radical, and whose present status is that of success. But when I look back on a life-time of repression I wonder that some American Freud has not turned his attention to the effect of systematic repression of honest thought upon what should be a great, liberal, and influential profession. Surely it is not only the suppressed libido that distorts and tortures the maturer years of man.

In the Driftway

THE season has come when the new college graduate goes forth and brandishes his diploma in search of a job. The Drifter is particularly interested in the case of a young friend who went to a city editor for reporting work. The editor was far from encouraging. He said: "You young college graduates think you have something to sell when you get out of college. You haven't. All you have is a darn good background that you can cash in on later."

* * * * *

NOW the Drifter thinks there is a great future in backgrounds. He himself believes that he has not cashed in on his own to the limit. For instance, he remembers having seen a picture in a magazine, advertising some comprehensive book of wisdom. A number of admiring men and women in evening clothes cluster around one earnest hero who has mastered the advertised book. The caption reads: "Listen to him! He is quoting Shelley now!" The Drifter, too, can quote Shelley when he is in the mood for cashing in. But the catch word in the caption is the word "now." The Drifter cannot quote in a hurry. He remembers a dinner where the conversation turned on burial urns, and he did not get launched on his favorite passage from the "Hydriotaphia" until the talk had wandered to immigration. However, perhaps it was just as well, as he found that he had forgotten the passage anyway.

* * * * *

BUT it may be that the Drifter misunderstands the city editor. Perhaps the man meant by "background" something more elusive than the ability to quote Shelley; even more elusive than the ability to quote Shelley now. Perhaps a very much younger friend of the Drifter's cashed in on her background when she misquoted those lines of Joyce Kilmer's:

> Poems are made by fools like me,
> But only God can make a tree.

On the young lady's lips the lines became:

> Poems are made by fools like me,
> But God can only make a tree.

* * * * *

AS a rule the Drifter discounts the boasting prophecies of our captains of industry. Mostly they are mere self-advertising or a lot of fiddle-faddle. But the words of the president of the Remington Arms Company the other day upon buying a slot-machine plant deserves more than passing notice. It was not improbable, he said, that a time would come when stores would be operated without a single clerk. The Remington company purposes to capitalize that possibility by making devices for the mechanical merchandising of various products. To the Drifter it looks like a good bet even if the company doesn't look forward precisely to beating its rifles into slot machines. Mechanical merchandising is now limited chiefly to the sale of chewing gum, bits of chocolate, and mouthfuls of peanuts at one cent. But why should it be? If small articles can be sold from slot machines at one cent, why not larger packages for a nickel, ten cents, and a quarter? At present slot machines are confined largely to railway stations and other quasi-public places, but there is no reason why they should not be introduced into stores. Automatic restaurants are considerably more complicated; yet they are apparently successful. The Drifter thinks the time is near when he will do much of his shopping in stores where there will be no employees unless possibly a money changer—establishments so dignified that chewing gum will be considered beneath exploitation except between the jaws of the aforesaid maker of change. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Sex Literature Continued

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I want to take a hand in this game because my friend McFee has lost his bearings. He is off his course.

Says he: "The fashionable craze for highly seasoned sex stories will pass and we shall have something else." My contention is that it is no craze, and men (women too) always have had a taste for what I want to call the erotic pâté de foie gras. And this taste has run side by side with the honest roast beef of adventure and romance and rascality literature. Only, by an illusion, the erotic stuff seems to be with us now as a new thing because it is advertised on the menu, whereas formerly every man with an appetite knew that it might be had and a wink sufficed to bring it to him.

True that Jane Austen and Dickens and Hawthorne and Thackeray did, in greater or less degree, ignore the more tumultuous passions in their books, but meanwhile there was a very lively call for Zola and Dumas Jr., and Paul de Kock in translations, to say nothing of the underground stuff. So there were two streams. The stream of rascal literature also flowed in lively manner, as witness Lytton with his seducers and coiners and highwaymen and murderers of the Eugene Aram type. Or what of Ainsworth with his high-spirited and splendid scoundrels? True, the rascal literature has nothing to do with the case, but I adduce it by way of showing that as popular taste is today, so it always was, and always shall be, world without end.

Coming down to more recent times, to a day when men read Ouida and Miss Braddon and Edward Bellamy and Howells and Henry James, none of whom produced very much of a thrill, we had Grant Allen who fluttered the dove-cotes somewhat, and still our Zola and de Maupassant. But there were other things for those tired of a prosaic world—the free-love propagandist sheet called the Word, the prosecution of a man named Moses Harmon, the very scandalous details of such trials as the Oscar Wilde case, the Dilke divorce suit, the Parnell-O'Shea affair, Stead's "Maiden Tribute of Modern Babylon," the neo-Malthusians, and much more for the perverted imagination.

Or reach back. Sir Thomas Browne and Isaac Walton, so full of temperate refinement and charm of workmanship, did not crowd Aphra Behn off the literary stage. John Wilmot, second Earl of Rochester, also flourished in or about the same time.

Turn the whole thing another way so that you see the rough and tumble coarseness of Beaumont, and Massinger and Ford, and Fletcher, and the rest of the dramatic staggerers. "The coarseness of the Elizabethans" is how the professors of literature in little colleges apologize for all that robustiousness. But they and many others quite overlook the fact that at the same time there were Surrey and Wyatt and Spenser, and many others, whose sonnets and songs were full of chivalric gallantry and highminded felicity.

Finale: man's a creature of many tastes and at certain periods of life certain tastes predominate. His appetites have always made demands, and with the demand supply has come. The whole question under discussion is wrapped up in that. It is not a capricious public, but a many-minded, many-sided public that buys books. If the demand for erotic literature exceeds the demand for better stuff, it is because the number of readers who are of an age to enjoy the highly seasoned outnumber those who have ceased to be interested in that kind of thing. But the persistence of the sex novel is no new phenomenon. Neither is it symptomatic of an age of degenerate sons of worthier sires. CHARLES J. FINGER

Gayeta Lodge, near Fayetteville, Arkansas, July 23

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Most distinctions of masculine and feminine are irritatingly meaningless, and Mr. McFee's assertions that "the point of view of the modern 'important' novel like 'Ulysses' is feminine in its preoccupation with the nastiness of sex" is no exception. Even if it is true (and I can't see it) that "literature is becoming emasculated by being written mainly for women and largely by women," this truth does not apply to the sort of novel under discussion. The very sophisticated or decadent novels are being written mainly by men, and are written for a comparatively small group of "advanced" people, both male and female.

To an admirer of Mr. McFee's novels, one who has read them with great pleasure, and quite frankly gave up "Ulysses" in despair, this is a little too much. I had thought of Mr. McFee merely as a person, but I see that he is one of those He-men after all.

Wouldn't it be just too lovely if we could forget all this feminine this and masculine that, and find a couple of other terms when we want to point out a difference!

New York, July 20 MYRA MARINI

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I was very glad to see the letter of William McFee in your issue of July 20. It seemed to me a perfectly justified rebuke.

It has been disappointing to one of your well-wishers to find vulgar matter in your columns and advertisements from time to time. And to have you resent criticism of the stupid coarseness of recent novels is not worthy of the high purpose of The Nation.

Old Bennington, Vermont, July 19 MARY R. SANFORD

Another View of War Guilt

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In connection with Heinrich Kanner's letter, "Another View of War Guilt," in your issue of July 27, mentioning further documentary material on this question and calling attention to the corpus delicti— "the secret military convention signed between Germany and Austria-Hungary in 1909"— some of your readers may be interested in the further discussion of the subject by Dr. Kanner and Professor Fay in the American Historical Review (January 1927, pp. 317 ff; July, pp. 942 ff).

Boston, Massachusetts, July 23 HISTORICUS

"God's Trombones"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have just been able to see The Nation for June 29 containing my review of James Weldon Johnson's "God's Trombones." Since I am advised that my review was run before the corrected proof reached your offices, I should like a note of errors and omission brought to your readers' attention. "Jamine" should be "jasmine" and "climacteric" should be "climactic." A brief paragraph should be inserted between the two present paragraphs to do Mr. Johnson justice: "The nativity of the poems has not been revealed by the external and borrowed device of dialect presented through typography. The diction is more structural, it is rhythmic. And rhythm, according to William Carlos Williams, is the poem. Again, this is an evidence of complete fusion."

Jamison, Pennsylvania, July 17 HARRY ALAN POTAMKIN

Books

Aesthete

By HARRY ALAN POTAMKIN

He is poised a deft abstraction
On slender blades of grass,
His toes are a nimble dancer's
Holding the body's mass.

Yet he may touch his fingers
On the most transient wind,
Touch as intangible a murmur
As may disturb the mind.

And, though logic will debar him,
He can transform his curse
Into a lens whose power
Can glare the universe.

Adulterations and Quackeries

Your Money's Worth A Study in the Waste of the Consumer's Dollar. By Stuart Chase and F. J. Schlink. The Macmillan Company. $2.

BIG BUSINESS is organized. Have you heard of the American Shovel Institute? The plebeian National Kraut Packers' Association? And the mellifluous Minced Razor Clam Packers? These are not fictional names. You will find them all in "Your Money's Worth," which tells a little of the life, work, ideals, and cooperative efforts of men bound together by a common understanding created by shovels, clams, or kraut. But, above all, do you know that pink salmon is sometimes white salmon artificially colored pink; that the discovered frauds on short measures of gasoline in Illinois in one year totaled 600,000; that 2½ cents worth of wheat at wholesale expands into puffed wheat selling for 68 cents retail; that the Society of Automotive Engineers have found a lubricator at 20 cents a gallon as good as that we buy for $1.35? My overcoats last about four years; in this book I learn of navy overcoats, built according to specifications, costing $75, and lasting ten years. If you ever buy a door-hinge remember that there is one made with a life of fifty years beyond the same-priced competitive article.

The evidence is irritating. I find that my office like many others pays $3.20 a gallon for material for mimeograph stencils and that the government standard tests describe an equally good material for five cents a gallon. Such exasperating evidence continues to pile up. I just threw away an old file—and then read in this book that second-hand files resharpened are 40 per cent better than new ones. To top it all, there is a special bit of information for the President of the United States—fish are color-blind!—and the colored flies displayed in sporting-goods stores every spring are sheer bunk.

No wonder the engineers feel the public right and left. This thrilling volume of popular modern economics has no difficulty in proving the extent and ease of consumer deception. But the frauds are carried on not only by fly-by-night vendors and stores selling to transients. Here we read of the American Druggists Syndicate, Amory Browne and Company, the Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company, the Royal Baking Powder Company, and other leaders in their lines, all accused by government agencies of unfair competition arising out of deception in descriptions of merchandise.

Does "Worsted" contain any wool? Is "99 44/100 per cent pure" a guaranty or a slogan? How much cotton is on a spool? The tale of these frauds, even omitting the well-known medical quackeries, is exciting reading. You feel meek when you finish each chapter. "What Letters We All Are!" "Your Money's Worth" establishes beyond much possibility of contradiction the fact that [illegible] for testing quality, utility, or in many cases even quantity of what it buys. Adulterations, misrepresentations, quackeries, and [illegible] are the result.

[illegible] public will [illegible] exists in [illegible] more standards in certain things or the end that there may be less standards in general [illegible] effectively the case for more and better public standards; but I doubt if they have proved all of this last proposition.

We read that the government has actually over 11,000 detailed specifications for the articles it purchases, that the Federal Bureau of Standards saves the government no less than $100,000,000 a year. The General Motors Company does not buy trade names, we read, but only goods made up to their own specifications, tests, standards. Private laboratories are testing on a great scale for private companies. One State—that of North Dakota—is singled out for praise. It does not keep secret, as does, regrettably, the Bureau of Standards in Washington, the results of its work. The consumer can—and does—become informed through its service.

The authors feel that a long time must pass before the information as to ingredients and uses of articles, even of necessities, can be placed in the hands of consumers. Impartial laboratories may help; mail-order houses may in time be driven to the use of complete and honest descriptions in place of vague catch-alls; consumers may even be organized to protect the expenditure of their incomes. But as a member of the bar I have one qualm: I doubt if the authors realize the laggard state of the law. The courts for ages upheld the principle of caveat emptor, "let the buyer beware," as a decent principle of decent trading. Today this is considered disgraceful. The next development was evidenced in the passage of the Pure Food and Drug Act—"What you tell about an article for sale must be truthful." But even this act applies only to the bottle or package on sale. The advertisement can still be fraudulent and be safe from prosecution under the act. The period on which we are entering and for which the authors contend, is the one in which, if you describe part of the ingredients or characteristics of an article, you must tell all. This last stage of full disclosure is being delayed by nearly all merchants and opposed by nearly all judges and lawyers.

Messrs. Chase and Schlink have written a very enjoyable book, gathered an accumulation of winning evidence, and no doubt stirred up national thought so that even the courts—the last resort of musty thinking—may in time be influenced to protect consumers from false representations and to force sellers to sell by standards and truth rather than by trade names and slogans.

MORRIS L. ERNST

An African Pioneer

Trader Horn, Being the Life and Works of Alfred Aloysius Horn. Edited by Ethelreda Lewis, with a foreword by John Galsworthy. Simon and Schuster. $4.00.

IN Maine, in remote island villages where American maritime supremacy lingers undimmed in memory, one still finds old and gnarled men with the sea spirit and look, essentially like Trader Horn in Africa. Struggle with the elements and wandering in quest of world trade have marked these men with a wisdom and philosophy born of first-hand experience, sifted out of surface adventure. It is as if physical courage that faced and overcame naked danger fostered and nurtured in them the courage necessary to an untrammeled, straight-thinking mind.

"The Traders were the imperial breed," says Horn of the old Africa gone forever, and agreement is almost imperative. In jumbled, incoherent, rambling bits he recreates the rubber, ivory, and ebony trail through once unknown territory. Baboons, leopards, elephants, their haunts and hunts, are more vivid than the oft-told tales of contemporary big game hunters, but they are just so much filling for the book. So is the drawn-out love theme of the eerie Goddess Nina.

The value and beauty of the book lie in the innumerable true flashes of native lore, custom, and history, as in the tragic, meager portion about the Gold Coast slave trade; in the love and knowledge of nature, as in the pages devoted to the wondrous herb cures of the medicine men; and in the philosophy of Trader Horn himself.

For the latter especial credit is due Ethelreda Lewis, the unobtrusive editor of Trader Horn's reminiscences, for she has given us the man intact, his quaint personal flavor untouched. There is a rhythm and classical turn to his language, gently, haltingly paced, like a garrulous old man painfully digging down into an old store of memories. Some of it is tedious repetition, as an old man would repeat himself. All of it is simple and natural, and free of the slightest taint of literary self-consciousness.

Trader Horn is unique in that after half a century of trading in Africa he has not succumbed to a worship of White Man's Africa, as kings and lesser slaves of commerce have, but still holds to him his first unprejudiced respect for Black Africa.

"Africa, ma'am, as nature moulded it. And believe me, when man has destroyed nature, then it is his turn to go. Sure. The barren world will swallow him up. 'Tis a lucky thing the cannibal tribes have kept the elephants safe so long from these so-called big-game hunters. An equatorial gang of cut-throats, wasting wild life to make what they call a bag. While the cannibals are there, there'll be no lack of elephants. They never kill wanton. Only to eat. They'd never be so childish as these dukes and colonels who have to count the head they kill same as we counted our marbles in Lancashire. The cannibal lives as nature taught him—kill only to eat, keep your women moral, hold no man as slave, be content with your side o' the river, and cast no eyes across the river."

Trader Horn is an invaluable contribution not only to Africana, but to the field of illuminating biography.

REBECCA HOURWICH

A Journalist Looks Backward

Covering Washington. By J. Frederick Essary. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

MR. ESSARY, the veteran correspondent in Washington of the Baltimore Sun, has given a misleading title to his eminently readable if discursive volume. It is really a book of personal recollections, coupled with many interesting historical facts. But it lacks form and a clear-cut conception of what the author intended to achieve. So we have all thrown together delightful anecdotes of public men; considerable information as to the way news is collected and relayed to the daily press; a compact history of the Supreme Court; a long and vigorous defense of President Wilson's attendance at the Peace Conference; an account of the author's long journeys with several Presidents; a chapter on the relation of the press to Congress, and then, in conclusion, a chapter devoted to the Gridiron Club, that amusing but exclusive newspaper club which excludes Jewish correspondents, limits itself to fifty members in a corps of more than five hundred, and devotes itself to elaborate dinner entertainments of public men.

To those in or out of the newspaper profession who are not familiar with life in Washington this volume will unquestionably be serviceable. But it is impossible to withhold a regret that so honest, able, and experienced a Washington correspondent as Mr. Essary should not have paid some attention to the vital problems involved in the Washington news situation. The relations of the press to our government are becoming yearly of greater and greater importance; we have seen there since the war a cowardly abasement of the press to authority and authority steadily seeking to control the press,—Mr. Coolidge, for example, through his fictitious "official spokesman" and his demand that all "loyal and patriotic" American newspapers shall support him in his foreign policies at all times—a preposterous and an utterly un-American position. No lay reader of Mr. Essary's book could guess that the Washington correspondent faces the gravest kind of problems of vital importance to every citizen. Plainly he did not intend to touch upon controversial matters, though he does make some valid criticisms of Congress. The more's the pity, for somebody must and he is well equipped in knowledge and experience to do so. Meanwhile it is only possible to repeat that the book is thoroughly entertaining, often instructive, and a worthwhile first reader in some of the things that go on in the nation's capital and capitol.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Marat the Radical

Jean Paul Marat, a Study in Radicalism. By Louis R. Gottschalk. Greenberg, Publisher. $3.

PASSIONS have so long clouded the study of Marat that it becomes a pleasant duty to record the exception to the rule in this suggestive work by Professor Gottschalk. In a short preface he states the goal of his endeavors—to treat Marat "without insistence upon abnormalities," "nullo discrimine and without undue emphasis" upon either his weak or his strong points. He suggests that success will have crowned his labors "if the reader finds, upon perusal of the following pages, that he cannot decide whether to admire or despise Marat." Now, prefaces have their use, especially for the reviewer. But I must confess that I found myself, long before I came to the last page, lost in intense admiration of Marat. Since the author never swerves from his scholarly objectivity, the fault must lie with Marat.

Suspicious by nature of everybody who disagreed with him, reserving honesty for his exclusive person, Marat was racked on the eve of the revolution by a mad resentment of his rivals, whose jealousy, he stoutly affirmed, had shut all doors to his scientific advancement. From his persecution complex he never recovers. He discovers Montesquieu, is raised to ecstatic heights by the natural-rights doctrines of Rousseau, and throws himself passionately into the revolutionary turmoil to retrieve his ebbing glory and to succor the people whom henceforth he will protect against their oppressors. The moderate bourgeois leaders plunge him into despair; he sees in them the agents of the counter-revolution. Not only in them, in Mirabeau also, in Barnave, in the King, in the Girondins. The accomplishments of the national assemblies are not revolutionary enough for him, the revolution is lost, the people are betrayed. He raves; tongue in cheek, he cries for the blood of a million traitors. He is condemned to prison, dives underground to escape, flees to England, returns with fresh hope, like a Bedouin chieftain organizes "razzias," and sighs for new suspects to convert to his revolutionary fervor. His mania grows upon him, and he cultivates his violent gestures and speech, his uncouth attire, his threats and his prophecies; for the people are not slow to appreciate his honest fury and he himself does not scruple over the choice of his weapons. At last, Reason be praised, the Girondins are crushed; and Marat breathes more easily in his tub, where, like an itching Diogenes, he sits now night and day. After Charlotte Cor-day's dagger, his apotheosis. The lowly, whom in his furious way he had loved and mistrusted, mourn for him and keep his memory green for two years.

Professor Gottschalk's conception of Marat is fresh and arresting, and it is heartily welcome, despite its awkward phraseology, after the wearisome distortions of former biographers. One regrets that he has chosen to stagger under the traditional restrictions of erudite writing and carry his learning into every passage. One feels that he has made out a strong case for a distinction which apparently does not occur to him—that Marat was fundamentally at odds with them in his convictions and singularly unconcerned with the major premises of their democratic doctrine; that he was tending toward an ill-defined philosophical anarchism, precisely because the suspicious nature and the restless, popular sympathies of the Friend of the People made him distrust and fear every organization of the political means of seeking liberty and the pursuit of happiness. Hence his frantic palliatives of a dictatorship, a committee of government, a supreme administrative court, and a network of fraternal societies. Hence the mysterious solace that his gospel brings in each new generation to radicals of every hue.

LEO GERSHOY

The Great Illusion

The Public Mind. Its Disorders: Its Exploitation. By Norman Angell. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

THE first part of this book is a selection from Mr. Angell's well-filled notebook of historical instances of the gross misuse of ideas. For our purposes they can be dated by reference to the World War and atrocities, the Venezuelan trouble under President Cleveland and Anglophobia, the Boer War, and the Crimean War. In retrospect they certainly are grotesque, and Mr. Angell points at them vigorously as examples of what not to do with ideas. The second part calls attention to stereotypes of more recent popularity: order, security, and revolution. Mexico and China are unfortunately omitted, probably because the book went to press before they were headlined; the idea is the same. The last part poses the old problem of democracy in the new dilemma of dictatorship or decay. Good intentions alone will not solve this. We must apply intelligence: research intelligence through fact-finding organizations, critical intelligence through logic. Education must be aimed in this direction, and then we shall know how to use political ideas.

This has been stated and criticized many times before. I should like to propose another development and function for political ideas, one suggested by the influence of Godwin's famous book, "Political Justice." It immediately inspired two great poets, Wordsworth and Shelley, to write good poetry. Some years later Gladstone, Disraeli, and Asquith read the poetry, and, having imagination, governed well. Of course there may be no connection—but, on the other hand, there may be. It may be that the butcher, the baker, the barber, and the Babbitt, who, according to Mr. Angell, are our present rulers in their spare time, would profit as Prime Ministers and Presidents have done on occasion from a non-moral love of unverified political ideas.

This suggests that there is another dimension of political ideas in the direction of imagination and speculation. In short, political ideas have an intellectual function in understanding and appreciation, and the ordinary member of society may have more use for ideas in seeing things straight than in setting them straight. Mr. Angell is thinking in this direction when he insists on intelligence, but he might go farther. If he did, the first thing he would have to do is to question the validity of his assumptions about the function of the Public Mind and the efficiencies of ideas. It might turn out that the Public Mind is itself the Great Illusion which he has been fighting almost for so many years. Discounting this, he might write a better book than this one.

SCOTT BUCHANAN

In the Time of Aurangzeb

Travels in India. By Jean-Baptiste Tavernier, Baron of Aubonne. Translated by V. Ball. Second edition, edited by W. Crooke. Oxford University Press. Two volumes. $6.

DURING the time of the Moguls, a number of Frenchmen traveled through India, visited the princes, observed acutely, and on their return home published their observations. Of these, the best known are the physician Bernier and the jeweler Tavernier (dates probably 1605-1689), whose achievements won him the rank of "baron." Bernier, the better educated and more philosophical, has given us the more important account, Tavernier the more gossipy. Both are classics, and the Oxford Press was justified in reissuing the first a few years ago and the second now.

Tavernier was a man of little learning; it has even been questioned that he could write; but Dr. Ball's opinion is that he could and did, some of the observations having been composed shortly after the events they describe. But the memoirs as a whole were unwillingly arranged and edited by the contemporary historian and dramatist Chappuzeau at the command of the King, and to his own "'mortification if not martyrdom' for the space of a year, while exposed to the rough humor of Tavernier and the ridicule of his wife." This Tavernier was a man of considerable courage yet prudence. He would stand by his price for his jewels with the Indian potentates; he defied the Dutch in Batavia when they endeavored to take advantage of him. With a fine taste in wine, he always had it, even in the wildest spots when his followers in fear deserted him, and he used it to good result with petty princes and officers.

But the book is more than the revelation of an interesting personality; it is also a compendium of observations in India from about 1640 to 1667. Tavernier writes of commercial products and methods, social manners, political intrigue, the quarrels of individuals and of states, the rivalry between the European trade agencies. The high point is reached in November, 1665, when he was at the court of Aurangzeb and by command of the Emperor was allowed to see the royal jewels, including the celebrated Koh-i-Nur, which he weighed, sketched, and appraised. This jewel forms the subject of an interesting essay by Dr. Ball, who endeavors to trace its checkered history in India, Persia, and Afghanistan from that time until 1849, when, on the annexation of the Punjab, "the diamond was formally handed to the new Board of Governors at one of its earliest meetings—and it was then personally intrusted by his colleagues to the care of John Lawrence, afterward Lord Lawrence, who, on receiving it, placed the small tin box containing it in his waistcoat pocket, and then forgot all about it till he was called upon to produce it six weeks later, in order that it might be sent to Her Majesty the Queen." The jewel is smaller now than it was in Aurangzeb's day, and Dr. Ball discusses this fact minutely.

W. NORMAN BROWN

Pragmatic Politics

The Science and Method of Politics. By G. E. G. Catlin. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

CONTEMPORARY history, says Professor Catlin, of the kind found in blue-books and technical investigations, and such earlier history as is pertinent to present-day problems, are the data of social science. Economics deals with the problems resulting from the relationship between men and things and from human relations arising therefrom. Political science deals with the problems of human relations resulting from the mastery of wills over, or collaboration with, other wills. The field of politics is concerned with the relationship of mastery and submission. Economics deals with the desire for wealth; political science, with the desire for power. Economics for the purpose of study has created the abstraction of the "economic man"; political science can likewise create the abstraction of the "political man." Just as economics has in the past century by abstraction, classification, and deduction become a science able to predict social phenomena, so by the same methods can political science become a science. As a pure science, political science is not concerned with purpose. The realm of ends belongs to ethics. In its method and moral neutrality political science is like engineering.

It is obvious that Professor Catlin's book is a treatise on the theory of method. It is, in intention, a novum organum of political science. The basic ideas are, as the author realizes, not novel. The idea that political science deals with the quest for power has been indicated by Machiavelli, Hobbes, and Spinoza, while the proposal for the application of the scientific method to politics is indeed a present-day commonplace. Yet the proposal of the desire for power as the basis of scientific politics, the comprehensive manner with which this suggestion is elaborated, and the acute comparison between the methods of politics and those of economics make Professor Catlin's book a stimulating work.

However, a recognition of the basic merits of the book does not involve an agreement with the views offered. Indeed, in certain respects, Professor Catlin's views are questionable.

Again Professor Catlin's thesis is particularly inadequate because he fails to appreciate the role of purpose in social activity. The investigator in physics may be expected to be less decidedly biased than the student of economics and political science, "Nihil humani nobis alienum." Hence only on simple, matter-of-fact, and relatively technical questions may the judgment of the expert be objective. Thus, for example, Professor Catlin is not correct when he considers the classical economics as the model of objective science, for its conclusions, as Hobson and Veblen pointed out, assumed the unscientific notion that they are in accord with a beneficent ordre naturel. A host of writers from Hall, Gray, Thompson, and Hodgkin to Sidney Webb and R. H. Tawney have refused to accept them, for they questioned their presuppositions—private ownership of the means of production, profit-making as the motive, and competition and autocracy as the method. In fact, the classical economics was not objective science, but, in the ultimate, an apology for a class. To take more concrete instances, the findings of experts as to why voters do not vote will be more objective than their findings as to the methods of making voters vote intelligently. Investigation of the means of safeguarding dangerous machinery will be more subject to objective analysis than an examination of copartnership as a solution of industrial discontent, for the very existence of copartnership between owners and workers may be in itself an issue. On the more complex question we get not science but pragmatism, not idle curiosity but a conflict of purposes.

LEWIS ROCKOW

The Biography of a Character

The Life, Character, and Influence of Desiderius Erasmus of Rotterdam. By Joseph Mangan. The Macmillan Company. Two volumes. $10.

"A GREAT scholar but a weak character"—such has been the traditional judgment of Erasmus by both Catholic and Protestant historians, from Peter Canisius down to relatively modern times. Such, too, is the verdict of his latest biographer, expressed with an uncompromising force hitherto almost unequaled. It is certainly not a new interpretation of this character, nor have Dr. Mangan's researches brought to light any new points that will be of interest to the Erasmian scholar.

Erasmus's fate at the hands of a biased posterity has been as hard as undeserved. He was neither Protestant nor, in the stricter sense, Catholic, though leaving himself open to the charge of supporting and betraying both sides. In an age of religious partisans he strove for a reasonable Christianity, a position which few contemporary or later writers could understand. He was inspired by the pathetic faith in human reason characteristic of an age of awakening knowledge, and he hoped for reform by the peaceful agency of enlightenment. The reform he sought was to be undogmatic, at once spiritual and ethical—and, above all, reasonable. The first step in such a reform, he believed, must be the revival of the wisdom of the ancient world, both pagan and Christian. With this in mind, he dedicated his life to the restoration and careful study of the classical and scriptural texts and the works of those fathers, especially Jerome, whose comments on the New Testament were most valuable. At the same time, he directed the full force of his sane and piercing satire against those abuses in church and state that obstructed the practical growth of spiritual reform. In so doing, he undoubtedly prepared the way for the Lutheran Reformation. Moreover, he gave encouragement to the early stages of that vigorous friar's protests against manifest abuses and did everything in his power to protect him from their mutual enemies. Soon, however, he perceived that Luther was as dogmatic as his opponents. He realized that the reformer's action was breaking up the unity of the Christian church, which he regarded as essential to the fulfilment of his own plans. By diplomatic appeals to the leaders of both sides he strove to bring about a reconciliation that would restore the status quo, but the current of passion was too strong for him to stem. He remained within the Catholic church because, with all its faults, it was still the nearest approach to his ideal of a universal church.

Dr. Mangan has missed completely this predominating purpose in the life and thought of Erasmus. Lacking the key to the great humanist's program, he has returned to the traditional interpretation. This interpretation is understandable enough. Erasmus attacked first the Catholic church, then Luther. He encouraged Luther, then deserted him. The obvious answer to the problem raised by this course of action is weakness of character and moral cowardice and Dr. Mangan's whole book is a persistent effort to show these traits in his subject.

Dr. Mangan's work would possess more validity were it not for his almost total lack of historical perspective, his very evident bias, and his neglect of the more modern scholarly work on the subject, the use of which would have saved him from error in more than one instance.

W. K. FERGUSON

Books in Brief

The Dictionary of Canadian Biography. Compiled by W. Stewart Wallace. Toronto: The Macmillan Company of Canada. $12.50.

Mr. Wallace's book is in brief form on the lines of the "Dictionary of National Biography." It does not include living persons. The notices are necessarily short, but they have the valuable feature of reference to detailed sources of information. Canadian biography carries us back to France as well as to England to Richelieu and Montcalm as well as to Charles I and Wolfe. This work is indispensable for anyone interested in Canada.

Dialogues. By Denis Diderot. Translated by Francis Birrell. Brentano's. $4.

This first handsomely printed volume of the Broadway Library of Eighteenth-Century French Literature promises well for the series. Sir Edmund Gosse contributes a general introduction and Francis Birrell, the translator, a particular one to the life and works of Diderot. To select from the eighteen volumes of Diderot's writings 196 pages to give to the general reader "some idea of Diderot's attitude toward life" really presents less difficulty than may be imagined. For his writings have about as much philosophical variety as a syllogism. If you like D'Alembert's "Dream" you will also relish "On Woman." The "Supplement to the Voyage of Bougainville," "Regrets for an Old Dressing-Gown," and "Conversations of a Philosopher With the Maréchale de ——" complete this volume. D'Alembert's "Dream" holds most interest to the student of eighteenth-century thought; the four other selections will appeal strongly to the lover of good writing. Mr. Birrell has amply redeemed his primary purpose in making these translations, viz., "to give pleasure," for he has indeed carried over into them the intimacy and the frankness as well as the wit and the robustness of the originals.

The Civil War and Readjustment in Kentucky. By Ellis Merton Coulter. The University of North Carolina Press. $3.60.

Professor Coulter has contrived to give to his book an interest and readableness rare in historical monographs. For the former quality he has, of course, mainly the subject itself to thank. Kentucky had a unique experience in the decade of unrest that began with 1861. It had embraced without reservation the doctrine of State rights, sincerely believing that the right of independent judgment which it claimed for a State could be exercised without impinging upon the sovereign rights of the Union. In conformity with its faith, it refused Lincoln's first call for troops, but its position between the North and the South bound it economically to both, and for a time it essayed the impossible role of a neutral. Neither side, however, respected its neutrality, and after a brief period of struggle the State passed under Union control. How thin a veneer its unionism really was appeared in the vote of the State for McClellan in 1864, in the failure of the draft, and in the rejection of the Thirteenth Amendment abolishing slavery. Thereafter, the process of readjustment was a dismal story of federal incompetence and irritation, and of the effort of the people to recover control of their political life. Professor Coulter's narrative, needless to say, is thoroughly documented, and there are some valuable maps.

The Magic of Herbs: A Modern Book of Secrets. By Mrs. C. F. Leyel. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

The Four Greater Cold Seeds of the seventeenth century were cucumbers, gourds, melons, and cittals; and the Four Lesser Cold Seeds were endive, succory, purslane, and lettuce—which would seem to indicate that if our great-grandparents had never heard of vitamins A and B, they knew almost as much of the virtue of green vegetables as we. We may have done well to neglect frogs and to give up the flesh of vipers (which Mme de Sevigné thought so healthful), but we have lost by passing from herbs to coal-oil cosmetics, and the belles of Venice were as particular in their perfume as any modern aesthete. Perhaps they needed them more. At any rate, Mrs. Leyel has garnered from Rome, Greece, China, Arabia, France, and old England a set of old recipes for cough cures, perfumes, poisons, cordials, opiates, embalming fluids, and love philters to fascinate any experimental mind.

Eight Bells. Sailors' Snug Harbor Yarns and Ballads. By Frank Waters. D. Appleton and Company. $2.

This is the kind of yarns that old salts like to tell and do tell when half a dozen of them get together on a cold night in a well-warmed room, make the air murky with the breath from their corncob pipes, and begin to reminisce. Such stories are usually of the amusing and more or less true exploits of some shipmate, embellished with the art of a raconteur sufficiently skilled in dialect and intonation to give them verisimilitude. Generally they cannot be transferred to the formal and impersonal printed page without serious loss to the flavor of the cargo. In this case the fact that the author's narrative has been printed apparently with all the original slips in grammar and eccentricities in capitalization seems to assist in preserving the illusion. At least the volume is an authentic contribution to a kind of sea lore which there will soon be no more shellbacks to pass on.

The Evolution of Charles Darwin. By George A. Dorsey. Doubleday, Page and Company. $2.

A sympathetic and highly laudatory life. The title chosen by Dr. Dorsey is a catchy one, but unfortunately means nothing. He has only recorded the obvious biographical facts. The most interesting features of Darwin's life remain for a future historian. What role did his father play in his life? What was the neurosis which made him a valetudinarian for forty years? Surely, a gigantic genius such as Darwin would repay the efforts of the interpretative biographer.

The Tired Child. By Max Seham and Grete Seham. J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.

Fatigue is of necessity not a lively subject. But a book dealing with the tired child and the evils of chronic weariness should be valuable. Unfortunately the authors, dyed-in-the-wool academicians, thorough, painstaking, and possessed of subject matter that is a genuine contribution to child psychology, hold forth in their best class-room manner.

Terry's Guide to Cuba. By T. Philip Terry. Houghton Mifflin Company. $10.

Now that Havana has become the winter capital of anti-Volsteadiana, we want to know how to get there, where to live there, what to see there, and—some day, maybe—how to get away from there. It's all in this little red book, got up exactly like a Baedeker and containing as much information as "Ask Me Another."

THEATER

Little Theatre
14th Street West of Broadway
Evgs. 8:40. Mats. Tues. and Thurs. at popular prices.

THE GRAND STREET FOLLIES

"One cannot find anywhere in New York more clever ideas, more fresh satire or more verve."—Joseph Wood Krutch in The Nation.

GILBERT MILLER Presents
ETHEL BARRYMORE
in The Constant Wife
By W. SOMERSET MAUGHAM
LAST WEEK
AT MAXINE ELLIOTT'S THEATRE
Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:30.

ANNOUNCEMENT

NEXT WEEK
Trying to Be Modern
By a Small-town Woman

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation.

Real Estate Ads

—If you have a house or property to sell or lease, try The Nation classified advertising section.

—If the experience of other advertisers of real estate is a guide, your advertisement in The Nation will pay.

Write for rates to Dept. R., The Nation.

IT'S THE YOUNGER CROWD THAT SETS THE STANDARD!

GO to the younger crowd if you want the right word on what to wear or drive or smoke. And notice, please, that the particular cigarette they call their own today is one that you've known very well for a very long time.

FATIMA

What a whale of a difference just a few cents make!

FRENCH SCHOOL

Château-Neuvic School

A Church School for American Boys preparing for American Colleges.
Wholesome country life organized on a business basis. American standards of hygiene and diet. Yearly tuition $1,250. Rich sports program, including crew.
The Rt. Rev. Charles H. Brent, Bishop of American Churches in Europe, Chairman of Board of Trustees.
Address: Dr. Conrad Chapman, Head Master,
Château-Neuvic, Neuvic-sur-Isle, Dordogne, France

Let advertisers know you saw it in THE NATION

MISCELLANEOUS

REAL HARRIS HOMESPUNS Direct from the Makers at Manufacturer's Price
Suit Lengths Cut to Order. Price $2.20 per Yard. Postage Paid
NEWALL, 150 Stornoway, Scotland. Write for patterns stating shades desired

MT. AIRY COMMUNITY

When you are tired of subways, skyscrapers, Babbitts and machine made civilization generally, come and look at MT. AIRY (Croton-on-Hudson). It is a beautiful place and conveniently located. A fine social life can be created there. One thing to remember, however, is that the people are liberals, radicals, artists and thinking people. Do you belong?
Enquire Harry Kelly, 70 Fifth Ave., Tel. Chelsea 6452

BOOKS

THE EVOLUTION OF MAN, by Wilhelm Boelsche

A clear, strong, simple summary not only of Darwin's theory but of the work of a generation of scientists since the time Darwin opened up. Just what a busy man wants to give him a bird's-eye view of Evolution. Cloth, illustrated, 60 cents by mail. Catalog free.

Charles H. Kerr & Co., 347 East Ohio St., Chicago, Ill.

International Relations Section

Price-Fixing in Queensland

By MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

WHATEVER overwhelming disaster they may hold in store for the people of the United States, public ownership and price-fixing have been more than ordinarily successful in bringing prosperity, equality, and general happiness to the people of the State of Queensland, Australia. Never before has individual prosperity, as opposed to class prosperity, been so widespread; never before have wages been so high; never before have wages so far outdistanced the cost of living; never before have the people of this Australian State participated to such a great extent in the affairs of their government.

It was just twelve years ago that Queensland, after many years of conservative, if not reactionary, rule by the Nationalist (Tory) Party, turned to the left by accepting a Labor Government with its untested schemes for State ownership and control of public utilities and essential industries and its program of price- and wage-fixing. The Labor people frankly admitted that their platform was based almost wholly on theoretical principles. The Tories, on the other hand, were almost frantic in predicting that dire calamity would befall Queensland if it accepted Labor rule, that the wheels of industry would cease to revolve, that grass would grow over the streets, and that Queensland would become a deserted State. Yet Queensland chose Labor, and so successful has that party's program been that Labor has been retained in power ever since, while people's ownership and price-fixing have emerged from the experimental stage and now appear to be permanently established.

These more or less socialistic principles, according to John C. Valentine, member of the Queensland Parliament, who recently came to the United States on an industrial-survey mission, have been productive of none of the disaster and calamity so gloomily pictured by the Tories. Indeed, quite to the contrary, they have increased bank assets, bank deposits, bank investments, dairying production, agricultural production, the output of industry, total wealth, individual income and population; they have given Queensland an increasingly favorable trade balance; they have created an unprecedented building boom; they have reduced unemployment as well as the number of bankruptcies.

Profiteering, exploitation of the people for the benefit of a limited class, as well as combinations in restraint of trade, have been the principal targets of the Labor Government, Mr. Valentine has stated. Wherever these have been found the State has stepped in, either by setting up competing organizations within the industries or by taking over the industries themselves. Following this program the State now operates railways, the water system, the educational system, governmental fire, accident, life and workers' compensation insurance, produce agencies, cattle and sheep stations, coal mines, sawmills, canneries, railroad-station refreshment rooms, sugar-mills, a hotel in the sugar-producing district, fisheries and retail fish markets, butcher shops, wireless broadcasting stations, and is engaged in numerous other, though minor, activities. The State also operates a Public Curator's Office, where citizens may receive free legal advice, have their wills and similar papers of importance drawn up, have their estates managed, and be provided with counsel when charged with criminal offences.

Under this program the total annual wealth in the State increased from £38,342,000 in 1914 to £66,945,000 in 1924, the last year for which authentic figures are available, or more than 75 per cent. In the same period general bank deposits climbed 70 per cent and savings bank deposits almost 90 per cent. Savings bank deposits for the last ten years of Tory rule totaled £68,916,000 and for the first ten years of Labor rule £179,802,000. At the same time the number of savings-bank depositors grew from 229,000 in 1914 to 397,000 in 1925, so that now virtually half of Queensland's 880,000 of population have savings accounts.

The value of the principal crops jumped more than 250 per cent, being £5,679,000 in 1914 and £13,992,000 in 1924. Dairy products doubled in value and the income of the wool-growers increased two and a half times. At the same time the capital value of farm lands increased from £44,482,000 to £51,858,000. Other industries were by no means slighted in the distribution of this prosperity. Their output was measured at £25,491,000 twelve years ago and at £38,867,000 in 1924. The value of the capital invested in machinery, buildings and land and the salaries and wages paid showed a proportionate gain, while the value of the output per employee jumped from £589 to £865. Meanwhile unemployment in all classes of industry fell off from 17.7 per cent of the available labor in 1914 to 6.55 per cent in 1925. These latter figures appear even more remarkable when it is noted that there is a constant stream of unemployed workers pouring into Queensland from neighboring and less favored States.

But the brightest spot in the entire situation is the improvement in the condition of the workers. A living wage is virtually guaranteed under the Industrial Arbitration Act, which is administered in conjunction with the office of the Price-Fixing Commissioner. First, the Price-Fixing Commissioner, being empowered to examine into all costs of production, sets the maximum prices at which all foods, some staples, and some articles of clothing may be sold in various sections of the State. Very stiff penalties attend violations of his rulings. With this data at hand, the administrators of the Industrial Arbitration Act are able to determine the monetary requirements of the workers and fix wages accordingly. Not only has unemployment been cut down in Queensland, but under this system wages for men have been increased in the last twelve years from 53 shillings to 99, and wages for women from 27 to 52.* The hours of labor have also been reduced under this law so that now the men average 43.88 hours weekly and the female workers 44 hours. But more important, perhaps, has been the elimination or reduction of lost time through the peaceful settlement of labor disputes under the Industrial Arbitration Act. In Queensland, for example, only 485,171 working days were lost in the six years from 1920 to 1925 as opposed to 1,225,262 days in Victoria and 3,858,433 in New South Wales.

The working people have benefited in other ways under the Labor Government. In the last ten years of rule by the Tories only £4,652,000 was expended on public-school education, while in the first decade under Labor rule the schools received £11,784,000. The number of scholarships in the higher institutions available for the children of the workers has been increased from 1,488 in 1914 to 13,611 today. The State also provides free textbooks and £4 annually for the incidental expenses of each school-child whose family has an average income. These families likewise may purchase State-built homes by paying a 5 per cent deposit on the building cost. They are allowed twenty-five years to pay off the balance. Moreover, the State retail shops have enabled the ordinary people to buy fish, meats, and produce at reduced prices, it being estimated that the State butcheries alone have saved the people £3,500,000 in the last ten years.

* In all the figures here given it is to be recalled that during the period under review [illegible] and prices increased greatly throughout the world.—Editor, The Nation.

The Labor leaders, Davey Bowman, T. J. Ryan, E. J. Theodore, and now Premier McCormick, have toiled long and hard to keep their party free from corruption so that it may continue to devote itself to the best interests of the people who have put and are keeping it in power. All Labor Party candidates are carefully investigated, not only as to their party fealty, but also as to their personal character and technical fitness for office, and those found wanting are barred. The Labor leaders likewise have sought political reforms which would preserve for the people the right to control their government, the most prominent reform in this direction being the abolition of the upper house of parliament, which they consider a vestige of the days when the existence of a ruling class was recognized. Now that equality has been established only one legislative body is needed.

Contributors to This Issue

G. E. R. GEDYE is a correspondent of The Nation in Central Europe, whose contributions on political topics frequently appear in our columns.

J. G. SAYRE is a student of contemporary political and industrial affairs.

JOHN GOULD FLETCHER is an American poet now living in England. He is the author of "The Tree of Life," "Parables," and a just-published volume entitled "Branches of Adam."

HARRY ALAN POTAMKIN is a poet and literary critic.

MORRIS L. ERNST is a member of the firm of Greenbaum, Wolff, and Ernst, New York attorneys.

REBECCA HOURWICH has lived in Africa.

LEO GERSHOY has been engaged in historical research at Cornell University.

W. NORMAN BROWN is in the Department of Sanskrit at the University of Pennsylvania.

LEWIS ROCKOW is the author of "Contemporary Political Thought in England."

W. K. FERGUSON is in the Department of History at Cornell University.

Reality—
but with a halo

MORNINGS IN MEXICO
By D. H. Lawrence
Mexico and Mr. Lawrence are a subject and an author created for each other. These eight informal pictures of life in Mexico are as contrasted and as entertaining as the promise in two of their titles: "Dance of the Sprouting Corn" and "A Little Moonshine with Lemon."
$2.50

ORIENTAL ENCOUNTERS
By Marmaduke Pickthall
The thrills and the humors of everyday life in Arabia, reported by an Englishman who lived among the Arabs as one of them. He is remembered by many readers as the distinguished author of Saïd the Fisherman. In the future he will also be remembered as the author of Oriental Encounters.
$3.50

The SEARCH FOR ATLANTIS
By Edwin Björkman
What had Nausicaa, of the Odyssey, to do with Atlantis? Mr. Björkman has constructed a new and ingenious theory of the lost continent—a subject eternally romantic to the imaginations of men.
$2.00

MEMOIRS of
CATHERINE The GREAT
Translated by Katharine Anthony
Author of "CATHERINE THE GREAT"
The self-told, long suppressed story of Catherine the Great's girlhood and unconsummated marriage, "in which all that goes under the name of romance would seem to be found," according to The Boston Evening Transcript.
Illustrated. $5.00

BALZAC
By René Benjamin
"The story of a passionate, prodigious life. . . . The picture drawn by M. Benjamin is admirably balanced."
—The New York Times.
Illustrated. $5.00

STRUGGLES AND TRIUMPHS; OR, THE LIFE OF
P. T. BARNUM
Written By Himself
Edited, with an Introduction,
by GEORGE S. BRYAN ("G. S. B.")
"Mr. Bryan's Barnum in two elephantine volumes has engrossed more of our time than we could well afford during the last couple of weeks. The editor has done a first-rate job in synthesizing the various Barnum gospels." So wrote Keith Preston (Cleveland Daily News) in one of the last articles to come from his pen.
Two volumes boxed, $10.00

Alfred A. Knopf
Publisher New York

In Canada from The Macmillan Company of Canada Ltd
BORZOI BOOKS
St. Martin's House,
Bond Street
Toronto, Ontario

All for One

An Advertisement of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company

A SLEET storm descends, carrying down trees and wires. A wind turns outlaw and blows down a pole line. Or some swollen river rampages through a circuit of destruction.

But wherever angry nature attacks the Bell Telephone System there are repairmen trained to meet the emergency, and everywhere trained in the same schools to the use of the same efficient tools. Supplies of surplus equipment and materials are kept at strategic points whence they may be rushed by train or truck to the devastated area.

Throughout the Bell System, all construction and practice are standard, so that men and supplies, when necessary, may be sent from one state or company to another.

There are twenty-five Bell Companies, but only one Bell System—and but one Bell aim and ideal; stated by President Walter S. Gifford as:

"A telephone service for this nation, so far as humanly possible free from imperfections, errors and delays, and enabling anyone anywhere at any time to pick up a telephone and talk to anyone else anywhere else in this country, clearly, quickly and at a reasonable cost."

TWO PAMPHLETS ON THE SACCO-VANZETTI CASE
By Dr. MICHAEL A. COHN,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

SOME QUESTIONS AND AN APPEAL
Thirty-two questions capable of refutation on the trial of Sacco and Vanzetti, [illegible] an appeal for their immediate release.
Price Ten Cents

TWO WORLDS
An address [illegible] delivered before Judge Webster Thayer by Bartolomeo Vanzetti; the sentence of death [illegible] upon him and Sacco.
Price Fifty Cents
Send orders to

INDEPENDENT SACCO-VANZETTI COMMITTEE
[illegible] Canal Street, New York City

Do you want to make extra money?

Address Dept. 11

THE NATION

20 Vesey St. New York

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

OPEN SHELF

GOOD CHEER, COMRADES! Want to buy, sell, or swap books, [illegible] pictures, [illegible] Russian [illegible] N. Y. C. Books [illegible]

BOOKS [illegible] sent post [illegible] from [illegible]
ISRAEL SOLTZ
1244 Clay Avenue New York City

EDUCATIONAL

SELECT A SUBURB WHICH HAS A PROGRESSIVE SCHOOL

Brookside School
224 Orange Road
Montclair, N. J.

Nursery group to eighth grade for boys and girls. Cooperative organization. Hot luncheons. School bus.

Write for Booklet
MISS ANNA J. GANNETT, Director

SPECIALTY SHOP

MY Summer Sale has started. Everything Russian [illegible] MARITZA, 11 Christopher [illegible]

HOUSE FOR SALE

WHITE MOUNTAINS, [illegible] two acres, [illegible] Mt. Adams and Madison. Climbing and tramping center. Fine views. Large living room with fireplace and dining alcove, five bedrooms, [illegible] baths, screened breakfast porch and two other porches, large workrooms with five windows, small cellar, ice and tool house. $7,500. Photographs and plans on request. [illegible] New Hampshire.

APARTMENTS FOR RENT

51 ST STREET, EAST—Completely furnished, antique, [illegible] 7 rooms, 3 baths, [illegible] Only year. [illegible] Box 841, % The Nation.

ROOMS TO RENT

ARTISTS and thinkers can find a congenial home [illegible] Modern conveniences. Commuting distance. Fireplaces, tennis court. Marvelous view. Huge veranda. Use of house. Only [illegible] Box 840, % The Nation.

APARTMENTS WANTED—Unfurnished

COUPLE [illegible] rooms, semi-city or four-[illegible] Preferably on Manhattan. [illegible] Will take [illegible] Give rates in [illegible] Box 842, % The Nation.

DOGS FOR SALE

THE SAMOYED DOG Retains businessman's [illegible] Nansen, [illegible] Loyal, happy, affectionate. Fine specimens. Booklet. Laika Kennels, [illegible]

POSITIONS WANTED

PH.D. and graduate fellow in philosophy, ousted from professorship because of pacifism, seeks [illegible] or permanent position. Consult Box 837, The Nation, for further [illegible] and executive [illegible]

YOUNG WOMAN desires position of interest and [illegible] Pleasant [illegible] and bookroom. [illegible] Box 848, % The Nation.

ART STUDENT wants 3 hours' work daily, in [illegible] Out door work preferred. Box 852, % The Nation.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXV NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 17, 1927 No. 3241

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 145

EDITORIALS:

Justice Underfoot 146

Is Coolidge Coming or Going? 148

Leonard Wood 149

Caterpillars on the State 149

AGRICULTURE IN THE NATION'S ECONOMY. By Charles A. Beard 150

THE SEMINOLE OIL FIELD. By Cora Miley 151

TRYING TO BE MODERN. By Edith Clark 153

THE MEXICAN "JUST WON'T WORK." By Eva A. Frank 155

THE ACTRESS. By Panteleimon Romanov 157

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 159

CORRESPONDENCE 159

BOOKS:

A Legend. By Floyd McKnight 161

England Arraigns Herself. By Harry Elmer Barnes 161

A Tract for Free Trade. By Oswald Garrison Villard 163

Capek's Divine Comedy. By Alter Brody 164

Books in Brief 164

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

The Press in Haiti 166

A Voice From a Haitian Jail 168

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor Literary Editor

FREDA KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

IN THE ENTIRE SACCO-VANZETTI case there is surely no more outrageous happening than that the final motion should have had to be made to Judge Webster Thayer. With other judges available, with the Lowell committee's criticism of his indiscretion on record, how can the rest of the world be persuaded that there is other than a foul conspiracy against justice? Over the plea of the defendants' counsel, who urged that another magistrate have the opportunity to examine the latest motion for a new trial, it was Judge Thayer who, like an avenging Nemesis, ruled on the motion, and denied it. If this had been intended as a cruel witticism, a dreadful and bloody jest, it might have some point. But it was doubtless the result of an honest man's conviction, which somehow makes it more dreadful and more meaningless. Government has taken up arms against Sacco and Vanzetti. Thus we are not surprised that a meeting on Boston Common on Sunday, August 7, was broken up by police because "speakers assailed the courts of the Commonwealth and criticized the testimony of State witnesses at the trial of the two radicals." Lese majeste has become a crime in America. And one of the last pages of this pitiful story of two Italian workingmen was written when the Holland-America Line refused to permit Luigia Vanzetti, sister of the condemned man, to take ship for America on the melancholy errand of seeing her brother once before he died. Her passport was in good order, and approved by the American consul, she had purchased a return ticket and thus was not in danger of becoming a burden to the steamship company in case of deportation. Nevertheless she was not allowed to go on board ship. It seems an inoffensive enough reason for coming to America. But government is up in arms; and its arms are long and far-reaching.

WHEN WE SPEAK ELSEWHERE about our disappointment at Governor Fuller's inability to rise above class and political prejudice, we had in mind, among other things, his point of view when he was in Congress. He was a Representative from Massachusetts on November 19, 1919, when the issue before the House was the expulsion of Congressman Victor L. Berger of Wisconsin. In a speech filling thirteen pages of the Congressional Record, Governor Fuller called for "the execution of the whole Red scum and brood of anarchists, Bolsheviks, I. W. W.'s, and revolutionaries." He also showed his feelings in these words:

> The expulsion of Berger may be the crucifixion which he characterized it, but it is the same sort of crucifixion which sent Debs and big Bill Haywood behind the bars, which suppressed Berkman and Emma Goldman and which has brought the hand of the law down upon a host of Reds who have plotted the destruction of the Government of the United States in the hope of substituting the rule of anarchy.

What a cruel irony of fate that the same Fuller should have become the final arbiter in this case that has stirred the entire world!

IT IS REFRESHING on public occasions, when the usual polite platitudes are being passed back and forth by the speakers of the day, to have somebody get up and say something. Thus Vice-President Dawes, at the opening of the International Peace Bridge connecting the United States and Canada, was the only speaker at the celebration who spoke frankly of what must have been in the minds of everyone present, the failure of the Geneva disarmament conference due to the disagreement between the United States and Great Britain. The peace bridge is a fitting memorial to a century of amicable relations between two great nations; yet a hundred years of peace, and an unguarded frontier between this country and Canada but point the way to what our relations should be with England. War with that country, we are told, is "unthinkable," and so certainly it should be. But we have plenty of evidence that a number of persons on both sides of the ocean spend all their time and energy thinking about it and many are planning for it. The quibble over cruisers is all the proof necessary that this is the case. Two countries with an honest desire to disarm and a determination never to go to war with each other do not spend their time worrying over how many and how big are to be the battleships of either. Vice-President Dawes said or implied as much in his speech. But Secretary Kellogg and the Prince of Wales and even Governor Smith contented themselves with the usual empty courtesies.

THE SUBJUGATION OF HAITI goes on from month to month with the busy public of the United States ignorant of or indifferent to the injustices and brutalities of an occupation which is not only illegal in itself but has got nowhere in the direction of reconciling the natives to it. In our International Relations Section this week we print a translation of a powerful address before the International Congress Against Colonial Oppression and Imperialism in Brussels, in which are detailed some of the outrages against freedom of the press in Haiti. We also publish a letter received by The Nation from the penitentiary in Port-au-Prince, signed by seven editors and two others under detention. Although arrested on June 24, two of the prisoners had not yet been arraigned when the letter was written a month later. Neither American nor Haitian law seem to have any standing with our new conquistadores. They are in Haiti to make it safe for American investment and exploitation—and law and justice do not in the least matter.

THE IDYLLIC CONDITIONS that now prevail in the management of our railroads as contrasted with the evils which many think would attend government ownership are constantly being held up before our admiring gaze. Only once in a while are we allowed to see that there is another side to the picture. Just now it is the Interstate Commerce Commission itself which has lifted the lid. It has castigated the management of the Erie Railroad for violations of the Clayton Anti-Trust Act and for the actions of the president's son, Russell S. Underwood, who as president of several companies, had lucrative contracts with the Erie and other railroads which resulted in their being asked to pay excessive prices for services rendered. The commission, speaking through Commissioner McManamy, declares:

> We cannot disregard transactions such as these which, made under the circumstances and conditions herein described, are not only in conflict with "honest, efficient, and economical management and reasonable expenditures for maintenance," but are repugnant to sound business methods and in some cases at least repugnant to good conscience.

Under Section 10 of the Clayton Act a common carrier is forbidden to have contracts beyond $50,000 with another corporation when the carrier has among its officers anyone identified with the railroad. R. S. Underwood became associated with the Hudson Shipbuilding and Repair Company as superintendent, although wholly without practical experience; he later became a director of the Chicago and Erie Railroad, a subsidiary of the Erie. The commission finds itself unable to estimate the exact amount of which the Erie was mulcted by the three subsidiaries with which R. S. Underwood was connected. It emphatically voices its regret, however, that the statute of limitations has run and that therefore no criminal proceeding can be brought against those responsible. In view of the fact that the Erie Railroad finds it so hard to get along, it would seem as if it were time for the stockholders to do a little investigating and acting on their own account.

THE BITUMINOUS COAL STRIKE is again brought to public attention by the reports of rioting in Ohio and Pennsylvania, the burning of tipples, and the wounding of guards and strikers. The determination of certain operators to break the four-months' strike and force the miners to accept the wholly inadequate 1917 wage scale, if pressed, will probably result in martial law in important sections. From the viewpoint of the 200,000 miners on "vacation" since April 1, the whole situation is very discouraging, for no signs of any permanent settlement are in sight. Their predicament, as everyone recognizes, is the result of the laissez-faire over-production in the bituminous coal mines. This enables the miners to produce 700,000,000 or more tons while the nation requires only approximately 500,000,000. The miner pays by unemployment through strikes or lack of work. Actually, since 1920, the average soft-coal miner has worked only about 167 days per year. Furthermore, the necessity of his being subject to call has prevented him from finding employment elsewhere. Confronted with the same facts in 1914, the Illinois Coal Operators' Association and the Indiana Bituminous Coal Operators' Association reported to the President: "Only the nation can reverse this tendency and provide against it." And similarly, the same disorganization was revealed by the recent Hammond Commission whose report and suggested remedies the present Administration entirely ignored. The coal situation remains like that of the farmers, and of the flood refugees, one of those problems about which the Government refuses to do anything except investigate—and then raise the tariff on iron, steel, aluminum, and other favored products. Meanwhile, we learn, 90,000 miners and their hungry families in Illinois will shortly have to be fed and supported by the public.

FEE SNATCHING IN TEXAS is not at all the mean trade that one might suspect it to be. Quite the contrary, it has the complete sanction of the Texas judicial system. In fact, it is the Texas judicial system. Justice in that noble frontier State is administered on a clever piece-work basis, whereby every officer who is even remotely connected with the preparation of papers or the trying of a case in a justice or country court gets a "fee" if the defendant is found guilty and fined for some alleged violation of the law. Therefore, two convictions plus two convictions make four fees, while two convictions plus two acquittals make only two fees. Does the reader grasp the concept? The law-enforcing officers of Texas do too. Consequently, it is charged in Texas that a steady stream of ignorant Negroes and poor whites are corralled and forced to plead "guilty" to charges often manufactured in order to afford fat fees for the men of the courts. A fair and impartial trial under such circumstances—where all interested officers are financially concerned in the outcome of the case—is rendered highly improbable. But nevertheless the process is quite simple, say Texan officials; and "cheap" add the voting citizens, who have just defeated five to one a State amendment which would have abolished this fee system and placed all officers on a salary basis. So we can imagine a certain poet speaking (with a few of our own interpretations) thus:

> Judge "Hal." Where shall we take a fee tomorrow, Jack?
>
> Attorney Falstaff. Zounds! where thou will, lad, I'll make one, an' I do not, call me a villain.
>
> Judge "Hal." I see a good amendment of life in thee; from praying to purse-taking.
>
> Attorney Falstaff. Why, Hal, 'tis my vocation, Hal; 'tis no sin for a man to labor in his vocation.

ENGLAND'S REACTIONARY MARCH continues, slowly and quietly now, but nevertheless steadily. The grotesque proposal for the permanent supremacy of the Tory

House of Lords, which it was assumed had been dropped by the Government some time ago (and was so reported in The Nation), according to the latest news, is not at all dead. It is indeed very much on both legs. Lord Salisbury states that the Government may allow a few concessions, if they are "as moderate as possible." The fundamentals of the bill, however, must not be changed; the uniform-wearing Tories, if the Government has its say, will be saddled upon the Empire for good. The reactionary drift continued when the Alien (restriction) Bill passed its third reading. An attempt was made to amend this in order to permit those aliens to enter who were seeking admittance solely to avoid persecution or punishment on religious grounds, but this failed. Then, to make reaction's triumph complete, the impossible Trade Unions Bill passed its third reading. The bitter feeling that these measures have engendered is ominous. They are so extreme that even many Conservatives are fearful of the opposition that will result with their enforcement.

THE TIDE OF PROTESTS against international tariffs rises steadily. Following the Geneva Economic Conference the Fourth Congress of the International Chamber of Commerce was in large degree concerned with the removal of the tariff barriers that hem the business of the world. Many leading bankers are similarly on record and still nothing concrete happens. There is no organized movement to lower tariffs in this country, although it is admitted that this is essential to payment of the debts due us by foreign nations and that the high tariffs are correctly believed by the farmers to be a stumbling-block to the solution of their troubles. Individuals upon whom the high tariff aura has rested are beginning to speak out. Thus, no less a person than Will Hays has forsaken the movies for a moment to inveigh against tariffs. The dailies see in his remarks a lance-thrust for free trade. We do not, for we notice that he was tilting chiefly at "exaggerated tariff barriers," but he did say correctly that "there are too many national trade barriers to be overcome without infliction of other hindrances by laws which upset and throttle fair competition." It is astounding how many American business men begin to see this and how few dare to speak out like Mr. Hays.

THE SUPREME IMPORTANCE of home training in the moral education of the youth of this country was again strikingly illustrated when Carroll Hepburn, the twenty-three-year-old son of the superintendent of the Virginia Anti-Saloon League, wrecked an automobile and was forthwith arrested upon the double charge of transporting whisky and driving a car while intoxicated. If we were inclined to muck-rake we should hint darkly our suspicion of a conspiracy on the part of the father to further the profession of the son, but the truth is that we are much more inclined to guess, first, that the elder Hepburn is entirely sincere; second, that he has lectured his son upon the evils of rum ever since the latter left the cradle; and, third, that he was just as surprised to learn of the charges brought as the village minister usually is when he discovers one of his offspring in some mischief wholly unbefitting a Sunday-school scholar. A goodly proportion of the world's drunkards come from families that never permitted brandy in the Christmas mince pie, and many an ardent temperance worker had the town sot for a father. So instead of attempting any conclusions concerning the efficacy of education we shall add a picturesque detail to the Hepburn saga: The car which the young man was using for the transportation of contraband was the property of the Virginia Anti-Saloon League.

FOR THE FIRST TIME in its history the United States Line has earned an operating profit. Without writing off anything for the depreciation of its vessels it made a profit of $371,000 in the fiscal year 1926-27, a gain of $1,285,000 as compared with the previous twelve months. The growing popularity of these government-owned ships with American travelers because of the good service furnished is mainly responsible for this improved showing. But while the Shipping Board's passenger services are almost self-sustaining, its freighters are still being run at a loss. According to the latest figures, these losses averaged $1.48 per ton of cargo carried and $9,000 on each completed voyage. Three years ago the operating losses were nearly $27,000 per voyage. Higher ocean freight rates and more fully laden ships account for this favorable turn in operating results. As the shipping situation is slowly improving—there were fewer than 4,000,000 tons of idle ships at the beginning of this year as contrasted with 11,000,000 tons at the same time in 1922—the Shipping Board's active-vessel fleet of 350 ships may before long cease to be a drain on the public treasury. But owing to the Merchant Fleet Corporation's policy of keeping down freight rates by putting additional ships in service whenever tonnage is in demand, it is not likely that our government-owned merchant marine will ever show any worthwhile profits or earn much toward the cost of replacement.

THE CAUSE OF THE WAR was Europe's lack of religion. Shakespeare laid down his wand at forty-six because, being without religion, he had no more to say. So says Bernard Shaw to George Sylvester Viereck in an interview featured by the current issue of Liberty. It would be interesting to know what the popular audience here reached by Mr. Shaw understands him to mean by religion. He cannot mean Fundamentalism, because he takes a crack at "that impressive intellectual vacuum, the late Mr. Bryan." And he cannot mean science in any casual sense, because he declares with disgust that the twentieth century "does not know science from patent-medicine advertisements." He does mean, however, Creative Evolution. And we wonder what Liberty's millions will make of that. The preface to "Back to Methuselah," says Mr. Shaw, is his magnum opus; there the reader will find a gospel which is both religion and science—and any religion must have science in it, he adds, if it is to survive today. Mr. Shaw, of course, is to be envied for having found a faith which even his great intelligence cannot destroy within himself. We who are less passionate, and for that matter less intelligent, shall probably not fare so well. But we shall not be as badly off as Mr. Shaw would have been had he not found his faith. Religions are discovered by heroic men whose unhappiness over the ways of mankind would drive them mad if they had no theory by which to confound them. The rest of us accept what we call the inevitable, and pay for this by remaining—as perhaps Mr. Shaw would say—among the insignificant.

Justice Underfoot

ONE of the most momentous decisions in the history of American jurisprudence has been rendered—and Sacco and Vanzetti are condemned to death. Around the earth the news has winged its way as fast as light and wherever the tidings have reached millions of workers now believe that justice does not exist in America, that two innocent men are going to their doom in order that a social system may be upheld, a tottering social order may triumph. As we write no one can foretell the consequences of Governor Fuller's astounding decision, but from remote quarters there already comes the news of protest meetings, of protest strikes, of the windows of the American Consulate in Buenos Aires smashed, of a sense of horror-struck outrage in one country after another. Talk about the solidarity of the human race! When has there been a more striking example of the solidarity of great masses of people than this? Ten years ago people were reading of thirty thousand, forty thousand, fifty thousand men done to death in a single day in the war that statesmen, with horrible sacrilege, had falsely dedicated to democracy and to civilization. Those useless massacres nowhere stirred the neutral world as has the fate of these two Italian workers, who have dared to say that they were anarchists, but innocent of the murder with which they are charged. Wherever the American flag flies in foreign lands today, it has to be guarded; it appears the symbol of a monstrous wrong. Men may yet die by the dozen because of Governor Fuller's decision. Rightly or wrongly, we repeat, uncountable multitudes today believe that in America justice is dead.

For ourselves, we are shaken to the core. We had not believed such a decision possible. We do not retract one word from our praise of the industry Governor Fuller has shown, his painstaking examination of the topography of the scene of the crime, of witnesses and jurors, judge and prisoners. We recognize again his honesty of purpose; we acquit him of any charge of political maneuvering; we admit the superficial ability of his opinion. Yet we cannot for one instant accept this verdict in the face of facts known to us for years as they have been known to multitudes of others. It seems to us that he has missed all the important points in the case and that his decision reveals his complete inability to rise above the point of view of his surroundings, his class, and the setting in which great wealth has placed him. Nor are we convinced by the facile report of the Governor's committee of three eminent and conventional gentlemen, two chosen from the highest Boston social circles, all of one type of mind and not one of them representing the vast groups that have felt from the first that they had a vital stake in the fate of these men. After a brief investigation, partaking of the nature of a star-chamber in hearing Judge Thayer and his attorney without attendance of the defense's counsel, they have upheld the court.

As for Governor Fuller's judgment of the case, it no more closes it than the hanging of John Brown ended the Harper's Ferry raid and condemned him to execration and oblivion. More than half the people of this country refused to consider John Brown a traitor or a murderer, though his guilt was unquestionable and was openly confessed, whereas the masses believe Sacco and Vanzetti legally innocent and entitled to have their innocence determined by law and not by prejudice. The people saw behind John Brown issues of far-reaching moment that soon thereafter tore this country apart and for four long years drenched it in blood. They knew at once that the questions at stake were not settled on that Charlestown scaffold and could not be; that the lives and liberties of millions were involved, and the issue was whether or not the South should be ruled by a despotic economic oligarchy, whether poor whites and blacks alike should be masters of their bodies as well as their souls. Rightly or wrongly, the case of Sacco and Vanzetti has become identified with efforts to reconstruct the social order, just as the Dreyfus case came to mean infinitely more important things for France and the world than the fate of one Jewish major.

Absurd and unjustified, this interpretation of the Sacco-Vanzetti case seems to all conservatives. But it is there, and not Massachusetts alone, but the whole of the United States will have it to reckon with. Governor Fuller's opinion will never upset this belief. For the fact, the great and unanswerable fact, stands out that here is an instance of a headlong collision of certain viewpoints which are and must be hopelessly antagonistic. The liberals and the workers who are championing the cause of these men may also have their blind eyes. The truth remains that the question of the guilt of these men has been subordinated to the clash of these two vital currents of human thought, and the world at large knows that Sacco and Vanzetti have been judged and will have been executed by the representatives of one of these viewpoints alone. And still another fact, a great and unanswerable fact, stands out that in its essence the guilt or innocence of these men has been passed upon by only one judge; that what is forbidden in New York and is impossible in other States of the Union has come to pass in Massachusetts: the evidence—not the technical legal procedure—has been ruled upon only by the trial judge, he who, if a tithe of the charges against him by reputable witnesses is true, ought to be impeached and disgraced—even the Lowell committee admits what it kindly calls his "indiscretion."

Is it any wonder that M. Herriot, who has repeatedly, as Prime Minister of France and as the present Minister of Education, given proof of his friendship for America, has cried out in protest, against not only this final act of barbarity but what has gone on before. "To the depths of my soul," he declares, "I am against this punishment that has lasted seven years. I am sorry to be unable to make my voice heard, but I belong to the Government and my words might pledge the whole cabinet. Personally, I never varied my opinion. Sacco and Vanzetti ought to be released. They have earned such a measure of clemency." This is what affects the European opinion more than Americans can possibly realize—that these men have been in jeopardy of their lives for seven long years. We are informed on high authority that a group of the foremost London jurists, after devoting an entire evening to a discussion of the Sacco and Vanzetti trial, was unanimously of the opinion that they ought to be freed now, whether guilty or innocent, since even the crime of murder does not merit the cruel and unusual punishment of keeping men in such torture for seven years. Governor Fuller smugly condemns the defense for the delay—would he be as quick to denounce Messrs. Sinclair and Doheny and Fall and Daugherty for dragging out their trials for five years?—but the hideous circumstance is there. It is impossible in any other civilized country for men to be tortured as have been these. The London Times itself features bitter criticism of verdict and procedure. Even the New York Times is compelled to write thus:

> Yet it remains true that thousands of good citizens, while submitting to this grievously delayed working of the machinery of justice, will feel that there is something shocking in an execution so long after trial. We speak not of the "perverted zeal of clamorous agitators," though that will now doubtless flame afresh. Far more serious is the hurt to humane feeling and the doubt which will persist in candid minds whether the ends of justice could not better have been attained in some other way.

A just and pious wish! But, the world over, it is a demand by an outraged humanity. Even if Governor Fuller felt that he must uphold the decision, could not justice have been tempered with mercy? Yield to foreign or American threats of course he could not. But the hands of millions have been outstretched to him for pardon or commutation of sentence. A great executive would justly have taken note of that, would have strengthened justice by recognizing an unparalleled demand for clemency; might even have weighed the cost to his country of making martyrs of these men; could have upheld the majesty of the law far, far better by exercising forbearance than by a brutal insistence upon an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, a life for a life.

As for Governor Fuller's opinion, he sweeps away the testimony as to the bias of Judge Thayer by affirming that the judge had a right to be biased after the testimony was in, whereas the affidavits of reputable men and women affirm that that bias was evident from the earliest stages of the trial. We pass over aghast his tribute to the "clear-eyed" and "courageous" witnesses—some of whom are of doubtful reputation, contradicted themselves, and testified to the impossible. Nor would we stress today the old question of the identifications or the fact that the deadly bullet was never proved to have been from Sacco's revolver; nor dwell upon the Governor's describing in one hundred words the Bridgewater hold-up which had nothing to do with the question of a fair trial in the Braintree case. As for the latter, the Governor is quite satisfied that Judge Thayer was right in denying all the seven motions for a new trial. He is not willing that the men should be given the benefit of a doubt, nor will he appeal to the legislature to start the machinery for a new trial in a different atmosphere under a different judge. Would that have rocked the foundations of Massachusetts justice? It might have inflamed the Back Bay clubs, but it would have meant joy and satisfaction wherever newspapers appear.

And not merely to radicals. It is not the radicals alone who fought for Sacco and Vanzetti. Noble souls have given years of their lives and their money to this cause who are neither Reds nor foreign-born Americans; nor have they belonged to those holding the anarchist views of the condemned. If there are finer types of our citizenship, or men and women of older American lineage, we should like to have them pointed out to us. They, too, have read every word of the testimony; they have examined the new witnesses; they, too, have studied the motions for a new trial and perused Judge Thayer's denials of them; they have read the affidavits against the judge and they are as good lawyers as the Governor himself. They are as eager as he for the good repute of Massachusetts and its courts, yet they are unconvinced. To them an incredible tragedy is being finished before their eyes; a judicial murder is being committed. Does not the passionate belief of these unselfish supporters of the right merit consideration, if not assent?

As for Sacco and Vanzetti, sometimes we have asked ourselves whether it was not intended that they should die, and whether it is not best for the cause of human progress that they should perish. In his wonderful address to the court—made to Judge Thayer, who did not once dare to look at the prisoners as he condemned them to the chair—Vanzetti voiced this in amazing exaltation of spirit:

> If it had not been for these thing, I might have live out my life, talking at street corners to scorning men. I might have die, unmarked, unknown, a failure. Now we are not a failure. This is our career and our triumph. Never in our full life can we hope to do such work for tolerance, for joostice, for man's onderstanding of man, as now we do by an accident. Our words—our lives—our pains—nothing! The taking of our lives—lives of a good shoemaker and a poor fish-peddler—all! That last moment belong to us—that agony is our triumph!

This, we believe, will be the verdict of history. Certain it is that if the precedents of history hold true, monuments are likely to be erected to Sacco and Vanzetti and the names of their prosecutors will fade out of history.

There is one other word from these men that we wish we might record from their lips before they step over into eternity. That is an appeal to all their fellow-workers of the world to refuse to be goaded by their deaths into any violence whatever. If we have any influence at all with those working-men whose cause we have so often sought to champion, we would make it count now if never again. Any violent reprisals can only do the cause of progress infinite harm. The life of every one brought into this case must be sacred. He who strikes at one of them strikes a blow at liberty and progress and justice and hope for a better world comparable to this execution of innocence. Should there be lawless violence, then reaction everywhere will not only retaliate in kind, but will seize upon it as proof of the necessity of maintaining itself by any means whatsoever. That way lie only madness and destruction. It is the American way to accept such a defeat in peace, however bitter the spirit, and then, by time-honored methods, seek to make a recurrence impossible.

As for those Tories who in their clubs and the marts of trade will rejoice that, innocent or guilty, Sacco and Vanzetti are going to their graves, we would delve into the past once more. The orator is Wendell Phillips:

> Men walked Boston streets, when night fell on Bunker's Hill, and pitied Warren, saying, "Foolish man! Thrown away his life! Why didn't he measure his means better?" Now we see him standing colossal on that blood-stained sod, and severing that day the tie which bound Boston to Great Britain. That night George III ceased to rule in New England. History will date Virginia Emancipation from Harper's Ferry. True, the slave is still there. So, when the tempest uproots a pine on your hills, it looks green for months—a year or two. Still, it is timber, not a tree. John Brown has loosened the roots of the slave system; it only breathes—it does not live—hereafter.

Let those who would uphold the present system by force beware lest it look green for a while, yet still prove timber and not a tree. Let them beware lest August 10, 1927, be forever recorded as the day of a great American change.

Is Coolidge Coming or Going?

MOST Americans—including practically all editors—seem to know exactly what Calvin Coolidge meant by his brief announcement of August 2: "I do not choose to run for President in nineteen twenty-eight." We are not so fortunate. We do not think we know what the President meant; we are not even sure that he knows. But it ought to be said at the outset that the statement itself is not cryptic or ambiguous, although to many persons it may sound so. In his "I do not choose" the President is not intentionally resorting to tricky phraseology in order that later—if he wishes to—he can say that his meaning was misunderstood, as did Roosevelt in his famous argument in regard to a third cup of coffee. Mr. Coolidge—who seems to have written his message without any advice or assistance—merely slipped into the vernacular of his native Vermont, where "I do not choose" is equivalent to "I do not want." His message may be translated into the direct and definite declaration: "I do not want to run for President in nineteen twenty-eight."

Thus translated, it is plain enough what Mr. Coolidge says. Yet the question remains, What does he mean? There seem to be at least three possible states of mind. Mr. Coolidge may have decided definitely to lay down the Presidency and to be so determined in that decision that subsequent events cannot shake him; or he may sincerely have concluded to quit and still be so minded that he would reconsider if sufficiently pressed; or he may have made the announcement merely as a political move, with the idea that it would lead to a crystallized demand which would sweep him into office or, failing that, permit him to retire gracefully without having to put up a fight and possibly going down in defeat. Any one of these theories is consistent with Mr. Coolidge's character as we know it, and so makes anything possible in the circumstances. Newspaper comment on the subject is obviously dictated more by partisan strategy than by conviction. Thus pro-Coolidge Republican newspapers insist that the President is expressing only a temporary, personal preference and that he may and must be drafted for the good of the party. Democratic editors, on the other hand, declare that the announcement must be accepted as final, in order to make it as hard as possible for Mr. Coolidge to change his mind and to put them in the best possible position to assail him if he does.

For our part we think that current discussion lays too little stress on the probability that Mr. Coolidge for purely personal reasons wants to quit. He is not in any sense, we must remember, a statesman. Unlike Wilson and Roosevelt, he has no policies in the back of his head which he wants to bring to fruition. There is no evidence that he has any back to his head. He is a small-town politician who in ordinary circumstances would have got no further than the lieutenant-governorship of Massachusetts. The peculiar usefulness to Senator Murray Crane's State machine of a man of Mr. Coolidge's docility and colorlessness advanced him to the governorship, after which the myth that he broke the Boston police strike made him, in a year of hysteria, perfect Vice-Presidential timber and a pure accident later seated him in the White House. Why should he go on? By the spring of 1929 he will have been President for almost six years. He has had all the honor and all the fun there is in the job—if perchance he has found any of the latter at all. There is nothing he wants or knows how to do for the country except keep up the routine of the office to the best of his ability in the interest of himself and his party. With his well-known thrift he has probably saved enough money to retire in modest comfort for the rest of his days, and as a lawyer he has the chance for a seat on the bench of the Supreme Court. Calvin Coolidge is not a fighter. He "does not choose" to enter a struggle for a third term. Even if it were handed to him on a platter it would mean only four more years of work and worry, with a fair chance that some blunder would send him out of office under a cloud. Poor Calvin Coolidge—why should he go on?

On the other hand, if he wants to go on he could hardly have made a cleverer move. He has put the country and his party on the defensive. If they want him sufficiently to break the tradition against a third term they will have to demonstrate it in advance of the election and the Republican convention. "Cautious Cal" is not taking any risks. If the American people will deliver the goods at his door upon approval, he will look them over—and possibly take them. Otherwise he will retire to his farm with enough in the savings bank so that he will never have to wear chaps or put on overalls and pitch hay again. He will be one farmer in the United States who is contented with his lot—with or without the McNary-Haugen bill.

What the feeling of the country is in regard to a third term we have no means yet of telling. Neither do we know what Mr. Coolidge's attitude on that subject is. His brief announcement states merely that he does not wish to run for the Presidency in 1928; it does not give the reasons. If Mr. Coolidge is eliminating himself for patriotic reasons—because he believes that from the standpoint of the country's welfare it is unwise and dangerous that one individual should be President of the United States for as long as three terms—then he is, as we have before suggested, entitled to the greatest credit. If, on the other hand, he wishes to lay down the reins for purely personal reasons, or because he is fearful that if he ran the feeling of the public against a third term would beat him, he is obviously not acting from motives of public service. Only two men so far, Grant and Roosevelt, have sought a third term and both of them failed. Grant was defeated by vote of the Republican National Convention. When Roosevelt found himself balked in the convention he bolted it and organized the Progressive Party with himself at the head. He failed of election, but so split the Republican Party as to beat Taft.

Five Presidents previous to Coolidge have refused a third term. The precedent, set by George Washington, was followed by Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and Jackson. Jefferson believed that there should be a provision in the Constitution against a third term. Of course if Coolidge were to seek to run again his friends would insist that it would not be a third term but only a second, since his first administration was not for a full four years but only for the unexpired period of the Harding regime. This same fact was true in the case of Roosevelt, however, and yet the public at large seemed to take the position that another term for him would, in fact, be a third.

Leonard Wood

WHEN the United States took its plunge into imperialism in Cuba and the Philippines in the years from 1898 to 1901, the defenders of the imperialistic policy were certain that we should at once produce a corps of colonial administrators who would surpass the Milners and Cromers and other great British administrators. So they eagerly acclaimed Leonard Wood when he appeared upon the horizon. Was he not amazingly successful? Had he not brains, ability, and understanding? Did he not win the regard of the Cubans? Was he himself not extraordinarily winning and attractive? Thus his career was rapid. From Governor of Santiago he twice became Governor General of Cuba and later went to the Philippines where he ruled longer than any other American proconsul in those islands, though always in hot water with the natives. In between came two unhappy episodes—his candidacy for the Presidency in 1920 and the refusal of General Pershing—long wrongfully credited to Woodrow Wilson—to allow General Wood to take a command in France. The General's tremendous popular following, especially among Harvard men, protested mightily but in vain. Mr. Wilson and Secretary Baker had given their word to General Pershing that he should choose his own subordinates.

At this hour we have no desire to enter again into the controversies which marked General Wood's rise at every stage of his career—those interested may find them set forth in our issue of May 29, 1920. It is, however, undeniable that here was a blindly ambitious man with the ability to take marked advantage of national and international happenings. He, like Theodore Roosevelt, saw in the Spanish War his opportunity and made the most of it; it is related of them, doubtless apocryphally, that over a camp-fire they divided not merely the United States, but the world. The friendship between the two men was, however, not always unbroken, though at times Roosevelt covered General Wood with praise. When it came to appointing his successor in the White House, Colonel Roosevelt bestowed his mantle upon Mr. Taft rather than his former comrade in arms. Both were doomed to military disappointments when the World War came on. While General Pershing feared the intriguing which invariably marked General Wood's career, Woodrow Wilson himself told the ex-President that the exigencies of modern warfare made it impossible to place at the head of a special division one whose total military service was not much over 100 days.

In the Philippines General Wood worked hard and knew the islands as few knew them. If he brought with him the governmental and business conceptions of the Republican Party, it is undeniable that he loved the islands and had their interests at heart. His last public act was an appeal for the Philippine lepers; sadly he pointed out that half the receipts of the last prize-fight was all that he asked. Undeniably a great administrator, he was not a great educator nor could he win the love of the natives. At the end he was a rather pathetic figure; he had lost hope of further advancement for himself and was deeply disappointed. Harassed by ill-health and family misfortune, he stuck grimly to his job, magnificent in his dogged determination to go on. Death perhaps saved him from a final blow of fate, for it has been clear that President Coolidge was hoping to have some one else take his place.

Caterpillars on the State

A BURST of bitterly ironic laughter arose in the neighborhood of Greenwich Village, was taken up in a number of the less stately mansions scattered across the continent, and finally died despairingly away along the California coast when A. W. Gregg, general counsel for the Internal Revenue Bureau, announced that author's royalties could not be considered "earned income." At the same time Carlyle, Flaubert, and various other writers of the past who had taken their jobs very hard, turned in their graves. Upton Sinclair and Thorstein Veblen were all but reduced to suicide when they learned that they had belonged all along to the class of idle rich, and two of our more successful poets (who had just received checks for $9.76 and $5.43 respectively in payment of the annual royalties on their Collected Works), passed quietly away. But Mr. Gregg is evidently a philosopher and he goes Plato one better. In his eyes not only poets but prose writers as well are mere caterpillars on the commonwealth.

In a formal opinion Mr. Gregg explains that to the legal mind there are authors and authors. Those who write on salary for a newspaper or magazine, or those who sell their product outright to a publisher, earn their money, but those who lease it in return for a percentage of the gross sales do not. But the learned counsellor is not entirely clear. In one place he says: "The question whether an author sells, leases, or rents his intellectual product to a publisher depends upon the terms of their contract. The contract may provide for the transfer of both the tangible and intangible property rights of the author in his product, for which the publisher agrees to copyright, advertise, publish and market the intellectual product and to compensate the author in the form of royalties for his property rights. When the royalties received by an author are derived from the sale, leasing, or renting of the intellectual product, it is the opinion of this office that they are not paid for 'personal services actually rendered' and do not come within the meaning of the term 'earned income.'" But in the next paragraph he concedes that where a publisher enters into a contract with an author to write a series of articles or a book upon a certain subject and where, though the publisher copyrights the book, he agrees to pay either a stipulated amount of cash or such a stipulated amount plus a percentage of the income derived from other publishers who may use the work, then "there exists the relationship of employer and employee and the consideration paid to the author is for personal services."

Yet the commonest arrangement entered into between a publisher and an author is that by which the former advances the latter a sum of money for the rights to a work either written or not yet written, such sum to be deducted from royalties later accrued under the terms further agreed upon. But it is just this commonest case upon which the opinion of Mr. Gregg does not touch. Does the fact that the original cash received by the author is generally spoken of as an advance on royalties make it unearned, or does the further fact that none of it is returned by him in case the book does not earn an equal amount constitute it the consideration of a sale? And what, furthermore, is the difference (referred to in the quotation above) whether royalties earned after a cash payment has been made are derived from the original or a second publisher?

Agriculture in the Nation's Economy*

By CHARLES A. BEARD

I BEGIN by confessing a prejudice for the land of my birth and for the ideals that were professed before we began, under the thoughtful patronage of our mother, England, to acquire dependencies, protectorates, moral obligations, and mandates in the interest of humanity, to administer water-cure and Krag-rifle medicines, to shoot, bayonet, gas, bomb, and eviscerate backward peoples in the name of the higher good and profitable investments. . . .

Proceeding from this prejudice, I conjure up in my mind the kind of a land that I would have my country become. We have here the most magnificent material endowment ever given to any people, with diversities of climate, soil, and vegetation sufficient to make us in the main self-contained. By developing our economy intelligently with reference to that independence, we can escape the huge burdens of military and naval expenditures necessary to defend trade and investments in all parts of the globe. At a relatively slight cost we can protect our own shores effectively against all foreign foes. Relying upon an economy primarily self-supporting, we cannot be shaken by the disasters of war or the coming revolt of the subject people of the earth against the arrogance of imperialists. Freed from the dangers and follies of childish adventures in imperialism—an old, worn-out game appropriate to the youth of the race—we can develop on this continent a nation dedicated to great humane purposes, the improvement of the common life, the advancement of science and the arts, transforming our cities from industrial slum wastes into gardens of beauty, redeeming the countryside from poverty, disease, and superstition, calling upon our dreamers of imagination to conceive, plan, and execute magnificent municipal, rural, State, and national designs, and inviting our men of war to prepare their scheme of national defense upon the assumptions of such a policy. Such is the prejudice from which I start. Evidently therefore agriculture lies at the base of the scheme of economy which, given my prejudices, I deem noblest and worthiest for America.

Now this concept is founded on no sentimental delusions about the farmer as such. It has been the fashion in some quarters to exalt the tiller of the soil as the noblest work of God. More than two thousand years ago, Aristotle declared that farmers afforded the best social substance for a stable state—largely, it seems, because they were busy with their herds and crops and could not interfere with the politicians who ran things in the home town of Athens. . . . More recently, Oswald Spengler, in plotting the trajectory of Western civilization, ascribes the decline of that culture to the substitution of the meglapolitan city dweller for the stalwart workers on the land. But I subscribe to no such general thesis. The farmer is not automatically intelligent and his pathway is strewn with folly and delusion; even though all the urban civilizations of the past that have fallen into decay have been renewed from the country. On a recent survey of improvements in American government, I was forced to the conclusion that, judged in the light of science and humanism, the rural regions had shown the least advance in every department. Compared with the court house rings of the country districts the municipal governments of our worst cities show immense gains in everything that is creditable to the intelligence of mankind. I should rather trust the health, education, and welfare of my children to Tammany Hall than to any county ring which I know in any part of the United States. Nor do I think that the farmer is an inborn economist any more than the business man. The amount of money wasted by farmers in the purchase of farm machinery in excess of their requirements and the amount wasted by allowing machinery to stand out in the fields and barn lots to rust during the past fifty years would, I dare say, discharge the entire agricultural debt of the country. A part of their folly in this relation is doubtless due to the high power salesmanship of implement manufacturers, the mania of installment buying, and the easy credit system of a benevolent government—a government that lends the farmer money at a low rate so that he can buy manufactured goods at a high rate, one of the neatest endless chain schemes ever devised for raising mankind by its boot tops. So let it be understood frankly that there is to be expounded here none of the fustian nonsense about the superior wisdom and virtue of the farmer. Still he differs in one fundamental respect from most city dwellers; he knows that it takes labor to produce wealth; and he does not expect to grow rich by some kind of a windfall, by skinning the public lawfully under the guise of service. . . .

Until about 1850 the value of the land and improvements in the United States exceeded the value of the industrial and urban property. About 1850 the balance tipped the other way. Since that time the proportion of capital invested in industrial and urban enterprises has steadily increased while that of agriculture has diminished. After economics, politics. Until near the Civil War, the country was ruled, save for brief intervals, by farmers and planters. From the Civil War until near the end of the century it was ruled by farmers and industrialists. Who rules it now, I leave to your understanding and imagination. There are signs at hand that the old union may be again renewed under a broader social philosophy and more competent leadership. Personally I hope that the new confederation may be effected and may command talents equal to the occasion.

Once American capitalists found an outlet for practically all their activities in the development of American resources. Now they are engaged in trying to make the backward races of the earth use telephones, cigarettes, kerosene, phonographs, . . . and are employing all the engines of the federal government to assist them in the operation—all the while grumbling because the army and navy are not used with sufficient vigor. Agriculture sinks in the scale of economic importance. Industrialism draws to its orbit the trained talents of the country. . . . For any design that promises increased industrial profits advisory intelligence can furnish blue prints, political support, economic justification, moral approbation, missionary vindication, military defense, and on occasion congressional whitewashing. Capital and labor are organized to do business and can buy the brains necessary to develop their jurisprudence. The farmers are unorganized, without great centralized economic power, and handicapped in all the arts of planning, executing, and defending, realistic and moral. If this keeps up for another hundred years at the present rate, we shall pass the point now reached by England. More than nine-tenths of our people will live in industrial cities, will depend upon the caprices and fluctuations of foreign trade for their livelihood, while the cultivation of the soil will pass mainly into the hands of colored races and white tenants. . . . But quite a number of people, especially the farmers, are alarmed by the prospect. In my opinion their alarm is justified. They are proposing various plans for averting what appears to be fate. Of their possible efficacy I cannot speak with any authority whatever. All that I really have to say may be summed up in a single sentence: The coordination of agriculture and machine industry in the interests of a balance economy, related to the task of maintaining the essential economic independence of America, is the supreme task of the contemporary statesmen.

* This is the concluding portion of an address delivered by Professor Beard at the Institute of Politics at Williamstown on August 2. The author has not had an opportunity to examine the article as herein published.

On consulting the writing of those who propose to go to the root of this problem, I find prominently set forth a bill of specifications somewhat in the following form:

1. Increase, not diminish the income and inheritance taxes, using the proceeds in the construction of roads, improvement of schools, the erection of electric power plants for rural regions, and a hundred other improvements that add to the wealth, power, beauty, and happiness of the people. Every dollar taken away from the surplus of the plutocracy, diverted from investments in foreign countries to be lost in the next war for democracy (unless our soldiers and marines can bring it home on the point of a bayonet), and devoted to the extension and enlargement of our domestic economy is a gain to America and in reality a gain to the foreign countries that are encouraged to borrow instead of save. . . .

2. Announce and adhere to the policy that any American who is not content with 4 or 5 per cent at home but is bent on making 10 or 15 per cent in some dangerous place cannot look to the American people to assure his interest and principal and fetch it home on a silver platter. In an exalted strain of morals, our genial Secretary of the Navy recently declared in effect that the American empire extended to any point in the world where there was an American dollar invested and that the armed might of the country must be strong enough to defend the said dollar. If we teach and practice that creed, then we must calculate the cost.

3. Push as rapidly as possible the organization of the farmers for the cooperative determination of crop areas to be planted, the cooperative disposal of the surplus, and the cooperative distribution of costs and benefits. Couple with this the encouragement of a greater diversification of crops to increase the independence of the individual farmer, freeing him from the one-crop mania so ruinous to his finances and his spirit. In the development of this cooperative policy, the farmers are entitled to use the federal and State governments, just as other economic interests use those agencies.

On the inherent merits of the McNary-Haugen bill, I do not undertake to pass judgment. Frankly I do not pretend to have any idea how it would work out if adopted. But most of the arguments against it seem to me to apply also to the economic and juristic devices of capitalism. To call it paternalistic and then turn around and supply a merchant marine to shippers, a protective tariff to manufacturers, and military and naval protection to anybody who tries to make money in China, Haiti, or Nicaragua is to dissolve the show in comedy. . . . The McNary-Haugen bill might do little to improve the lot of the farmer, but in any case it might help as much as wearing cowboy breeches and fishing with worms in Western waters.

After all, the whole burden of my argument is to the effect that we need to develop a new science which, for want of a better name, we may call nation-planning, supplementing the budding science of city and regional planning, inviting all classes and interests to put away self-deception, as far as it is humanly possible, and devote their imagination and executive powers to organizing and maintaining a fairly balanced system of national economy. . . .

The Seminole Oil Field

By CORA MILEY

THE town of Seminole is in Oklahoma. Until a short time ago it was like any other of the small country towns up and down the Rock Island railroad lines in the Indian country. On dry days it was dusty, on wet days muddy. Men spat where they pleased. Waste paper lay in the gutter until the wind moved it on. Vacant lots grew up in weeds or served as dumping grounds for old machinery and worn-out automobiles. The town was an island surrounded, just outside the city limits, by a sea of old tin cans. The soda-jerker in the drug store wiped his fountain with a filthy rag and served "cokes" on a dusty table. The dry-goods merchant sold dresses by the yard only.

On Saturdays the streets were filled with Indians, Negroes, and "freedmen," a sea of them, milling back and forth, drifting into the stores, stopping to talk, blocking the sidewalk. The most interesting of these was the Seminole Indian, with his soft gentle voice, his tragic background, and his colorful dress, the men wearing broad white hats, bright shirts, and a bit of decoration here and there; the women the dress of the 90's, tight waist, long full skirt, wide white apron, small shawl around the shoulders, hair parted in the middle and brought smoothly to the coil in the back. Fashions do not often change with these people. The Indian imitates the white man no more than necessity demands.

The Negro on the streets of Seminole at that time was a small town man—the kind that does odd jobs, that shuffles along and depends on his wife, cooking for the "white folks," for board and keep. He had not reached the status of his city brother who can maintain himself, in some measure, by dealing solely with those of his own color.

The "freedmen" are like no other in the whole world. These sons and daughters of the original slaves to the Indians are as black, as shiny, as the ace of spades to which members of the African race have so long been compared. No learning is theirs; they can neither read nor write; their ignorance is profound. They believe in "han'ts," in "conjurin'," in voodooism of all kinds. Down in the bottoms of Little River they make their homes, separate and apart from either white man or Indian. They dress as their fancy dictates: rooster feathers in a fur cap on a summer's day; a red shirt, a beaded belt, high boots, silver spurs; anything—everything—that will satisfy their crude sense of the decorative. There is confidence in their mien, swagger in their gait. No idea of law and order has penetrated their consciousness. They will steal if they deem it expedient; being expert marksmen, they will shoot a foe at the slightest provocation, seemingly without realization of the legal consequences.

Upon these the merchants of Seminole depended most for trade and prosperity.

But Seminole is no longer as it was. A feverish restlessness is everywhere. Men, excitement in their faces, are hurrying up and down the streets, talking rapidly with others they meet, cranking up muddy little cars and rushing hither and thither, pell-mell, away, somewhere. The soda-jerker no longer wipes the fountain with his soiled cloth; he leaves it wet. No dust is on the table; it has adhered to the sleeves of the men who figure and scheme as they drink draughts there—stronger than "coke."

Among this crowd are still others, men with strong jaws and keen eyes, the successful men, men of big money, come to size up the situation. Long, expensive cars as well as flivvers are in the melee of congested traffic. Hawkers, barkers, "con men," hamburger and hot-dog venders cry their wares on every street corner. No longer do the merchants depend on the men of color for trade. These lowly ones are pushed aside for greater gain. And gain there is. Six millions of dollars have been deposited in the banks by citizens of this little town in the last few months. Thousands of dollars pour in each day. Seminole is in the center of an oil field, so rich that it is called, among the other rich fields, the wonder of the Mississippi Valley. The Cushing oil field at one time bore the title of the world's richest.

About 1903 the Dawes Commission came to the Indian Territory to allot the lands, hitherto held in common by each of the Five Civilized Tribes, to the individual Indians. Through a series of manipulations, maneuvers, chicaneries, on the part of the white man, these tribes were giving up their governments and were about to become citizens of the United States. It was the business of the commission to distribute the lands as equally and as impartially as possible.

The Indians as a whole were not satisfied with the plan. Some of them took their allotments without comment, making the best of a bad situation; others grumbled openly but took the land nevertheless; the remainder refused to abide by the decision of those in authority. They would not take their allotments; they declined to deal further with the white man; they took their families and withdrew to the fastness of the hills. Their determination was to live there as best they could on roots and berries and what wild life they could secure.

It would not be a full life, they said, but it would be a free one. They gave as the reason for their acts that all contacts with their white brother had been disastrous for them. He had deceived them, betrayed them, persecuted them. They were through with him. This band, consisting of Indians from each of the Five Civilized Tribes, was called the Snakes. Chitto Harjo was the leader.

At length the work of the Dawes Commission was almost finished. Only a worthless tract of land, entirely unfit for cultivation, was left. All the Indians had their shares but the Snakes. The members of the commission were anxious to finish the work correctly and satisfactorily. Again and again they sent for the Snakes to come and file for their portion of the lands. The Indians paid not the slightest heed to the call. At last, realizing the futility of further effort with the Snakes, the commission secured what names it could of this rebellious band, put them on the rolls as owners of the bare rocky tract, packed up bag and baggage, and went back to Washington. Those worthless acres became the Cushing oil field. The joke was on the white man. Indian after Indian became a millionaire while the white brother gnashed his teeth impotently. If he had only known, he would have grafted the land from the Indian and would have been the millionaire himself! So much for that.

The Seminole Indian came from Florida. He had lived there for many years, even as far back as Spanish ownership. He has always been a peaceable fellow, fighting only in defense of his property and his loved ones. Even so he has had his troubles. It is the same old story of the persistent encroachment of the white man. Farther and farther the Seminole was pushed back into Florida until his home was deep in the swamps. And even from this almost impenetrable place the long arm of the white man dragged him forth. Early in the nineteenth century he was forced to move to the Indian Territory, to enter into an alliance with his old enemy the Creeks, to adjust himself to a new climate and to a new soil, to make a home in a wilderness. Disaster after disaster followed. Misfortune after misfortune befell him. The war between the States razed his improvements to the ground; he was driven from the reservation; his return there later entailed new difficulties.

The latest disaster that has befallen him has been the worst. In the period following the allotting of the lands and especially after the discovery of oil, dark deeds were done to dispossess the Indian. The government had restricted the sale of his lands, and protected him in every way possible, but every law seems to have its loophole. Deeds were forged, were signed under false representations; Indians "touched the pen" to sign one thing and found later that they had signed something else. Heirs to land were made intoxicated and made to sign away their all; they were sometimes spirited away until deeds could be forced from them; in some instances stubborn heirs, who would not sell, disappeared mysteriously. Lands were bought for a very little. Sometimes I think that this was the worst of all. Men of standing, of so-called character, leaders in State affairs, hired other men, not so particular about their standing, to buy lands cheaply from the Indians. Cheap meant $10 this month, $5 the next month, and a kick and a curse the next.

All the Indian lands which could be sold have been sold. The Indian has been left with a pittance, a hut in the woods, an acre or so of worthless land, with the lease on that gone, a mere remnant of his former holdings, to keep him from being a public charge. These holdings with their rich deposits, now flowing outward like black gold, belong for the most part to the vultures, the beasts of prey of humanity, the men who have robbed him. It is the whites who ride in purring motors, who build palatial homes, who have their photographs in the newspapers as the "State's new millionaires," who watch their bank accounts grow, who strut and swagger in the consciousness of new-born power, who gloat over the things that money can buy.

Meanwhile the Indian stands on the corner and wonders at the restless throng in that throbbing little city; he leans against a post and leisurely watches the crowd go by; he gossips gaily with the squaws on the corner; he wanders down the street with an eager child by the hand and counts the few coins in his purse to see if he can satisfy the request of his little one for the shining bauble in the window; at nightfall he gathers his little brood into the rattling old flivver and goes back to his cabin in the woods under the gleaming and silent stars.

The Seminole is no poor fool! He knows that he has been robbed. But he frets not at all about the matter. His store of resentment against the white man was exhausted long ago. He fights back no more. He would not change places with those who have wronged him. Perhaps he has a sense of values.

Trying to Be Modern

By EDITH CLARK

I AM happily and, I hope, permanently married. I have no great creative urge but do have a direct antipathy to housework and a slight facility in other directions. I have no time or disposition for complexes, fixations, or inhibitions. And I live in a small town. It is simple, conventional souls like myself who must face the difficulties of "being modern."

The rural and small town woman presents a unique problem. Our social organization is simple and primitive. Woman's work is as definitely fixed as is a squaw's and she does it as unquestioningly. There are no parasites. For example, I am the only woman in our small Illinois town who keeps a maid, year in and year out. There is no provision made for the non-domestic matron: no pre-school groups, no trained cooks or nursemaids, and very few jobs.

I closed my senior year at college ten years ago as president of the Feminist Forum, with an address entitled "Why I Am a Feminist." At the time I was considered in our little group a Queer One, and a Dangerous Radical. Any one of you, nowadays, could sketch the outline of my talk. "It is not necessary for a woman to give up her outside work when she is married, any more than it is for a man to give up his profession. So many of the former activities of the home have been taken over by factory production that a woman who is content to be a homemaker alone, is stultifying herself and lapsing into the role of parasite. If children are borne (I can remember how I hesitated, just ten short years ago, to introduce this rather breath-taking possibility) the mother need not devote herself exclusively to the physical care of these children. They will admire her mental alertness the more if she uses her intellectual powers to the full and does not lapse into a mere Household Drudge. A competent nursemaid can give baths and supervise naps and meals, and a woman who surrenders a Career to Home and Motherhood, is making an unnecessary sacrifice to the shibboleths of conventional society." It sounded so simple—then.

Just the other day I told my present "competent nursemaid" to put the baby outdoors for her sun-bath. I stepped out the door to feel the direction of the wind, and indicated the exact niche where the blanket and pen were to be put—a sheltered spot in the bright sun being often forty degrees warmer than an exposed spot. I dashed upstairs to pound the typewriter in pursuit of my extra-home job. After half an hour my sixth sense, which Competent Nursemaids have developed to an uncanny acuteness, led me to go down stairs and see the sun-bather. I found her shivering with cold, penned up, in the exact spot where the wind whistled its gustiest around the corner of the house. Our elder daughter, aged five, still rolls her black eyes with a gruesome fascination toward the water tower every time we go past, since months ago she was told by a C. N. that it was there the C. N.'s father had been drowned. The full details of attempted rescue and resuscitation accompanied the tale.

But to go back to seven years ago. I was a social worker in New York City. I was making $125 a month. My fiance had left a well-established business in this little Illinois town to make Democracy safe. When that ideal had been brought to its thrilling consummation his business awaited him. I surely couldn't support him on $125 a month. He could support me. His capital and ambition were both invested right here. The reason we were married was because we found joy in each other's companionship. I gave up my job.

How was I to "go right on with my work," and live in the same town with my husband? We have a population of 1,308. When winter comes a kindly old lady, a Seventh Day Adventist, comes to our door carefully holding a newspaper which she spreads down and on which she stands, "so's not to dirty your floor." She collects all the old clothes we have for the three poor families in town and leaves us tracts which explain the "Menace of Spiritualism" or warn us to "Prepare for the Bridegroom." What need have we for a paid social worker?

So, jobless, I prepared to lead the parasite's existence. Since the factory had taken away all my traditional occupations, I would just loaf and keep house. If my daughters will let me, I hope I may help them to escape the agonizing exhaustion of my first year's experience as a housekeeper. To cook three meals a day, wash the dishes, and keep our small house only moderately clean was to me desperately hard work. I tried to organize, to "use my well-trained mind to solve my domestic problems," but the endless minutiae, the sheer physical labor involved in sweeping, mopping, ironing can't be organized out of existence. Let no one deceive you, theoretical feminists. Housekeeping for the homemakers who do not employ domestic servants—90 per cent of the total—is a full-sized job, even in this enlightened factory age. But my neighbors convinced me that I had started too late in life to learn their profession. They do their own washing and ironing, and buy perhaps one "good" dress a season. The rest of the family sewing they do themselves. And they do it all with an ease, with a pride of competent achievement that leaves me sincerely envious. For I loathe every phase of housekeeping except cooking.

Hence, I got a job. Not because I aspire to a career. (One of the bitter steps from youth to maturity is when one discovers that career material is lacking in one's makeup, that one's work is to hold down jobs.) I simply wanted to escape as far as could be from the exacting profession of housekeeping. I do newspaper feature writing for a small city newspaper. Because my father chanted the Iliad in Greek to us as a lullaby when we were infants, and because we attended the German Lutheran summer school in vacations in order to learn idiomatic German, we were known to the editor of the paper as a family of "culture," and on that basis he gave me a chance to run my department by long distance from our little town. I do not believe that every uprooted young wife would be equally fortunate. Part-time jobs for educated women may be developing in cities. They are few and far between in rural and small-town America.

A short while after achieving my job, small but precious to me, I became pregnant. According to the theorists, I should have given up my job for two years when I discovered my condition, or else have been such a thoroughly normal woman that the natural function of motherhood would cause me no physical discomfort. Neither of these things happened. If I gave up my job, just after having made a place for it in my life, I should lose it forever. Furthermore, I suffer considerable discomfort during the early months of pregnancy. Hence I would sit at my typewriter and pound the keys until a wave of nausea laid me low. Then I would stretch out on the bed and read the books from which I gathered my newspaper material until I caught my breath again, and then back to the typewriter. I managed to hold down my job and have the baby, and now, when I see her fat legs trotting around on endless weighty errands, I am sentimentally glad that nature triumphed over science.

But a job at what price! I have become of necessity a bovine creature who has foregone completely the joy of having nerves or temperament. There is not fifteen minutes of any morning when I work at my typewriter without an interruption. Our small son is going through the difficult transition from babyhood to boyhood. His present title in the family circle is The Prince of Wails or his elder sister's polysyllabic epithet, CryBabyCryStickYourFingerInYourEye. Bumps and hurt feelings have to be kissed away a dozen times a day. Our daughter in kindergarten daily brings home slips of paper with the information "The cat ran to the tree" repeated in wobbling characters over and over on a manilla sheet. This herculean effort must be enthusiastically praised and cautiously criticized the minute she enters the house. I have yet to find the mythical nursemaid who regards sieved carrots for the baby as a different article from carrots mashed into hunks with a fork, or a sterile bottle as one to which a few flakes of milk curd may not adhere, or a teaspoonful of cod liver oil as anything but sheerest nonsense. And after I have written down in black and white the day's menus and have done the ordering, the morning is blessed and unique when a plaintive, nasal voice does not call at least five times up the stairs messages running from, "Say, I fergot t'tell you, we was outa laundry soap," to a conversational comment, "Say, it sure is a swell day, ain't it?" Since I am the only woman in the knowledge of most of our neighbors who attempts to "hire her work done and write instead," as one of them neatly phrased it, my efforts are regarded by our townspeople as a mere pastime. When I started, I tried with as little pomposity as possible to let it be known that I reserved the morning hours for my newspaper work. A few blessed kindly souls still respect these hours, but the rest, now that the novelty has worn off, think nothing of running in for "just a minute" to get reading material for a study club lesson on Ralph Connor, the Preacher-Novelist, or telephoning to know whether I want to bring two apple pies or stewed chicken and noodles to the Fireman's Benefit. I have learned to switch placidly from reading "The Sun Also Rises" for my newspaper job, to looking up It Takes a Heap of Livin' in a Place to Call It Home for Mrs. Krumbelbine to read at the Woman's Culture Society guest day program.

I left college with a strong sense of community responsibility. This was fostered by two years of social work after college. An opportunity for disinterested, intelligent community work assails my eyes on every side. I visit my little girl in the kindergarten room. One child sits dully in his little red chair with mouth ajar and eyes half closed. His condition calls aloud for tonsil and adenoid operation. Another little girl each time complains that her stomach aches or her legs hurt. She is pot-bellied and round shouldered—a perfect example of malnutrition. A Parent Teacher Association would bring a school nurse and supplementary food. I go down town in the afternoon or evening. Arm in arm, up and down the main block of Main Street walk the high school girls, in the doorways lounge the boys. Dances are frowned upon by the school authorities. The gymnasium equipment is woefully inadequate. There is not another thing in the world for the young people to do but lounge and flirt in the gossiping eye of Main Street. Recreational facilities for the boys and girls of our community are a crying need. Every week or so two or three middle-aged men get together and saw away on violins. A crowd gathers on the sidewalk to listen to the old-time fiddling. It is the only music except for church choirs that the town affords. A grown-up singing school would be a joy-bringer. Three Protestant churches struggle along on a pitifully small budget. A united Community Church would bring to us here a well-educated young minister, and a well-equipped church plant.

Yet when these matters are brought up for discussion among the town's intelligentsia I withdraw into a frigid little zone of silence. I have neither the time nor the physical energy to undertake the role of booster for the most worthwhile thing in the world. By bitter experience I have learned that I cannot coach plays for the benefit of the library fund or solicit members for the Community Club, and at the same time write a decent article or be decently calm as a household administrator.

I shut my eyes to the books on the importance of the early years of a child's life. Aside from guarding zealously the physical well-being of my children (I can conscientiously feel that I am vigilant in that respect), I do not give them the companionship that a thoroughly single-track mother might give. (But I cannot see that the children of thoroughly domestic mothers receive much more direction.) My children do not know what directed play is. The words "Montessori system" have in their very context a syllable of reproach. I wilfully blind myself to the chance for rich and full development which the newer systems of pre-school work might hold for my infants if I were willing to take hours of every day as teacher.

But in spite of hesitations, doubts, and questionings, I hang on like grim death to my newspaper job. My reasons are simple and selfish. My monthly pay check is a welcome addition to the family budget, and a degree of financial independence is heart-warming to one who has tried the sentimental role of partner-homemaker with its uneconomic "allowance" dole. Housework as a life job bores and enrages me. Writing, even such hack work as I do, lights up windows for my soul. The idea of eventually learning to keep a clean house and bake good pastry does not inspire me with enthusiasm, whereas the thought of achieving even moderate success as a writer sends shivers up and down my spine. And last, through the outlet of the reading and writing that my job entails I am able to endure the lack of stimulating association of small-town life.

As for the children, time alone can tell the story. They have fresh air in abundance, the companionship of other children, good food, regular hours. Whether or not they will suffer from the repeated injunction, "Now run away and play. Mother must pound the typewriter," remains to be seen. I like to believe with Samuel Butler that perhaps they will benefit by it.

The Mexican "Just Won't Work"

By EVA A. FRANK

WHENEVER you meet an American business man in Mexico the conversation, no matter how diversely it begins, always ends in a most irritated pronouncement against the congenital laziness of the Indian.

"He just won't work," says almost every Yankee. "He'd rather sit around all day doing nothing than earn enough to buy himself a decent house. In the tierra caliente, even if you double the wages, you can't obtain steady labor. The Indian works a while and then quits. You ask him why he lays off. He answers that he has enough money at present."

The American is irritated and puzzled. He cannot understand why all the incentives which urge men to action in the United States should fail to produce results in Mexico. The desire to better one's economic position seems to lose its force in the upside-down world south of the Rio Grande. Most of the Indians—and they, together with the mestizos, form 84 per cent of the population—are content to cultivate the tiny plot about their own adobe huts, to raise a few chickens and perhaps a pig, to catch enough fish for their own needs, and to make pottery or serapes or whatever their village is famed for, as a commodity of exchange. Not that every Indian owns a farm and works nowhere else. Many thousands of them labor on large haciendas, their little huts crowded against the ancient walls. But it is every Indian's dream to possess a plot of ground for growing the bit of maize that will supply him with sufficient tortillas; just as it is a part of every American's program to own an automobile. But while the traditions of American government render it neutral about the fulfillment of our desires, the social revolution in Mexico has compelled its bureaucracy to respect the peons' urge for land, and the Mexican government is distributing it in the form of ejidos (village communal lands) as fast as funds permit.

"The Indian has no ambition," growls the American. The real difficulty is that he has ambition for a leisurely life too firmly intrenched. He enjoys squatting in the market-place behind his petates, bargaining, selling, refusing a price, but mostly just squatting. And he holds fast to this mode of living. The first time the average American observes the many women in the market each with her few eggs or her few cakes, he is annoyed in his efficiency nerve at such a ridiculous waste of time. Why not depute one person to sell the eggs or the cakes while the others stay at home working? The Indian's answer is as simple as it is confounding. None of these women wishes to labor constantly at home, and none of them wishes to stay at all times in the market. The Indian enjoys savoring life, the American enjoys crowding it. One would imagine that it would be possible for the two cultural ideals to exist placidly side by side, each race following its own conception of worth-while living.

Let us turn again to the American business man. With genuine feeling, he tells of the burning of the banana plantations in the Isthmus of Tehuantepec during the revolution. "I should like to be fair," he predicates. "If the natives wanted to fight and kill the foreigners who had come down to their wilderness and made them work, I wouldn't say anything. But why did the fools burn up the banana plants? Why didn't they take possession of the plantations and run them? Instead they destroyed the work of years in a few months, and today the country is just the way it was before the Americans came—the same clusters of thatched houses with little patches of cultivation beside them, the same primitive dugouts full of flowers and vegetables, paddled leisurely to Puerto Mexico."

"But they look happy," I ventured. "They are reposeful, contented."

"Happy?" he snaps back. "Of course they're happy, and that's the worst of it. What becomes of progress if you're happy with what you've got? And that earth," he groans, "is so fertile that I could make a fortune there without half trying."

Ah! Something more than irritation in that last sentence, something more than inability to understand another people's psychology. "I could make a fortune there, if . . ." Frustration is there, inability to function, a sense of being tied by something beyond reach, while at the same time the mind is stimulated to grab by extraordinary fertility of soil, untouched mines, and all the riches which make eyes glisten and brains work in the United States. Here are thousands of acres of productive soil to be had for very little cash. The American promoter wants to form companies, to issue prospectuses, to plough and to plant. Everything is marvelous except the human material that would have to do the actual work. It cannot be molded into the proper shape. It will not labor consistently, regularly.

If you ask the average Indian what he wants, he will say: "Land, to grow things on." The average American reply to the same question would be: "Money, to buy things with." And until the Indian wants the things that money can buy more than he wants his mastery over time, the American cannot, except by force, function in Mexico.

The economic motive has driven the American over the border to make money, to get rich quick. For this he must have labor, cheap labor, a necessity which undoubtedly lends force to the cry of rage against the Indian's laziness. But even without the economic urge, the rage would be there just the same. For the Indian's savoring of life day by day, his complete disregard of the basic need of work, is entirely alien to the American temperament. "It's a great life if you don't weaken"—under its strain—bespeaks the enormous pressure under which we work and play. And although we often complain of the burden of this pressure and say that we wish we could go free of it, we have so rationalized it into a moral good, we are so geared to this speed of thought and action, that when we observe the Indian sitting—taking joy in the sun and the wind—we jeer at him and his useless existence.

The Indian cannot understand the American point of view at all. He has not yet felt the thrill of power over matter which speed gives to the average American, whether he be a soda-fountain clerk hectically flopping glasses, or a social worker crowding five extra visits into the day's toil. Closer to the early stage of culture, the Indian retains the Garden of Eden as his ideal, while we Americans, banished from that delightful existence long ago, have twisted work, the punishment for disobedience, into an ideal of living, have shoved mere busyness into the importance of an end in itself. We consign to Satan all the idle hands while God presumably looks down with enjoyment upon the busy bee improving each of His shining hours.

The culture of the Mexicans of Spanish descent who form the upper 15 per cent of the population is just as alien to the characteristic American disposition as the civilization of the Indians. The rich Spanish-Mexicans have beautiful homes in Mexico City, Guadalajara, or Puebla and leave all the management of their estates to agents. The very wealthy among them live in Madrid or in Paris, and simply draw revenue from their country. None of them works. They never have worked. Hardly one of them opens a factory, though the crying need for Mexico is manufactured goods. Is that patriotism? The selling of cloth is practically in the hands of the Syrians, while the drug trade is managed by the Germans. Outside of government clerks, no middle class exists in Mexico. As soon as a man gets a fair amount of money together, he doesn't set himself up in business and make more; he buys a house in the country and retires to ride horseback and enjoy life for the rest of his days. All of which astounds and annoys the American, and makes him look with impatient, irritated superiority at the whole nation. If they would only follow in our footsteps, if they would only strive after our ideals in our fashion, he would be so eager to help them along.

We run to nerves—and are proud of it. It is part and parcel of the pressure idea. There is so much for us to do and so little time in which to do it. The Mexican shrinks from such an ideal. It gives him not a sense of importance but a feeling of bondage. The fewer things he must do, the more free he feels from the tyranny of environment, the more he can follow the dictates of his own likes and dislikes.

In all the discussions of the constant friction between the two countries, no one, as far as I know, has pointed out that these misunderstandings might well have their origins in the profound cultural disparity indicated. Yet this seems to me a natural conclusion, especially if one considers the social backgrounds of the settlers who made these two neighboring lands such totally different countries.

Everett Dean Martin holds that the destiny and ideals of the United States are greatly influenced by the fact that it was settled by the lower middle classes. Whatever you may think of this theory, there can be no doubt that the ideals of the present-day Mexican have been shaped by the ideals of his ancestors, whether Indian warriors or Spanish aristocrats. Mexico was torn up (you can hardly call it settled) by Spanish soldiers of fortune. The rapacious gold-seekers, swashbuckling adventurers who wrenched the land from Montezuma, were not shopkeepers with thrifty slogans of "a penny saved is a penny earned." They were sons of Spain's great feudal families who saw life in terms of danger mastered, in riches accumulated without work. Even the priest was of noble family. They brought with them ideals of courtesy, of chivalry, joy in the hunt, in fighting, a large disregard for the common people, a haughty superiority to trade. This conquering nobility never thought of shoving the Indian back, enclosing him and his primitive culture on reservations, and doing the work themselves. With warlike zeal, they enslaved the native, earning the bitter hatred which has so frequently burst through the crust of Spanish dominance in devastating revolution.

The ancient Indian culture, though differing greatly from the Spaniard's in many respects, was alike in this—it placed the fighter in the very highest rank of the puebla, while the worker assumed the very lowest. Every tribe attempted to capture its neighbor, seize all the possessions, and enslave the population. Like the Spaniards, the Indians had a nobility, dependent on war and looking on work as demeaning.

With this traditional background, it is easy to see why the present-day Mexican does not believe in the sacredness of work, but regards it as an evil. In Mexico nobody goes around spouting about the dignity of labor unless he wants to be accounted a comedian. The magazine Success would have as small a sale in Mexico as the Dial has in the United States. Nobody but foreigners would be interested in stories about the rise of messenger boys to presidents by energetic sweeping out of offices, diligent clerking, and prodigious working night and day. They wouldn't believe the stories for one thing, and besides most of them would find the retailing of so much work very fatiguing. Perhaps Palm Beach, better than any other community in the United States, would be understandable to all classes of Mexicans. The happy lounging on the sand beneath the warming sun, the dancing under the trees, would appear very delightful. And the peon, if he could see it, would probably point to Palm Beach and say: "It was in order to have that life, which only your rich posssss, that I burned the banana plantations on the River Coazcoalcos and the vast fields of sugar-cane on the outskirts of Cuernavaca."

Of course Mexico will change. It will have to. Even now it is in process of emerging from a feudal state into the beginnings of modern industrialism. Its ideals must alter with the transformation; but they must not necessarily take on our individualistic, mechanistic slant. I believe that some of those who wish for United States intervention in Mexico, vaguely are urged in that desire by the hope that the germs of progress as we see it will cling to the uniforms of our marines, and somehow or other Mexicans of all classes will be injected with our incentives. But Mexico, if she is to remain free, must build its progress upon the foundations of the Aztec-Spanish heritage of its inhabitants—Indian customs, communal, closely connected with their agricultural life; Spanish traditions, feudal, aristocratic.

Any reforms which North Americans may wish to introduce will have to be conducive to the attainment of Mexican ideals, not ours. We shall have to show the peon that by our methods he will gain more leisure, or more money with an equal or less amount of work. The cooperative at Tlahuac uses a motor-driven thresher and baling machine, and the Indians tell you with great glee how much money it has earned for them, at the same time reducing their labor. They are most enthusiastic about American farm machinery—when they own it themselves.

Something of the possibility of change from feudal culture to a modern life, based upon the cooperative use of machines, Diego Rivera, the painter, has indicated in the frescoes at the Agricultural College at Chapingo. On one wall he has painted the Exploitation of Man, with rich generals shooting peons, agents passing bags of money to absentee landlords, gunboats flying the American flag in the harbor; on the opposite side, he has pictured the Exploitation of the Land, featuring tractors and derricks and reaping machines. Between the two he has inscribed in large letters: "Here we teach the exploitation of the land, not the exploitation of man." That expresses an ideal worth working for, and possibly the energy which went into fighting men may be transformed into fighting the environment, and the idols of Mexico change from generals to scientists.

The struggle that is going on in Mexico today is basically a clash between the Latin-Indian and the American culture ideals. Under the surface there is the constant tugging between the two culture patterns, the American vivid, powerful, the Mexican in mortal fear of submergence. These social forces are behind the return of the communal land to the Indian and in back of the plea for intervention. In times of great stress, they become almost visible, and the impartial spectator can fairly see them galvanizing individuals to speech or action. Then the struggle is intensified into a "problem"—the century-old problem of Mexican-American relations.

The Actress

By PANTELEIMON ROMANOV

IN the labor districts the revolutionary actress, Anna Reinhardt, had become popular mainly because of her anti-religious performances. Each performance of her new pantomime, "Revolt," stirred her workingmen's audience to the greatest enthusiasm. The small, golden-haired woman was their own actress because of the astounding sincerity and conviction of her acting.

Not long ago she owned large estates in the country and a sumptuous house in the city. During the revolution nothing had been left her. The graciousness that made her so charming a hostess and that so enchanted the people of her former set was her only gift. This gift she now meant to use to earn her daily bread. She was forced to, because she was on the verge of starvation. But she could not even gain admission to a theatrical agency, and so was obliged, for two or three rubles a night, to accept singing and dancing engagements in cheap cabarets.

There were times when she appeared three times in one evening, and having no dressing-room she had to stand in the filthy corridor awaiting her turn. She was, moreover, at a loss how to defend her dignity among these lawless characters, who long since had lost all sense of decency, and to whom it was all the same how they earned a living.

Sometimes she earned no more than two rubles a week, and eventually she was reduced to such extremities that she shrank from going out because she feared meeting acquaintances, and also because she could not bear the sight of the loaves of good white bread so glaringly displayed in the bakeshops. Then came a day when her face powder gave out, and in her shame she used tooth powder instead. As she had no means of getting her linen washed at the laundry, she locked herself up in her room and washed her chemises in the soup tureen. When she had but one chemise left, she took her pillow-case, cut out the corners for her arms, and made a hole in the middle for her head. But having to use tooth powder instead of face powder caused her acuter suffering than the want of linen, or the pangs of hunger. She herself did not know why.

During this period of privation religion was her only solace. When she was told that her old life would never come back and that she would have to adapt herself to the new, she was filled with dread. What did it mean, adapt herself to the new life? It meant not to believe in God, to spit on the floor, to have dirty finger-nails, to take away other people's houses; death were better!

But suddenly there came an unexpected change. Life became almost bearable. She again had linen, powder, and even perfume. Some black, hairy man staged a pantomime for her, calling it: "Revolt." From that time success smiled on her. She herself could never explain the reason for her success, nor did she ever understand why she was received with such enthusiasm. She acted her part simply and naively, as she lived. She could not have done otherwise. But at each appearance a hush fell on her audience.

Was it because she expressed her emotions not in words but by gestures, by movements? Was it because this little woman with her frail slender body, had the eyes of an innocent child whose extraordinarily touching expression of sincerity so moved her rough workingmen's audience? It may have been all this together, but there it was, the irresistible effect of her acting upon these people. They no doubt felt the strong appeal to their feelings by one who had deeply lived through and suffered what she was portraying.

A labor audience is very sensitive to the truthfulness of acting. It readily detects falsities, artificialities, such as when an actor, wishing to speak the language of the people, does so in a trained, cultivated accent, instead of in the tones of everyday life. But a labor audience is a very indulgent one. It applauds and laughs generously, even at dubious performances. "After all, it's only play-acting! What's the use of taking it seriously? These things don't happen in real life. And they are doing their best for us." And that is why they never withhold some encouragement from even the poorest performer. But for him who gives a real thing the applause is very different.

All those who have not yet been to the new show are crowding into the public hall to see how this little woman is going to represent the spirit of revolt in her pantomime. One would think it required masses to give adequate expression to the idea of revolt.

The curtain rises. The performance begins. At first singers appear dressed in peasant costumes and new bast shoes. They sing, using their arms freely, and dance the Russian peasant dance. Among them a red-headed country lout, clad in an unnaturally clean shirt and also wearing new bast shoes, has a patch of black showing under the red wig at the back of his head. The fact that he is blissfully unaware of this makes it all the funnier. And his ardor is so great, he is so zealous to please, that he arouses in the audience a good natured wish to encourage his efforts.

Now follows the next number on the program: Another man dressed as a peasant, also in a red wig and in bast shoes, who tells folk stories and flavors his discourse by mispronouncing words as the uneducated are supposed to. Although this might be supposed to give offense to the common people, he too elicits good natured applause.

The curtain falls. Out comes the manager in ordinary street clothes to announce the number so impatiently awaited: Anna Reinhardt in her new number, "Revolt." A sudden silence. Presently low muffled music is heard, as it were from behind thick walls. The curtain rises quickly and noiselessly. The scene represents a prison; in one corner is a gray lime-streaked wall. On the ground a bundle of straw. At the back a small square window with iron bars. In the other corner stands an altar covered with a red cloth, a wooden cross and a New Testament on it.

All eyes are fixed on the open prison door from which can be seen a flight of stone steps leading upwards. "What is coming through that door?" A sudden shrill discord from the music as though from a broken string. Then a fragile woman's body is thrust down the stone steps as if by the brutal hand of the jailer.

The audience is breathless. "There she is." The little body lies in a heap on the stone floor, all crumpled up in a helpless mass. Only her thin back and trailing gold hair can be seen. Slowly she raises her head, and rises on her knees, an expression of pain still on her face. Her gaze, in naive and childlike terror, slowly wanders around the prison, dwelling first on the jumble of straw, then on the iron-barred window.

Her eyes do not express exaggerated pain or terror as is usually done on the stage. Her face is that of a little child, with the undried tears of pain still on it, but already attracted by the novelty of her surroundings. But those surroundings are dreadful—a bundle of straw and a barred window. She understands all and the realization of her imprisonment turns her cold with horror.

She jumps up, rushes to the door, and clings to the heavy handle in shaking despair. In a paroxysm of anguish she bites her hands. For her the audience does not exist; for her there is no crowd sitting in the hall. She is alone before that door forever closed to her. She can only beat her head against its heavy panelling and bite her poor little hands to deaden the pain of the knowledge of her fate. And behind her is the desire of hundreds to push open that door with the force of strong workingmen's shoulders.

A sudden change comes over the face of the terror-stricken woman. Her gaze has fallen on the red altar with the cross on it. This red cloth is the symbol of her blood that will be shed tomorrow—perhaps today. Her eyes are wide open, full of mute horror. Then that look passes and gives place to an expression of religious transport, of resigned submission. With outstretched arms, the tears streaming down her face, she crawls to the altar on her knees, and there lies crushed in self-abasement.

Presently she raises her head, as if struck by a new thought. Her gaze is riveted on the altar. She approaches it, and as with newly awakened consciousness, takes first the New Testament, then the cross in her hand, gazes at them with a sort of curious intensity, and after putting them back on the altar, she turns and slowly passes her hand over her eyes.

An intense hush has fallen over the hall. Only the repressed breathing of hundreds of people can be heard. All of a sudden, she pricks her ears; she has heard a sound behind the scenes. She is tense. Again taking the cross, she moves to the door. The sounds behind the scene come nearer; one can distinguish a revolutionary melody, then the tramp of hundreds of feet. Victory!

Her glance travels from the door to the window, and in a moment her face is radiant with joy which, unconsciously, is reflected on the faces of the audience below. The unhappy enslaved creature is no more. As she straightens herself she seems to grow in stature, her eyes become large and sparkling. With quick action she breaks the cross in two, throws it on the ground, and tramples it underfoot; she tears the red cloth from the altar and waving it like a banner of victory she runs to the heavy prison door which now opens before her, allowing her saviors to enter with wild shouts of victory.

The hall is rent with yells, with the thunder of stamping feet. Hands, even chairs are waved at her. But she again has changed into the helpless little woman and appears before her audience with hands outstretched like those of a child, bowing and smiling a quiet bright smile.

The performance is over. She removes the make-up from her face with a bit of cotton, closes her suitcase, and having received her ten rubles, she leaves her dressing-room. She goes home to her room. A large antique bed, two portraits of her ancestors in general's uniform, and up against the wall a table on which is a coffee pot—this forms the furniture of her room. But she can now have caviar on her bread, and milk with her coffee.

It is late. She undresses and in her nightdress and with her feet bare she stands on her little rug and is lost in deep and silent prayer before the crucifix over her bed. Pressing her slender fingers to her forehead very tightly, she bends lower and lower, finally dropping in a heap to the floor, where she lies crouched for a long time. She implores God to understand and forgive her if he can. The sacrilege is only acted on the stage; in her heart she is faithful and believing as of old. But she no longer has the strength to use tooth powder instead of face powder.

In the Driftway

HE was lettering a huge bill board and doing it so rapidly and yet neatly that the Drifter paused to admire, then mustered courage to speak. "How many years does it take to do it as fast as that?" "I'm not very fast. I've only been at it twenty years." He smiled and dug for a cigarette. "It depends on the man, how long he's an apprentice. I was three an' a half years, but I was anxious to learn. Most of them are six or seven. You know, nowadays at the scale they get—how much do you think a helper gets? He gets fifty dollars a week. Well, lots of 'em are satisfied an' don't want to get further. Now me, I wanted to go up, not just for the more money but for the honor of it.

* * * * *

"WAS our increase handed to us on a platter? Hell, no! We fought for it. Ten weeks we was out. Strike benefit came in mighty good then. Either a five-day week or higher scale we asked for. Now we got it, and no lay-offs in the middle of the week. Fourteen dollars a day for a man doing this work; ten for the helper. Union makes pretty good conditions. Why, you know what they used to do in the old days? Used to send a man out to paint in the swamps all alone. Of course they furnished hip boots. Had to carry tackle with a rope almost as big as this, paints, brushes, everything. Then probably pull off a piece of the signboard to stand on. And they'd tell you: 'Do this sign—bigger'n this it would be—today.' An' if you said 'Well, I don't know for sure whether I can finish,' they'd say 'Don't go out then.' Yeh, it's pretty good now.

* * * * *

"YEH, an' I'm not satisfied even now. No. I've been trying to paint. Been to school winters for the last five or six years. Grand Central. Portraiture an' life classes—nudes, you know, and action sketches. I'm doing four portraits right now. . . Yeh, and in Pennsylvania I took several summers off. Did landscape work. 'Bout thirty-five miles from Philadelphia. Been to Cape Cod two summers. Studied with Hawthorne there. . . You know those men that are really finished—Well, I s'pose you wouldn't call them exactly finished ever—it's too big a field. But you know. Men with a national, I might even say an international reputation I've known, they pretty near go hungry sometimes. These rich people get their pictures painted by about everybody that's big; then they don't want any more. And these men, they'd rather go hungry or anyway be poor than do a cheap portrait. And there's lots of people who could give $250 for a portrait and would probably like it.

* * * * *

"YES sir! That's it! That's just it! There's nothing better in life than creative work. I don't get any money out of these portraits I'm doing now. It's kind of, well, I haven't any studio, and, well, it's kind of embarrassing to have a model—you and your wife—and it's embarrassing for the model too. The wife, she gets tired posing. So these people they are friends of ours and they come in, and during the rest period we have a little tea and something to eat maybe, and talk. . . You're right. Yes, sir. If everybody gets interested in art—if those people who could pay $250 or so would think of having their portraits done . . . a great market and it would—stimulate. . . . Oh yes, quite a few. There's George Green, and a fellow name of Hendrickson, and a fellow—Bill Watts. They're all good painters. Bill Watts is really clever. I mean he's unusual, but he can't get work. Drinks. . . . Glad you stopped. It's good to talk to some one that's interested in things."

* * * * *

MAY it ever be that several hundred millions of people (oh yes, there must be a limit some time) may have leisure, time free from the production of the necessities of existence?

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Sex Literature Continued Further

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It seems surprising that a man of such attainments as Mr. McFee seems to possess should speak of "Ulysses" in the same breath as "The Sun Also Rises." I agree with the writer of the letter headed, "Sissified Sex Literature" about the modern sexy story which portends to be art, or as he calls it, "important." It is fairly obvious that Brett herself called the turn by dubbing herself unmistakably canine, which she undoubtedly was, and yet why should this novel even be mentioned with such a masterpiece as "Ulysses."

Any person who wades through 735 pages of "Ulysses" cannot be accused of pruriency, and any human individual who approaches the work without apology will never feel the need of extenuation for reading a book that Mr. McFee calls "feminine in its preoccupation with the nastiness of sex." The book is certainly not milk for babes; neither is real literature. Finishing "Ulysses" for the first time you may call it the "maddest, muddiest, most loathsome book issued in our own or any other time . . . inartistic, incoherent, unquotably nasty," as the Sphere reviewed it, or you may agree with the Police Gazette of England, the Sporting News (the Pink 'Un), that the main contents of the book are enough to make a Hottentot sick, "not alone sordidly pornographic but intensely dull."

These reviews may summarize Mr. McFee's opinion of sex and the writer's preoccupation with it in "Ulysses," but at the risk of opprobrium many writers have stated that it is a great work and will have more influence on literature and writers than any book of the last two hundred years. Ford Madox Ford says: "One feels admiration that is almost reverence for the incredible labors of this incredible genius. . . . No writer after today will be able to neglect 'Ulysses' . . . an adult, a European work . . . austere and composed—a book of profound knowledge and profound renderings of humanity."

Undoubtedly "Ulysses" is more obscene than most professedly pornographic books, but it is too big to call either indecent or either moral or unmoral. This great Rabelaisian work with its portentous display of Irish mythology, folklore, and history; its accumulation of thousands of references to ancient philosophy and symbolism; its vast store of knowledge extending and embracing every known form of education will never be forgotten by the erudite who regard literature as something more than ice cream.

Mr. Gilbert Seldes remarked in a review appearing in The Nation that Joyce was "among the very great writers of whom only two could be named as compared to him in regard to the long devotion to their work and for the triumphant conclusion —Flaubert and Henry James." Mr. Seldes goes on to say in one of the finest criticisms of "Ulysses" that "The galvanic fury in which the 'Walpurgisnacht' episode is played, is, one feels certain, not equalled in literature."

"Ulysses" is certainly not "feminine in its preoccupation with the nastiness of sex." It is too big a work to be called dirt, or labeled or pigeon-holed in some convenient nook as anything. "Ulysses" is not dirt and being creative it is art. Mr. McFee is perfectly justified in rebelling at the hundreds of decidedly cheap and florid works that are being passed off as works of art. Why, though, class "Ulysses" with anything so innocuous as Beyle's "Le Rouge et Le Noir" or as unimportant as "The Sun Also Rises"?

Homer's poem may not have been conceived in the same spirit as "Ulysses" but as a record or chronicle it follows the blind poet faithfully. If all Mr. McFee can see in "Ulysses" is the so-called "dirt" and "smut" he had better re-read the book with patience (and anyone needs it). Rabelais has never been dirt for Pullman smoking cars and I doubt if the average traveling man has ever heard of James Joyce.

Seattle, Washington, July 26 JOHN LEEDS KERR

The Truth About Canossa

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Just as I was beginning to hope that the old legend of Lambert of Hersfeld in regard to Henry IV was dead The Nation helps to revive it. Forty years ago German scholars showed that the story of "three days and three nights in the snow" was ridiculous and historically without foundation. The letter of Gregory VII covering the case already disproves that. Scholarship had gone so far that every recent text on the Middle Ages has embodied the new and sound interpretation. And now The Nation cartoons the legend and gives it a new lease of life!

Will you not please tell your readers that Henry IV was not ordered to Canossa, that all efforts were made to prevent his going, that his "penitence" was a shrewd political move by which the pope was wholly outwitted, that he did not stand for three days and three nights in the snow barefooted (even Pope Gregory's letter mentions his woolens). In short that Canossa was in every sense of the term a victory of the unscrupulous king over the politician pope.

New York, July 23 H. C. ENGELBRECHT

Should Music Teachers Be Licensed?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: "It is not their numbers which are to be watched, but their quality and the character of their instruction." This sentence quoted from your editorial Musicians and Their Jobs, June 29, sounds a challenge to music teachers and a warning to their pupils. A pointed query, "Who is to do the watching?"

Those fortunate ones who attend an endowed conservatory or a college need have little fear about the quality of their instruction. As a rule competent and well-equipped instructors are employed. It is in the field of private instruction—and a very large field—that supervision is sadly neglected and needed.

When fond parents look for a music teacher, the important consideration is "What's his price?" A few do want to know the ability and knowledge of the prospective instructor. Today any one may hang out a shingle. "Violin Studio," "Piano Studio," or "Saxaphone, Banjo and Ragtime-Piano Playing Taught—Guaranteed—6 Lessons—New Methods—Quick Results." The louder the noise, the larger the sign, the more quackery will you find. This type of instructor is interested in selling an instrument—at an enormous profit—and doesn't care about the quality of his instruction or the welfare of his pupil.

The situation here seems to be very much akin to the one which existed in the medical, legal and public-school fields before the licensing of doctors, dentists, lawyers, and teachers. Some incompetents do slip through—but the great majority are equipped to practice their profession. The state seeks to safeguard its citizens by setting up definite qualifications and standards. This licensing of individuals is being extended in many directions. Is it not time to include music teaching so that the watching will not be done in a haphazard fashion but by some board of examiners who know what music teaching requires.

New York, July 5 SILAS J. BIRNBAUM

President Eliot's Letters

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The family of the late Charles W. Eliot and I are desirous of obtaining as many as possible of his letters to correspondents both at home and abroad, for use or reference in connection with a biography or biographical collection of letters which I have agreed to prepare for publication. Mr. Eliot's life covered such a long span and his correspondence was so wide that we are trying to take every means of reaching what may be interesting. Letters may be sent to me at 10 East 10th Street, New York City, or if sent to the Eliot family they will be forwarded to me.

Oakdale, Long Island, July 16 HENRY JAMES

School Wants Old Nations

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Virginia Normal and Industrial Institute wishes to complete its file of The Nation. As the boat carrying our first shipment of magazines to the bindery was lost, our files date back only to 1920. Will you please ask through your columns if any one has any copies of The Nation which he would care to dispose of.

L. H. FOSTER, Treasurer-Business Manager,
Virginia Normal and Industrial Instutute.

Petersburg, Virginia, July 28

Contributors to This Issue

CHARLES A. BEARD is the author of important volumes on the economic background of American history.

EIGHTH CLARK is a pseudonym.

EVA FRANK has just returned from a trip to Mexico.

CORA MILEY is a resident of Oklahoma.

PANTELEIMON ROMANOV is a Russian writer.

FLOYD MCKNIGHT is a New York poet and novelist.

HARRY ELMER BARNES is author of "The Genesis of the World War."

ALTER BRODY is a New York poet, dramatist, and critic.

Only 44 copies left

Who Is Calvin Coolidge?

A stenographic account of the answer to the Coolidge Riddle by William Hard, Frank R. Kent, Carter Field and Oswald Garrison Villard. Mimeographed and bound. $1.

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York

Books

A Legend

By FLOYD McKNIGHT

I

Small talk had occupied their lives for years—
Gossip and books—until each learned the might
Within the other's flesh one tiresome night.
Clinging in dark embrace, they knew no fears;
He touched her softly, whispered to her ears,
Attained a pinnacle of strange delight;
He built a dream that lingered with him, bright
As only an imagining appears.

The same small talk again. She would have said
How their two minds had flown too far away;
His fingers would have cherished her. Instead
The small talk trickled. Gone was an old boldness;
Invisible to all but them that day
Between those two there crept a little coldness.

II

Slowly he wandered down a darkened street,
Peered upward at a shining window-pane,
Remembering a warmth where they had lain.
He climbed a staircase leading to her suite,
But at the door he grew afraid to meet
His dreaming face to face, so fled again
Downstairs, out of the house and through the rain
Into a place to drink and think and eat.

Within her room a girl longed quietly
For his return. Frightened, she locked the door,
And watched the log-flame leaping like a dancer,
Scattering golden shadows over the floor.
She sat, holding a book upon her knee,
Listening for a knock she would not answer.

England Arraigns Herself

British Documents on the Origins of the War: The Outbreak of the War, June 28-August 4, 1914. Edited by G. P. Gooch and Harold Temperley. His Majesty's Stationery Office. 10s. 6d.

THE British Government has issued the most important collection of documents bearing on the responsibility for the World War which has been published since the appearance of the German, Austrian, and Russian documents shortly after the close of the great conflict. It is unique in being the only complete publication of the documents on the crisis of 1914 made voluntarily by a government consisting of the same groups and classes that ruled a country before and during the World War. The German, Austrian, and Russian publications were executed by radical governments eager to discredit the capitalistic regimes in their respective countries.

The volume under review constitutes the last volume of a projected eleven-volume series designed to cover the period from 1898 to 1914. The editors of the complete work are to be the well-known British historians, George Peabody Gooch and Harold Temperley. The rather unusual procedure of publishing the last volume in a chronological sequence as the first of the set is due to the fact that Messrs. Gooch and Temperley found that Mr. J. W. Headlam-Morley had already prepared an edition of the documents on the period from June to August, 1914, and it was decided to use this immediately because of the great importance of these documents in the study of war guilt. Therefore the real editor of this volume is Mr. Headlam-Morley. Messrs. Gooch and Temperley have merely compared these documents with the originals in the Foreign Office.

Mr. Headlam-Morley was one of the leading British propagandists during the World War, and he has recently given evidence of still holding firmly to an extreme version of the war-time mythology and of being willing to stoop to misrepresentation of facts (see London Observer, October 3, 1926; Quarterly Review, January, 1927). As far as the external mechanics of the editing are concerned, he has done an admirable piece of work, his cross-references and comparisons with the original British Blue Book being most helpful. On the other hand, his historical introduction and his notes are often misleading and disingenuous, as a result of his efforts to explain away facts damaging to the Entente epic and to the reputations of those in the British Foreign Office in 1914. For example, on page xii of his introduction he dismisses as of no importance the statement made by Poincaré on the morning of July 30 that he regarded war as inevitable. Even more open to challenge is his explanation of the British deceptions of 1914 in regard to the French enclosures in Document 319.

The number of documents printed greatly exceed, of course, those published in the Blue Book of 1914, there being 161 in the Blue Book and 677 in the present volume. The interesting question at once arises as to the nature of the documents omitted from or paraphrased in the original Blue Book. For the most part, such official editing in the Blue Book appears to have been done to save the reputation of England's allies, France and Russia. The great majority of the important documents omitted or paraphrased were more damaging to France and Russia than to England. To be sure, in so far as such documents reveal an inflexible determination upon war on the part of Russia and France, they are indirectly damaging to the English pretensions of having joined in the conflict to aid her fellow-members of the Entente in a defensive war. A considerable number of documents were also omitted or paraphrased in 1914 because they embodied facts too favorable to the view that Germany and Austria did not desire war in 1914.

In regard to the Austro-Serbian crisis one learns from the British documents that the British Ambassador in Vienna, Sir Maurice de Bunsen, while not aware of the Serbian complicity in the assassination plot, fully informed Grey of the desperate plight of Austria in the face of the murder and the Serbian nationalistic intrigues. He indicated the atrocious attitude of the Serbian press in regard to the assassination, and made it clear that Austria could scarcely afford to allow the crisis to pass without decisive action in the Serbian issue. Even Dumaine, the French Ambassador in Vienna, admitted that Austria had the alternative of dealing severely with Serbia or losing the southern Slav provinces. Before the final formulation of her ultimatum or any conclusive decision as to what she would do in regard to the Serbian menace, Austria, on July 16, sent out two definite preliminary "feelers" to discover, if possible, what attitude England would take in the event of a severe Austrian policy toward Serbia. The result was an apparent indication of British indifference, which even the Russians regarded as British encouragement of a strong Austrian stand in the matter. Austria thus not only delayed her ultimatum until Poincaré had left St. Petersburg, but also received reasonable assurance of probable British neutrality in the event of complications. Nothing could be better proof of the Austrian desire to avoid a European war and of her efforts to be fairly sure of being able to localize the possible struggle with Serbia. At the beginning of the crisis, indeed, the great majority of the British not only believed that the Austro-Serbian affair should be localized but that it could be localized. Even Bienvenu-Martin, French acting Foreign Minister, told Lord Bertie in Paris that he did not believe that French opinion would sanction intervention on so inadequate a ground as the protection of Serbia from Austria. The fact is that the British authorities were at the outset sympathetic with Austria rather than with Serbia, and were not in any sense brought to their stand with Russia and France by the Austrian attack upon Serbia. They took an interest in the Austro-Serbian impasse only because it became apparent that Russia and France were determined to seize this crisis as an opportunity to test out the strength of the Triple Entente as against that of the Triple Alliance. "Brave and innocent little Serbia" became a potent phrase in England only after Sir Edward had surrendered to the war-makers.

In regard to Germany the British documents show that the British were completely aware that Germany did not take the initiative in urging Austria to deal severely with Serbia. Grey was quite conscious that Germany ardently wished to see the Austro-Serbian clash localized, and that she desired peace in 1914. While rejecting a conference of Powers, because it was to be called under conditions which would have been manifestly unfair to Austria, Germany cooperated enthusiastically with Grey in the diplomatic efforts to avert a general European war. Indeed, in the place of the rejected conference, Germany substituted Grey's original diplomatic proposal—direct conversations between St. Petersburg and Vienna—which Grey enthusiastically described—in 1914—as "the most preferable plan of all." Still more, Germany agreed to put pressure on Austria to modify her Serbian program even when threatened by Russian mobilization, a concession which Grey himself admitted to be acquiesence of a most difficult and unusual sort. Germany also promised not to mobilize if Russia mobilized solely against Austria, an agreement which involved grave military danger for Germany. England, of course, later refused to promise her neutrality if Germany refrained from attacking France. The British authorities were fully informed to the effect that the Russian mobilization preceded both the German and the Austrian mobilizations, and that the German mobilization was provoked by and was an answer to the Russian. They also knew that the French military preparations for war were much further advanced by July 31 than the German. Perhaps most significant of all is the letter of Sir Edward Goschen, British Ambassador in Berlin, to Sir Arthur Nicolson, permanent Under Secretary of Foreign Affairs at London. Written at the height of the crisis on July 30, it expresses a definite conviction that both the German Government and the German people were strong for peace:

> I have a stronger conviction than Cambon that both the Chancellor and Jagow would like to avoid a general war—whatever may be the opinion of the hot-headed division and the General Staff. This is not only my opinion but the opinion of most diplomatists and many Germans. . . . I hear in fact from all sides that the financial and industrial classes are dead against a war in any shape—but particularly against a war which in its origin does not touch German interests.

In reality the only case which Great Britain had against Germany in July, 1914, was Germany's growing industrial, commercial, and naval power. That was a weighty case, to be sure, but it was not one which had its roots in excessive militarism or aggressive diplomacy on the part of Germany. On the other hand, the British documents show that from July 24 onward Nicolson and Crowe, convinced that England should make common cause with Russia and France, instituted a most malicious campaign against German acts and intentions in their notations on the relevant dispatches, hoping thereby to overcome the caution and hesitancy of their chief, Grey. Their distortions are at times almost incredible and often make the Kaiser's digs at England in his marginal notes seem a penetrating and convincing analysis by comparison. The British documents make it absolutely certain that France and Russia were determined to force the Central Powers to accept diplomatic humiliation or the test of arms.

The British documents show that whatever Russia may have promised Serbia before the assassination of the Archduke, it is certain that by July 18 she gave Serbia assurance that she would protect her against any Austrian attack—this being long before the submission of the Austrian ultimatum to Serbia. Not only did Poincaré encourage the Russian militarists on his visit to St. Petersburg from July 20 to 23, but he also laid the basis for Franco-Russian solidarity in the crisis by reaffirming the Alliance and its obligations in the impending crisis, as well as by vetoing Grey's plan to avert difficulty by direct conversations between St. Petersburg and Vienna.

The precipitate Russian military measures which made the war inevitable are fully revealed in the British documents, indicating that the British Foreign Office was promptly and minutely informed as to the date and extent of all these military moves, from the preliminary plan of July 24 and 25 to the general mobilization order of July 30. It was also aware that Izvolski was asserting that war was inevitable as early as July 27, before the Austrian attack on Serbia. The British were fully informed in 1914 to the effect that the Russian mobilization came before the Austrian and the German, and that the Russian mobilization forced the German in answer and self-defense. Grey admitted this fact in a telegram to Bertie on July 31. The British even knew that the Russian mobilization was decided upon approximately twenty-fours before the German declaration of a state of imminent war, but concealed this fact from the English public for twelve years.

The clue to British policy toward Russia throughout the crisis is to be found in the note of Nicolson on Buchanan's telegram of July 24: "Our attitude during the crisis will be regarded by Russia as a test and we must be careful not to alienate her." Not only did Britain fail to exert any restraining influence on Russian policies which were recognized as leading to war; she actually encouraged such policies and acts. On July 25 Grey telegraphed Buchanan, implying that he believed the Austrian ultimatum might warrant Russian mobilization, that Germany would not mobilize if Russia mobilized solely against Austria, and that Germany would press Austria for moderation even if the latter was threatened by Russian mobilization. These telegrams were very important in encouraging the Russians to take their preliminary mobilization measures. The information sent by Grey to Russia on July 27, to the effect that the British fleet was being held in battle formation and that this should be taken by Russia as an evidence of English adherence to the Entente, appears to have been more influential than anything else in leading the Russians to risk the final step of general mobilization.

The almost criminally inciting nature of Grey's well-meant vacillation and indecision is well illustrated by his attitude toward Russia and Austria on July 27. He told the Austrians that they might well proceed to make war upon Serbia, but that they should be careful not to bring Russia into the fray. On the same day he informed the Russians that the above-mentioned mobilization of the British fleet might be taken by Russia as assurance that Great Britain would not stand aside if Russia made war on behalf of Serbia. An attitude better designed to promote extreme policies on both sides could scarcely be imagined.

The implicit indictment of France in the British documents is not less overwhelming. The British Foreign Office was entirely aware as to the inciting nature of Poincaré's visit to St. Petersburg, as to his blocking of Grey's first diplomatic proposals, as to his reaffirmation of the most extreme version and application of the Franco-Russian Alliance, and as to his insistence that the Russians must be kept firm in the crisis. The pathetically weak case of France in standing by Russia in her bellicose policy was clearly pointed out by Lord Bertie, the British Ambassador in Paris. He pronounced the Russian proposal to protect Serbia "an absurd and obsolete attitude," and stated that he could scarcely believe that France and England would make war in behalf of so preposterous a cause. And it must be remembered that Bertie was vigorously anti-German and had cooperated with Poincaré in frustrating the Haldane negotiations in 1912. Bertie also telegraphed Grey that even Bienvenu-Martin, the French acting Foreign Minister, had admitted to him personally that he did not believe that France could be induced to go to war in support of so discreditable a cause as the Russian protection of Serbia. In short, Bertie's communications make it clear that neither the French authorities nor the French public were for war before Poincaré's return from Russia on July 29, in spite of Paul Cambon's hasty secret trip to Paris, July 25-27, and the press falsifications of German policy, initiated by the Echo de Paris.

The British documents contain a full and illuminating account of how Poincaré turned the tide for war as soon as he returned home, how he invented various diplomatic subterfuges to deceive the French, British, and Italian publics and to aid Grey in bringing England into the war, and how fully aware the British authorities were in July, 1914, concerning the dishonesty and hypocrisy in these French acts. Bertie reported that after Poincaré's arrival the French Government was beginning to suppress anti-militaristic meetings, that the French press was becoming more belligerent in tone, and that on the morning of July 30 Poincaré had announced that he believed war inevitable. That was the day when England and Germany united in diplomatic efforts to preserve peace, which might have succeeded but for the Russian mobilization which the French had encouraged and approved. The British were under no illusions as to the bellicose attitude and the diplomatic hypocrisy and evasiveness of their partners in the Entente. The documents even show that Cambon openly admitted to Grey in 1914 that the notorious ten kilometer withdrawal order was issued "for the sake of public opinion in England." Bertie had also warned Grey that Poincaré's appeal for a British declaration of solidarity with France and Russia was only a hypocritical subterfuge designed to make war that much more certain. Grey possessed the information which proved the atrocious French falsifications of the dates of the mobilizations and of alleged German aggression. By August 3—the day of his famous speech in behalf of France—Grey was in possession of enough information to compile a more spirited indictment of France and Russia than that contained in Judge Bausman's "Let France Explain."

The British did not desire a European war in the abstract, but they were determined to enter if France and Russia did, however bad the case of these allies. The great indictment of Great Britain in the crisis is that she did next to nothing to prevent France and Russia from exploiting the Austro-Serbian crisis as a mode of testing once and for all the strength of the two sets of alliances. The dominating leaders of the policy of unhesitating intervention were, in the order named, Sir Eyre Crowe and Sir Arthur Nicolson (Under Secretaries in the Foreign Office). Their arguments are to be found especially in the notes attached to Documents Number 101 and 369. They took the position that Great Britain would better go to war than take any chances on either straining the Entente or risking a German victory. As Crowe wrote on July 30 (Document 318):

> What must weigh with His Majesty's Government is the consideration that they should not by a declaration of unconditional solidarity with France and Russia induce and determine these two Powers to choose the path of war. If and when, however, it is certain that France and Russia cannot avoid war, and are going into it, my opinion, for what it is worth, is that in that case our intervention should be immediate and decided.

Grey hesitated because he did not want to incite France and Russia, because he did not wish to admit what he had denied, namely, secret English understandings with France, and because he feared an adverse vote in the Cabinet and the House of Commons if he were too hasty. He was muddle-headed only in his apparent failure to see that war could be avoided only by a British declaration of neutrality or by restraint of France and Russia. Churchill is revealed in the documents as "rearing to go."

The British documents furnish the final proof that the invasion of Belgium had no relation whatever to the British policy of 1914. That policy was decided upon, with the grounds for it, on July 25, three days before Moltke drew up his secret ultimatum to Belgium. Nothing whatever was said about Belgium. Further, unpublished French documents used by Bourgeois and Pagès show that Grey informed Cambon of his conversion to intervention on July 31, before he had received any answer from either France or Germany as to what stand they would take in regard to Belgium.

If one concedes that it was to the interest of Great Britain to encourage and enter a fight in behalf of the Entente, then these documents prove that Grey and his associates played their cards with great skill. But if Grey really desired to avoid a European war, then he behaved with the utmost—even criminal—stupidity. Had he put the same pressure on Russia that Germany put on Austria, or declared for British neutrality in the event of Russian aggression, there is little probability that there would have been any European war.

HARRY ELMER BARNES

A Tract for Free Trade

The Road to Prosperity. By Sir George Paish with a Foreword by George E. Roberts. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.00.

THIS is a short book, somewhat padded and distinctly repetitious. But Sir George Paish's fundamental principles are invariably sound and the thesis he develops, that Europe is still in a critical and gravely dangerous condition, no one can gainsay. The one solution he sees is the rapid expansion of the buying power of all European countries, and to that end he would remove every possible hindrance from the path of unlimited international trade. Tariffs, of course, must go first of all; reparations must be settled, confidence restored, and an economic and financial peace established. He calls earnestly for the rehabilitation of Russia by loans from the United States and Great Britain—now further off because of the ruptured diplomatic relations between Great Britain and Russia—and generally demands a financial Locarno. In effect it is all a plea for international free trade. As such everyone must welcome it who is not blinded by the protective theory.

The book will, however, fail to wield the influence the subject and the high standing of its author warrant because of the stylistic faults already referred to and because Sir George has become known as a pessimist with the result that his writings are often discounted in the very financial and economic quarters in which they should most be taken to heart. In this volume it seems, too, as if Sir George shrank from stating his case in baldest form. Yet it is a tract which ought to be in the hands of every American financier and of such of our business men as know something of economics and trade and can use their brains to reason with. Sir George lays the best remedies before the world; the question is whether his advice and that of the great group of bankers who have demanded a wiping out of tariff barriers will be heeded.

Mr. George E. Roberts of the National City Bank contributes a lengthy foreword. His comprehension of the question may be exemplified by his solemn upholding of President Coolidge's veto of the McNary-Haugen Farm Bill on the ground that it is "contrary to the principles of the Constitution to extend special favors, which have to be paid for by the citizens as a whole, to a small percentage of these citizens. The President's position in this matter is practically in line with that of the publicists of Europe in regard to the undesirability of legislation that interferes with freedom of exchange and that maintains privileged classes." But what else does the tariff do? Has not the United States for generations extended special favors to manufacturers, which have to be paid for by the citizens as a whole to aid a small percentage of these citizens? Despite his respect for Sir George Paish, Mr. Roberts trembles for our protective system lest the attacks upon it involve our general prosperity and he urges all good citizens to concentrate their attention upon industries like the automobile business which are so rooted in national economic advantage as to be beyond foreign competition.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Capek's Divine Comedy

The Absolute at Large. By Karel Capek. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

PLAYING with ideas instead of characters need not necessarily be a didactic occupation for a novelist—providing he plays with them. The difference between the artist and the moralist is that when the artist releases an idea it is a free agent to him, an unknown quantity with limitless possibilities; whereas the moralist enslaves it from the outset to some ulterior purpose. There are those who would confine art to a diet of emotion—preferably raw—and there are those who look down upon such a diet as infantile, and would have art function cerebrally only. Both theories will rebound harmlessly when they hit an artist. What is essentially aesthetic is neither the ideas nor the emotion but the orchestration of them. Keeping this in mind, a piece of intellectual by-play by Shaw on British Imperialism may present a truer aesthetic pattern than the most "powerful" situation in Dreiser; and by the same token Karel Capek, for all his perilous consanguinity with H. G. Wells, remains an artist—to whom ideas are means rather than end.

Getting his cue from the latest adventure of modern science—the attempt to split the atom—Capek hits on the spiritual counterpart of it. Just as Science professes itself to be dismayed at the infinite physical energy which its success would unleash, Capek speculates on an equally terrific inundation of spiritual energy, which he cleverly links with the splitting of the atom and the consequent release of the Cosmic Mind imminent in all Matter. Of this he weaves a fascinating metaphysical detective story which manages to be as thrilling as a Sherlock Holmes mystery, without doing undue damage to a profound premise.

In fact one could easily take Capek seriously, if one chose to. Though he has found the splitting of the atom a convenient propulsion for his imagination the situation that he conjures up is within the bounds of conceivability. Not literally, but as a psychological phenomenon. With the unflagging aggressiveness of Science and the breakdown of the ritualized limitations that Man has erected in his mind against the Unknown, the Infinite, the Absolute, it becomes a question whether the average psyche will be able to balance itself without its accustomed supports, unless some substitute is discovered for Religion. It is a truism of comparative theology that Religion, among both civilized and primitive peoples, serves as insulator as well as conductor of the Divine. It is a conductor of the Divine largely in the sense that a lightning rod is a conductor—to attract and divert the highly dangerous divine or demonic forces into a restricted channel and prevent them from interfering with the orderly processes of society. Speaking of the innumerable taboos that hedge about divine or semi-divine representatives among primitive peoples, Frazer says:

> These taboos act, so to say, as electric insulators to preserve the spiritual force with which these persons are charged from suffering or inflicting harm by contact with the outer world.

Precisely what the Catholic bishop of Capek's novel says to the rash scientists who have broken into the cosmic Holy of Holies —the Atom:

> "Gentlemen, in the name of Heaven, do not imagine that the Church brings God into the world. The Church merely confines and controls Him. And you two unbelievers are loosing Him upon the earth like a flood. The ship of Peter will survive even this deluge; like the Ark of Noah it will ride out this inundation of the Absolute—but your modern society," cried the Bishop with a mighty voice, "that will pay the price!"

Food for thought! Many a Polynesian race has been annihilated through the forcible break-up of its protective taboos by western "civilizers." We ourselves have fared well so far, because the dissolution of our taboos is proceeding much more gradually. Nevertheless modern science is accumulating, however gradually, a serious problem for the psychiatry of the future.

But Capek has wisely chosen to be a jester rather than a prophet. Which makes his Absolute at Large all the more deadly. Unharnessed to any program, bound for no particular destination, it runs amok among our contemporary institutions —which turn topsy-turvy at its transvaluating touch. The result is a grand cosmic comedy in which the Lord Himself is one of the funniest actors. For Capek is impartial. If our human foibles are a spectacle for visiting Gods, equally ludicrous are the efforts of the Lord at running the machinery of modern industry in the same incontinent fashion in which He runs Nature. Satire from such an original starting point may seem so easy that one is tempted to feel that Capek has not sufficiently exploited all its possibilities. But one can hardly blame him for not having rung all the changes on such a rich theme.

ALTER BRODY

Books in Brief

Prosper Mérimée: A Mask and a Face. By G. H. Johnstone. E. P. Dutton and Company. $4.

A vivid and well-written account of a writer too little known in English. The general disrepute into which the French romantic period has fallen has intended to obscure the fact, made abundantly clear by Mr. Johnstone, that Mérimée, for the most part, merely aped the romantic fashions of his time and that, like Stendhal, with whom he has much in common, his soul was really in the eighteenth century. It is too bad that Mérimée should be known by generations of school children as the author of "Colomba" and "Carmen" and as the fashioner of a factitious local color when his early satires, his short stories, and the durable and disillusioned quality of his mind offer to the modern reader a store of riches for the most part unsuspected. Mr. Johnstone's careful and enthusiastic study should attract many readers to the consideration of this fascinating figure, whose motto was "beware of believing."

William Henry Harrison; a Political Biography. By Dorothy Burne Goebel. Indiana Historical Collections, Vol. XIV. Indianapolis: Historical Bureau of the Indiana Library and Historical Department.

Curious that we have been forced to wait to this late day for a satisfactory biography of William Henry Harrison. He was not a great man, but he was identified with the Ohio Valley from its earliest pioneer days until, grown wealthy and populous, it began manufacturing favorite sons for the Presidency. Miss Goebel has succeeded in writing a scholarly biography which will repay perusal by any reader who is interested in the career of an ordinary American official of a region as it was passing from the frontier period to a state of semi-civilization. Possibly the author may be criticized for not sufficiently identifying her hero with the changing environment about him. Harrison was not, however, a product of the frontier. His most impressionable years were spent among the F.F.V.'s, and the prejudices and culture of the Old Dominion clung to him throughout life. The author has constantly been confronted with the direct issue raised by conflicting claims of rival partisans. The evidence is not always sufficient to determine the truth. Miss Goebel sometimes appears too favorable to Harrison, but not often. She recognizes propaganda such as Harrison's friends and enemies employed, and escapes generally its traps. After reading this volume, one is convinced that the taunt of "land-grabber" so often used in connection with Harrison should be softened. The policy he pursued concerning Indian lands was evidently manufactured in Washington. He obeyed orders, as other politicians of the Ohio Valley have generally done.

The American Year Book. A Record of Events and Progress for the Year 1926. Edited by Albert Bushnell Hart and William M. Schuyler. The Macmillan Company. $7.50.

Mirrors of the Year. A National Review of Oustanding Figures, Trends, and Events of 1926-7. Edited by Grant Overton. The Frederick A. Stokes Company. $4.

After annual publication from 1910 to 1919, inclusive, "The American Year Book" was dropped until last year, when it reappeared. The second volume of the new series is now at hand, containing more than a thousand pages of useful information assembled by a staff of specialists. A new feature is the addition, in connection with each general subject, of a list of societies whose activities relate to it. "Mirrors of the Year" is less a record of events than a series of monographs by American writers giving a personal interpretation of certain aspects which to them seem worth setting down.

Natural Man: A Record from Borneo. By Charles Hose. London: Macmillan and Company. 30 shillings.

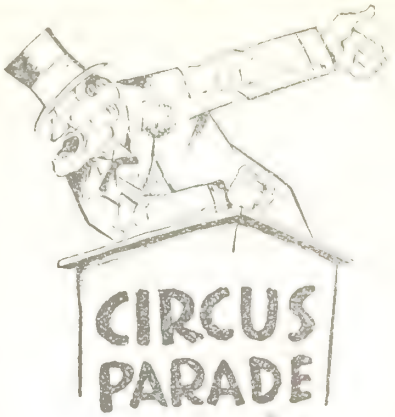
We learn here of an early English visitor to Borneo, Charles Brooke, who accomplished an interesting variation of the usual British imperialistic practices. In 1841 he took command of the troops of one warring faction of the natives of Sarawak on condition that if he quieted the country he should become its Rajah. So to this day the Rajahs of Sarawak have been Englishmen, and the whole of northwest Borneo is now British. Mr. Hose gives a competent but uninspired record of the lives of two of the aboriginal peoples who live in the jungles, the Kayans and the Kenyahs—their tribal and village life, their ceremonials, their festivals, their arts and crafts, their religious beliefs, and their medical practices—and there is a final chapter on Morals and Mentality, where we learn the fact, not too startling, that in neither respect are these people identical with the inhabitants of Western Europe.

THEATER

Little Theatre
44th Street West of Broadway
Evgs. 8:30. Mats. Tues. and Thurs. at popular prices.

THE GRAND STREET FOLLIES
"One cannot find anywhere in New York more clever ideas, more fresh satire or more verve."—Joseph Wood Krutch in The Nation.

THE NATION'S INDEX to Volume CXXIV
January-June, 1927
is now ready. One copy will be sent to each library on the subscription list of The Nation. Other subscribers who wish a copy should send their request to the Subscription Department.
THE NATION
20 Vesey Street New York City



COME on in. See the circus from below. See the faded wanton women, see the Monday men, the thieves, the liars and the embryo yeggs. Hear the tales that are told. You never saw a circus like this—from the inside. If you have read Beggars of Life, you know what to expect. —Illustrated, $2.50

OIL!
A Novel by
UPTON SINCLAIR
A best seller everywhere. "Story telling with an edge on it." —Wm. McFee
"One of the most remarkable books I have ever perused and one of the most readable." —Oswald Garrison Villard $2.50

THERE'S NOT A BATHING SUIT IN RUSSIA and
Other Bare Facts by
WILL ROGERS
"It is a fine achievement to succeed simultaneously in two such difficult and mutually exclusive fields as humor and politics." —N. Y. Times. Illus. $1.75
Albert & Charles Boni - 66 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

THE EVOLUTION OF MAN, by Wilhelm Boelsche
A clear, strong, simple summary not only of Darwin's theory but of the work of a generation of scientists since the lines Darwin opened up. Just what a busy man wants to have him a brief, concise view of Evolution. Cloth, illustrated, 80 cents by mail. Catalog free.
Charles H. Kerr & Co., 347 East Ohio St., Chicago, Ill.

Do you want to make extra money?
Address Dept. 11
THE NATION
20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK

International Relations Section

The Press in Haiti

THE oppression of Haitian editors under the American occupation was discussed by a Haitian, Carlos Martins, at the International Congress against Colonial Oppression and Imperialism, held recently in Brussels. Excerpts from his address follow.

After the American occupation of Haiti was established and in the proclamation launched by M. Louis Borno to announce his election to the presidency under guard of American marines, he had menaced the press with the thunders of martial law. A short time afterward, because of an article by Maitre S. Villard, notary, published in the Nouvelliste of Port-au-Prince, President Borno sent the author and the two editors, M. Ernest G. Chauvet and M. Fred. Duvigneaud, before the American court martial, which condemned the three journalists to imprisonment for six months, and to a fine of $300 each. This proceeding made more noise in the United States than in Haiti.

An order arrived from Washington to set them free. Then the High Commissioner cooked up with his marionette-president the most iniquitous of laws against the freedom of the press, which the Council of State ratified. And with the complicity of the examining magistrates, corruptly appointed by M. Louis Borno, "preventive imprisonment" has become the most formidable weapon in the hands of the American occupation against the newspaper men.

Let us examine these laws briefly: Under these press laws, which might be more justly termed "ukases against the press," every offense that may be committed by the press is a flagrant offense; that is to say, the government prosecutor can send a journalist to prison arbitrarily, without considering the time which may have elapsed since the publication of the incriminating article. The government's legal representative in the courts may order a summons issued against a newspaper man at any time he sees fit; and, after a pretended examination of the offending article may convert that summons into an order for imprisonment!

The manager and the editor of a newspaper are imprisoned with the writer of the article, as in the recent proceedings against M. Charles Moravia and M. Maurice Debrosse, editor-proprietor and manager of the Temps. In 1924 they also imprisoned the pressman of the Poste's printing establishment, as an accomplice in a pretended offense against the press laws. In 1925 they went still further, and locked up all the compositors of the Courrier Haitien, while, under the direction of an American officer, gendarmes brought coffee sacks and piled into them all the type in the composing room, which they took in a truck to the record office of the civil tribunal. . . .

It should be remembered not only that these ukases against the press are the work of the American occupation, but the agents who execute these orders are American officers. The chief of police and his deputy, the chief and the under-chief of the gendarmerie, and all the officers of public authority belong to the United States Marine Corps. It is unnecessary to say that the director of the penitentiary where they confine newspaper men is an American drawn from the Expeditionary Corps, assisted by two officers of the same origin. What happens to a newspaper man thus arbitrarily cast into prison? He stays there, without examination by a magistrate, without the judgment of a court. And if an American philanthropic society, knowing of the case, makes an appeal to the State Department at Washington, the invariable response is: "It is the native government which has acted, and we are powerless to interfere in the domestic affairs of Haiti, especially as we know from the reports of our High Commissioner that the Haitian government has proceeded by virtue of the powers conferred upon it by the national press laws, duly enacted and promulgated." . . .

More than that, the Haitian penal code provides that any one detained in a house of arrest has a right to an examination within twenty-four hours, but the examining magistrate named by the phantom-president, in agreement with the High Commissioner, as always, permits weeks to go by without calling the prisoner to his office to question him as to his identity and on the subject of the accusation. In general those who are so disposed may obtain the "favor" of being called before the examining magistrate on presenting a request for provisory liberty under caution (release on bail). But that request became useless with the ukase of 1923, which stipulated that provisory liberty could not be accorded to a newspaper man unless the magistrate's conclusions were in accord with the views of the government prosecutor. That is to say, the official casting a man into prison had the sole power to release his victim!

However, M. Pouget, editor of the Poste, when he was accused of an offense against the press laws and refused provisory liberty, denounced the unconstitutionality of this ruling to the Court of Cassation, on the ground that by virtue of the principle of the separation of powers, written in the constitution, the agent of the executive power might draw his conclusions as to the party to an action but could not deliver sentences, and that the judge alone possessed this high power. The complete bench of the Court of Cassation declared, in effect, that the law was unconstitutional, and consequently inoperative.

Very promptly when this decree had been pronounced, the High Commissioner and his president caused a new law to be registered by their Council of State to replace that declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. Under this new law it was no longer necessary that the examining magistrate's decision should be in conformity with the views of the prosecuting officer, but worse than that, neither the magistrate nor any other court was permitted to accord provisory freedom, with or without bail, to newspaper men undergoing preventive imprisonment. . . .

Recourse was had anew to the Court of Cassation, and again the law was decreed to be unconstitutional. But during all these proceedings, the newspaper men remained in prison, which was the object of the reigning dictatorship.

After these two reversals by Haitian justice, a third law was imposed. This time, in conformity with ordinary law, the right of provisory liberty was admitted, but the bail for each succeeding accusation by the prosecuting officer, and for each co-author or accomplice in the offense named by the court was fixed at $2,000 in cash; neither realty deeds nor the bonds of the Haitian Republic can be substituted for this purpose.

But, you ask, how can the editor of a newspaper, locked up in jail, be implicated in a new offense against the press laws, since he is no longer writing? That is the unbelievable paradox of a military dictatorship. Under the regulations of the penitentiary, enforced by an American officer, an imprisoned newspaper man cannot write. If a scrap of writing is found in a cell, the penalty is transfer to a dungeon, on bread and water. But if a new offense against the press laws is committed by his substitute, the editor is taken from prison to court to receive a new order of imprisonment as an accomplice. At the same time the author and the new manager may be sent to join him in the penitentiary. For a newspaper to be able to free its editor, its manager, and their collaborators would require a large liquid fortune. . . .

M. Louis-Eduard Pouget was arrested on December 26, 1924, because of an article on Charles XII, king of Sweden, who was killed in the year 1718. M. Louis Borno considered this to be "provocation for his assassination," and his master, General John H. Russell, a "recommendation for the assassination of functionaries." After five days of preventive imprisonment, M.

Remember "Floradora"?

Shanley's Restaurant—"The Merry Widow"—"Twenty-three, Skiddoo"—champagne—bustles and balloon sleeves "Mlle. Modiste"—"The Red Mill"...? They come to life again, the passing fancies that held sway in the Gay Nineties and the Naughty Hundreds, in the swift progress of Zelda Marsh's story. Here is the glamour of the stage—and the heart-breaks. Zelda with her flaming, unforgettable beauty, is the eternal symbol of woman's soul in travail, told in terms of grease-paint, of acetylene flares and hoarse-lunged barkers.

ZELDA MARSH

CHARLES G. NORRIS

Author of Brass, Bread, Salt, Pig Iron

DUTTON'S NEW YORK

AN ADVERTISER WRITES

"... and I would like to add that I have had numerous responses to my ad in The Nation, and am developing a clientele who are very pleasant to deal with."

Sincerely yours,

ANN SELEY, Antiques.

A WORD TO THE YOUNG FATHER

Do you propose to educate your son?

How ridiculous that query seems! Of course you do!

Yet, there are thousands of school boys who will not return to their classes next month and whose fathers were equally positive a year ago that they would go on through the university.

Why?

Because these parents have unexpectedly been taken away and no provision had been made by them for the education of their boys in the event of such an emergency.

You are a young man. See to it now, by acquiring an Educational Endowment policy, that the toddler of today will be educated whatever happens to you.

Ask your Prudential man or make inquiry direct of the Home Office

THE PRUDENTIAL

INSURANCE COMPANY of AMERICA

EDWARD D. DUFFIELD, President

Home Office, NEWARK, N. J.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

Pouget was taken from his cell to receive a new order of imprisonment as "the artisan of a plot to bring about the assassination of President Louis Borno." He demanded a hearing before an examining magistrate on this accusation. The only response was to confine him to a secret cell, day and night. He went on a hunger strike, in order to compel the attendance of a magistrate. After eight days, in the course of which he was much weakened, an examining magistrate appeared at the penitentiary to question him. He was permitted to quit his cell, but was not released from prison until seven months later, July 31, 1925; and from that day to this, no legal document has ever set forth whether such a plot existed or not. However, during that period, an individual who did not know M. Pouget, and whom M. Pouget did not know, was taken before the prosecuting officer who threatened to send him to prison if he did not agree to make a declaration that the editor of the Poste had offered him money to assassinate M. Borno. He refused to agree and was locked up, but upon provisory liberation, he went to the editorial rooms of the Poste and made this revelation which was published. No one would have dared to lie about so grave a matter. The government contented itself with ordering the magistrate to docket the case, and replied to the inquiries of M. Pouget's lawyer, "the examination is proceeding normally. . . .

The comedy of "reelection" was played on April 12, 1926. On March 26, they arrested the editor of the Poste, who had published the official documents proving the constitutional ineligibility of M. Borno, who was born in 1865, son of a foreigner naturalized as a Haitian nine years later; but M. Pouget's arrest was under an accusation of publishing "false news," because he demanded that the government "make an official declaration" to reassure the people regarding a report that a territorial concession had been sold to the United States for the establishment of a naval base. The government prosecutor held that this rumor was not true, and that consequently the journal had published false information. Two days later a fresh order of imprisonment was issued against M. Pouget as an accomplice of M. Latortue. Maitre Lys Latortue, an attorney of the Gonaives bar, had announced in the Poste that the Americans no longer permitted the Haitians to go bathing in Lapierre, a bathing beach near Gonaives, during the time that Americans were bathing. M. Latortue asked these gentlemen in khaki if they had taken these beaches as their own property, their naval base. Naval base! This offense of "giving false news of a nature to disturb the public peace," occasioned the imprisonment of Latortue as its author, and the second order of imprisonment against M. Pouget as his accomplice.

On April 16, American bayonets having again precipitated M. Borno into the presidency, two American officers came to release M. Latortue, M. Pouget, and his manager from the penitentiary. M. Pouget had not been called before an examining magistrate in this second affair. He related the incident in his newspaper, with this comment: "One does not know by whose order, that of the dictator or the under-dictator, he was set at liberty, but it certainly was not by the court, for he had never been interrogated by the examining magistrate. But the American High Commissioner was moved. When he gave the order to free his prisoners, he did not know the state of the case. . . ."

To correct this mistake, on June 16, 1926, the examining magistrate called the editor of the Poste before him for examination on the March offense and informed him that he himself had ordered that the editor be restored to liberty. This gives a correct idea of the insolence of the Yankee dictatorship in Haiti.

The epilogue is grotesque. Toward the end of 1926, the High Commissioner caused a decree of amnesty to be issued through M. Borno, couched in generous terms, in favor of the newspaper men who had not been brought to trial, and including all accusations made by the government prosecutor, and those which had been brought without authority, not to mention those which were based on the phantom plot of 1924!

A Voice From a Haitian Jail

THE NATION has received a letter dated July 26, 1927 from the penitentiary at Port-au-Prince, Haiti, reading as follows:

> The undersigned make it their duty to express to you their deep appreciation of the editorial printed in your issue of July 20 concerning their arrest and confinement.
>
> We are still in jail and forbidden to have ink, paper, and pencil in our possession; that is why we are addressing you in such an informal way.
>
> Please accept our best thanks and continue to help us in your most esteemed paper, using all your influence in our favor.
>
> We are, dear sir,
>
> Yours very sincerely,
>
> The Editor of the Temps, Charles Moravia
> The Editor of the Nouvelliste, Ern. G. Chauvet
> The Editor of the Courrier Haïtien, Jolibois Fils
> The Editor of the Haïtien, Jean Charles Pressoir
> The Editor of the Variétés, Clamart Ricourt
> The Editor of the Petit Capois, Edmond Liautand
> The Editor of Stella, Luc E. Fouché
> The President of L'Union Patriotique and of L' Association Fraternelle des Travailleurs, P. Thoby.
> The Secretary-General of L'Union Patriotique, Victor Cauvin

The communication from the penitentiary in Port-au-Prince then goes on to tell of the difficulties with the cable company as follows:

1. We were arrested on June 24 and are still in jail.
2. Only seven of us have been interrogated by the judge.
3. On the 16th of July Mr. Petit, secretary of L'Association Fraternelle des Travailleurs of which Mr. P. Thoby is the president, wrote a cablegram to Mr. William Green, president of the Pan-American Federation of Labor in order to inform him that Mr. Thoby was going to sail for New York in order to attend the 5th congress, when he was arrested, and that Haiti therefore would not be represented at said congress. The cablegram was received by All America Cable, Inc., and paid for, on the 16th, but the company returned it to the sender on the 21st of July with a letter saying that the Haitian Government had forbidden the sending of the cable. That's the gag! And Haiti is so prevented from being heard in the States.

On the 22nd of July we asked one of our friends outside, the same Mr. Petit, to cable to Mr. Green. The cablegram read as follows: "Read editorial The Nation of July 20th. Take action in favor of jailed members."

All America Cable accepted the cablegram, but asked the sender to write "Take defense," instead of "Take action."

I wish you might investigate the case, asking All America Cable, Inc., (New York Office) what they know about that thing and urging them to explain if there was any state of war that justifies such a censorship not only against us but against such a personage as Green, who has a right, I suppose, to be notified as to the reasons why a delegate to the congress he is presiding over cannot attend thereto.

What means the changing of words and what if the cablegram was coded?

The censorship is against you, The Nation, against any American paper and organization, and that is an unbelievable thing.

Please communicate the fact to an American daily that may take up the matter with All America Cable and let the American public know how the Haitian people is forbidden to cry when it is being crushed.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXV NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 24, 1927 No. 3242

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 179
EDITORIALS:
What Happened August 2? 181
"A Decent Respect to the Opinions of Mankind" 182
The New South 183
WORLD OPINION ON SACCO AND VANZETTI 184
NATION READERS ON SACCO AND VANZETTI 185
INDIANA'S ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE GOES TO JAIL. By Lee Frances Budenz 187
GUY LOWELL. By Talbot Faulkner Hamlin 188
RE-DISCOVERING THE PACIFIC OCEAN. By Edward H. Buehr 190
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 192
CORRESPONDENCE 193
BOOKS:
With the Gods. By Witter Bynner 195
General Dickman Views the War. By Oswald Garrison Villard 196
A Dapper Little Man. By George Genzmer 197
Healthy Sensuousness. By Johan Smertenko 198
Justice to the Pharisees. By Shirley Jackson Case 199
A Man Without a Country. By Walter Voegtlen 200
Builder of the Empire. By Carleton Beals 201
Books in Brief 202
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Free State and Republican Ireland. By R. M. Fox 203

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER — JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MANAGING EDITOR FREDA KIRCHWEY — LITERARY EDITOR MARK VAN DOREN

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

WE HEREBY AWARD the gold cup for the most impudent public utterance for the current month to Representative Albert Johnson of Washington. He won all three legs to the trophy by his bullyragging lecture to aliens threatening them with refusal of citizenship and even deportation for demonstrations in favor of Sacco and Vanzetti. Mr. Johnson has long been known as an extreme immigration restrictionist. He is entitled to his opinions in that regard, but he is not entitled to instruct aliens in this country how to conduct themselves, especially when he distorts law and fact in so doing. An alien has the same right of criticism as a citizen, and is likely to make a poor American unless he exercises it. A peaceable protest whether by strike or otherwise, in behalf of the lives of two fellow humans whom he believes to be innocent, does not make an alien liable to deportation, Mr. Johnson to the contrary notwithstanding, nor is it what the latter describes as an "anti-government demonstration." Mr. Johnson is also wrong when he says that had Sacco and Vanzetti been murdered by Americans our government would have had to pay Italy large damages. Did he ever hear of the New Orleans lynchings for which we paid Italy exactly nothing? Finally he says he hopes for legislation shortly making citizenship revocable. Maybe. The possibility for fool laws is always pretty near unlimited, but we doubt if a majority in Congress can be obtained for any such welching shell game for all of Mr. Johnson's willing and expert assistance.

FROM A PROFESSOR in a Southern university, whose forbears were American through and through, comes the following illuminating letter:

> I wish to say also that some of us here are much bewildered by the turn of events in Massachusetts. I, for one, dislike extremely to be forced definitely to doubt the honesty of public officials and college presidents, but unless I discredit my reason and the only near-complete and straightforward statement of the case which has been available, namely, Frankfurter's "Case of Sacco and Vanzetti," I am forced to believe that there is something extremely rotten in the State of Massachusetts. The frequency of mob and legal murders in the South has not dulled my interest in such affairs. It is a great pity that the Governor of Massachusetts has not sense enough to see that, in a case where there is real doubt, the line of action which he has taken is provoking honest people seriously to doubt the possibility of justice from our government under its present organization.

This from a man in cloistered shades who has nothing of the "red" about him. He is, we are sure, but typical of untold Americans who will feel similarly if vengeance has its ruthless way in Massachusetts.

ONE TRAGI-COMIC INCIDENT marked the tenseness of the week which saw armed policemen at every turn in New York on the look-out for bomb-throwers. Two of them saw a man running with a revolver in his hand. At once they suspected a dangerous "red." They ran him down, leaped upon him, knocked him out, and beat him up in most approved police style, fracturing his skull with neatness and dispatch, before the man could give any account of himself, or explain what he was about. Then, having rendered him senseless, they proceeded to search him and found—not anarchist literature but a police shield pinned to his vest! He was a plain-clothes policeman who was himself chasing a man who, he thought, was acting suspiciously. The case is highly illuminating of American police methods. Beat your man up first and examine him afterward. Well, this time the police got a taste of it themselves and not as usual some citizen in full exercise of his rights of peaceful picketing, or striking, or of peaceable assembly. We wish with all our hearts that the unnecessary suffering of their comrade might bring about in the police of the metropolis a new method and a wiser one of dealing with "suspicious" men.

NOW IS THE TIME for President Coolidge to make clear, emphatically and decisively, the views of the Administration on our naval policy. With the sad failure at Geneva still fresh in mind, the policy adopted by the United States will be of utmost significance and far-reaching effect with respect to future naval competition. So far, however, news reports from Rapid City have been anything but reassuring. Certain reports, it is true, give the impression that Mr. Coolidge is not in favor of a cruiser building race with Great Britain. But other despatches, since the arrival of Secretary Wilbur and Senator Fess at the summer White House, say that before Congress convenes a program will be announced that will contemplate the building of twelve cruisers of the 10,000-ton type, mounting eight-inch guns, in addition to the eight already authorized, or twenty in all. Such a program would be nothing less than a bold challenge to Great Britain and Japan. Even at the Geneva Conference we asked for only twelve of these big fighters—although the blustering Admiral Jones, in a wild, flag-waving speech, threatened to build twenty if no agreement was reached. Is his absurd proposal to be adopted by the Administration? Are the admirals to be conceded this victory? If not, now is the time for President Coolidge to prove his consistency and thwart this propaganda for a "big navy." Regardless of who was to blame for the Geneva fiasco, Great Britain and Japan should be reassured not only of our sincerity in proposing a limitation of naval armaments but also of our refusal to adopt the big-navy men's policy of "rounding out our fleet" to meet what they consider an overexpanded British Navy. Now is the time to show that if the admirals would not be held in check at Geneva, they may at least be made to listen to reason at home.

ELBERT H. GARY, of whose career we shall write at length later, was something more than a person—he was a symbol. The uncrowned king of big business, and the chief apostle of business optimism, he never made a speech without assuring his listeners that good times prevailed and better ones were just at hand; he had the faith of a Coué and the power to make himself believe of a Christian Scientist, rolled into one. No evil thought, much less a discouraging one, ever entered his head—or left it. So his annual addresses to the Iron and Steel Institute were always the rosy barometers of a happy trade. If business went bad, contrary to his prophecy, why look ahead, be cheerful, don't knock, be a Gold Dust Twin, and all will come out right. It invariably did—for the Steel Trust, while Mr. Gary was its able and revered head. Wall Street and big business everywhere looked up to him as to a demigod, especially after he beat the steel workers' strike and when he announced that a twelve-hour day and a seven-day week for workers were part of God's holy alliance and indispensable to the safety and prosperity of the greatest American corporation. Later he lost his long day and his seven-day week, but his reputation and the Steel Trust still survived. So did to the end the pontifical character of Mr. Gary's utterances and their joy-giving qualities to all who toil for great wealth in the marts of trade.

IRELAND'S POLITICAL CLOUDS have by no means rolled away. We print in our International Relations Section this week an article showing why the Free State Government has become increasingly unpopular. Directly in line with this comes the news that in spite of their opposition to the oath of allegiance De Valera and his Republican associates have taken their seats in the Dail—at the same time taking the oath—as the quickest way of turning the present Government out, and presumably repealing the measure which makes the oath imperative. A coalition between the De Valera party, the Laborites, and the National League group headed by Captain Redmond will result in enough votes to throw out the Government, and install Tom Johnson, the Labor Leader, as President. There remains outside the parliament only the extreme Sinn Fein Party, with five members, and since they have had to witness the spectacle of the De Valeraites taking the oath of allegiance to King George, their hostility will doubtless be directed henceforth not only at the Free State but at the Fianna Fail. Only if De Valera succeeds in severing Republican Ireland from Great Britain will those at the extreme left be satisfied.

'A NOBLE GHOST from the past though happily he is to this day in the flesh still noble though a ghost—" thus Henry W. Nevinson, writing in 1925 about John Dillon. If he was a ghost then, he was still more of a ghost when he died the other day. But he was a great and conspicuous figure in the times of Parnell and Gladstone, when a single slashing attack of his could wreck a bill in Commons, and his voice carried far in the United States which he often visited in order to arouse public opinion on Ireland's wrongs. He knew what it was to be called a liar and to pass the lie in public debate, to be present when men were ruthlessly shot down by British police, and how it felt to be arrested and imprisoned. For a long time he stood with Parnell and then he broke with him. During the Boer War he was unqualifiedly against his country and cheerfully risked mob violence to declare his sympathy with the Boers and his reprobation of England's conduct of the struggle. On the whole, Nevinson was right when he declared of Dillon that "no one has played a finer part in upholding the cause of Irish freedom—and of freedom for other countries than Ireland—in the past." But the tide of events long ago left John Dillon high and dry, a rather pathetic figure. If he lived to see a freedom for Ireland neither he nor Parnell in their prime could hope for, the Fenianism which he led is merely a memory, as much so as the Phenix Park murders and those great fights for the little home rule for which Gladstone battled and for which the Great Commoner was shunned and hated. It is to be hoped, however, that the Ireland of today will cherish John Dillon's memory as it should.

A FIGHT FOR the "open door" in news dissemination is to be made at the International Press Conference opening at Geneva under the League of Nations on August 24. The meeting will be attended by representatives from both independent and "official" news agencies, from government propaganda bureaus, and from individual newspapers. At a conference at Geneva last year of representatives of news agencies Roy W. Howard, in behalf of the United Press, obtained the passage of a resolution opposing the granting of special or exclusive privileges in connection with the receipt or transmission of government news. It is understood that an effort will be made at the present meeting, where the opponents of the "open door" predominate, to make a contrary or modifying declaration. In this connection it is important to recall that since last year the Associated Press has lined up with the "official" news agencies such as Reuter's, Havas, and Wolff. At a secret meeting of these agencies in Warsaw recently, as noted in our issue of June 15 (page 656), the Associated Press applied for and was received into membership. In these days of doctored news and official propaganda it is of the utmost importance that American newspapers shall not be dependent upon news-gathering organizations which receive government favors and thus are obligated to or controlled by such powers.

WRITING ON THE RELATIONS of the United States and Germany in the Hamburger Nachrichter, after a visit to this country, Professor G. A. Rein of the University of Hamburg describes with great feeling the hostile anti-German movies he everywhere encountered here. They still portray the Germans as the essence of "cowardice, treachery, lying, brutality, coarseness, dishonor, and criminality." As long as this propaganda lasts, he thinks, there can be no talk of any real peace between the two countries. Indeed, Professor Rein declares that the embers of hatred between Germany and her former enemies still smoulder everywhere and are kept alive by this revival of war-hatreds portrayed in the films. He admits that the idea of reprisals persists with him and that he thinks it would only be just and consequential if the Germans should put on films savagely portraying American weaknesses. Only in this way, he feels, can public attention in America be aroused to the injustices of the American movies. We doubt if he is right. Much as we deplore the movies which he denounces, we believe that reprisals would only increase the ill-will on both sides. Hate, unfortunately, only creates more hate. But what pictures of us hostile producers could make!

IF TEACHERS can ever be envied, envy must go to Paul Rauschenbush, John M. Gaus, Laurence J. Saunders, and others recently appointed to positions on the staff of the new Experimental College of the University of Wisconsin. We have already commented on this institution, designed by Alexander Meiklejohn and now to be headed by him, but we are once more excited by a statement of its aims given by Glenn Frank, president of the University of Wisconsin. There is to be very little lecturing and reciting; the groups will be small and informal; the procedure will be largely by discussion in which both instructors and students take part. And there will be no "subjects" to "take."

> That is to say, instead of studying the various sciences, economics, history, literature, psychology, and the like as if they were separate and distinct things the students will, figuratively speaking, put coherent episodes of civilization upon the table, dissect them, see what forces animated them. . . . In this process the students will reach out into all the separate fields of subject-matter usually taught in colleges for whatever light they need to have thrown upon the episode in question in order to understand it.

This will be fun, though it will also be hard, and the temptations to talk rather than think will be always in the way.

THE DEATH OF MRS. GORDON NORRIE removes one of the most public-spirited and progressive women in New York City. Of high social position and liberal means, her heart was attuned to every call from those who believe that the battle for liberty today is a struggle for the retention of the rights for which the founders of the republic stood. Her house, her means, her time were most generously given to all liberal causes. But two movements, those of the Progressive Party and the prohibitionists, appealed to her most. Were all prohibitionists of Mrs. Norrie's sincerity and principle, the cause of temperance would stand very differently in this country. As for the organization of Progressive Women in New York City, Mrs. Norrie was the moving spirit in it from the inception of the La Follette campaign to the final relinquishing of the work. Her judgment, her sanity, her wisdom, made her leadership of profound value to the campaign. For The Nation Mrs. Norrie's death is a severe blow because she was a highly valued and beloved member of its board of directors.

What Happened August 2?

BY what is perhaps merely an extraordinary coincidence it now appears that there may have been some connection between President Coolidge's announcement of his unwillingness to run again for President and Governor Fuller's decision in regard to Sacco and Vanzetti. We shall let the great New York dailies tell the story. On August 3 the Times had this to say:

> Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti will not die in the electric chair on the date set. Neither will they be pardoned. Further reprieve pending steps by the Massachusetts legislature looking to a new trial was indicated at the State House today as the solution of the historic case of the Italian radicals, which Governor Fuller will place before the Executive Council when it meets tomorrow.
>
> New and overwhelming eleventh-hour evidence is the only factor likely to change the plan for a further reprieve and an appeal to the legislature for a new trial. [The italics are ours.]

The New York Times had not been a strong champion of the two Italian radicals in their fight for life. Neither —to put it mildly—had the Herald Tribune; yet the latter printed substantially the same prediction on August 3, and added:

> The Governor's decision is already made, and he seemed to be in a comfortable frame of mind at the executive offices this afternoon. This encouraged supporters of Sacco and Vanzetti, who argued that it would be difficult for a man to smile who had just decided to send two men to their death.

The New York World published the same sort of account.

No one connected with the case will ever forget the dreadful hours of Wednesday, August 3. With a prophecy that the Governor would order a reprieve or a pardon before their eyes, anxious watchers saw the hours go by with no word from His Excellency. And at 11:30 at night, when the word finally came, with what sinking of the heart was it heard and pondered. The papers of August 4 carried it in streamers along the front page: "Sacco and Vanzetti Doomed to Die"—"Sacco and Vanzetti Must Die, Says Fuller"—"Sacco and Vanzetti Guilty, Says Fuller, and Must Die"—thus the Herald Tribune, the World, the Times. And on August 5, the Times added an interesting item to the record:

> The decision, announced late last night, stirred certain important men in Boston to private discussion of the case. These men, it may be stated on excellent authority, were taken into the Governor's confidence. They are declaring emphatically tonight that the Governor gave them every indication that he would pardon Sacco and Vanzetti or extend clemency to them. One of these men is a former high State officer. . . . The apparent last-minute finding of Governor Fuller came as a shock to those who thought they were aware of his intentions. They put the change in the Governor's decision as apparently made between 3 P. M. Tuesday and that midnight.

Between 3 P. M. and midnight Tuesday President Coolidge uttered the memorable words: "I do not choose to run for President in nineteen twenty-eight." Could it be that Governor Fuller changed his mind upon learning the President's decision? We hesitate to believe anything so dreadful could be so, but the public is entitled to know the curious coincidence in regard to the two sets of facts.

"A Decent Respect to the Opinions of Mankind"

EVERY day that has passed since Governor Fuller's decision and the report of the Lowell committee has seen a tremendous outpouring of protests from all the world, demanding that Sacco and Vanzetti be not executed. As we pointed out last week, nothing like it has ever come out of the five continents, and it does not wane but waxes. More than that, every shade of public opinion is represented. Ramsay MacDonald as the spokesman for all of British Labor has publicly said: "All friends of America pray that there will be no execution." At the other extreme the conservative London Times declares that the reprieve "again must intensify feeling widely prevalent all over the world, whether the condemned men are guilty or not, that the prolonged suffering which they have undergone during seven years under the sentence of death makes them fit objects for pity." Nothing more astounding than the unanimity of the ultra-reactionary Paris press on behalf of this pair of anarchists has come to our knowledge in the last thirty years. Elsewhere we print a collection of excerpts from the European press. If it was ever true that contemporary foreign opinion is often the opinion of history in the land affected this would seem to promise a case in point.

Why should not Governor Fuller pay "a decent respect to the opinions of mankind" and commute or pardon these men? We ourselves do not waver in our belief in the existence of so reasonable a doubt as to their guilt as to make their proposed execution itself partake of the nature of a monstrous crime. But for the sake of the argument we shall assume that they are guilty of a particularly cold-blooded highway robbery accompanied by cowardly and wicked murder. We still feel that Governor Fuller should give heed to those at home and abroad who declare that these men have already paid more than an adequate price in the torture to which they and their families have been subjected. We are aware, of course, of the ignorant and thoughtless multitudes of well-to-do citizens all around us who are saying: "Let those damned foreigners pay attention to their own affairs. We can take care of our criminals and will be thankful if the press of Europe will kindly mind its own business." Unfortunately for those who speak thus, appeals for justice refuse to stay within the boundaries of any one nation. We are quite aware that justice is sometimes blind in England, and there are doubtless grave miscarriages in the courts of France. We know that the places of exile and the prisons of Italy are full of innocent men, punished solely for their opinions, by the very despot who has appealed for Sacco and Vanzetti. We are aware that every nation is eager to see the motes in the eyes of others and to overlook its own beams. None the less we still ask for a "decent respect" to this unparalleled outpouring of foreign sentiment.

Americans should be the last to protest against foreign opinions upon a domestic affair. What country was it that sent a warship to bring to this country Louis Kossuth, the man who was trying to overthrow the government of his native land by force of arms? What country was it that welcomed Garibaldi? If it be declared that these are not similar cases because those were political revolutionists, in what country was there a tremendous outpouring of public opinion in the Dreyfus case? Was not the American press united in demanding a new trial for Dreyfus? Then there is an American citizen who still lives in the city of Washington, John Hays Hammond. He was legally condemned to death for his efforts to overthrow the government of the Transvaal. Was it not an outpouring of American, English and Continental sentiment which made possible the release from prison of this reprehensible American who set out to make private war upon a friendly country?—he, by the way, was one of the first to congratulate Governor Fuller on his decision against Sacco and Vanzetti! We could pile up cases, but these will suffice. The truth is that no nation is strong enough or righteous enough to defy an aroused international public sentiment.

The whole world knows that, whatever the guilt of Sacco and Vanzetti, the judicial system of Massachusetts has been irrevocably found guilty. It is guilty of a procedure that is a disgrace to a civilized state—that has made it possible for these men to live in jeopardy of the electric chair when only a single judge, and he accused by the Lowell committee of grave indiscretions, has passed upon the evidence in the case. But the indictment of the judicial system of Massachusetts carries further than that. No one can deny that these men have lain under the shadow of death for seven years. It makes no difference what percentage of the responsibility for those delays is due to the defense and what to the prosecution. The damning fact is there; everybody who has read of the case knows it. Every intelligent European is aware, moreover, that this could happen in no civilized country save the United States.

More than that, in Europe they can read as well as in America. They read, for instance, that a paper like the Springfield Republican, not an anarchist sheet but a journal esteemed for generations because of its liberalism and its ability, is urging the Governor of Massachusetts to commute the sentence of Sacco and Vanzetti to life imprisonment, not because it believes that they are innocent, but in order "that the discovery of new evidence later on might find the defendants still above ground and in a position to profit by a turn of events conceivably favorable to them." It dwells upon the "grave breach of official decorum" of which the Lowell committee found Judge Thayer guilty, and it declares that the accused men "should not be put to death unless the official conduct of the judge who presided at their trial was beyond rebuke, above reproach." It returns to the question of the bullet testimony and finds that Judge Thayer's charge gave a misleading color to that testimony and that the Lowell committee in no wise cleared up this point. "One familiar with the testimony in this case," it concludes, "could raise point after point in the advisory committee's report, around which controversy might range. The committee has by no means quieted all doubts." When this editorial is read in Europe we venture to say overseas commentators will declare that the Springfield Republican furnishes conclusive evidence that the men should have a new trial before a new judge in a different atmosphere in order that no man may question hereafter the fairness of the procedure. To Europeans accustomed to high standards in their judicial life, it seems incredible that there should be any judge worthy of the name who could consider it judicial decorum to talk to his club associates about what he had done and was going to to to the "anarchist bastards" —his words—who were on trial in his court.

Blindest of all are those citizens of that once-honored Bay State who say that these men must die to uphold the prestige and power of the courts. Those who are pressing for the death of these criminals must not delude themselves. The courts will not be exalted but degraded if these men are executed while a single reasonable doubt exists, as long as multitudes remain unconvinced that justice has been done. It will be everywhere believed that these men have been sacrificed to bolster up an indefensible legal procedure; that the State is not big enough and generous enough to admit that it has done wrong; that it is covering up its tracks by sacrificing a couple of penniless radical workmen. It will be held that its defiance of the world is the defiance of a conscious wrong-doing. Least of all will execution end the case. Everywhere in Boston clubs they are crying out: "Let us have it over with!" But the last thing that will end the case will be an act which seems to millions judicial murder. Done with it? Nothing in the world will so keep it alive as the execution of these two men. If Sacco and Vanzetti are executed, not only will execrations be heaped upon Massachusetts, but as long as any member of the present generation lives there will be voices to cry out against what people everywhere consider not merely an attack upon two men but upon a class.

Clemency after the findings of the court are upheld would have a tremendously soothing effect upon great masses of people. We are aware, of course, that the extremists are claiming that the reprieve was achieved by their agitation, and that they will take credit for any act of clemency to which Governor Fuller may be moved. But the bulk of the people would know perfectly well there was no truth in that. The Governor himself could make it perfectly clear in any memorandum which he might write. That risk is slight. Our domestic peace and good will are at stake—the prestige of America all over the world and the question whether the faith of multitudes in American courts and American governments shall or shall not be shaken.

Is justice ever injured when it is tempered with mercy? "Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord." States everywhere arrogate to themselves the right to do the very act of killing for which they condemn others, and they call it not vengeance but just retribution, a fair warning, a deterrent, an example. For no other purpose has this power been placed in the hands of the State by the people from whom alone the governors of any nation can obtain it. When that power is misused as, for instance, in those nations where it is being utilized to maintain a government in power, it becomes the grossest breach of trust and invariably leads to the undoing of those responsible. Let the American people believe that this power is being abused for the support of one class or group and there will be an immediate upheaval. Massachusetts today stands accused by millions of seeking vengeance, a bitter, vindictive vengeance; of using the force which it possesses to defy everywhere a public opinion never before equalled. Let it beware. Vengeance has taken its toll of humble men before this and they have lived eternally. So we appeal once more to the Governor of Massachusetts to grant that clemency which ministers and public men all over Europe are asking. No one can question that such an act would exalt the American name and American righteousness wherever the news could travel.

The New South

IS the South turning away from violence—from mob punishment with the shotgun and the rope to the law? There are hopeful signs that it is in spite of the contrary influence of the Ku Klux Klan. For the first six months of this year, according to the records of the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute, there was not a single lynching in Virginia, the Carolinas, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Tennessee, or Kentucky. There were but nine lynchings in the entire South. The records of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People differ slightly, attributing one lynching each to Florida and Tennessee, but the National Association agrees on a total of nine for the first six months of 1927 against its figure of thirty for the entire year 1926. The record is especially encouraging in regard to Georgia, South Carolina, and Tennessee, for the National Association recorded three lynchings each in Georgia and South Carolina in 1926 and two in Tennessee.

It is true that one must set against this decline in lynchings the outbreak in some parts of the South of another kind of violence—floggings. These are almost entirely the work of the Klan and are directed against a different kind of victim from that sought by lynching mobs. In recent years lynching in the South has been largely directed against Negro men for alleged offenses such as murder and rape. The Klan flogging mobs, on the other hand, have drawn no color line and have whipped women and youths as well as grown men. The reason has commonly been some comparatively slight offense, such as violation of the prohibition laws.

But floggings are not going unpunished either. Governor Hardman, of Georgia, let it be known when he took office a couple of months ago that he would not tolerate the Klan's lawless efforts to discipline its neighbors, and the State has proceeded so vigorously against floggers as to halt that pastime. In Alabama the outlook until lately seemed less hopeful, as the political grip of the Klan there is tight. Governor Graves is the grand cyclops of the Klan in Montgomery and Attorney General McCall is the kloncillor of the klavern. When, therefore, action was begun against the mob that whipped Mrs. Bertha A. Slay, knowing ones winked slyly and assumed the proceedings to be a bit of hypocritical window-dressing intended to placate the anti-flogging sentiment, and destined to end without punishment of the floggers. But thanks in no small degree to the vigorous campaign of Victor Hanson's Birmingham News and Age-Herald and his Montgomery Advertiser, a strong sentiment has been aroused in the State against flogging which the Governor and the Attorney General have either come to share or to which they have had to bow. The case against Mrs. Slay's attackers was pressed with vigor and ended in the punishment of three men and two women by fines of from $100 to $25. This, though light punishment, was a vindication of the law, and it was followed by far more drastic action against the floggers of a nineteen-year-old orphan, Jeff Calloway. Two of his attackers have been sentenced to jail terms of eight to ten years while five others have been fined and sent to prison for six months.

From time to time The Nation has had to use harsh words in regard to mob violence in the South. It takes extra pleasure, therefore, in pointing to signs of a better public sentiment.

World Opinion on Sacco and Vanzetti

NO MORE striking evidence of the international character of the Sacco and Vanzetti case can be presented than appears in the editorial columns of foreign newspapers and periodicals. Conservative and liberal journals alike unite in featuring the news of the case. By actual count twelve leading Paris newspapers on August 5 devoted four times as much space to the Sacco and Vanzetti case as to the break-up of the Geneva Conference. And the editorials show a remarkable unanimity of opinion: that something is radically wrong with United States justice. We quote below the more significant statements.

The London Times (August 11):

> A postponement once again must intensify feeling widely prevalent all over the world, whether the condemned men are guilty or not, that the prolonged suffering which they have undergone during seven years under the sentence of death makes them fit objects of pity.

The London Spectator, a conservative weekly, (August 13), waiving the question of the men's guilt, hopes that they will be reprieved > because that would be best, not only for peace but for the credit of the United States. Certain facts make us feel that justice in the strict sense of the word would be truly served either by the release of the prisoners or by a further term of imprisonment, the greater part of which might be taken as having been already satisfied by the six years under which the prisonors have lain under sentence of death.

The London Outlook, mildly liberal, (August 13) comments:

> In themselves Sacco and Vanzetti are obscure and without any political importance. But they have become a symbol to millions of people throughout the world as victims of the "capitalist" system of justice, which has one law for the poor and another for the rich. The case has intensified class antagonism throughout the world. It is difficult to judge the case on its merits, but there is no question that there is something radically wrong with American administration of law.

The London Daily News, (August 11):

> No one whatever ought to be treated as these men, whatever they have done. Surely there must be some one in America, President Coolidge or another, capable of quietly making effective this obvious truth.
>
> The question now is whether that is enough or whether patriotic Americans can suffer longer a criminal system so rigid and stiff in its pedantry and in its tender mercies worse than the excesses of barbarism.

The Liverpool Post in an editorial said (August 9): "The original trial from start to finish was a travesty of judicial procedure. It was so understood among most of the European peoples and we can readily believe it was so understood in America as a whole."

The Paris Journal des Débats (conservative) August 4:

> The decision of Governor Fuller has caused profound surprise and real regret in France. We still believe that there is strong reason to consider these two men innocent of the crime with which they are charged and for which they have already suffered such cruel punishment. Our opinion is shared by men and newspapers of very different sympathies and parties.
>
> Even if reasons of equity did not exist, we had hoped that the sentiment of pity would at least inspire the man who held in his hands the fate of these two condemned men. One can say only that it is with astonishment that we learned his decision, and that in making it he has assumed a heavy moral responsibility.

The same paper on August 11:

> If this was not a serious matter one would be tempted to describe it as cinematographic justice. Right to the end it has shown an extraordinary mixture of melodrama such as would have been accounted all but impossible if recounted in fiction.
>
> But the matter is serious from many points of view. One must be entirely without heart not to be moved by the torture of constant uncertainty inflicted upon these two men. Even if Sacco and Vanzetti are guilty, they cannot now be executed without the suspicion persisting of a great injustice having been done.
>
> In every country all over the world it is the hope and wish of all men of ordinary humanity that they should now be spared.

The Temps, (conservative), Paris (August 7):

> We wish to see the lives of these men spared, whether they are innocent or guilty, because we think that they have suffered enough in these seven years of nightmare. But we do not wish to go further than that. Human life should always be respected, but so also should the justice of a free people. We do not wish that today's manifestations should be otherwise interpreted by the American people than as being perfectly respectful to American justice.

Liberté, Paris (Nationalist), August 11:

> The burial of this deplorable business would be certainly better from every point of view than the burial of the two victims. The symbolic torch which the Statue of Liberty carries in her hand must not be replaced by two half-scorched scarecrows.

The Quotidien (Herriot's paper) says the execution would be a crime against humanity. "If Sacco and Vanzetti are executed with them will be buried American justice. We still hope for pity, for humaneness."

The Berlin Montagspost publishes a symposium of the views of about a dozen prominent judges and criminal lawyers, to all of whom the seven-year delay in the case seems an inexplicable flaw in American judicial methods. All express the belief that the execution ought not be carried out, and it is pointed out that during the last four years 85 per cent of the death sentences in Germany have been commuted. Dr. Eberhardt Schmidt, professor of criminal law at Kiel University, writes: "I am opposed to the death penalty on principle, but apart from that I consider that Sacco and Vanzetti should be pardoned because the death sentence is seven years old."—New York World, August 9.

Nation Readers on Sacco and Vanzetti

The Mark of Cain

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: With millions throughout the world this morning, I thank whatever gods there be that I have not, for the time being, the mark of Cain on my forehead. But to escape that dishonor all who believe either in the innocence of Sacco and Vanzetti or in the fact that, innocent or guilty, they are today symbols of freedom of speech and of political and economic agitation, must not relax their efforts to have them freed.

It is this fact that raises, or should raise, the matter above all legal quibbles and sophistries.

The case does not concern Massachusetts alone, It is the United States that will have to bear the odium throughout the world of having put men to death for being agitators along political and industrial lines.

No one, least of all those who believe in the existing order, can afford to have this growing world-wide belief confirmed by the execution of these men. In themselves they are insignificant and in their opinions absurd or quixotic. It is the principle involved that has made the case significant, and that makes the ultimate decision momentous.

New York, August 11 Benjamin Macmahon

Would Indict Massachusetts

[By Telegraph]

To the Editor of The Nation:

IF SACCO VANZETTI EXECUTED I URGE BOSTON COMMITTEE SUMMON GRAND JURY OF LIBERAL CITIZENS BRING FORMAL INDICTMENT AGAINST COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS FOR FIRST DEGREE MURDER JUDGES SHOULD BE APPOINTED JURY IMPANELLED IN REGULAR FORM COMPLETE TRIAL HELD SUMMONING ALL WITNESSES OF BOTH DEFENSE AND PROSECUTION INCLUDING JUDGE THAYER AND GOVERNOR FULLER THOSE WHO FAIL TO ATTEND SHOULD BE REPRESENTED BY PROXY EVEN MORE IMPORTANT THAN SAVING LIVES OF TWO RADICALS IS NECESSITY OF EDUCATING AMERICAN PEOPLE TO NATURE OF THE FRAMEUP NOW AN ESTABLISHED FEATURE OF AMERICAN POLICE SYSTEM I BELIEVE THIS PROPOSED TRIAL WOULD BE WIDELY REPORTED.

Long Beach, California, August 12 Upton Sinclair

Captain Proctor's Testimony

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The testimony of Captain Proctor as Commonwealth's expert was brought before the Supreme Court for review upon the fifth supplementary motion for new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence, which motion had first to be passed upon by Judge Thayer and the granting of which was discretionary with him. The Supreme Court thus had an extremely restricted question submitted to them. This was error on the part of defense's attorneys—or rather mistake of tactics. The proper ground on which to base the motion on that ground was mistake of law important enough to be prejudicial in the original admission of Proctor's opinion at all. The reasoning is as follows:

Proctor stated he had an opinion and that it was "consistent with" the conclusion that the bullet in evidence had come through Sacco's Colt automatic—i.e., that it might have come through it, to use common talk. Such an answer would have been inadmissible if given by an non-expert witness. It was only admissible from Proctor because he was an expert and his expert opinion was supposed to be a fact, while an ordinary man's conclusion is excluded because it is the duty and province of the jury to draw their own conclusions and not adopt others'. But an expert's opinion that a result might have occurred or a thing might have happened is not an expert opinion (legally considered) except as it be taken as signifying that some signs or items of evidence, factors, and elements for a basis of positive judgment, one way or the other, were present in his mind when testifying, and considered by him as affording some ground for belief however faint that the bullet had actually so traversed the pistol of Sacco. Otherwise, for a witness to say that a 32-caliber bullet might have been shot from a 32-caliber revolver is nothing but a statement of obvious fact and has nothing expert about it. The fact that an important expert witness so testifies necessarily implies as much; just as when an important medical diagnostician says "The man may be suffering from cancer" it means naturally that to him there is at least a faint ground for positive belief that he is actually so diseased, while the same remark from a layman would mean only a guess or an obvious fact.

But Proctor's subsequent affidavit clearly establishes the fact that there were no such signs observable to him whatever. It therefore transpires that there was no expert "opinion" at all, nor were there any grounds for it, as his detailed affidavit expressly denies all of them. So his answer was inadmissible as matter of law and the admission was clearly a mistake of law which only transpired by the affidavit.

Was it a material error? I don't know without reading the whole record, but in view of Proctor's office as police head and his function as State expert, I should think it was a material and very prejudicial error.

Was the defense bound by failing to object and except at the trial to this evidence? I think not, because the expert had a right to say he had an opinion and then to state it, which he did. Defense could have scrutinized and developed his grounds or absence of them for that opinion, but that is a matter of tactics, and they were not obliged to risk doing so. Therefore they are not now precluded from taking advantage of this mistake of law, which only transpired through the later affidavit of Captain Proctor.

Minneapolis, August 11 Homer Morris

The Pope's Position

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The Pope's refusal to consider the plea relative to the renowned Sacco-Vanzetti case, will unquestionably instigate considerable controversy, not only in religious circles but among the general public as well.

While the Pope might "not see how any appeal was possible since the men had already been condemned," nevertheless it is obvious that he does not feel disposed to interfere. True, he might not be able to render material aid, but if any statement was forthcoming, would it not have been wiser if the Vatican had issued a statement deploring its inability to aid Sacco and Vanzetti—a statement that would clarify the futility of capital punishment as seen through the eyes of Rome, instead of this terse and very unsympathetic message.

I am a Catholic myself, and I know that I am expressing the sentiments of many more, irrespective of their creed, in disapproving of the statement which very recently emanated from Rome. We are all entitled to our personal convictions and mine is: Since the Pope is the mortal representative of Christ, why does he not try to do what Christ would do?

New York, August 11 James P. Healy

An Open Letter to President Lowell

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I am asking the courtesy of your columns for the enclosed open letter to President Lowell of Harvard that no publication in Boston seems willing to publish.

Boston, August 9 John Dos Passos

As a graduate of Harvard University I feel that I have the right to protest against the participation of the president of that university in the report on the Sacco-Vanzetti case presented to Governor Fuller by his advisory committee. I feel that you have put your name and indirectly the name of the university you represent to an infamous document. This is no time for mincing words. You have made yourself a party to a judicial murder that will call down on its perpetrators the execration of the civilized world. What it means is that you are allowing a Massachusetts politician to use the name of Harvard to cover his own bias and to whitewash all the dirty business of the arrest of these men at the time of the anarchist raids and their subsequent slow torture by the spiteful and soulless mechanism of the law. They have probably told you that this was a mere local decision on a Boston murder case, but to any man with enough intelligence to read the daily papers it must be clear that somehow it has ceased being a Boston murder case. Sacco and Vanzetti starving in their cells in the death house and the authorities of the State of Massachusetts building the electric chair in which to burn them to death have become huge symbols on the stage of the world. The part into which you have forced Harvard University will make many a man ashamed of being one of its graduates.

Many of us who have watched the case for years felt that your appointment as a member of the committee assured at least a modicum of fair play and of historical perspective in the conduct of the investigation. This hope was pretty well shattered when it was announced that the investigation was to be carried on behind closed doors. If there was nothing to hide, why the secrecy? Since when have star chamber proceedings been part of the American judicial system?

The published report has confirmed our worst forebodings. With inconceivable levity you counsel the electrocution of two men because it "seems" to you that the enormous mass of evidence piled up by the defense in seven years' heartbreaking work should be dismissed, like the rent in the lining of the cap that you wrongly assert fitted Sacco, as so trifling a matter in the evidence of the case that it seems to the committee by no means a ground for a new trial. Did the committee feel that the prosecution's case was so weak that they had to bolster it by fresh deductions and surmises of their own?

The report in its entirety is an apology for the conduct of the trial rather than an impartial investigation. Reading it, the suspicion grows paragraph by paragraph that its aim was not to review but to make respectable the proceedings of Judge Thayer and the District Attorney's office. Not in a single phrase is there an inkling of a sense on your part or on that of your colleagues of the importance of the social and racial backgrounds of the trial. Your loose use of the words "socialistic" and "communistic" prove that you are ignorant or careless of the differences in mentality involved in partisanship in the various schools of revolutionary thought.

This is a matter of life and death, not only for Sacco and Vanzetti but for the civilization that Harvard University is supposed to represent. The Sacco-Vanzetti case has become part of the world struggle between the capitalist class and the working class, between those who have power and those who are struggling to get it. Ignorance in high office ignorance of the new sprouting forces that are remaking society, whether he is with them or against them, is little short of criminal. It is inconceivable that intelligent reading men can be ignorant in this day of the outlines of anarchist philosophy. Instead of crying ignorance it would be franker to admit that as anarchists and agitators you hate these men and disapprove of their ideas and methods. But are you going to sacrifice the integrity of the legal system to that feeling? Are you going to prove by a bloody reprisal that the radical contention that a man holding unpopular ideas cannot get a free trial in our courts is true?

I cannot feel that either you or your colleagues have understood the full purport of your decision. If you had you would certainly have made out a more careful case for yourselves, one less full of loopholes and contradictions. It is upon men of your class and position that will rest the inevitable decision as to whether the coming struggle for the reorganization of society shall be bloodless and fertile or inconceivably bloody and destructive. It is high time that you realized the full extent of the responsibility on your shoulders.

As a Harvard man I want to protest most solemnly against your smirching the university of which you are an officer with the foul crime against humanity and civilization to which you have made yourself accessory.

John Dos Passos, '16

Boston's State of Mind

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Summoning the bomb squad, the State police, and the fullest emergency strength of her police force, Boston prepared to defend herself against the defenders of Sacco and Vanzetti. Public meetings and demonstrations of whatever sort were forbidden. Even so, merchants and property owners near the Common took out thousands of dollars worth of fresh insurance against riot and robbery. And those Boston citizens who had to face the perils of their city during the past week could relax their nervous strain only after Wednesday night was safely passed.

Think of their escapes in those few days! Six Italians arrived in an automobile, armed with leaflets demanding that Sacco and Vanzetti be released. But the stalwart police arrested them before the leaflets could be exploded.

A package containing the menace of one hundred seidlitz powders was intercepted, as the messenger dared to walk through the streets in broad daylight. The package was opened and examined; then the messenger was allowed to proceed.

Two men with a foreign accent said something in a public elevator about bombs and bombing. Within a few hours plain-clothes men had traced them to their union headquarters, arrested them during a conference with an employers' committee and finger-printed and quizzed them with no inefficient delay for the formalities of a warrant.

Perhaps bravest of all were the heroic employers who discharged at once workers who endangered the safety of the Commonwealth by carrying before the State House—in defiance of the police—placards declaring the innocence of Sacco and Vanzetti. Of course in Massachusetts there is a certain lese majeste in such an inscription as this: "President Lowell called Sacco's alibi witnesses liars. They proved him wrong. Now he kills Sacco. Governor Fuller asked for proof of Vanzetti's eel-selling alibi. He got it. Now he kills Vanzetti."

Boston, suffering a grave relapse in its fever of prejudice, sets up an almost impenetrable wall of respectable authority. Court, commission, and Governor, contemptuous of workers and radicals, defend sacred institutions against the "mob rule" of popular protest. Even liberals who had in the past signed petitions for a new trial stand by the men of their own class and, as Bishop Lawrence wrote the other day from Bar Harbor, "feel that with the Governor's decision the matter is closed."

But the case is clearly rooted in the joint persecution of radicals by federal and State authorities. Its implications touch every citizen of the United States. If Massachusetts continues too paralyzed by prejudice to save our fair name, can we not compel an investigation of the Federal Department of Justice before it is too late?

Boston, August 12 Anna Rochester

Indiana's Anti-Saloon League Goes to Jail

By LOUIS FRANCIS BUDENZ

Indianapolis, August 8

THIS is Saturday, August 6, and the honorable Supreme Court of the State of Indiana is now in session. The case of the State vs. Edward S. Shumaker is before us. It is no ordinary proceeding which has brought the five justices in funereal file onto the bench this midsummer morning. One autocracy is locked in wrathful grip with another. Shortly the name of Rev. E. S. Shumaker, D.D., head of the Indiana Anti-Saloon League, will glare at us from the front pages of the nation's newspapers, a close publicity rival to that of his fellow Hoosier celebrity, ex-Grand Dragon D. C. Stephenson.

Late on the afternoon immediately preceding our present solemn session the honorable court had announced to the world that the defendant Shumaker was guilty of contempt. We are now met to pass sentence upon him. The spacious chamber in the State capitol is crowded, extra seats having been provided for the emergency. The faithful dowagers of the W. C. T. U. are there in force, sad-eyed but resolute, some of them weeping silently at this outrage to a valiant leader of the "cause." Reporters from distant parts are standing as close to the bench as they dare venture, the journalistic world having awakened to the fact that Indiana is becoming a source of bizarre news.

Over to the left sits the defendant—a rotund, soft-voiced, bespectacled individual, looking for all the world like Mr. Pickwick. The suave smile which usually lights up his homely features has given way to a strained air of concern. To the right is the man who has brought him to this pass—Attorney General Arthur L. Gilliom, stocky, olive-skinned, a Swiss-American hailing from the Swiss-American town of Berne, near South Bend. The viewpoint of that northern section of the State is colored more by the ideals of gay and alcoholic Chicago than by those of drab and puritanic Indianapolis. Mr. Gilliom, taking his cue therefrom, is a sworn enemy of Ku Klux Klan and Anti-Saloon League alike. Determined to grasp the scepter of the Republican Party for himself and the "liberal element," he is inclined to no halfway measures and will probably go too far. The ladies of the W. C. T. U. already prophesy that this action will "cause an upheaval in Indiana," and they are a power not to be laughed to scorn. Even in the court room they carry on their missionary work; they flutter about the reporters, urging those confirmed cynics "to be sure to vote right."

Short shrift is made of the case, nevertheless. The injured court affixes a fine of $250 and sixty days at the State Farm as the penalty for Dr. Shumaker's offense. August 18 is set as the day when his attorneys may argue any motions that may be on their minds. Pending such argument, he is released on $1,000 bail, quickly provided. Thus does the dictator of the second worldly-spiritual clique which has ruled Indiana with rods of iron, find himself in the hands of what is commonly called the law.

That he should have come to this sad state is the occasion for grave surprise from Lake Michigan to the Ohio River. To be sure, incarceration of public officials and public-spirited citizens in penal institutions is a common practice in that territory. Public office has become a likely stepping-stone to the penitentiary. It is not so many years since the then mayor of Terre Haute was so confined, at about the same time that the chief of police of Indianapolis was in a similarly bad way. Warren T. McCray, immediate predecessor of the present Governor, left his office prematurely to sojourn in the Federal penitentiary at Atlanta, where he still is. The present Marion county grand jury may take action which would speed Mr. McCray's successor along a parallel pathway, provided the statute of limitations does not intervene. In addition to the Stephenson charges, the Indianapolis Times now accuses Governor Jackson (while Secretary of State) of having attempted to bribe McCray to appoint a prosecutor in Marion County favorable to the Klan, in return for a "gift" of $10,000 for McCray's defense.

Though the fate of these men startles no one, with Shumaker it is different. His domination of the State has been as great as that of Stephenson, and much more firmly rooted. He has been no slack workman in the factory of the Lord. A minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, he has devoted fully half of his sixty years of life to the battle against alcoholic beverages. For twenty of these years he has occupied his present position as superintendent of the Indiana Anti-Saloon League, all of which time he has been a power in State politics. His quiet, shrewd personality has pervaded every line of that long series of legislative acts which have made Indiana, by statute, the driest of our commonwealths.

The crowning achievement of his career was the passage of the so-called Wright bone-dry bill. Alcoholic beverages in all forms, even for medicinal purposes, came under the ban of the law. The prosecutor's fee in liquor cases was put at $25, in contrast to the $5 required for that purpose in all other actions. Common drunkenness carries with it, as a consequence, a fine of at least $40 for each offense. And "drunkenness," in practice, became a very elastic and all-embracing term. Doubtful breath odors alone have been and are possible causes for conviction. Searching and seizing went beyond all conceivable bounds. Doughty workers of the Women's Christian Temperance Union systematically intimidated the courts. Practically every liquor trial in Indianapolis is still attended by an army of soldierly matrons, who troop into the court room in military formation and occupy the larger part of the space reserved for the public. In cases where the prosecuting attorney of any county is unable or unwilling to enforce the law, the Attorney General may appoint special assistants to enforce the law in that county. They are allowed the $25 fee in case of conviction, and if the defendant cannot pay it within ninety days the county must pay it. Under this section of the law, the prosecuting attorney of Marion County had three young lawyers appointed, and for a time, these dynamic young men collected as high as $1,500 a month apiece out of this lucrative employment.

Thirsting for further triumphs, E. S. Shumaker, D.D., this Anthony Comstock of beverages, sought an amendment to the dry law declaring the mere possession of liquor to be a crime. A frightened legislature obediently carried out his mandate. Through one of those defects to which even geniuses are addicted, the law as thus amended failed to include this addition in its title. Upon reaching the Supreme Court on a test case, that body held the omission to be fatal to the act's validity. Judge Benjamin Willoughby, a determined and vindictive old man, wrote that opinion. Although this particular decision seems to follow out the practice of the State and the rulings of previous courts, this and other acts of Willoughby were made the occasion for a State-wide campaign against him, when he came up for reelection in 1924. Attacked jointly by Anti-Saloon League and Klan, he was apparently defeated by his Democratic opponent, ex-Congressman Denton, of Evansville, by over 900 votes. The election authorities, however, found that he had been successful by the grand total of one vote.

The Supreme Court, by divided decisions, continued to clip the talons of the anti-liquor forces. The blanket warrant, unsworn to, which had been a prominent feature of early prohibition days here, was declared to be a violation of the Constitution. In the famous Beech Grove case and other cases, it was held that the warrant must be specific in its description of the premises to be searched. This was, necessarily, a serious restriction upon the spectacular methods employed by the enforcement agents and their volunteer aids up to that time. It had been the custom of these irrepressible sleuths to draw a warrant covering a whole district, which might include blocks of houses, industrial establishments, and small businesses. Armed with such sanction, these mighty arms of the law might roam about, searching and seizing at will.

The court's heretical differences with the forces of righteousness produced the inevitable reverberation. In his 1925 report to his league, Shumaker not only took Attorney General Gilliom to task for lack of zeal in liquor prosecutions but also paid his compliments to the judges, including Willoughby in particular. He ended with the hope that the next election "will give us a court which will be dry and not wet."

The Attorney General, however, was not prepared to eat humble pie. He was the only candidate on the Republican ticket of 1924 (chosen by the Stephenson-Walb-Watson coalition) who paid open court, in the campaign and after, to the anti-Klan and "liberal" groups. Securing the Shumaker report by accident, he instituted the proceedings against the Anti-Saloon leaguer for contempt. Two of torneys for the league were included in the Attorney General's action.

The Supreme Court judges, or at least some of them, jumped at the chance to smite their foe. Six lawyers were chosen as friends of the court to look into the charges. After various delays, these gentlemen reported that the league's attorneys had purged themselves of contempt by showing that they were not guilty of the report's authorship. Shumaker was held to have injured the court's dignity and respect, and therefore to have made himself liable to punishment. By a three to two vote, the court affirmed this judgment in regard to Shumaker, but likewise decided that one of his attorneys, Jess E. Martin, was equally involved and therefore equally guilty.

To crush Shumaker's dictatorship, the court has gone far toward setting up one of its own. Answering Shumaker's statement, from the report, that "our courts are the servants, not the masters of the people," the majority opinion declares that "courts in this country are subservient to the Constitution of the United States, the constitution of this State, and to the established law of the land only, and to no other earthly power." This strange and Mussolini-like doctrine takes on an even more threatening aspect when it is known that the contempt in this instance consisted in "veiled threats" to defeat judges for reelection. To instruct the bewildered electorate on whom they should center their choice for elective judicial offices thereby becomes a crime. The court's remedy appears to be worse than the disease.

The rising sentiment against the Klan has probably emboldened the court to take this rash position. With meticulous care, Shumaker has kept the two organizations organically apart. In the public mind, however, they are often confused and thought to be allied. In raiding expeditions and other ventures, subdivisions of the two powers have frequently cooperated. Relying on an old statute which allows the Governor to swear in men as horse-thief detectives, the Klan had thousands of its members given this unusual authority. At the zenith of its strength they used this indiscriminately to suppress anything from "petting parties" to suspected liquor dealers. Rum, anti-Catholicism, anti-Semitism, "nigger hating," and radical baiting are lumped in the mind of the man in the street as one. The Supreme Court has met the suppression of one set of liberties by the suppression of others—and Indiana is beset on all sides by intolerance.

Guy Lowell

By TALBOT FAULKNER HAMLIN

PURITANISM is not the only mark of New England tradition; the early insistence upon education laid firmly the foundations of a respect for a culture much broader than the original ideals it was supposed to support. This movement did not die with Emerson or Thoreau; it still flowers in our own time. Guy Lowell, who died some months ago, was a remarkable example of this flowering; he represents completely both the advantages and the disadvantages such a background may bring to one who seeks creative outlet in the arts.

Guy Lowell, cousin of the president of Harvard, cousin of Amy Lowell, could not help being scholarly. To him refinement of taste was no affectation; it was part and parcel of his entire being. Classicism was for such a one inevitable. It shows in every one of his works; perhaps best in the colonnade of the Fenway side of the Boston Museum, whose ranked white columns seen over the ponds and the greenery of the park have a haunting beauty, seeming to give pause to the smoking factory chimneys in the distance which ring Brahmin Boston with a circle of anachronistic noise and steel. From these white columns comes a protest passionate and beautiful against today. It is a beauty half akin to nostalgia; the incarnate longing for a less chaotic time; it embodies, probably unconsciously, that turning backward, which an intellectual culture, unattached to the present by any economic need, often produces.

The same beauty shows in all his work. Its quality does not come from mere copying; for this spirit is not the spirit of the style revivalists of the early nineteenth century. The quality comes from the attempt, intense and sometimes fruitless, to create today in a language much loved but dying or dead; a language that is without a vital appeal to the mass of the beholders.

This quality is not dependent upon the use of an "ancient" style, for Guy Lowell was no mere stylist. In the little library at Boscawen, New Hampshire, he produced a building in an exceedingly free Georgian or Colonial manner. It is in no sense archeological or academic; yet even here one feels the touch of a refinement, a balance, more classic than the most meticulous copy. So, too, in the white marble house at Eighty-sixth Street and Fifth Avenue in New York, there is incarnate the same delicacy of feeling, the same quality of a beauty nostalgic, slightly forced, almost decadent, impossibly aristocratic. Like the fame of its designer, it survives, a thing a little distant, haughty rather than cold, distinguished and aloof.

Guy Lowell's present fame is due more to the New York Court House, so recently completed and opened. The solution embodied in the competitive drawings was magnificent; clear, logical, characterized by the mind of a scholar, instinct with the large simplicity of that Roman work Lowell so loved. In the change from circular to polygonal the design lost some of its quality. This was typical of the tragic side of such a temperament. For the clear unity of the circle is not in tone with modern mechanical methods: its cost proved excessive; before the implacable necessity of modernism, the circle hardened into a hexagon; the quality of Lowell's dream was dimmed to a compromise, inevitable in such an unequal struggle.

A mind like Lowell's necessarily seeks Europe. There lay the seed of the culture he loved and expressed. During the war his sympathy turned at once to the Italy that was still the symbol of the classic past. No mere expression of sympathy satisfied him; he must throw into the struggle his whole self, and in the Red Cross on the Austrian front, he found work that satisfied and thrilled him; it was almost as if at last for the first time he found his cultural classic emotionalism and the passion of a great people wholeheartedly at one.

A scholar, as well as a designer, Guy Lowell inevitably produced books. His contribution to American architectural literature was immensely important, though in ways he could not always have expected. Again it was love of Italy that determined his choice; and in the two volumes of Italian villas and farmhouses which he published, full of photographs thrillingly picturesque and sketches of his own of characteristic delicacy, he introduced American architects to a new vernacular.

To the growing love of stucco and tile of the Spanish renaissance already existent, these books gave new life. The restraint of the Italian work was a desirable antidote to too great a baroque license, and to Lowell's books is due not a little of the skill which characterizes much of the best work in that type.

Guy Lowell, perhaps, has affected American architecture more deeply and widely in his books than through his buildings, just as Amy Lowell may be longer remembered for her study of Keats—another modern in love with a classic past—than for her poetry. Like her, he had that loneliness that comes from membership in a passing aristocracy; but aristocrat his every work has proved him, and his death among the stucco walls and sunny hills of a distant tropical island seems strangely symbolic; it took away the spirit of one in love with a beauty that was of another time; a fruitless love whose passion drove him further and further away from the country where he was born, the industrialism that supported him, and the clash of a vital modern world.

Re-discovering the Pacific Ocean

By EDWARD H. HUME

Honolulu, July 30

BALBOA brought the existence of the Pacific Ocean to the attention of the Western world. William H. Seward, with vision that has proved prophetic, foresaw its importance in the century ahead as compared with the Atlantic. The Institute of Pacific Relations, which has just held its second biennial conference at Honolulu, may be said to have re-discovered the Pacific. It exists for the very purpose of facing squarely the major factors already evident in that area, factors which may bring good or ill to our world according to the way they are met. Of some of the issues in that area we, as a nation, are as yet scarcely aware; others, such as immigration, Americans are inclined to believe the United States has disposed of. All of these questions are coming to the front again and must be faced.

For the members who journeyed to the Institute conference—and let it be recalled that there were no representatives present delegated by this or that national or regional body; those who attended were selected individuals, chosen for their knowledge or influence in some field of Pacific interest—the experience was a voyage of discovery. They came to attend, and found that they had discovered.

The first discovery was in the realm of human relations. As an Australian member put it, "It was a liberation of my mental vision to come in contact with Messrs. Koo and Yui of China, and with some of the Japanese members. I had no idea of their caliber. They impressed me tremendously by their use of English, their power in debate, and their ability to adjust themselves to situations that arose. Men and women from two sides of the Pacific, who had known nothing of each other, met, spoke together with the utmost frankness, and developed personal relationships that were remarkable, quite apart from reference to issues debated. They found, as they debated, that wherever they first appeared to differ, the areas of agreement soon proved larger than they had expected and that differences, while clear-cut, were not numerous. They found that the economic inter-dependence of the several nations in the Pacific area was amazingly real.

The second discovery had to do with the nations lying west of the Pacific. China was found, as the chairman aptly said, to have "discovered the fountain of youth." The old indifference and traditionalism had disappeared and in its place was seen an aroused China, determined and confident. Every Chinese member was a living evidence of this fact. Japan was found to be almost staggering under an economic burden of the most perplexing sort. The Japanese members demonstrated beyond dispute that while population was increasing, there was no commensurate growth in the supply of raw materials and markets. Her island domain will not expand either in size or productivity and it was soon found that this problem was not Japan's alone. Soviet Russia had been invited to send members but none were present. On many sides the hope was expressed that their viewpoint would be presented at subsequent gatherings. Manchuria was shown, over and over again, to be a region of real and growing friction, involving all three of these nations. Russia and Japan look at each other in no great friendliness as their issues clash here; China and Japan differ widely as to the validity of the treaties signed in 1915 after the presentation of the Twenty-One Demands. Other sharp points of difference are found, for instance, in the highly developed system of law which Westerners who reside in China are accustomed to for themselves, in contrast to the much less highly developed legal codes of the Chinese; or again, in the determination of the Chinese to recover the jurisdiction they have lost, in tariff administration, in law courts, and in foreign settlements—a determination which is met by the insistence of the Westerner on definiteness and safety. The very recognition of these differences led to increased determination to discover and remove the factors standing in the way of adjustment.

The third discovery was of immediate and pressing needs. Here lies a vast ocean, whose distances can be crossed with increasing rapidity for the purposes of passenger and freight traffic, but whose scanty supply of possible naval bases makes it evident at once that Pacific problems cannot be solved with the same war technique that has prevailed, hitherto, in the regions of the Atlantic. It was found that there was scarcely any international machinery for use in major Pacific issues involving serious conflict. While inventions forge ahead and science daily suggests new methods for devastating warfare, the Washington Conference adjourned in 1922 without providing for any further assembling of the Powers concerned, and even the League of Nations has but one small standing sub-committee to deal with friction in the Pacific. Here is an ocean crossed by migrations, some of which are checked by legislation while other streams are still active. How can these race contacts be wisely regulated? Here is a vast area in which old races are disappearing, flora and fauna changing constantly, where industrialization is rapidly altering old economic balances. How can the era of assumptions and speculations in such vital matters be left behind and an era of objective research be quickly entered? These were some of the questions faced squarely at the Institute.

The fourth discovery was that of the strangely rejuvenating influence of the Pacific on those who now line its shores. The United States and Canada are still young and their strength is growing. Australia and New Zealand are young, too, and feel the tingle of youth in their blood. But China, too, is revived. As a motto on a recent Chinese publication says, "The time of negation is at an end. High purposes are at hand." Near Young China stands a new Japan, increasingly liberal, increasingly conscious that in the spirit of youth she must forge forward to work out her destiny. Even the British members felt the impulse of the Pacific. They went to the round tables like schoolboys, met the Orientals squarely, faced without flinching the criticisms of both China and Japan and sat down with groups from each of these countries to study out how to deal with existing situations. At the end of the Institute conference one of the strongest of the British members asserted that outside of governmental agencies he knew of no body so significant in the field of Pacific problems nor of any that had so frankly tackled the major issues of that area.

Members of the Institute leave the conference, not speaking of any success attained nor satisfied with personnel and procedure in any merely optimistic spirit; but rather, deeply impressed with the magnitude of the Pacific arena and with the need for a mechanism and a spirit that shall make possible the solution of issues within that arena on a plane wholly different from any that has been known in the Old World. They believe the Institute affords at least a sane approach to the study of those issues and they look forward to a more intelligent understanding of their nature on the part of citizens in each of the Pacific countries. To them the Pacific Ocean represents, not a barrier that separates, but a highway for the travel of the spirit —the spirit that shall bring fuller knowledge and the ultimate elimination of war.

In the Driftway

AS the Drifter has traveled about the country he has of late observed a tendency to glorify the American employee in the lower ranks of labor. No matter how unskilled the laborer, the employers are resolving that he shall not work in obscurity. The star system has struck American labor, and no longer mute and inglorious, the humblest employee sings as he works.

THE Pennsylvania Railroad, for instance, has begun to feature its shop employees on its dining car menu cards. As one sits down to dine and takes up the card, one is confronted with a nice picture on the outside with a caption underneath stating that this is J. Montague Smith, the father of four children, who lives in Altaloosa, and has worked in the shops of the Pennsylvania Railroad for thirty-seven years. These little biographies are changed off now and then, and thus a great many employees are given their day in the sun. The dining-car porter is beginning to emerge from obscurity, too. One now finds his name on the bottom of the menu card. "You are being served," one reads, "by Mr. Lionel Johnson." It is the same with the hotels. Approach the desk to register in Boston, Atlanta, Des Moines, or Seattle, and everywhere the name of the hotel clerk confronts you. The Drifter learned now that Mr. George Brown, and again that Mr. Frank Thomas, and yet again that Mr. Paul Lawrence was ready to serve him. Once in a hotel in Atlanta when the Drifter plunged into the basement of his hotel for a shave he discovered the legend in front of him: "This chair is attended by Mr. Albero Benventuri." Although the Drifter is shy and has a strong aversion to having his finger-nails manicured by strange girls in strange places, he logically decided that it would be safe now to patronize the manicure girl. There would now be no embarrassment about introductions. For would he not be informed that "This chair is attended by Miss Violet Summers?" But, alas, at this point the system had broken down! The poor girl wasn't featured at all.

* * * * *

FOR all the Drifter knows this "super-service" may be all to the good. If the movement has arisen from a belated realization of the brotherhood of man and the dignity of labor, he will perforce be patient. But if, on the other hand, it is only another scheme of the efficiency experts, he must lament. It may keep the slaves contented but it is not in order to rejoice. The Drifter can only warn the experts in the solemn words of the author of the "Elegy": "Let not ambition mock their useful toil." He wonders if, after all, our humble servants will be happy in all the glare of this publicity. He wonders, too, if patrons do not prefer to be served anonymously. He comfortably refrains from talking to a barber or a waiter, name unknown. But it seems boorish to refuse to say a few words to a fellow-man who has been as good as introduced. He will be forced to make conversation in the future whether he likes it or not, and there is already far too much footless conversation in America. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Morituri Te Salutant

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: With regrets I must ask you to drop me from your mailing list for the present.

I give The Nation many thanks and have a sort of personal affection for it. It has been friend, teacher, and guide on and off these many years. To it I am more indebted for a wider, truer outlook than to all else I have read in current literature. Ambrosia, nectar, and manna in the Methbapterian wilderness it has been—a torch in the darkness of Coolidgeanity and a gas mask in the barrage of "big business."

Excepting its articles on the drama and music, yes, and its pictorial art, which are for the most part beyond my ken, and always the mysterious ravings of your cacophonous "poets," it has been a feast indeed; but a feast to be consumed in the closet with the door closed lest I be crucified on a fiery cross.

I am a teacher by occupation, and no teacher in this benighted South where I have spent my entire life dare acclaim The Nation and its ideals—its just ideals—and hope to live by teaching. It just isn't done. The mob would be on his neck.

Dark look the days ahead for my country when all liberal, enlightened opinion is stifled by the inquisitorial parsons and their political dupes. The enlightened are in a viler than Babylonian captivity and in the thumbscrews of a merciless Torquemadian "Holy Office."

I wonder what The Nation would think to see in a school textbook on literature the name of Robert E. Lee as a literary man and no mention of Thomas Paine whatever. Come to Texas and you shall see it.

Fare thee well, O wise and gentle Drifter! And ye, too, ye trenchant essayists and reviewers. Keep up the brave fight, if ye still have hope and vision of a better day. I cannot descry a star in the Stygian sky. But my eyes have become old.

Somewhere in Texas, July 27 W. M.

Contributors to This Issue

LOUIS FRANCIS BUDENZ, managing editor of Labor Age, was formerly a resident of Indianapolis.

EDWARD H. HUME has for twenty-two years served Yale-in-China at Changsha, Hunan Province, and is its president.

TALBOT FAULKNER HAMLIN is a New York architect and author of "The American Spirit of Architecture."

WITTER BYNNER, author of many volumes of poetry, is living in New Mexico.

GEORGE GENZMER is on the staff of the Dictionary of American Biography.

JOHAN SMERTENKO is a New York critic and student of the history of criticism.

SHIRLEY JACKSON CASE is professor of the early history of Christianity at the University of Chicago.

WALTER VOGDES is a California novelist and newspaper man now living in New York.

CARLETON BEALS, a frequent Nation contributor, is teaching in Mexico.

R. M. FOX is a resident of Dublin.

THEATER

Little Theatre
44th Street West of Broadway
Evgs. 8:30. Mats. Tues. and Thurs. at popular prices

THE GRAND STREET FOLLIES
"One cannot find anywhere in New York more clever ideas, more fresh satire or more verve." Joseph Wood Krutch in The Nation.

BOOKS

by DOROTHY VAN DOREN

A memorable novel, revealing the subtleties, the strengths, the fires of a woman's mind.

Distinguished in workmanship, powerful in story, it will win a place in the foremost ranks of American fiction.

By the Author of STRANGERS

JUST READY $2.50

FLOWERING QUINCE

DORAN BOOKS

Books

With the Gods

By WITTER BYNNER

I am at home with the gods of many people,
And therefore with the people of the gods.
My house is a temple fitted for their worship
With crosses, candles, feather-wands, tripods.
The Salt-Water Chief is my intimate at midnight,
Buddha smiles for me with his lotus-brow,
Out of a grave rises a Mexican image
Quiet for centuries and quiet now,
Korean dogs guard me from evil spirits,
Hopi Katchinas crowd my room with corn,
The Babylonian Moon-God lights my window,
I lend my bed for Jesus to be born,
I dare to have a difference with Jehovah—
Glad of a guest with whom to be at odds—
And when the cups are poured, I know that laughter
Makes people indistinguishable from gods.

General Dickman Views the War

The Great Crusade. By Major General Joseph Theodore Dickman with a foreword by General John J. Pershing. D. Appleton and Company, New York, 1927. $2.50.

OUR World War generals are doubtless excellent fighters but as writers they are behind the Civil War generation. Not one of them has produced a book to rank with the memoirs of Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, Wilson, J. D. Cox and others. General Dickman, who commanded the Third American Army, has added little to the history of the great struggle. He writes with justified pride in the American troops, in their extraordinary bravery and adaptability, and in the refusal of their leaders to permit them either to be distributed among the Allied troops or to be condemned to trench warfare. The Americans, he says, made up their minds to change the warfare back to the historic open methods and they did so. His book is chiefly valuable for its revelation of the constant friction between the Americans and the French troops and the severe criticisms of French strategy at Belleau Wood.

As to the latter, he says that every one of the 1,862 Americans killed and 9,412 wounded was sacrificed needlessly at the behest of French generals. Belleau Wood was, General Dickman says, "of no strategical importance whatever"; the Wood was of no special value to us as part of a general line of defense"; "it was magnificent fighting, but not modern war"; "Belleau Wood was a glorious but unnecessary sacrifice." Had this battle never been fought, the success at Soissons a few weeks later would have compelled the Germans to leave the Wood without its costing an American casualty.

As for the French, General Dickman writes "they did not come up to our expectations of cordiality, frankness and cooperation in the pursuit of the ideals of our people." He tells of their overcharging the Americans, of near-riots in Trier after the armistice and other conflicts between American and French troops; of French officers sent away from the American forces because of brutality to German civilians; of the constant misbehavior of the French native troops; of the failure of the French to include a single American in the festivities headed by the President of France, over the release of St. Mihiel from German domination by American troops, etc. etc. The whole original idea of the Allies was plainly to use the Americans as labor troops or to draft them individually as replacements for British and French regiments. They, apparently, had no more belief in the fighting qualities of the Americans under their own leaders than had the Germans—until they learned otherwise.

General Dickman waives any intention to assert that the Americans won the war; but he lets it be pretty well understood that he knows who did. There were no troops in Europe, he insists, who could have forced their way through the fortified fastnesses of the Argonne Forest except the Americans. The writer of this review, having seen those fastnesses not so long after the fighting ceased, agrees with him that it took incredible courage, daring, enterprise and determination—so great no one could have expected it of green troops in the most horrible of warfare, in the most difficult of terrains. But General Dickman, especially in dealing with St. Mihiel, fails to touch on the exhausted and demoralized condition of the German troops in 1918. If the Allies, as he says, "had lost such a percentage of their best men" as to render it doubtful whether they could have forced the Argonne, the same was true of the enemy. They, too, were bled white and exhausted. When the Germans had to meet the American attack they were without adequate reserves, they, too, were deficient in vitality and morale. Everybody testifies that if the Americans had attacked St. Mihiel in 1915 or 1916 the reception they would have received would have been entirely different. It is certainly open to question whether the Americans could have forced the warfare into the open if the Germans had not been spiritually and morally and physically at a low ebb. That does not detract from the wonderful American achievements; but when General Dickman fails to state it, he does not give his readers a true picture of the war. The American battle of November 1 and 2, 1918, he considers "the greatest feat of arms ever performed by an American Army." If that is the fact it has not yet penetrated American consciousness.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

A Dapper Little Man

The Life and Works of Francis Hopkinson. By George Everett Hastings. The University of Chicago Press. $4.

A MORE debonair man than Francis Hopkinson did not sign the Declaration of Independence. Over that historic transaction, otherwise solemn and desperate in spite of pealing bells and waving banners, the blithe little gentleman must have diffused an air of confident gentility. Luck and a cheerful temperament were his throughout life. The son of an affluent and highly respected lawyer in Philadelphia, he grew up in the pleasantest town in colonial America, received a good education at Franklin's new college, traveled in England, where he met the nicest kind of people, dallied for a few years with music, painting, and versifying, married the beauteous and wealthy Ann Borden of Bordentown, New Jersey, and settled down to practicing law, managing his wife's estates, and holding various political appointments. A man of letters by avocation, he imitated Gay and Prior in verse and Addison and Arbuthnot in prose, tinkered with several inventions, sat in the Continental Congress, contributed sprightly satires to the Revolutionary cause and later to the propaganda for the Constitution, enjoyed the friendship of Franklin, Washington, and Jefferson, was Judge of the Admiralty, and died respectably of gout and apoplexy in his fifty-third year. He was a dapper little man, whose head, according to John Adams, was no bigger than a large apple and whose whole personal appearance was the most amusing thing that Adams had ever met in natural history. In his own day he was regarded as a prodigy, and he had in fact that versatility which to contemporaries seems like genius but to posterity, unacquainted with the charm of the man, like frivolous mediocrity. Even his reputation as a jurist has waned. He is remembered now, so far as he is remembered at all, as the first person to receive a diploma from the College of Philadelphia, the first American poet-composer, the probable designer of the American flag, and the third best patriot satirist of the American Revolution.

Dr. Hastings's book is equally illuminating as an example of how to prosecute an historical investigation and as an example of how not to write a biography. His research has been conducted with thoroughness and discretion. It is unlikely that he has overlooked any document that would shed light on Hopkinson's career or failed to consult any person who might furnish information or made any mistake in his assessment of the evidence. Such work is not easy; so it is a pleasure to find the work done so well. Unfortunately, Dr. Hastings has not taken the same care with his writing. He does not discriminate between the pertinent and the irrelevant; he drags into his exposition what should have remained in the footnotes or been passed by in silence, and he makes no attempt to relate Hopkinson to the picturesque society in which he lived. Even an indurated historian, accustomed to reading public documents by the cubic foot, will murmur against the author's unnecessary tediousness. A single example is worth looking at. Chapter II begins thus:

> Some confusion has arisen about the date of Francis Hopkinson's birth. Lossing, with a minuteness of detail that invites belief, states that he was born "at almost midnight on the third of September, 1738." The sketch in the National Portrait Gallery, which has been attributed to his son, Judge Joseph Hopkinson, says merely that he was born in 1738. Sanderson is equally vague, but changes the year to 1737. Delaplaine agrees with Sanderson as to the year, and adds September as the month of his birth. And finally, two of the most careful of his more recent biographers, Mr. Sonneck and Professor Tyler, have given the dates September 21, 1737, and October 2, 1737, respectively. Fortunately, the way out of this labyrinth is easy: The record in the family Bible states that Francis Hopkinson was born on September 21, 1737, at seven o'clock in the morning. Moreover, the discrepancy between the dates given by Mr. Sonneck and Professor Tyler is only apparent, as September 21, old style, is the same as October 2, according to the modern calendar.

And to this paragraph eight footnotes are attached, yet the whole thing, so far as anyone interested in Francis Hopkinson is concerned, simmers down to a single sentence and its footnote. The rest should have been strictly between Mr. Hastings and his seminar professor at Harvard. To let such material remain in the completed book is like retaining the scaffolding on a building as proof that the bricklayers have been at work. Such writing serves no purpose except to bring scholarship into disrepute.

GEORGE GENZMER

Healthy Sensuousness

Wedding. By Melvin P. Levy. Unicorn Press. $2.

THIS is an erotic book, containing the most carnal-minded writing I know of in American literature excepting only Whitman. But it is not bawdy. It has nothing in common with the obscenity of Rabelais nor the ribaldry of Shakespeare nor the defiant pornography and furtive pruriency which are the polar attitudes of contemporary writers. Mr. Levy goes farther back, back to the naive voluptuousness of Greek and the healthy sensuousness of Hebrew literature. And he is not unworthy of his masters, for his libidinous story is written in chaste and beautiful prose.

Both this style, at once passionate and precious, and the emphasis given to the sheer cerebral reactions of the characters will serve as a deterrent to the merely salacious. "Wedding" is clearly and consciously not written for those who, while they accept the moralistic dogmas and inhibitions of the prude, seek lascivious titillation in the actions of the hedonist. Its treatment of sex is as thoroughly and as honestly sublimated as the prayer of a Shakti priest. Its consideration of carnal phenomena is full as a biologist's and, hence, wholly lacking in suggestiveness.

For Mr. Levy has somehow made vital his rediscovery of the elementals of our physical experience. Of descending a flight of stairs in an ordinary apartment house he can write convincingly: "The stairs were before him, an immeasurable downward distance to be traversed. He could not see their end, could not imagine it. For a moment he paused before them undecided: then one foot dropped downward. With the skill which man has made the custom of the staircase, he caught his falling weight. Down, down, down he went unpausing." And as with this sensation, so with washing, so with amorous advances, so with the writing of poetry! Moreover, the inanimate and social manifestations of our civilization are treated with the same fullness. The subway, the child's game, and the auction market no less than a strange girl and a lustful acquaintance engross and stimulate the hero to philosophical resolution of the mysteries of living.

Those who know the author through "Matrix" will be amazed at the change and growth revealed in this book. The turgid, derivative style of that first novel has been strained and purified until it is crystal-clear and remarkably individualized; the autobiographical irrelevancies which so insistently demand expression from every young writer and which cluttered the pages of the earlier work are almost wholly eliminated here; and, most important of all, the hesitant and unconvincing development of action, which in "Matrix" was due to incertitude concerning emotional values and a groping for spiritual motives, is now replaced by a pointed and inevitable movement born of intellectual and artistic surety, a calm assurance which inserts with subtle understanding and vulgar beauty a story of the Crucifixion into this most contemporary of scenes, and a confident craftsmanship which despite all the numerous digressions gives the novel compactness and intensity.

JOHAN SMERTENKO

Justice to the Pharisees

Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era: The Age of the Tannaim. By George Foot Moore. Harvard University Press. Two volumes. $10.

IT is a unique experience for the modern reading public to be presented with an elaborate two-volume work on the religion of the Jews during the first two centuries of the Christian era. There is to be still a third volume containing notes and excursuses. These books are without a rival in their chosen field. They offer the only extended discussion of the subject available in the English language. Probably they constitute the most detailed description of Judaism in early Christian times that has even been attempted.

The undertaking called for courage. Serious obstacles stood in the author's pathway. Any general sympathy with his theme was hardly to be expected beforehand, particularly in view of his determination to share none of Christendom's traditional hostilities toward the Jewish race. Although not a Jew himself, he chose for study just that period of history when Jews are popularly thought to have displayed most glaringly their heinous character by their rejection of Jesus and the early Christian preachers. A second difficulty involved the question of obtaining dependable information. Everybody is acquainted with the radical criticisms that Jesus is supposed to have pronounced upon the scribes and Pharisees of His day. Also Paul's remarks about the desperate situation of one who tried to live worthily under the instruction furnished by the Mosaic law are familiar. But estimates of Judaism made by ardent champions of the rival Christian movement are in the nature of the case partisan documents. Not until speakers for the other side have been heard is one in a position to judge of the facts. But such information is not readily accessible. Even those Christian writers who would assent to this judicial principle have as a rule been inadequately acquainted with the pertinent documents and consequently have been liable to draw hasty conclusions. They have not expended the time and labor necessary to insure familiarity with the Talmud and kindred Jewish literature; while Jewish scholars themselves have been none too active in making the contents of these religious books more generally available. It is an astonishing fact that, notwithstanding the large numbers of Jews scattered over the English-speaking world, there is no reliable English rendering of the whole Talmud or even of its most elemental part, the complete Mishnah.

Professor Moore has taken great pains to make himself at home in his sources of information, and his interpretation shows not the faintest trace of anti-Semitism. The publishers have accurately defined his aim in the words of the historian Ranke; he seeks to ascertain "what the thing is—what are the facts—and how it came to be." These volumes are particularly strong on the side of the "what." First there is a lengthy introduction in two chapters, one surveying the political career of the Jews down to about 200 A. D., and the other giving a detailed account of the various sources of information for the present study. The main body of the discussion falls into seven parts, with approximately a hundred pages allotted to each. The principal captions are Revealed Religion, The Idea of God, Man, Sin, Atonement, Observances, Morals, Piety, The Hereafter. The whole is elaborately indexed with respect to subject-matter, proper names, and passages and authorities cited. This feature adds much to the value of the books as works of reference, a use for which they are especially well adapted.

To accept our author's conclusions will involve a complete revision of the picture of Pharisaism as it has commonly been drawn by Christians. The alleged insincerities, hollow formalities, and barren legalism charged against scribes and Pharisees in the first century are found to have been not at all the characteristics of them as a class and must be set aside as slanders of their enemies. It is recognized that Judaism was a thorough-going legalism based on revealed instructions contained in Scripture. But the assumption that the principle of legalism was incompatible with the virtues of sincerity and genuine spirituality is stoutly contested. Indeed, Jesus and His immediate followers were "entirely orthodox" in their attitude toward the Jewish ceremonial law. On the other hand, the usual Christian claim that Jesus was the first to stress the conception of God as father, and the first to insist on the primacy of good motives in religious living, is emphatically denied. To call God "Father" was, we are told, not at all original with Jesus, but was characteristic of the type of piety in which He and His disciples had been reared. Similarly, the "wage-theory" of righteousness is not to be set down as the fundamental principle of Pharisaic religion. On the contrary, love toward God and conformity to the divine will were as basal for the contemporaries of Jesus as for Jesus Himself. Such findings should go a long way toward the rehabilitation of the much-abused Pharisees. Here they are in the presence of a fair-minded judge—or is he sometimes their zealous advocate! SHIRLEY JACKSON CASE

A Man Without a Country

Denied a Country. By Herman Bang. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

HERMAN BANG, Danish critic, journalist, novelist, and wanderer, died in America in 1912 while on a reading tour. We can see through his penetrating novel a man brilliant, dissatisfied, ironic, but at times sentimental and arbitrarily obscure.

His chief figure, Joan Ujhazy, is the son of a nobleman whose family for generations had occupied an island in a river that divided several countries. Rumanians, Hungarians, Serbs lived nearby, but the Ujhazy family had no country. Joan's mother was Danish. Bang adroitly establishes his theme by a description of the teasing and maltreatment which Joan undergoes as a child at the hands of the boys on the mainland. They jeeringly call him "prince of No-Country." The theme is brought in again when he is a student of music in Paris. He becomes a famous violinist and we next see him on a train. In the dining car are members of the European nobility and musical virtuosi, but Joan, the nobleman who happens to be a musician, feels aloof from both groups. In the last and best part of the book he arrives in a Danish frontier town for a concert and meets Gerda Johansen. He is the great and traveled artist, she the bright-eyed, romantic, and mysterious maiden. A new spirit possesses the tale at once; it becomes fresh and young, poetic and lovely. Joan and Gerda walk to the mountain top, they return to a dinner party which is to precede a concert. After the concert the guests return to the Johansen house. The joy given them by Joan's superb playing passes, they bicker among themselves, and the subject of patriotism brings on a harsh argument. Joan is made to feel apart from them, his mother's people. And, as the spirit of the gathering changes, so the romantic mood of Joan and Gerda fades. They cannot reach each other, really, and the end is frustration.

Parts of this novel are finer than the whole. The attack on petty patriotism is intelligent, but the author is so obsessed by his theme that the brooding, the self-pity, and the final collapse of Joan are unconvincing. Joan and Gerda live beautifully for an evening, but we have the feeling that if they could have escaped from their creator they would have given a better account of themselves. WALTER VOGDES

Builder of the Empire

Francisco de Ibarra and Nueva Vizcaya. By Lloyd Mecham. Duke University Press. $3.50.

THE sixteenth century in New Spain, or Mexico, was a period of glamorous, reckless empire-building. Beyond the furthest outpost were still new regions to explore, new possibilities of hazardous adventure and quick spoil. The lurid imaginations of the early Spaniards filled the void of their geographical ignorance with legendary treasure cities; and the most vicious frontiersman, often an escaped criminal or one wanted at home for marital support, felt a quickening of religious instincts and a desire to convert the dusky hordes to faith in Nuestra Señora as the hand of the law reached further into the wilderness and the chances for speedy enrichment faded with the coming of royal favorites and more systematic settlers. Yet the spectacular original conquest of Tenochtitlán, the Aztec capital, by Cortés has, perhaps forever, dimmed the lustre of succeeding conquistadores and has cast a shadow over the bold administrative daring of such viceroys as Mendoza and Velasco. Thus the cruelty, greed, and adventurous instability of the Spaniards have stood out in clearer relief than many of their later constructive colonizing efforts. Bourne in his "Spain in America" gave the picture more canvas; but there has always remained, especially in New Spain, a great gap at the end of the sixteenth century and, in spite of Bancroft's wholesale output, much historical ignorance concerning the subduing and colonizing of the northwest. Priestly in his recent volume, "The Mexican Nation," devotes major attention to the colonial period; Bolton has consistently deepened the current of border history. The present volume further illuminates an obscure corner: it is a specialized monograph on the exploration and the establishment of Nueva Vizcaya, that imperial province extending north and west from what is today Zacatecas and Jalisco, a region of almost impassable mountains, of desert and jungle, in many places still as wild and inaccessible as when Francisco de Ibarra first traversed it. Here is the region of Mexico which I myself know most intimately and which I have crossed on a dozen trails.

The author has based his study largely on research in the archives of Seville; he has mulled over an enormous mass of primary and secondary material. Yet the fact that his is specialized super-accurate historical research bars it as fireside romance of far times and far places. Even so the bare-bone facts add another jewel to the crown of hardy Basque exploration in the New World. Also, as biographical reconstruction the book is not over-convincing; the dramatic possibilities are lost in subsidiary detail and too rigid adherence to the direct documentary material. The author has cut out an impressive geometric solid, but has not breathed the clay of his material into life.

Francisco de Ibarra, who conquered this vast harsh area of Nueva Vizcaya, most of it before he was thirty, at no place strikes the eye warmly as a functioning character. This is in part due to the meagerness of the original previously untilled material and the failure of the author to go imaginatively far enough afield into parallel chronicles for that intimate narrative-stamped portrayal which enlivens certain episodes of the conquest. Mr. Mecham, while deserving unstinted credit for sailing uncharted seas, has vacillated between biography and a study of the adding of a new province to the empire. He tells the story of the second thing creditably if prosaically, because his forte lies in resetting historical bones patiently. If the interested reader will anticipate Mr. Mecham's book by the story of Lumholtz's explorations over much of the same area, he will gain a vivid picture of the region and its inhabitants three centuries after Francisco de Ibarra, a picture rich with concrete detail and intimate reality; and then, from the skeleton of Mr. Mecham's honest facts, he can perhaps recreate emotionally the epic figure who strode across so vast a stage in the twilight of the earlier period.

CARLETON BEALS

Books in Brief

Canada. The Great River, the Lands, and the Men. By Marion I. Newbigin. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $4.

This interesting book has a too comprehensive title. It is really limited to the history of French Canada down to the British Conquest. The author is interested in geography, as becomes one who is the editor of the Scottish Geographical Review, and the really original feature of the book is the relation of the history of Canada to its geography. The author thinks that Frontenac misread geography when he tried to make the trade of the West flow to Montreal and that La Salle was equally mistaken about the possibilities of the Mississippi. Of course, the railway of a later age altered the conditions, but Montreal remains the greatest seaport in North America, after New York, and proposals for deepening canals on the St. Lawrence may well increase its importance. Dr. Newbigin, relying chiefly on Parkman and a few monographs, tells the story of French Canada in a coherent and interesting style; the maps are excellent and original in form, and the photographic illustrations are good.

The Historical Life of Christ. By J. Warschauer. With a Preface by F. C. Burkitt. The Macmillan Company. $5.

This is a type of "Life of Christ" that has come more and more into vogue during the last quarter-century. The author is a modernist, but not an extremist in his treatment of the New Testament documents. In the main he discards the Gospel of John and reconstructs his story of Jesus's career from the less supernatural features in Matthew, Mark, and Luke. Much is made of Jesus's supposed classification of himself as a Messiah in the so-called "apocalyptic" sense. He believed himself destined in the near future to return to earth in triumph after the pattern of the heavenly deliverer pictured in later Jewish prophecies. In this hope he was, it proved, quite mistaken, yet in pursuing the delusion he displayed a devotion to the divine will and moral sincerity that have since established him as the inaugurator of the true Kingdom of God for his disciples. In respect to critical method, one must say that our author simply rethreshes old straw, but he wields the flail with fascinating vigor, and one who is not already familiar with this type of book will find it stimulating reading.

The Mystic Rose. By A. E. Crawley. Revised and greatly enlarged by Theodore Besterman. Boni and Liveright. Two volumes. $10.

The new edition of this well-known classic of anthropology shows enlarged bulk, but it is unfortunate that the quality of the additions made by Mr. Besterman are such as to convince the critical reader that he knows extremely little about the data of ethnology gathered in the twenty-five years since Crawley published the first edition. The "new" references rarely date later than 1905, and the old trick of quoting in full the title of every work each time it is referred to is used to pad the citations and make them impressive. Mr. Besterman adds a few so-called "refutations" to objections made when the first edition appeared, while for the most part the additions themselves take the form of reprints of Crawley's contributions to the periodical literature of anthropology. These too often appear to have been placed in the new edition rather for the sake of having them included than for the purpose of adding anything to the argument in hand. The work itself needs little comment; it is a study of "primitive" sex life and thought in the old evolutionary tradition that has been so thoroughly discredited by modern anthropologists. Its two worst faults are the assumption that primitive and modern thinking processes are essentially different and the dizzying tendency to pull ethnographic facts from their cultural contexts to make a point in the argument.

Economic and Social Conditions in France During the Eighteenth Century. By Henry Sée. Translated from the French by Edwin H. Zeydel. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

A distinguished French scholar popularizes the most recent researches on economic and social conditions in France in the Old Regime. Done in the best traditions of French vulgarisation—readable, balanced, above all, accurate. Realistic in treatment, with a pronounced leaning toward economic interpretations of social changes. An invaluable handbook for the student. Also an eye-opener for the average reader on this side of the Atlantic, who explains the Revolution through an idealization of his democratic prejudices and the myth of a starving peasantry reading Voltaire and Rousseau and forthwith rush-rushing on against the Bastille.

French Society in the Eighteenth Century. By Louis Ducros. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $5.

This book possesses unity of plan and execution. The author's open-mindedness and his vast command of the sources compel respect. His picture of the various strata of society can in no instance be called distorted. For all that, it fails in the essential purpose for which it was written. It does not give an imaginative reconstruction of the past. It is difficult to state why. The figures of society move on its pages. Their words are repeated most copiously. Their surroundings are described, their bodies draped, their minds bared. In the process, however, reality dies a thousand deaths.

The Spanish House for America. By Rexford Newcomb. The J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.50.

A small book packed with interesting material. Its illustrations are remarkably well chosen, and the text is carefully arranged and clear. Whatever one may think of the propriety of such a style revival in modern America, particularly in places where the tradition of Spanish work does not exist, one must welcome works like this which give it background, sanity, and taste.

Free State and Republican Ireland

By R. M. FOX

Dublin, July 22

TWO big funerals took place in Dublin recently—those of Kevin O'Higgins and the Countess Markievicz. Both were buried in the same week and the death of both had a political significance. It could hardly be otherwise. Kevin O'Higgins was the strong man of the Free State while Countess Markievicz, who was sentenced to death as a leader in the 1916 Irish Rebellion, has ever since taken a prominent part in Republican activities.

The assassination of Kevin O'Higgins was a great shock to everyone for, contrary to popular belief, the Irish do not take assassination as a matter of course. General sympathy was expressed for the widow and there was some foreboding as to the future. But to represent the public as being stricken with grief is quite untrue. In the eyes of the people O'Higgins was responsible for many terrible things, and on occasion was heard to boast of them. When a woman asked about the "75 executions" he leaned forward and said, "Pardon me, madam, 77!" "I am the hero of the Flogging Bill!" I heard him cry at a meeting in O'Connell Street. What has remained in the public memory is the execution of the leaders in the Four Courts' struggle. The four leaders had surrendered and had been in prison for some time. Suddenly they were taken out and shot. Rory O'Connor was the close friend of O'Higgins, who signed his death warrant. When his will was read it was found he had left everything to Kevin O'Higgins.

The newspapers in Dublin and elsewhere stated that there was not a dry eye at the funeral. I was present. It was a military display led by the Free State ministers. Soldiers with bared bayonets marched in columns like an invading army through a conquered city. The rest was made up by policemen, fire-engines, bored-looking civil servants who marched under compulsion, British ex-service men with rows of medals, and a contingent of Italian Fascisti. People stood and gazed with whispered comments. The name of Rory O'Connor was frequently on their lips. I do not say that the people were not reverent. All heads were bared as the coffin went by. It is a pronounced Irish characteristic to respect death. If, at a meeting, a dead man's name is mentioned caps and hats are always raised in memory. Only the well-dressed civilian marchers showed lack of respect. Some were obviously bored and laughed and talked as they straggled along.

The funeral of the Countess Markievicz contained all the elements which the other lacked. It was no cold official ceremony. Dublin rose in its thousands. Dockers who remembered her self-sacrifice in the great lock-out of 1913, marched from work on Friday night to the chapel. Flower girls and street traders gave beautiful wreaths and asked if they might walk in the funeral procession. All through the night on Saturday while the Countess was lying in state, an endless stream of people of all classes filed past the Fianna boys (National Boy Scouts) who formed the guard of honor. On the morrow the people marched. Dublin papers had treated the event as of no account. The news concerning her death was tucked away inconspicuously. But Dublin shook to the tread of thousands of men, women, and children who marched through the city to Glasnevin. Everyone in the procession came voluntarily. And there was no laughing, talking, or falling out of step. One young man after marching nearly two hours in the scorching sun lit a cigarette surreptitiously behind his hand. There was a roar from the ranks: "Put that cigarette out!"

The Free State which refused the use of the Mansion House for the lying in state of a 1916 leader (whose work made the Free State possible) sent lorry loads of soldiers and police to the cemetery to hamper the proceedings as much as they could. They failed. A more generous body of men would have given the Mansion House and taken part in the ceremony. Even from the lowest tactical motives, it would have been wise to have annexed some of the 1916 tradition for the new state. Instead they emphasized the breach and put another barrier between themselves and nationalist Ireland. Contrast this with the generous message of sympathy immediately issued on the death of Kevin O'Higgins by De Valera, the Republican leader.

The contrast of the funerals throws a withering light on the position of the Free State Government in Ireland. At the very time when Dublin papers were doing their best to hide the intensity of Irish feeling, an English newspaper in pursuit of Irish readers brought out a striking article on the career of the Countess. The funeral was featured in English newspapers while Dublin papers published golf results!

It is time the world faced the truth about Ireland. The recent elections should have made it plain. Republicans secured 51 seats as against the Government's 47 and this in spite of the fact that electors knew from experience that their representatives would be barred out. Does that mean that the Anglo-Irish treaty must go? The Irish alone can decide this. But it does mean that further concessions must be made to Irish national feeling. When I first went to Ireland—at the time of the 1922 truce—I met many leaders on both sides, some of whom have since been killed in the fighting. Discussing the question with them the conclusion I came to was that the dry bones of logic were not enough. The treaty I believed would have to be given an Irish interpretation if it was to be worked at all. Logically it may give Ireland power to work out her economic and political salvation. But we have to consider logic as tempered by tradition. The upholders of the treaty are being more and more forced into the position of enemies of the Irish tradition. They are relying to an increasing extent upon the bitter ex-Unionist element. But they cannot build on that. To placate Irish feeling they have declared for compulsory Irish in the schools. This makes the ex-Unionists furious because they know that a separate language means a separate nationality. The Free State is in a dilemma because it is breeding Republicans to effect its undoing. Yet while national sentiment grows under its rule, it sets itself to repress adult expression of this sentiment. At elections, Ministers take with them a horde of "stewards" whose duty it is to throw out questioners. In the last election at a meeting in Rathmines Town Hall, a woman who asked a question was so severely handled that a few days later she wrote from a hospital where she had recovered consciousness, protesting against her treatment.

Raids are frequent. Not long ago I was staying at Washington Lodge, Rathfarnham, near Dublin. A Republi-

"HELL! . . . .

Save that Whoop-la—to get us votes in the next campaign It won't sell no books!"

—says Boss Van Hoos, the hero of "God Got One Vote," a novel acclaimed by William Allen White as "a real book without being nasty . . . its saving grace of essential idealism never softens into mush."

THIS book is the story of Boss Van Hoos, a politician in a Middle Western town — an ignorant, sentimental, tough, big-hearted, big-bodied Irishman who makes his entry into political life as the result of a saloon brawl the night before the McKinley-Bryan election and ultimately becomes one of the most powerful political bosses in the country—and it traces his material, social and moral development. A more startlingly genuine character has rarely been portrayed in recent fiction.

The Book-of-the-Month Club News, in reporting on the book for its subscribers, says: "Boss Van Hoos stays honest, personally honest, and the curious moral world which he inhabits —where corruption in politics seems right and natural as long as you keep faith with your friends, where the men who govern have no interest in government except as a business, have never even heard of political theory except as a catchword—is a real achievement. This, in short, is the faithful and sometimes exciting picture of a ward politician. The title is accurate. When it was all over, the boss had done something for righteousness and humanity, where the reformers had failed or been hypocrites. God got one vote anyway."

Published August 19th

On sale at all bookstores—$2.50

GOD GOT ONE VOTE

A novel by Frederick Hazlitt Brennan

SIMON and SCHUSTER, Inc., 37 W. 57th St., NEW YORK

ANNOUNCEMENT of the FRANCIS BACON AWARD

Sponsored by THE FORUM MAGAZINE and SIMON AND SCHUSTER, INC.

SEVEN THOUSAND FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS for the outstanding work of non-fiction in the coming year which, in the famous phrase of Professor James Harvey Robinson, best "carries on the conscious adventure of humanizing knowledge."

ONE of the most significant trends in literature, of recent years, has been the ever-widening audience that has arisen for distinguished and authentic works of science, history, sociology, philosophy, psychology and biography. Curiosity about the world in which we live is, apparently, deeper and keener than ever before. There has been evident an insistent demand from the public for the humanization and clarification of specialized knowledge. The Francis Bacon Award has been instituted to foster this clearly valuable tendency. The selection each year of such a work will unquestionably be an event of the first importance in the world of letters. In addition to the money award of seven thousand five hundred dollars, an emblematic medal will be struck off each year and presented to the winning author.

THE JURY OF AWARD WILL INCLUDE:

DR. CHARLES A. DORAN — Author "How Far Science Lies Beyond Science"

DR. WILL DURANT — Author of "The Story of Philosophy"

DR. HENRY GODDARD LEACH — Editor of "The Forum"

DR. EDWIN E. SLOSSON — Author of "Creative Chemistry"

DR. HENDRIK WILLEM VAN LOON — Author of "The Story of Mankind"

THE COUNCIL OF SPECIALISTS WILL INCLUDE

DR. JAMES HENRY BREASTED — Director Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago

DR. VERNON LYMAN KELLOGG — Director National Research Council

DR. EDWARD GRANT CONKLIN — Professor of Biology, Princeton University

DR. HENRY FAIRCHILD OSBORN — President American Museum of Natural History

PROFESSOR JOHN DEWEY — of Columbia University

DR. HARLOW SHAPLEY — of Harvard University

FRANK JEWETT MATHER — of Princeton University

For details about the method of procedure to be followed by contestants, address the Francis Bacon Award, c/o Simon and Schuster, Inc., Publishers, 37 West 57th Street, New York City, or c/o The Forum, 441 Lexington Avenue, New York City.

NEXT WEEK

in The Nation

Should Men Be Protected?

by Lorine Pruette

OPEN SHELF

GOOD CHEER, COMRADES! Want to buy, sell, or swap books, bronzes, old china, clocks, curios, etchings, lamps, paintings, prints, oriental rugs? Bus, or stroll to Daca's, 63 Washington Sq. So., N. Y. C. Books always 20 to 80% off. Open eves.

BOOKS All books (except text) sent post free anywhere at 15% discount from publishers' prices. List on request.
ISRAEL SOIFER
1244 Clay Avenue New York City

can family lives here and it was a common thing for a lorry to rumble up in the middle of the night while with a great racket seven or eight men would rush in, carrying revolvers and electric torches. These raids took place for the most trivial reasons.

For example, one night it was alleged that Mr. Cosgrave's mother's windows had been broken, so a young man of the Republican family was arrested and taken to the police barracks for about an hour. Although I had taken no part in Irish politics my room was invaded without ceremony. I sat up in bed and interviewed the raiders in the dark. No warrants were produced; papers, letters, and belongings were tossed about and the raiders went without any apology. After the shooting of Kevin O'Higgins two young men of the family were arrested and charged with others for conspiracy to murder. They have been remanded twice without any evidence. The charge is absurd and no one believes it. The parish priest, not a Republican, has testified to seeing them at church the morning of the murder and the whole village is indignant. Republicans have always accepted responsibility for their activities and they repudiate any connection with the crime. On July 21, a public meeting called to protest against these imprisonments was proclaimed. Hundreds of police were scattered in groups along O'Connell Street and to reinforce them, several lorry loads of burly men in plain clothes stood by the roadside. This policy of irritation and suppression pursued by the Government indicates weakness and complete lack of confidence in the people.

On certain "neutral" measures like the Shannon electricity scheme, the grading of dairy produce, improved cattle breeding, and general industrial efficiency, where national tradition is not directly involved, the Government has done good work, though even here it has set itself to reduce wage standards. Besides this it has replaced many elected local bodies by paid commissioners who also carry out the policy of low wages and scanty relief rates. This is in line with the Government policy of reducing Old Age Pensions by a shilling and cutting down unemployment and sickness insurance benefits.

It is hard to prophecy as to the future. I have heard it said that there is no treaty party in Ireland: only one party opposed to the treaty and another that has betrayed it! However this may be, the point on which national sentiment is now focussed is the removal of the oath of allegiance. The feeling of the country is clear on this. Only the Government nominees and a few Independents stand firm for the oath. The Labor Party (22) has opposed it. The National League and the Farmers' Party are lukewarm. But the Government, though in a hopeless minority on the question, declines to remove it. They have even introduced a bill abolishing the provision in the constitution for a referendum in order to checkmate the growing agitation against the oath. They have succeeded in getting through a bill which declares that no one may stand for election unless he declares his willingness to take the oath beforehand.

The Government is getting more and more out of sympathy with the strong national tradition. They dance on the razor edge between ex-Unionists and Nationalists and when their toes get sore they vent their spite on opponents by repressive acts. The sensible thing would be to make such concessions as would placate national feeling and enable Ireland to develop on national lines.

SUMMER PLACES

RIVERLAKE LODGE
A Camp Superb
FOR ADULTS
OUISLEY KINGSTON, N. Y., ON THE HUDSON RIVER AND LAKE ESOPUS
A beautiful place with wonderful views of the Hudson River and mountains, where intelligent people will meet congenial company. Bathing, Boating, Fishing, Tennis, Hand Ball, Dancing and other amusements. Golf course in vicinity. Excellent Food. Terms: $35.00 weekly, $7.00 a day. Write for camp booklet
Special 3-Day Labor Day week-end—$20.
RIVERLAKE LODGE
70 West 40th St. New York City Tel. Longacre 3693.
Ulster Park, Ulster County, N. Y. Tel. Kingston 2810.
HARRY WEINBERGER HARRY KELLY
Directors

TIMBERLAND
IN THE HEART OF THE ADIRONDACKS
The Camp Purposely Limited to a Congenial Group of 40
Bungalows and Main House modern in every respect. Rate $27 per week.
Excellent facilities and equipment for all camp sports; also golf.
Round Trip Fare to Riverside, N. Y., station, $13.27.
MORRIS HARKAVY
ESTHER R. KAPLAN
N. Y. Office, 55 West 42nd St. Pennsylvania 7663
Mail your reservations to POTTERSVILLE, N. Y.

SCHOOLS IN FRANCE

Château-Neuvic School
A Church School for American Boys preparing for American Colleges.
Wholesome country life organized in a historic feudal castle. American standards of hygiene and diet; yearly tuition $1,200. Full sports program, including crew.
The Rt. Rev. Charles H. Brent, Bishop of American Churches in Europe, Chairman of Board of Trustees.
Address: Dr. Conrad Chapman, Head Master, Chateau-Neuvic, Neuvic-sur-l'Isle, Dordogne, France

BOOKS

THE EVOLUTION OF MAN, by Wilhelm Boelsche
A clear, strong, simple summary not only of Darwin's theory but of the work of a generation of scientists along the lines Darwin opened up. Just what a busy man wants to give him a bird's-eye view of Evolution. Cloth, illustrated, 60 cents by mail. Catalog free.
Charles H. Kerr & Co., 347 East Ohio St., Chicago, Ill.

MISCELLANEOUS

REAL HARRIS HOMESPUNS Direct from the Makers at Manufacturer's Price
Suit Lengths Cut to Order. Postage Paid
NEWALL, 150 Stornoway, Scotland. Write for patterns stating shades desired

Do you want to make extra money?
Address Dept. 11
THE NATION
20 Vesey Street New York

Your Fall Problems
If you want to rent a house or an apartment for the coming winter, or if you have one to rent—or sell, advertise in the classified section of The Nation, read by desirable landlords and tenants. Rates on application. Special three-time rate.
Dept. T, The Nation, 20 Vesey St., New York

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXV NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 31, 1927 No. 3243

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS ... 189

EDITORIALS:
- Massachusetts the Murderer ... 190
- Chiang Kai-shek Passes On ... 192
- Warrior Wells and Battling Bellor ... 193

TORTURE UP TO DATE. By Hendrik Willem van Loon ... 195

THE ARMOURS BETRAY THE FARMERS. By Frederick Boselly ... 196

HANKOW SWINGS TO THE RIGHT. By Paul Blanshard ... 198

SHOULD MEN BE PROTECTED? By Lorine Pruette ... 200

HONESTY IN ADVERTISING. By Raymond Fuller ... 202

CHICAGO'S SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. By Lawrence Martin ... 204

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter ... 205

CORRESPONDENCE ... 206

BOOKS AND MUSIC:
- The Gulls Know Best. By Leslie Nelson Jennings ... 208
- Vera Figner. By Theresa Wolfson ... 208
- Senator Owen on the War. By Harry Elmer Barnes ... 208
- Shakespeare and His Audience. By George Genzmer ... 209
- The Real Olive Schreiner. By R. S. Alexander ... 210
- Catching Pegasus Young. By Harry Alan Potamkin ... 210
- Intensity. By Martha Mott ... 211
- The Lower Rhine Festival in Aachen. By Henriette S... ... 211
- Book in Brief ... 212

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
- A Forger of Soviet "Documents." By L. T. ... 213
- Fascist Culture ... 215

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

THE MAN WHO BOMBED the house of Mr. McHardy, the Sacco-Vanzetti juror, struck a terrible blow at the prisoners and stiffened the backs of all who might have had something to say as to a commutation of sentence. More than that, it again identified the cause of these men with bomb-throwers in the minds of multitudes who read only the headlines. The very thing that hundreds of men and women who fought for the lives of these two men tried to get out of the case—the question of their political opinions—was thus reinjected. So we can only devoutly hope that the execution will bring no further outrages with it. We must again repeat what we have already said that the cause of progress and true liberty is enormously retarded by any act of violence, which is invariably seized upon by every reactionary as the excuse for reprisals and the suppression of free speech, free assembly, and the right to demonstrate which marked the closing hours of the tragedy in Boston. Two wrongs never yet made a right—violence cures and helps nothing. The capital of Massachusetts trembled both in fear of bombs and of words. One could not carry legends as to the "judicial murder" of Sacco and Vanzetti without being arrested. And this on Boston Common of all places, where once even the boys of Boston fought a successful battle against other "reds," or red-coats, to be exact. Those who turn to violence to vent their feelings will only injure gravely the cause they seek to aid.

WHAT AN EXTRAORDINARY and often how disappointing a public man is William E. Borah! Here is a great figure in our political life, the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Senate, sending the following words to Jane Addams in response to her appeal to him to aid in his official capacity in the saving of Sacco and Vanzetti because of the tremendous feeling in Europe:

> But it would be a national humiliation, a shameless, cowardly compromise of national courage, to pay the slightest attention to foreign protests or mob protests at home. We all know your fine devotion to humanity, but neither humanity nor peace can be served by deferring to foreign interference, which is an impudent and wilful challenge to our sense of decency and dignity and ought to be dealt with accordingly.

Any petty agent of the National Security League might have penned these lines, the mistaken character of which ought to be clear to Senator Borah when he finds that it has led to his commendation editorially by the Boston Transcript and other dailies which ordinarily are ready to criticize his every utterance. The discouraging tone of this despatch lies less in its attitude toward the particular cause for which his help was asked than in the revelation of the Senator's mental slant. Fortunately he has his different moods. Two days later he swung round and offered his services to the Sacco-Vanzetti Defense Committee to aid in getting justice done! This is characteristic. Where once he breathed fire and slaughter against the Mexicans, he has of late been a tower of strength and wisdom in dealing with the situation. We notice that Mr. Borah has also appealed to the nations of Europe to devote themselves now to furthering democracy at home. That is excellent; but it is no foundation for democracy in America to put to death men as to whose guilt literally millions have well-based doubts.

THE TRAGEDIES in connection with the trans-Pacific flight, the failure of the German flyers, and the weeks of delays which those who are waiting good weather before taking off from France and England have had to face are clear enough proof how far we still are from any regular transatlantic air service. It is well to pioneer and for that reason risks must be run to establish the first contacts. But it is obvious that there must be a tremendous advance in the safety of airplanes and a radical change in the type manufactured for overseas flight before there can be any talk of passenger or mail service. It is a grave question, too, whether it would not be well to discourage transoceanic contests until we are much further along—as we write the Dole contest seems to have cost five airplanes and ten lives, enough in all conscience to put an end to any further racing. Particularly pathetic is the loss of Captain Erwin with his Spirit of Dallas; he so bravely set forth to zigzag to Hawaii in the hope of aiding the others who were down. Never before, we presume, has any radio message come from an airplane that it was in a tailspin and dropping. What iron nerve and fortitude the sending of such a message must have called for!

WE COMMEND to the statesmen of all subject people the diplomatic style of C. C. Wu, Minister of Foreign Affairs of the dying Nationalist government of Nanking. He does not waste breath in assurances of high consideration. On August 16 a British military airplane flying over Chinese territory near Shanghai was forced to land. The Chinese have repeatedly protested against the practice of foreign airplanes flying over Chinese territory, and on this occasion a detachment of Chinese troops seized the airplane's wings. Dr. Wu announced:

> The British are criminals in the eyes of the Chinese and international law as regards their aviation policy in China. We intend to use this incident to force a showdown in the matter of flights in China. We intend to hold the wings. We have not the force to meet British imperialism but we intend to let the world know what they are doing.

The British under Major General Sir John Duncan promptly tore up a section of the Shanghai-Hangchow-Ningpo railway as a reprisal, and the Chinese were forced to give back the airplane wings. Dr. Wu's defiance of Great Britain was bad military strategy but first-class advertising. It reminded the world of the extent of British occupation of China. But how much better is America's position? Six amphibian airplanes intended for Guam have just been sent to China instead These, upon their arrival, will make twenty-one American military airplanes in China, increasing the potential danger of abuse and violation of Chinese rights.

THE WORLD OIL WAR which Sir Henri Deterding of the Royal Dutch-Shell promised to instigate against the Standard Oil of New York when that company entered into an agreement with the Russian naptha company for the purchase of Russian oil is assuming daily more significant proportions. At the start of the Anglo-American conflict, it will be remembered, Sir Henri directed his highly virtuous crusade against the Standard Oil of New York; it was only this company of the Standard group that had fallen so low as to purchase the Soviet's "stolen oil" (i. e., expropriated from Sir Henri's company under the nationalization act of 1918). With the Standard Oil of New Jersey Sir Henri intended to continue friendly and cooperative trade agreements. This state of grace for the New Jersey company, however, did not last long—it made the mistake of entering into the "Heidelberg agreement" with the German dye trust. This German-American alliance gives the Standard exclusive selling and exploiting rights in the new crude oil and oil patents of the German company—thereby freezing Sir Henri out completely. But the agreement—and this is probably more despicable from Sir Henri Deterding's viewpoint—also links the New Jersey Standard with Russia, since the German dye trust has important branches and concessions in the Soviet Republic. At any rate the Dutch-Shell has denounced its compact with the Standard to cooperate in the exploitation of the Persian oil fields. This action is interpreted as Sir Henri's way of reprisal, and it makes the break between the two oil groups now seem complete. The likelihood of a peaceful settlement or compromise has virtually disappeared.

WITH THE PRECEDING reprisals and counter-reprisals in mind, the recent Soviet-Persia trade treaty assumes added importance. It is in Persia that British policy has been constantly in opposition to Russia—even before the World War its main object was to keep Persia as a buffer state between Russia and India. One can easily imagine how this desire has grown with England's deadly fear of Soviet propaganda. The weakening of this barrier, therefore, coupled with the American concessions in the rich Caucasian oil fields, has obviously not lessened British antagonism toward the Soviet system in general and in the Persian region in particular. Nor has Great Britain's apprehension decreased. Already it has been proposed to place the Indian army under the direct control of the War Office instead of the Viceroy. Under the War Office the Indian troops could be directed to any point of need. Thus would be overcome the Indian Government's opposition to the use of Indian troops for other than strictly defensive purposes within India. Great Britain maintains, of course, that this proposed army reorganization, which also involves concentrating the main British military strength in India, is simply for protection against a threatened Russian invasion through Afghanistan. While it may be conceded that Afghanistan is a weak point on the Indian border, it is open to conjecture whether the attractive petroliferous lands of northern Persia and Caucasia have not had a strong influence in reforming British "defensive" tactics. In the past it has certainly not been unknown for the desires of the Foreign Office and those of the great petroleum interests to show a striking similarity of purpose. "Meanwhile," asks a New York Herald Tribune correspondent, "is there any possibility of an actual clash in the near future? Men following the situation . . . say that next spring may witness the first moves."

ONE OF THE MOST STRIKING and hopeful events in Europe since the armistice is the trade treaty just concluded between France and Germany. The close of the World War found a well-organized propaganda and a firm intention in France never again to buy merchandise from Germany, while the occupation of the Ruhr left Germans with a greater bitterness toward the French than the war itself. Yet now, only eight years after the dissension-breeding Treaty of Versailles, the traditional foes, France and Germany, come together in an accord which is calculated not only to benefit both economically but to improve gradually their political and social relations. In general each country grants the other tariff concessions on articles which its nationals do not produce. Germany has also agreed to practical exclusion of her citizens from Morocco. Her steamship lines may enter Moroccan ports but the agencies there may not be conducted by Germans. No better proof than this treaty could be adduced to prove the old adage that misfortune makes brothers of us all. Germany, with the necessity of carrying a huge indemnity and recreating her foreign trade, realizes the need of French markets, while France, staggering under a huge burden of debt and a depressed currency, has to keep her industrial wheels turning or perish. Thus business has again made peace while politicians merely talked it.

WE PREDICTED in last week's Nation that an Irish coalition might force out President Cosgrave and install the Labor leader, Tom Johnson, or Colonel Redmond in his place. Nothing of the sort happened. President Cosgrave held his place by one vote; the Labor and De Valera supporters lost by a count of 70 to 71, the missing vote being the property of one John Jinks, a Redmond supporter unfortunately absent from the chamber when the roll-call was taken. At first it was rumored that Mr. Jinks had been kidnapped, but no such romantic explanation was forthcoming. At the last moment he had changed his mind. As a result the Government will remain in power until October, anyway, when the House meets again. By that time Mr. Jinks may have been persuaded, or another coalition, not so precarious, may have been formed. Meanwhile the Government's attempts to place the murder of Kevin O'Higgins at the door of the De Valera party has been without result.

A POLICEMAN WITH A GUN is a dangerous animal: five persons killed and eleven wounded in New York City this year by chance shots from a policeman's pistol bear eloquent witness to the fact. During the last ten days a nine-year-old girl was killed by a policeman, a twelve-year-old-boy shot in the leg, a man at the wheel of his car commandeered by a policeman to chase a stolen automobile dropped dead from a policeman's bullet, an Italian was shot in the abdomen by a policeman and died, and two other Italians, a man and a woman, were slightly wounded. It is well that as a result of this shocking state of affairs Police Commissioner Warren, in some embarrassment, should call for an inquiry into the cavalier pursuit of suspected criminals by officers of the law armed with revolvers. But what does the commissioner propose to do about the situation? Why, to be sure, he has directed that patrolmen report for target practice four times a year instead of twice as is the custom at present. But, according to the New York World, no general warning has been issued warning patrolmen against using revolvers in the streets, especially in crowded ones. Evidently, besides "investigating" the shootings that have just taken place—and doubtless establishing the fact that actually the unfortunate person was alive and is now dead or wounded, as the case may be—the commissioner has thought of nothing except to give the police more lessons in how to shoot straight, when it is obvious that they need the most elementary instruction in how not to shoot at all.

SUBJECT TO THE APPROVAL of shareholders the capital of the International Mercantile Marine Company is to be materially reduced. In place of $101,596,800 preferred and common stock now outstanding, the corporation is to issue approximately 720,000 shares of no par value about five-sixths of which will be common and the balance cumulative preferred stock retirable at $100. This drastic recapitalization is the outcome of the sale some six months ago of the White Star Line, the Mercantile Marine's principal asset. When this first of the great shipping trusts was formed twenty-five years ago its vessel fleet was acquired at the abnormally high prices for tonnage then prevailing in consequence of the British Government having requisitioned a vast amount of shipping for carrying on the Boer War. The book value of its passenger and cargo carriers was $160 a ton, or nearly three times that of the vessels of competing lines. From its very inception therefore the International Mercantile Marine was overcapitalized. It was never able to pay a dividend on its common stock, while only for a few years from 1917 on, when shipping made unprecedented profits as a result of the World War, did it declare any dividends on its preferred stock. In a highly competitive business open to all comers like the ocean carrying trade, an enterprise with an inflated capital cannot possibly be made to pay appreciable returns to shareholders. This initial mistake of its promoters the officials of the International Mercantile Marine now propose to rectify by writing off $45,000,000 from its good-will account and by changing its present stock into a lessened number of no-par shares.

A GOOD WILL TRIP to Mexico in an airplane was the plan of leading business men of Houston, Texas. Nothing else, they thought, would do quite so much to cultivate friendly relations between Mexico and the United States. It was a "metropolitan" idea, too, in these days when Lindberghs and Chamberlains were being hailed as unofficial ambassadors of good will across the Atlantic. In order to make the trip sound more important T. L. Evans, chairman of the Chamber of Commerce, telegraphed to President Calles of Mexico asking permission to enter the republic. President Calles replied in a courteous telegram that he would be glad to welcome the flyers, would waive all customs regulations in order that they might cross the border without landing, and would arrange to have an air field lighted so that, if necessary, the plane might land at night. The plan to create reciprocal brotherly love between Houston and the country below the Rio Grande seemed well on its way to success. Then Mr. Evans telegraphed to our Secretary of State, Frank B. Kellogg, from whom came the following reply:

> Your telegram of August 5 was considered with every disposition to grant your request if this could be done without jeopardizing other matters affecting very vitally the policy of this government and the enforcement of our arms embargo. . . . I regret very much the necessity of informing you that having in mind the larger interests of the government, it is not possible to grant your request.

What a delightful flight of the fancy "Nervous Nellie" must have had to imagine that an airplane load of singing Rotarians would be violating the arms embargo! And this so soon after Lindbergh had been greeted in France as a messenger of peace. It all goes to show that, according to the new Kelloggian hypothesis, the character of an airplane is relative to its orientation: when it flies eastward it is a dove of peace; but if it should change its course and fly southerly it becomes contraband of war. The cultivation of "good will" with Mexico must proceed in the usual Kelloggian way—under the guidance and escort of United States marines.

WHERE MORE THAN IN GERMANY today would a thing like the Liga Miramundum be likely to start? Recently, it is reported, 500 citizens of Berlin met to organize a league for international friendships. The German people know what it means to be misunderstood, and at least 500 of them have decided to make the world as intimate a place as possible. They say that the world will be held together, if at all, not by ships and airships—which at a moment's notice are capable of becoming instruments of death and separation—but by an inter-tangle of personal acquaintanceships. To this end groups will be formed over Germany and it is hoped over other countries of the two hemispheres, which can assemble whenever desirable for the purpose of conversation with travellers arrived from foreign lands. The success of the enterprise will depend wholly upon the size it achieves. A few international friendships will never prevent nations from misunderstanding one another. But any such motive is to be praised.

Massachusetts the Murderer

MASSACHUSETTS has taken two lives with a vindictiveness and brutality unsurpassed in our history. It has blotted out the fishmonger and the cobbler whose names are now known around the world, men who in the minds of multitudes will take for the moment their places with the Carpenter. In the face of a world-wide protest of never-equalled dimensions, in the face of appeals from lawyers and judges of the highest standing, and from the heads of foreign governments—with complete contempt for the earnest pleas of the entire European press and some of the leading American daily newspapers that the guilt of the two men was not established beyond doubt—Governor Fuller and his council have sent Sacco and Vanzetti to their deaths. Henceforth the world over, when men wish to describe what is worst in any judicial system, they will declare that it is akin to Massachusetts justice; they will speak for years to come with horror of a State in which two men could be executed after seven years of monstrous torture, in the face of world-wide appeals for mercy; when the bar itself was divided as to the righteousness of the procedure; when the evidence was reviewed by only one judge and he was condemned for grave impropriety of conduct in connection with the case. Massachusetts, said Daniel Webster, "there she is." There she is today, a target for the opprobrium of mankind. Her constituted authorities have used their constitutional powers as cold-bloodedly as ever a Roman centurion had his legal way.

We cannot deny that Governor Fuller and his advisers believe that they have done their simple duty, that they were thoroughly convinced of the guilt of these two men, that they were consciously and conscientiously virtuous in repelling foreign criticism and foreign pleas. They believe that no one else has so mastered the case; that no one else has seen so many persons connected with the crime, and no one else has heard as much testimony. They feel that the delays of years were of the prisoners' own choosing, and not the fault of the judicial system—as if anyone could be blamed for taking advantage of any loophole to escape from a single prejudiced judge! They are sure that they have possession of important facts never brought out in court; that the bulk of Massachusetts opinion is on their side and that the foreign excitement was due to the Defense Committee and its propaganda. They could not, they said, yield to threats; they could not yield to the demands of foreign ignorance deliberately misinformed. Least of all could they yield in the face of the bombing of a juror's house. It was their duty to see the law through; their duty to uphold law and order; theirs to take the pound of flesh. They did so, clothed in the righteousness of men in whose minds no single doubt as to the correctness of their procedure, or the wisdom of their decision, could come to rest.

They did so and they outraged the opinion of the foreign world, voiced thus by Ramsay MacDonald, the former Prime Minister, in England: "This whole affair is too terrible; I hope the reputation of the United States will be saved the horror of this execution." They did so, and they struck at the reputation of the whole nation. They did so and everywhere strengthened the hands of violence and of all those persons who believe that the world can be reformed only by bombs and bloodshed. Everywhere they have made peaceful men and women despair that progress may be achieved without force. They have enforced law and order and created disorder. They have upheld the majesty of the law only to bring it into contempt. They have destroyed the deterrent power of the death penalty in this case, if it ever had any. And to them this has seemed good Americanism and good statesmanship! They must have heard, as have we, of the profound concern in the Departments at Washington as to the effect of this happening upon our foreign relations; they must have heard that there they think our international relations will be clouded for twenty years by the shadow of this tragic event. At this Governor Fuller has shrugged his shoulders; the men were guilty in his eyes; the delay was no fault of his and the sentence must be carried out immediately. After seven years he was not willing to wait even a couple of months longer in the hope that those doubts, raised and re-raised by such powerful journals as the New York Times and World and the Springfield Republican, might be resolved. He could not wait a minute, although every hour that passed after the publication of the Lowell committee's findings and his own, only increased the feeling of doubt as to the correctness of those decisions. Individuals and newspapers that said at first: "Well, we must accept the Lowell report and the Governor's findings," swung around the more they studied these documents and demanded further study and further explanation. With every hour the contradictions of the two viewpoints became more plain and the disagreement as to facts. But the Governor could see no occasion for mercy—rather every reason for getting the case out of the way and ending the public excitement and confusion. So, as we said last week, he has made it necessary to guard the American flag wherever it flies over an American public building outside of the confines of the United States.

That is perhaps the greatest tragedy of all, that the men responsible have taken this course believing in their righteousness, their justice, yet utterly unable to see that the case of the accused had long since transcended the individuals concerned and become part of the lives and causes of great classes of our citizens. They, too, require forgiveness. "They know not what they do." They have had their eyes upon the Mosaic Law. No doubt Governor Fuller could not see a single just reason why he should commute or abate the sentence. "The Governor means well," wrote to The Nation last week one of the noblest persons connected with the cause of these men, who has sacrificed health and means to save the good name of the State of Massachusetts. "The trouble is," the writer added, "he cannot see." There lies the crux of the whole matter. He could not see that there are times when mercy is greater than justice and exalts justice. He could not feel the horror of this execution. He could not see that a wise statesman does not use to the fullest extent the power that is his when by staying the hand of the state he can soothe great masses of the public with an opportunity further to unwind the tangled skeins of evidence, so differently interpreted by those who have come into the case. He could not see that commutation would make possible the doing of complete justice should later facts demand. So Massachusetts has legally murdered the fishmonger and the cobbler, vindictively and brutally, for all the righteousness of its Governor who cannot see.

How crass, how degrading it all is! In the year 1927 of our Christian faith a great State electrocutes two men and thinks that thereby it increases its might, its majesty, and its righteousness. It uses violence to avenge the violence with which it charged them. It convicts them of murder and then commits murder. It mumbles: "Thou shalt not kill," and then, being merely an aggregation of the individuals of whom it demands the sacredness of human life, itself flouts the very sacredness for which it pretends to stand. Thereby the Alvan T. Fullers believe that they suppress or control crime, or at least increase the safety of human life. In all the history of jurisprudence there is no record where murder has been ended by murder, however legalized, or public respect for authority increased by the State's use of its force. "It has been shown," declared as far back as 1841 a committee of the Assembly of the State of New York, "that it is a total fallacy to regard the fear of death as constituting any very powerful or effectual restraint upon the indulgence of the motives which impel men to great crimes; that it is seen to be entirely inoperative in influencing men's conduct . . ." For any one who is today deterred from future crimes by the scene in Charlestown jail, there are hundreds of thousands of hearts wrenched into bitterness and rage by this brutality of a State and by the ineradicable belief that the grossest injustice has been done. Can they ever regard the State as highly again? Can they ever believe again that it stands for justice and fair play to all men?

It avails not to say that errors occur in the administration of justice in every land. This case has gone home to people because they are tortured with doubts about the justice of the sentence of two humble men with whom they have had no personal contact whatever, whose political views they in no wise share; because the human heart is not yet so corroded that it can read of the extinction of these two men without a shock to the very roots of its belief in justice and humanity. Perhaps it was precisely for the purpose of creating this sense of moral outrage in multitudes that Alvan T. Fuller occupies the Governorship of Massachusetts. Perhaps fate intended that to millions should be brought home the utter folly of capital punishment, if only because of the terrible finality of it in a case in which new evidence has repeatedly appeared during these seven long years. Tomorrow the other three men charged with the killing who were never traced or identified may turn up; the stolen money not one cent of which was ever connected with Sacco and Vanzetti, may be discovered, and with it the solution of the crime. What then? Where then would be the Thayers and the Fullers? Convicted murderers in their turn. Who knows? It was only the other day a young girl in Kentucky cleared up her own "murder" for which Cole Dabney was then completing the seventh month of life imprisonment. That is but one case of many. The point we make is that Governor Fuller has failed utterly to satisfy editors, lawyers, doctors, college presidents and professors, judges, and men of high standing everywhere, that the case was clear, the guilt beyond dispute. When a State takes the irrevocable step under conditions like these it is idle to talk of a deterrent. It is the State that has harmed itself, that has dealt a blow to law and order. It has roused a dreadful doubt which will never be dissipated, unless by the discovery of new evidence on one side or the other, during the lifetime of multitudes now living. Rightly or wrongly, the case of Sacco and Vanzetti goes down to history with the witch hunting in Salem and, in modern times, with the execution of the anarchists in Chicago in 1886.

As for Sacco and Vanzetti, for whom life's fitful fever has now run its course, why grieve for them? Their long agony is over and they were philosophers and students of history enough to know that their sacrifice was worth more to the rationalizing of human life than would have been their release and their return to comparative obscurity. John Brown wrote just before his execution that he was "worth infinitely more to hang than for any other purpose." He spoke more truly than a Tory Southern colonel who, standing at the foot of the scaffold, looked at Brown's dangling body and said: "So perish all such enemies of Virginia! All such enemies of the Union! All such foes of the human race!"—two years later he was doing his best to destroy the Union. The very act which blots out the lives of Sacco and Vanzetti insures their eternity in any social history of the United States. The mere threat of their deaths produced an amazing international solidarity. When before have multitudes awaited with grief and rage in the Argentine, Japan, Jugoslavia, Italy, all over the world, news of the execution of two American "highwaymen"? When before did the second largest political party in Great Britain officially throw itself into the breach in an endeavor to save the lives of two "criminals"?

Whatever else may be said of Sacco and Vanzetti there can be no doubt that the souls of these two men grew and broadened and gained in knowledge and strength while they were behind the bars. When men face death many things are made clear to them; many scales drop from their eyes. We defy anyone to read Vanzetti's address to the court or Sacco's farewell to his son, and say that these were written by bloodstained hands. Alvan T. Fuller to save his life could pen no words like these. But assuming they were guilty then here in all truth is complete proof of the possibility of the uplifting and redemption of the vilest wrongdoers. Vanzetti's extraordinary utterances have led many besides Heywood Broun to characterize him as one of the great men of the day. In the circle of those close to Governor Fuller we have heard words of profound admiration for Sacco, for his courage, and his consistency, and the wish that he could be known better and his mind enjoyed. And these men the world is asked to believe were cowardly assassins and robbers, these men who led blameless lives until they are said to have appeared with three confederates—never traced—in a Buick car—never traced—to steal $16,000—never traced—in what police officials declared to be the manner of professional criminals.

No, they may swallow this who will. To it we cannot bring our minds or our consciences. But innocent or guilty these men made their mark. Their bearing in the face of death, their shining courage, their resignation, the range of their spirits—these are deathless things, and somehow or other the memory of them goes on in the hearts of men. No one can say what it all means or foretell where this case will end. But this is clear: This legal murder in Boston will profoundly and adversely affect the international relations of the United States, and its moral standing throughout the world for at least a decade to come. Massachusetts has triumphantly killed an Italian fishmonger and an Italian cobbler, but she has blackened the name of the United States across all the seas.

Chiang Kai-shek Passes On

WE greet the retirement of Chiang Kai-shek after four months as head of his Nanking Nationalist government. Chiang was probably better than most Chinese military leaders in that he did not loot the countryside occupied by his troops and he paid his soldiers most of the time. It is probable also that he went into retirement a relatively poor man although he had unusual opportunities to make a personal fortune. For all these things Chiang Kai-shek will receive due credit at the hands of historians, but for the time being we cannot forget that he destroyed the unity of the Chinese Nationalist movement at the most critical moment of its advance toward Peking.

Chiang won the support of a large part of the foreign press because he seemed the lesser of two evils. His attack on the Hankow regime as Communist was accepted without analysis as true by most of the enemies of Chinese Nationalism and by a great many loyal members of the Kuomintang. He convinced a large part of the world that he was the rightful heir to the Kuomintang authority and that the Hankow regime represented a few disgruntled and violent Communists. How false that charge was can be seen by a checking up of the men who actually supported the Nanking government.

Chiang Kai-shek, even at the height of his authority, did not have the allegiance of one-third of the Central Executive Committee of the Kuomintang elected in 1925. This committee is the only legally elected committee which had authority in the Nationalist movement and Chiang recognized it until he chose to break with Hankow last spring. Of the thirty-six members of that committee not more than ten supported Chiang while the rest were more or less loyal to Hankow. Among the group supporting Hankow were most of the popular Kuomintang leaders who had survived in the Canton regime, including Wang Ching-wei, Eugene Chen, Sun Fo, and Mrs. Sun Yat-sen.

The fall of Chiang Kai-shek was due partly to military reverses at the hands of Sun Chuan-fang, partly to the opposition of Shanghai business men to his taxation program, and partly to the constant propaganda against him within his own ranks. We are inclined to believe that propaganda played the most important part because Chiang's own subordinates deserted him before the end had come. The teaching of the Kuomintang against government by military dictators made inroads into Chiang's armies during the summer in spite of his strenuous efforts to divert attention by shouting "Down with Communists." Shanghai, bled white by the financial demands of Sun Chuan-fang before his retirement, did not yield to Chiang Kai-shek the revenue that he had hoped for. Even his reorganized labor unions in Shanghai which smacked of Fascist ideology would not stay put.

Chiang's removal, with the simultaneous withdrawal of the Communists from the Hankow government, makes possible the reunion of the two wings of Chinese Nationalism. If that reunion occurs it will undoubtedly be the Hankow regime which will emerge with the most authority. The immediate result of the collapse of the Nanking regime has been the strengthening of the northern forces in their attack upon Shanghai and Nanking, but the ultimate unification of the Nationalist forces will probably more than outbalance that temporary loss of ground.

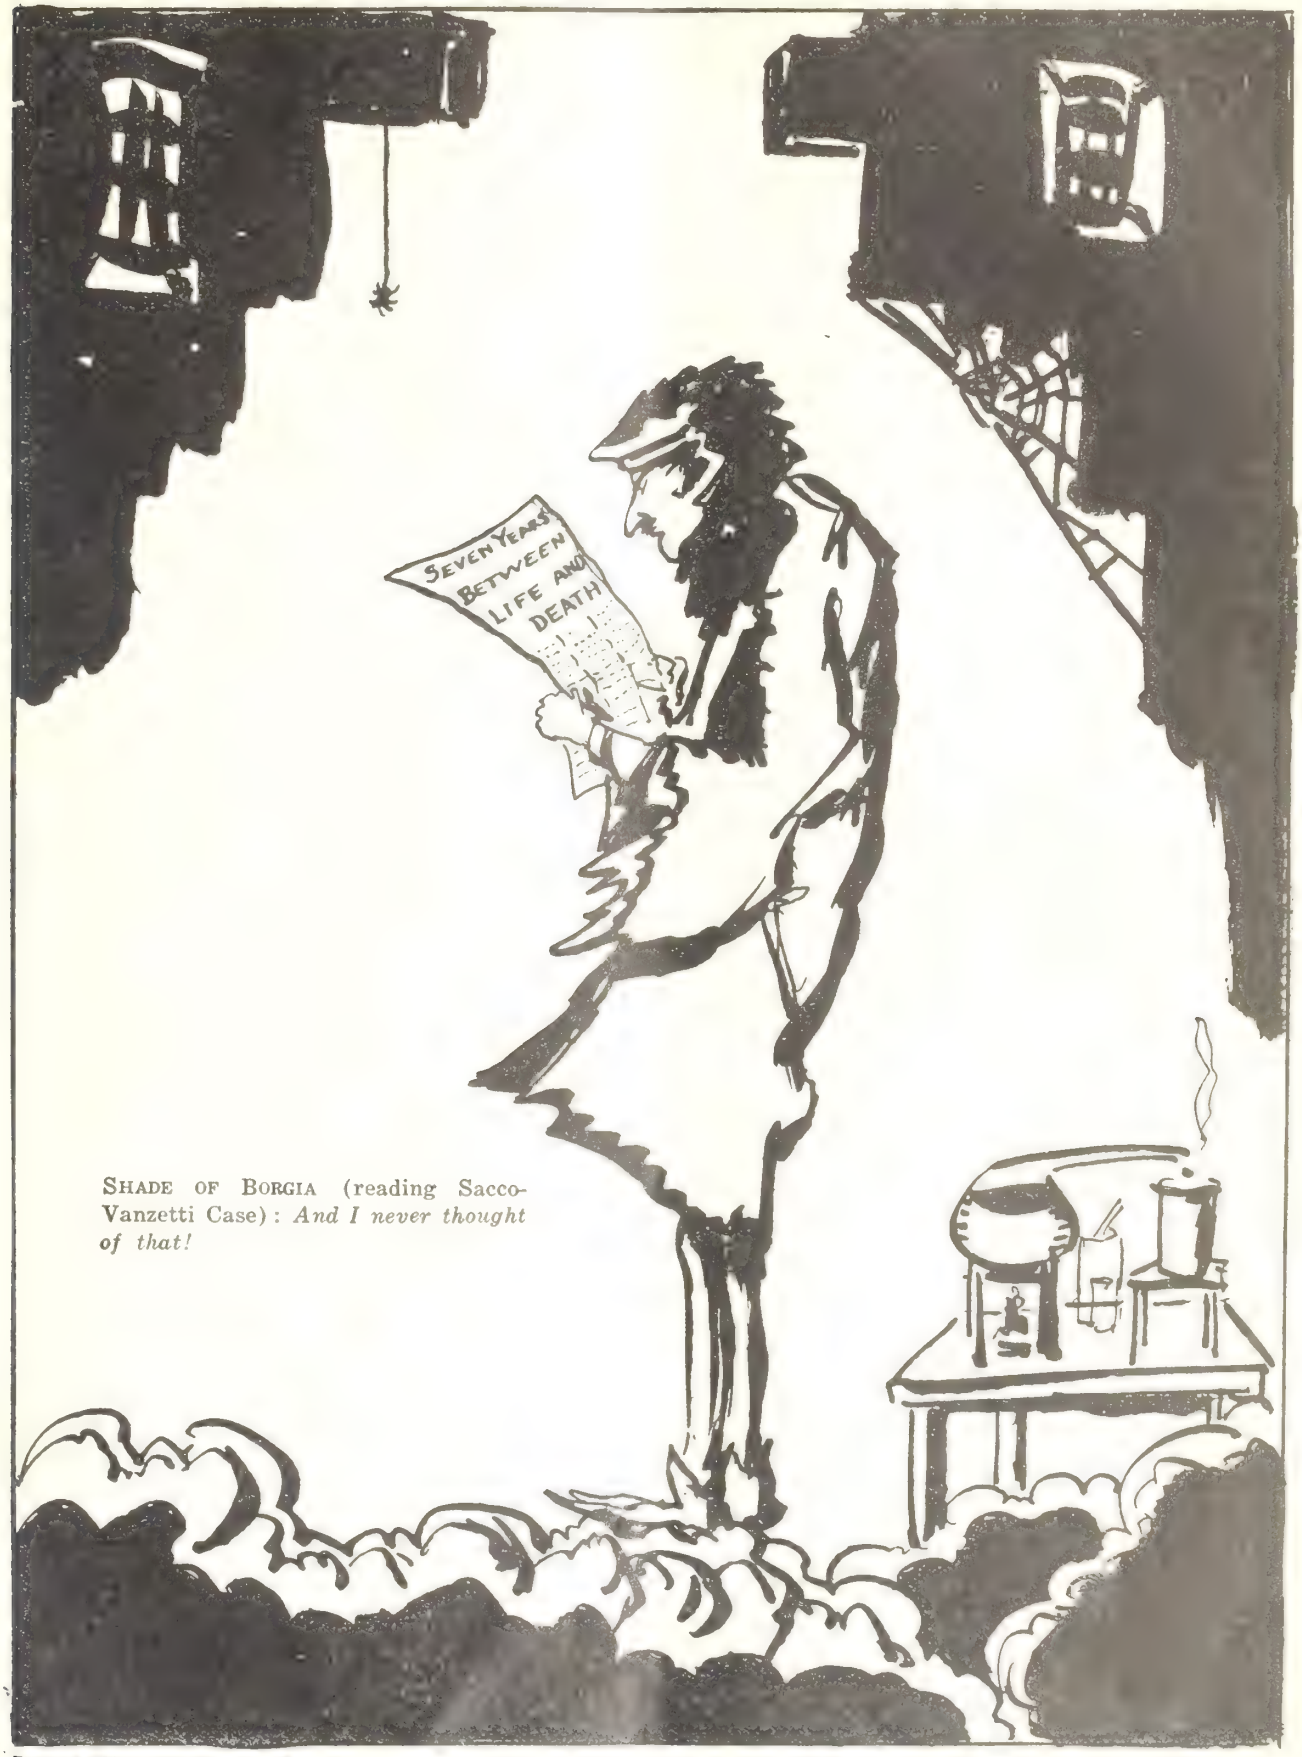
Warrior Wells and Battling Belloc

IT is not often in these days of literary good manners—when, if one author hates another, he keeps that hatred to himself or expresses it darkly to his friends—it is not often that we are treated to the blazing spectacle of a prize ring wherein two champions slug it out. In older days, when the literary world was smaller than it is now and when readers could be counted on for knowledge of both the contestants in a quarrel, and there were no libel laws, the thing happened pretty frequently. Ben Jonson had his Marston, Milton his Salmasius, Dryden his Shadwell, Pope his Tibbald, Byron his Southey, and for that matter Butler his Darwin. But nowadays we have to get along with examples of polite dismissal or pale sarcasm; most of us, doubtless, suppose that the age of enmity is over and that authors, generally speaking, love one another.

It is not so. Look at Hilaire Belloc and H. G. Wells, who have been battering each other in public ever since Mr. Wells published last year his illustrated, revised edition of "The Outline of History." Mr. Belloc, who presumably had been lying in wait, rushed forward with "A Companion to H. G. Wells's 'Outline of History'" (it can be procured, along with the other documents in the case, from the Ecclesiastical Supply Association in San Francisco), in which he designed to "point out the principal popular errors, most of them now out of date, which its author has repeated." The "Outline," said Mr. Belloc, was of course "ephemeral," "necessarily short-lived," and "a thing of passing fashion." But it had widely disseminated certain fundamental errors, and "to check erroneous statement is always worth while." So he proceeded, after a dissection of Mr. Wells which revealed him as a busy little provincial of the London suburbs who hadn't a ghost of a notion how to treat subjects he had never heard his neighbors discuss, to show that the "Outline" erred ridiculously in relegating the Catholic Church to a minor role in the story of the hemispheres—"for," said Mr. Belloc, "the foundation and career of the Catholic Church is the chief event in the history of mankind." Mr. Wells had slighted Christian doctrine whenever possible; he had used Buddhism as a stick to beat the Christian; he had insulted the priesthood, the doctrines of the creation, the fall, and the incarnation, and the very origins of religion itself by dragging in a lot of very old-fashioned biological and geological evidence. Mr. Belloc insisted many times that Mr. Wells's science was really not up to the minute—though why that mattered he did not say.

Mr. Wells, countering with a pamphlet called "Mr. Belloc Objects to 'The Outline of History,'" took the best possible line in his preface. He was not a controversialist, he said. "For years I have failed to respond to Mr. Henry Arthur Jones, who long ago invented a set of opinions for me and invited me to defend them with an enviable persistence and vigor." But Mr. Belloc had been so offensive that he must be answered. And so Mr. Wells, beginning calmly enough, went on to call his adversary "densely ignorant," "an adept in stale gossip," "a stout fellow in a funk," and a pretender to scholarship. Why!—"he is no more a scholar than I am."

Nothing has been proved except that both men are hard hitters. Pacifists though we are, we enjoy the fight.



SHADE OF BORGIA (reading Sacco-Vanzetti Case): And I never thought of that!

Drawn by Hendrik Willem van Loon

Torture Up to Date

The Armours Betray the Farmers

By FREDERICK BOSELLY

FIFTEEN years ago a new Messiah appeared on the agricultural horizon in the person of Aaron Sapiro, a young Chicago lawyer who had made a study of cooperative marketing. He visited western Canada and was instrumental in organizing the Canadian cooperative wheat producers, the largest grain-marketing organization in the world.

Sapiro had one idea—that the producer, instead of wailing at his helplessness in the grip of the wholesaler, should organize, abandon the practise of "dumping" the whole crop on the market within a few weeks, and, by scientific cooperative marketing, obtain the full value of his products.

Sapiro is a man of intense personal magnetism. He is an orator. He is a Jew. He is after money for himself as well as his client, the farmer. His weak point was that he had no political possibilities. He asked for no government intervention. No agrarian vote-getter could ride to the title of a statesman on Sapiro's plans. So Sapiro has been consistently attacked. Because he is an orator he has been called a demagogue. Because he is a Jew he has been attacked by anti-Semitic papers, notably Henry Ford's Dearborn Independent.* Because he sought compensation for himself he has been called a fishy-blooded money-grabber out to exploit the farmer.

Five years ago Sapiro appeared as a menace to the grain interests in Chicago. He had been scoring consistent successes in the Middle Western States, and the grain men were worried. At one time he was in negotiation with the American Farm Bureau Federation, which is the closest to a national organization possessed by the farmers. A rift appeared, and Sapiro and the Farm Bureau Federation parted company. But the idea had been sown and the farmers continued to cry for cooperative marketing.

At the same time the terminal-elevator, or wholesale-grain business, was in rather poor shape. The biggest company in the Chicago area was the Armour Grain Company, 87½ per cent of which was owned by the same money which controlled the Armour Packing Company, despite the virtuous statements recently made by the packing concern that it had nothing to do with the grain company. There were also E. F. Rosenbaum and Brothers and the Shaffer Grain Company, the latter owned by John C. Shaffer, publisher of the Chicago Evening Post and several Indiana newspapers.

According to men in the grain business, the officers of the Armour and Rosenbaum grain concerns saw eventual ruin in the rising tide of cooperative marketing, for the Sapiro plans included terminal elevators owned and controlled by the farmers. So they got together and someone, supposedly E. F. ("Manny") Rosenbaum, mapped out a plan which went something like this:

"The farmers have got the cooperative bug. It's going to break us. Why not organize a farmers' cooperative marketing concern, and sell to the farmers our elevators before they build warehouses of their own. We know that the farmers will never pay large enough salaries to get the brains necessary to handle such a monstrous corporation and eventually the company will fail. The cooperative idea will die, and we'll get our elevators back."

In December, 1925, it became known that three monster grain corporations, always bent toward "service," had heard the cry of the farmer and were ready to sell their terminal elevators and marketing organizations to a cooperative company, to be organized by the American Farm Bureau Federation, for approximately $20,000,000. So generous had the grain men become that the farmers were not even to be forced to finance the undertaking. They would be placed in charge and would be allowed several years in which to pay gradually for the elevators. Meanwhile the grain men would remain in an advisory capacity as a board of management while the farm representatives learned the business and while the American Farm Bureau Federation, through its local organization, sold $5,000,000 in stock to its members.

The Grain Marketing Company became a reality. By the end of 1925 it was working. The elevators had been formally appraised and turned over to the farmers. At last it appeared that cooperative marketing on a giant scale had established itself. The press was enthusiastic in approval of the far-sighted farm leaders, and the unselfish grain men who had helped them toward the realization of their dream. Only the elevators of the Armour Grain Company and the Rosenbaums were taken over. Mr. Shaffer had dropped out.

Then came tales that the stock in the Grain Marketing Corporation was not being subscribed to by the farmers. Gray Silver, tall, forceful, a former president of the National Farm Bureau Federation and now their representative at Washington, had been chosen president of the Grain Marketing Company. He called committee meetings. He listened to threats of the vendors of the elevators and tried to thrash his organization into action before the whole scheme should fall and the farmers' great chance should be past. On the witness-stand at the legislative investigation he told his story and almost broke down and wept as he described how the farmers had been offered what he regarded as the chance of a century and had ignored it.

"I don't know," was his stock answer when he was asked details of the management which he should have known—but the truth of his reply was never doubted by anyone who looked at Silver's puzzled face and eyes.

Then came more conferences and an unexplained decision that the Grain Marketing Company had failed, and was to be disbanded. The decision was strictly within the agreement. The farmers had failed to sell the required amount of stock in the agreed time, but no extension was sought or offered. The board of managers, composed of the vendors, knew a reason for parting company, for they could not agree among themselves, but this was not made public then.

Following the demise of the Grain Marketing Company and the return of the terminal elevators to the Armour Grain Company and the Rosenbaums it became known that these two companies were involved in litigation. Eight months ago the financial district of Chicago was startled to learn that Frederick K. Brown, who had been appointed arbitrator, had awarded to E. F. Rosenbaum and Brothers a judgment of $1,300,000 against the Armour Grain Company.

* Sapiro brought suit against Ford for $1,000,000, but after the automobile maker's change of front in regard to the Jews it was announced that the action would be dropped.—Editor, The Nation.

Rumors were heard that the judgment was largely because of falsely graded grain—fake wheat—which had been turned over to the Grain Marketing Company by the Armours.

The rumors grew, and after months of agitation, Governor Small of Illinois appointed a legislative committee headed by Representative Thomas Curran of Chicago to investigate. Curran, a former saloon keeper, is chairman of the House Finance Committee and is considered the governor's right-hand man in his faction of the party.

At the investigation George Thompson, former elevator superintendent for the Armour Grain Company, admitted that, after conferring with George E. Marcy, president of the company, he had instructed men at the Armour's Northwestern Elevator to raise the grades on nearly one million bushels of almost worthless "feed wheat" and label it as high-grade milling wheat, worth approximately $1 a bushel more. The work of changing the grades was carried out by Frank Cromby, superintendent of the elevator, and Thompson, who changed the boards at night without the knowledge of the other employees. This changing of grades was done just before the Armour elevator and its contents were appraised and turned over to the Grain Marketing Company. It was so brazenly done that Thompson admitted that he had been accused of taking damaged grains from the sampling boxes of the Chicago Board of Trade samplers.

Thus feed wheat, worth about twenty cents a bushel, was shipped by the Grain Marketing Company to Buffalo as milling wheat worth $1.50, and was refused when it was delivered. The Grain Marketing Company had been disbanded before the claims were adjusted, and no attempt was made to saddle the losses on the farmers who had invested in the company. Every dollar paid in for stock was refunded, and the necessary adjustment was made between the Armours and the Rosenbaums. But the crooked wheat deal is conceded by grain men to have brought about the quick ending of the farmers' dream company.

Shortly after the legislative investigation the Armour Grain Company was suspended from the Chicago Board of Trade, and members of the Armour packing family, denying any knowledge of the actions of their subordinates, announced that the grain company was to be disbanded.

And the result of the investigation? For a time it looked as if a sincere attempt was to be made to clear up dishonest practises at the Chicago Board of Trade. The committee itself said that was its intention, and its efforts became even more serious when State Senator Harold E. Kessinger, the Arthur Capper of Illinois, paid a hurried visit to Springfield and demanded that he be allowed to sit as the farmer's representative on an investigation that primarily affected the agriculturalists.

Kessinger sat on the inquiry board. By his questions he aimed to get to the bottom of the cooperative marketing situation. Arthur Cutten, the nation's most spectacular grain speculator, was called and testified that the present regulation which allows elevators to trade in the market was vicious and did not give the buyer of grain a fair deal.

But it was the same Kessinger who prevented any real action from coming of the investigation. Anxious to make a name for himself, he rushed down to the State Senate and introduced his own grain-futures-trading-regulation bill before the Curran investigating committee had been given a chance to bring its findings before the General Assembly.

The result of Kessinger's bill was pandemonium on the Board of Trade. Officials claimed that its provision, which would have forced the daily reporting of all deals, would ruin futures-trading, and the bill was abandoned until July 1 when it and the Curran bills were tabled for lack of time.

Then came the cry that Congress should introduce a federal measure to regulate futures-trading and nullify the boast of the grain operators that they would merely move to another State if the Kessinger bill were passed. That possibility alone remains out of all the investigation, and even if Congress did act, grain trading could be carried on in Winnipeg and Liverpool by American speculators.

A feature of the grain investigation had been the testimony of Emanuel Rosenbaum. All through a long grilling he had affirmed his belief in cooperative marketing and declared that he had traveled the whole world over, including Russia, and had decided it was the only salvation for the American farmer. He said that, whatever the sacrifice, he would be willing to offer his elevators again to the farmers. His testimony was received with approval by the officials of the American Farm Bureau Federation.

Now the Rosenbaums have acquired the elevators of the defunct Armour Grain Company; the wreckage of the Grain Marketing Company has been cleared away. Emanuel Rosenbaum has announced that his new company will deal directly with the farmers. The stage is set for the next act.

Hankow Swings to the Right

By PAUL BLANSHARD

Hankow, July 13

HANKOW is an island of civil power in a sea of militarism. The government which has been established here by the Kuomintang is completely surrounded by hostile and semi-hostile forces. Along the river front by the Bund are the twenty-three war ships of the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan. To the west in Szechwan, Yang Sen and his bandit troops are temporarily driven back but not pacified. To the east Chiang Kai-shek * holds Shanghai, Nanking, and much of Anhwei and Chekiang provinces. To the south Canton, cradle of the revolution, gives nominal allegiance to Chiang Kai-shek. To the north is Feng Yu-hsiang, the world's most doubtful friend—and beyond him Chang Tso-lin.

Most ominous of all is the rising tide of military control within the Hankow government. Two weeks ago there was every indication that the civil government here was firmly in the saddle, but every day has increased the evidence that the military chieftains who serve the Hankow regime are taking power into their own hands.

Borodin who receives us in his rooms across from the Foreign Office is pessimistic. He is a stately, magnetic man with a deep, vibrant voice, one of the most impressive figures in Far Eastern politics. He speaks of the Chinese revolution sadly; no enemy of Hankow could be more gloomy as to the prospects of any approach to Communism in China in the near future.

"Will the Hankow government resist the encroaching waves of military control?" we ask.

"I thought so a while ago. That is not to say I think so," he replies. The militarism which he fears is within and not without the Hankow regime. Neither Feng Yu-hsiang nor Chiang Kai-shek, he thinks, can afford to attack Hankow directly while so many popular leaders of the Kuomintang are still here.

Since the split in the Nationalist movement on April 12, when Chiang Kai-shek definitely denounced Hankow, the officers of this government have been fighting a desperate battle to maintain themselves first as a military power and second as a civil government true to the principles of the Kuomintang. They hoped to continue the drive to Peking, patching up a temporary peace with Chiang Kai-shek until the goal of their ambitions had been realized and turning over to a Peking congress of the party the whole question of future control. Then came the great disaster in Hunan.

The complete story of Hunan cannot yet be told because it is still impossible for foreign journalists to penetrate into the back country around and to the south of Changsha, where the struggle was staged between revolutionary peasants and returned soldiers. But the main outline of the story is apparent.

Hunan, the great agricultural province in central China lying south of Hankow, has come under Communist influence more than any other section of China. The Hunanese have the reputation of being quick-tempered and hot-blooded; they welcomed the northward advance of the Cantonese and the most extreme parts of the Kuomintang program. They established peasant unions and fought the "bad gentry." The program of the peasant unions under the Kuomintang does not call for nationalization or general seizure of the land, but it allows the union to seize the land of reactionary officials who oppose the Nationalist movement and to use the land for the benefit of the union. The power is not clearly defined. It might apply to the land of rich peasants who opposed the peasant's union. It proved to be a most dangerous weapon in the hands of men not trained to leadership.

No sooner had the Nationalist army with large sections of Hunanese troops swept northward than guerilla warfare broke out in many Hunan villages between the gentry and more conservative peasants on the one hand and the revolutionary peasants' unions. Bandits and scoundrels took possession of the unions in a number of places and used their power for theft and personal revenge. The unions had the very bad taste to seize the land of a number of officers in the revolutionary army who belonged to the gentry class.

The reaction was immediate. The reports of seizures of soldiers' land soon found their way to the army. A unit was rushed from Hunan and a general massacre of the leaders of the peasants' unions took place in many villages. General Tang Sheng-chi, who after the defection of Chiang Kai-shek was the most important military leader of the Hankow regime, came back from Hunan and took personal command of the Hunan situation. His report to the Hankow government approved with a few minor reprimands the attacks upon the radical peasants. The peasant unions were disbanded and told to reorganize. The Hankow leaders saw their most advanced section pass from civil to military control. They approved the new policy by official vote and the Communist Minister of Agriculture took an indefinite leave of absence on account of "ill health."

It was charged that the excesses committed by the peasants' union in Hunan were part of a deliberate plot by Communists to exceed the limits of the Kuomintang land program. General Tang Sheng-chi, commander of Hunan, does not accuse the Communists of bad faith. "The Changsha incident, "he says, "was entirely due to the lack of able leaders in the peasant and labor movements." Wang Ching-wei assured us that there was definite proof that Communists in Hunan tried to carry out a Communist program in addition to the Kuomintang program in violation of their pledge to stay within the limits set by the party. Wang Ching-wei is the real head of the Hankow government, the chairman of the Central Executive Committee of the Kuomintang, and a man whose close association with the Communists gives his criticism double weight. Borodin admits that there were many peasant excesses in Hunan, but he emphasizes the fact that the soldiers and officers of the gentry class turned upon the revolution because they were unwilling to lose the special privileges belonging to their families.

Whatever may be the proportion of Communist betrayal and military reaction in the Hunan debacle it appears that the Hankow regime cannot count upon the loyalty of its revolutionary armies when the economic interests of those armies are injured. The army of the Chinese Nationalists differs from the workers' and peasants' army of the Russian revolution in solidarity and social outlook. "It is clear," says Wang Ching-wei, "that the revolutionary troops do not necessarily come from the revolutionary masses. This has resulted in a situation in which when the commander is revolutionary his troops will also be revolutionary, and when the commander turns against the revolution, his troops will do likewise." Many of the Nationalist troops have passed from this stage of personal loyalty to strong party allegiance under the powerful campaign of education in Kuomintang ideals carried on in the army by the political department, but enough of the army remains subject to personal domination to make the future of the Hankow government most uncertain.

* This article was, of course, written before the resignation of Chiang Kai-shek, referred to in the editorial in this week's issue.—EDITOR, The Nation.

The foreign press has consistently described the Hankow regime as "Communist" because of three factors: its retention of Russian Communist advisers, the Communist leadership of the labor unions, and the activities of the peasants' union in Hunan. We have already indicated that the campaign of the peasants' unions in Hunan was repudiated by the Hankow government.

The evidence available here seems to indicate that the Hankow government is no more Communistic than the Nationalist movement was before the split with Chiang Kai-shek; in fact there is every indication that government and labor policy has moved steadily to the right for the last three months. The split with Chiang Kai-shek has given an opportunity to isolate Hankow as a target of vituperation and to blame upon its "Communist influence" all the excesses which are inevitable in civil war or revolution. The Kuomintang has consistently and openly cooperated with Soviet Russia and the Communists since 1924, when Dr. Sun Yat-sen advocated such cooperation, but it was specified from the beginning of the party's relationship to the Communists that the Communists must pledge their allegiance to the Kuomintang program and work within the limits of that program as long as they were in association with the party. Outside of Hunan there does not seem to be proof that the Communists violated their pledge.

Borodin has continued to hold large personal power as adviser to the Hankow government because of his grasp of the situation, but he has no vote in party decisions and the Kuomintang is under no obligation to accept his opinions. Not more than six of the twenty-five living members of the Central Executive Committee of the Kuomintang elected at the last official election who are loyal to the Hankow regime are members of the Communist Party. Probably by the time this is in print Borodin and his advisers will have left Hankow and the Kuomintang will have broken definitely with the Communist Party of China. All signs point in that direction.

In the conduct of the labor unions the Communists have taken a leading role, placing many Communist leaders in strategic positions and securing a Communist as Minister of Labor. At the Pan-Pacific Labor Conference here they imported every glittering and explosive phrase of left-wing vituperation, including the familiar denunciations of right-wing labor and Socialist leaders of Europe and America. They particularly warned the Chinese workers against any suggestions of help from foreign labor movements that were not of the approved color.

The influence of the Communists is also apparent in many of the practices and policies of the local unions. The literature and posters show the mark of Russian advice. But the actual policies of these unions in the past three months have been far from Communistic. They do not advocate the socialization of all or even of most industry. After the first flurry of bitter opposition to British and Japanese employers and to the former henchmen of Wu Pei Fu they settled down to a policy of improving their conditions within the capitalist structure. Their increases of wages, while nominally large, have been more than cancelled by the increase in the cost of living and by the fluctuations in local currency. They have not accomplished a revolution and their program does not call for a Communist revolution.

The Kuomintang economic program follows the vague Third Principle of Peoples' Livelihood advanced by Sun Yat-sen. It is interpreted as meaning a tax on unearned increment of the land and government land banks, as far as the peasants are concerned. It might be interpreted as something more revolutionary, although everyone knows that Dr. Sun was not a Communist. For a time last spring the Hankow government considered seriously a thoroughgoing redistribution of the land under a new law, but the project was voted down by the Central Executive Committee. Since the Hunan debacle the leaders are positive in declaring for a conservative land policy.

For many weeks the labor pickets of Hankow and vicinity were armed and carried out the instructions of the unions without benefit of police. They were regarded by the government as a kind of special police and when in the last week of June objections to their activities arose among military leaders the pickets voluntarily surrendered their arms and declared their satisfaction with ordinary police protection for the labor movement.

One by one the Communist leaders have been slipping out of town during the last week. Sou Cheu-ging, Communist Minister of Labor, has resigned. Teng Yen-tat, director of the political department of the army, said in resigning: "If the Kuomintang has no intention of recognizing the peasant and labor policy and the question of the distribution of the land, the result will be that the party will be deprived of all its revolutionary significance. The consequence will be that the revolution will be a failure as it was in 1911."

The leader of the Houseboys' Union came in great fright to a friend yesterday and asked for help in getting out of town on a British steamer. He feared a massacre of radical leaders if some section of the troops should turn upon "the Communists." The British would not allow him to leave on their ships because he was already blacklisted as undesirable. Last night the Amah's Union, formerly many hundred strong, met in a nervous little meeting of twenty-five. There was almost a panic when the lights went out for a moment.

Although a coup d'etat is possible at any moment the government manages to avoid the appearance of panic. It is manned by stout-hearted veterans of Chinese revolution who were well aware of the risks when they undertook the northern campaign. In spite of the almost insuperable obstacles they have achieved the nearest approach to a responsible and progressive government that China has had. Their offices and ministries are well ordered; their leaders inspire profound respect. Their defeat would be a serious blow at the future of the labor movement and of civil government in China.

Should Men Be Protected?

By LORINE PRUETTE

WHEN Galatea grew weary of the fatuous and somewhat repetitious adoration of Pygmalion she stepped gravely and determinedly down off the pedestal on which he had placed her. In stepping down, with a certain malicious inadvertence she collided with the sculptor so that he fell down a long flight of stairs. Then with the bland determination to erect a new statue upon the deserted pedestal, Galatea took up the chisel. She thought she might make it a glorification of Galatea, with several orphan children clinging to her skirts and an angelic light shining upon her brow, which should be chiseled very smooth for the purpose of reflecting this angelic light. If she left this glorification behind to represent her she thought she might be able to slip down into the world of men and be as vulgar as she liked. By and by she thought she might turn her attention to Pygmalion, still nursing his broken head on the lowest step; she felt she could make quite an entertaining statue to represent him, but as this seemed not at all pressing she went away on business of her own, forgetting even to inquire about his wounds. She did not know that by stepping off the pedestal she had already made a different and indeed pathetic creature of the great Pygmalion.

This is the correct version of what happened between Pygmalion and Galatea, and any other account is to be regarded with suspicion if not actual disrespect.

If it is true that man once shaped woman to be the creature of his desires and needs, then it is true that woman is now remodeling man. If it is true that this was once a man-made world, then it is a certain fact that the world is now fast becoming woman-made. But of course the world is neither man- nor woman-made. In every intimate relation there is constantly going on an exchange which we must call mental, psychic, or emotional because we do not know how to classify it in physiological—or chemical—terms. A psychology is growing up which puts the emphasis upon the interaction between two bodies, rather than on the nature of either body. Certain it is that for social psychology we have to recognize that no individual is a man unto himself, that the isolated human being is an impossibility, and that we are all of us products of each other.

Looking at men and women in this light it becomes absurd to speak of this man-made world, ridiculous to say that women are what men have made them, and a childish superstition to hold that the two sexes are concrete entities, one of which is capable of kicking the other about like a football. We may be sure that whenever men were influencing women, women were likewise shaping men. The joint life of men and women does not illustrate "linear social behavior" but "circular social behavior." However, while from the strictly scientific viewpoint men never determined the personality of women, there have been periods when one or the other sex has appeared to wield a predominant influence. For some time now women in this country have been wielding such an influence. The much derided American husband is the result.

American women under fifty may be divided into three groups: (1) those who struggled for independence of action, who have against legal and social disqualifications fought their way into positions of importance, who bore the brunt of the fight begun before their day and who will never quite lose their bitterness toward men; (2) a younger group which know less bitterness because it has known less of the struggle, and (3) a still younger group that is quite frankly amazed at all the feministic pother and likely to be quickly bored when the subject comes up. The college students of today belong of course in the third group, as almost any teacher from groups one and two will unwillingly testify. For these feminism can never be a burning issue; very likely their daughters will come to discuss the serious problem of masculinism and the enslavement of men and will hold heated debates over the question. "Should Men Be Protected?"

In "The Fabulous Forties" a quotation appears from a writer of that period: "Home is the palace of the husband and the father. He is the monarch of that little empire, wearing a crown that is the gift of Heaven, swaying a scepter put into his hands by the Father of all, acknowledging no superior, fearing no rival, and dreading no usurper." That is a pathetic utterance, when we look at the American husband and father of today, a humble creature, blustering occasionally but knowing in his heart that power has departed from him. It is not merely that he eats the food his wife thinks is good for him, it is not simply that the clothes he wears are picked out or at least definitely supervised by a woman, it is not only that his recreations are largely chosen for him, or that he gets his religion and his culture second-hand, or even that very soon he may be taking his politics also by way of the wifely verdict; none of these quite accounts for the shorn lamb. The true enemy is within. The man has glimpsed his own amazing insignificance in the cosmic scheme. All modern industrial life is calculated to reduce a man's sense of his own importance and the home, which once served as a citadel of protection, an asylum and a refuge, a featherbed for aching limbs and an opiate for bruised self-esteem, is, with the change in women's activities and interests, simply ceasing to function.

More than this, the new attitude of aggression and initiative on the part of the women means that they are much more critical and much less soothing when husband comes home with a story of trouble at the office. Some men openly declare that they want an empty-headed wife who will restore their self-esteem by the mere circumstance of being inferior. The town-drunkard usually keeps a dog for the same purpose. But even empty-headed wives may be critical rather than admiring. Fashions in wives have changed. The "yes-woman" has gone out of the home. The husband may be, and often is, the most important single interest in his wife's life, but he is by no means the only one. If what psychoanalysis has to show about the importance of early influences is correct, this decline in the husband's position is particularly serious. The small boy is the object of at least one woman's devoted solicitude and service and he grows into maturity secure in the confidence that he is supremely important to his mother. The wife who is an active business or professional woman simply has not the time to fill the maternal role; in many cases she undoubtedly lacks the desire to do so, and the social pattern no longer constrains her to act the part. Using general terms which have very little meaning psychologically, the wife is becoming less "altruistic" and more "selfish." She has her own life to live and she has won certain rights which still further diminish the importance of the husband's position.

Old theories of the sexual needs of man, the sexual coldness of woman, led to an attitude that the husband had certain rights and powers which could not be denied by any good wife. Sexual relations were thus much simplified and in the practically unlimited exercise of these functions, as she saw fit, the most insignificant husband gained for a moment power and dominance, the memory of which could help to bolster up his self-esteem on other less gratifying occasions. Further, the man could regulate his sexual life according to his individual needs with beneficent effects on his physical and mental health. Now that the old superstitions about women are breaking down and women are being recognized as equal partners in all marital relations, the situation is immensely complicated. It is entirely probable that there are definite differences, both by sex and by individual, in the rhythms of sexual activity and inactivity. In France the wife's duty toward the husband in this respect is still quite clearly recognized; in America the modern wife is likely to laugh at the idea.

In addition to losing his sexual dominance the modern man has lost financial dominance as well. Both of these losses turn not so much on the concrete situation as upon the attitude that has insidiously taken possession of the man himself. At the same time that he knows his dominion is going the woman has begun most vigorously to assert her rights to his earnings. Wages for wives is an entirely respectable idea, when applied to wives who work enough to justify wages, but this slogan is just as likely to be taken up most vigorously by the woman who does nothing in return. Wives who have no interest in the responsibility and obligation of feminism adopt with suspicious ease the patter about rights. The man is often made to feel that he has no right to expect any form of service from his wife—that would be degrading to a free woman,—but that somehow, mysteriously, he is responsible for her still hampered condition and that he can never give her enough to make up for it. The thousands of women enjoying imaginary diseases help to keep the husband in his place. He may be slightly bewildered by the logic of the whole thing, but he plods on determinedly. He is caught between the millstones of the old and the new mores. He has to live up to the old conception of the husband as provider and head of the family; he has also to live with an exponent of the view that women should be free. And if there is a child! Well, of course it is his fault that nature has not provided a better way of populating the globe. The "mother of two children" has husband down on the floor, not even daring to beg for mercy. The theory is that he can never do enough to make it up to her for what she has gone through. In proportion as the man is sensitive to the problems of others he is most easily betrayed into the clutches of this sort of woman.

A further cause for the decline of the male is the fact that his wife is so important. As wage-earners and citizens all women are still young and they have the insolence of youth. They are proud of themselves, proud of what they have won, sure of the importance of what they are doing or are going to do. They have not been in the industrial organization long enough to realize how remorseless is the system; particularly in politics women are like children, playing dolls with an absorbed futility. The young person in any position is apt to be cock-sure and valiant until difficulties threaten; then when he makes a mess of things he probably feels he should be let off the punishment. Youth believes it "will get away with it"; women still believe they can get away with it, and they still do, even with murder. The preferential treatment that belonged to the old order is still theirs, and this gives them courage. Scarcely any young girl or married woman is under the same tight pressure to earn a living as is the average man. Employers speak feelingly of the impossibility of disciplining the married woman worker.

Of course there are women who have every difficulty and every burden; women who have set up homes and have many persons dependent upon them; but these women are the exception. The modern woman, the very young modern woman who crowds the subways each day on her way to work, is secure because she can still claim the security of the old system, gay because the novelty of the new assures her that she is doing something rather remarkable. She can do everything Pygmalion can, and more.

For she can bear children. And children have to have a mother. Every new emphasis upon the importance of child-bearing and child-rearing increases the importance of the woman. There is nothing in modern civilization that does not work to her aggrandizement and that does not work against the man. Of course I am speaking of psychological values. Men still hold the big jobs and get the big rewards, but their confidence is going and for the most intelligent ones it is already gone. This self-distrustful male is going to be dominated more and more by the rising womanhood. His consciousness of his own defects is an encouragement to the woman to note her own abilities. Back and forth the ceaseless pendulum moves.

Men must worship now and then, and they cannot worship men, while women have long been skilled in worshipping themselves. They are greedy, these modern young women, and cruel, but who can blame them? Theirs is the power. If they crush out the individuality of their husbands, if they drink the sacred fount completely dry, they may only be avenging their grandmothers unaware. It is not to be expected that women will be any more chivalrous or more generous than men have been when they were in the saddle. Tyrants are made by blindness and lack of imagination. As long as Pygmalion sits dull and unprotesting on the bottom step the new owners of the world will not think much about his situation. But when his feeling of inferiority becomes so great that he must cry out, when the inevitable psychoneurotic tendencies manifest themselves in definite disorders, women will be compelled to pause and think a little. Men lost their power when they began to consider the disadvantages of being a woman; they were betrayed by their imaginations. Eventually it is to be supposed that women will follow this same cycle. When this happens Galatea may go and sit rather humbly upon the bottom step beside Pygmalion, or she may even submit to being a statue again and wait for the quickening breath of life, because Pygmalion needs it so.

Honesty in Advertising

By RAYMOND FULLER

WHEN President Coolidge extolled the virtues of American advertising some months ago, his words were received with general applause. Thirty national advertisers, contributing to a symposium on the subject in the Literary Digest, enthusiastically approved the President's economic wisdom and his understanding of the true purposes of their profession. Here are a few passages from that address:

> There can be no permanent basis for advertising except representation of the exact truth.
>
> Advertising (rather than competition) is the life of trade.
>
> The basic function of advertising is education . . . it informs its readers of the existence and nature of commodities by explaining the advantages to be derived from their use. . . .
>
> Advertising ministers to the spiritual side of trade.*

The gratitude of the advertisers is not unnatural, especially in the light of another statement published not long before. Mr. W. E. Humphrey, Federal Trade Commissioner, speaking in New York, had said:

> The publication of fraudulent advertising in magazines and newspapers costs the American public about $500,000,000 annually. I can produce today magazines that in a single issue carry not less than fifty vile, dishonest, or indecent advertisements.

I determined to look further into the educative, spiritual, and exact-truth aspects of advertising. A current copy of one of the largest women's magazines, carefully checked, showed, after careful investigation, that out of 7,757 column-inches of advertising, 2,157 (or 28 per cent) were sold to advertisers making explicit or implied misstatement of fact. These advertisements represented 26 per cent of the advertisers in the issue. Another monthly (running over two million circulation) had forty-six such untruthful advertisements; another, thirty-two; another, forty. These were "the best advertising mediums" in America.

Individual notions of truth and falsity are always debatable. But if advertising were mainly designed to put forth undeniable "advantages to be derived" by the public, advertisers should be able and willing to answer any doubts about their statements. Letters were sent to thirty-five national advertisers, selected at random, asking them to give some unbiased scientific authority on which their slogans and claims were based.

Five advertisers failed to reply even to second letters, although they had been requested to substantiate such broad and obviously questionable statements as these:

> Adjusto Ray is wonderful for relieving rheumatism, neuritis, neuralgia, lumbago, headaches, nervousness, and many other ailments. Its sunlike rays quickly soothe the affected parts, penetrating to the seat of the trouble, ease pain, and help to remove the cause.

> Armored Cord construction applies an engineering fact to the building of stronger sturdier Cooper Tires. . . . This revolutionary new construction multiplies by many times the resistant strength of the carcass . . . it thwarts the deadly elements that heretofore sent most good tires to the scrap-heap . . . [it] eliminates interior friction. (We asked if laboratory tests had been made which would compare these tires with those of competitors—such tests as the United States Bureau of Standards makes annually before the government departments buy tires.)

> Smith Brothers' Cough Drops safely protect and gently medicate the throat tissues. . . . The cheapest health insurance in the world.

> Consolidated Clean Coal . . . invariably lowers production costs where it is used. Rich in heat-content. . . .

Liquid Albolene, claiming special value as a laxative mineral oil, sells at eight to ten times more than mineral oil is purchasable at wholesale. We inquired its special value. McKesson and Robbins did not reply. (The American Medical Association's experiments have led to the conclusion that all mineral oils are of substantially equal merit.)

Other manufacturers, however, did reply with interesting results:

Wildroot Company claimed that their hair tonic "does remove dandruff . . . dandruff soon disappears under regular treatment . . . removes the very unhealthy condition of dandruff, and thus prevents the loss of hair sure to follow dandruff . . . renews the luster and beauty." Asked to back this by medical authority, they wrote, "If you will use it you will find it to be just what we claim." The Bureau of Investigations of the American Medical Association had reported, however, specifically with regard to Wildroot: "It would seem obvious that no drug with the poisonous potentialities of arsenic should be put in a mixture and indiscriminately sold to the public." The same bureau had previously declared that Wildroot had no root or herb product in it.

The Amplion Corporation of America asserts that its cone speaker "reproduces the entire vocal and musical range with every precision and purity." The chief engineer, however, admitted that the word "apparently" should have been inserted before "reproduce." Asked if his department had seen to it that some such change be made, he replied that "correspondence had been sent to the sales department."

The Edison Phonograph manufacturers advertised "Music just as it emanates from the throat of the singer or instrument is captured and recreated with absolute fidelity. There is no distortion." Published tests of talking machines by engineers show that exact reproduction of music has yet to be attained. In answer to requests for the proof of their claims the company said, "Beauty of music is perceived through the sense of hearing and not through an inanimate device showing the relation of acoustic input to output."

Forhan was asked to show proof that "Four out of five get pyorrhoea." "Kindly call at our office and we shall be glad to let you refer to this data." I thought it unnecessary, however, to do so after examining an official tabulation made of 17,000 policy holders of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company. It utterly confutes the slogan, as do other examinations recorded by the Life Extension Institute. Instead of four out of five, one out of twenty is shown to be nearer the truth.

* The italics throughout are the author's.

Do Perfect Piston Circles "seldom fail to give a thousand or more miles to the gallon of oil and add 10,000 miles to the life of cylinders, pistons, and rings?" I wanted to know what disinterested engineers said. "We have no disinterested engineers. . . . If your interest has behind it an opportunity for us to secure additional business, we will be only too glad to go into this matter in detail."

I asked "How can you justify the statement that 'The Aero B Amplopower makes possible on your radio the exact reproduction of every note of every instrument?'" Answer: "For business reasons we are unable to make public all engineering data which cost us so much to secure . . . the Amplopower must speak for itself." It does. But that all radios, despite their claims, are still far from attaining exact reproduction of every note has been proved by laboratory tests.

Asked to send the report on "Minute Brew" by Dean Sayre, director of the Kansas State Laboratory, showing that the Battle Creek Food Company has "eliminated these empyreumatic products which were known to do the harm" in caffeinless coffees, the company wrote, "The tests made by Dean Sayre proved Minute Brew to be the least acid of cereal beverages. . . . He requested, however, that the figures on this be confidential." But this company had declared in print: "His results are at the disposal of anyone who cares for them."

The makers of the Prophylactic Tooth Brush answered a statement by Dr. W. M. Gardner in Hygeia that their brush was not as well-shaped as they claimed, by asserting: "We have nothing of a scientific character to confute Dr. Gardner. The only data we have is commonsense data which is so obvious and so simple that it refutes without any argument." Yet this company has stressed the "scientific" qualities of its brush for years. In advertising it announces: "These features (the ones questioned by Dr. Gardner are there because Science says they should be."

Ivory Soap, "99 44/100 per cent pure," was admitted to contain a necessary 30 per cent water content; "99 44/100 per cent is a slogan, not a guarantee."

I asked the Three-in-One Oil company to substantiate claims that such a light oil was a practical rust-preventive. I asked about an obvious acidity corrosive to copper, brass, silver, etc. I asked other leading questions to discover (1) why it was so expensive, (2) why other common oils or greases were not just as good for the purposes mentioned. The answer was simple: "If Three-in-One was just being placed on the market and had not stood the test of a third of a century we might feel that a certified laboratory sheet was essential, but when millions of men, women . . ." "Army and navy small-arms manuals recommend it," the company advertises. But a letter from an officer in the War Department, Ordnance Division, says: "The army small-arms manuals do not recommend Three-in-One oil. The United States Army does not purchase it. Our own investigations show that Three-in-One oil has an acid reaction . . . which forms verdigris in presence of copper. . . . It is so thin it runs from surfaces and leaves spots unprotected. . . . For lubrication of small arms this department for many years has been using sperm oil." Neither the official "Blue Jacket's Manual," nor "Small Arms Firing Regulations, U. S. Navy" mention it, although recommending suitable oiling treatments.

A huge display advertisement of "Dona Castile Soap" manufactured by Armour and Company in the Middle West led me to inquire how much olive oil was in it and why "nothing else but castile soap has been found so beneficial for the skin of a woman." The company replied: "We can think of no better answer to your questions than for you to try this exquisite soap, and we are sending you . . ." The Federal Trade Commission has ordered the manufacturers to desist from using the word "castile," alleging that the company "has misled and deceived the public into believing that said soap is and has been genuine castile soap, made exclusively of olive oil . . . but which on the contrary has included vegetable oils other than olive . . . and animal fats such as tallow, in a substantial amount. . . ."

Listerine's makers, questioned about its dandruff claims, responded: "It is recommended for removal of loose dandruff." The following came from the American Medical Association Bureau of Investigation: "The Listerine advertising on the dandruff feature is of the same kind as the Listerine advertising for halitosis and body odors—largely buncombe."

The Sanka Coffee Corporation says its caffein-free coffee can be given freely to children. "If there are children in your family, you should use Sanka by all means. It can't hurt them; it is as harmless as milk." Literature sent in response to inquiry contained a reprint from the Medical Journal Record, contending that coffee should never be given to children but not saying that Sanka could with safety. Nowhere in other literature sent is there authority for the statements quoted above; but on the other hand a letter to me from the American Medical Association Bureau reads: "Children should have no coffee even though the caffein has been largely removed. In addition to caffein, there are certain empyreumatic oils which give coffee its aroma and flavor, and there is some evidence to indicate they affect digestion unfavorably, and therefore it is a good thing to keep off the dietary of children."

Other advertisers written to did not see fit to substantiate claims made publicly to sell their products. B. T. Babbitt was addressed about Bab-O. "You say that Bab-O is a preparation distinctly out of the class of scouring powders . . . different from anything else. Why is this true? Please give scientific reasons." The quite inconsequential answer was: "Because it contains other ingredients besides soap powder, volcanic ash, and moisture." The J. B. Williams Company replied to a request for facts showing its products were the best: "A vast accumulation of scientific data, imbedded in which are most flattering findings in connection with Williams' creams and soaps, are not available to the public." Ever-Ready Razor Blades are claimed to be "the perfect blade." I wrote for laboratory tests to prove this. "We regret exceedingly we cannot supply you with the information you require. We do not make public the records of our laboratory."

Of the remaining advertisers not quoted for lack of space, four have backed their printed sales-talk with probable fact; the others made no serious attempt to do so.

I submit the above survey as a fair test of the ethics and purpose of this modern art. It omits the wild exaggerations of cigarette, automobile, and cosmetic advertising; it does not go down into the lower depths of the tabloids, the snappy-story magazines, the billboards, or into direct mail advertising, almanacs, or drug store windows. It is a brief cross-section of so-called national advertising in our better-class popular magazines, and contains, it seems to me, an appalling indictment of American business honesty.

Chicago's Symphony Orchestra

By LAWRENCE MARTIN

THE Chicago Symphony Orchestra, founded thirty-seven years ago by Theodore Thomas, is a cultural landmark not only of the Bandit City but of the nation. Nevertheless it stands disbanded as the upshot of an "industrial" dispute, and only heroic efforts will bring it back to life. Meantime in Chicago the strange spectacle presents itself of a Rajah of Jazz offering $10,000 (through his publicity agent) towards saving the orchestra, which the Orchestral Association, comprised of the pillars of local business and society, turns down, preferring rather to junk the orchestra than to give way an inch before the musicians' union or its czar.

Trouble began some three months ago when the Musicians' Federation, through its president, James C. Petrillo, demanded a 25 per cent increase in the basic salary of $80. This the Orchestral Association turned down flat. Petrillo alleged that the players were poorly paid as compared, on the one hand, to grand opera, theater, and jazz musicians, and on the other hand to players in other symphony orchestras. Figures were cited to show that the average salary of grand opera musicians was $150 a week, of theater musicians $125, and of jazz melodists $110 to $175.

To this the association officials answered that the Chicago Symphony was the best-paid orchestra in the world, and offered as proof the fact that its basic rate was $10 higher than the basic rate of either the New York or Philadelphia orchestras. The union now retorts that in these orchestras only about half a dozen men are receiving the minimum, while in the Chicago Symphony half the men are being paid at the lowest rate. Thus the arguments have gone back and forth, and only an expert accountant with the payrolls of the orchestras concerned before him could expect to reach the truth.

In the course of negotiations, about July 15 the union cut its demands in half, asking only a ten-dollar increase in the minimum rate. The answer of the association to this attempt at compromise was that no contracts would be considered except at the salaries in force. Local newspapers in their editorials stressed the fact that there had been two similar disputes in the past, that the association was in no mood for union dictation, and that the present situation was regarded as a show-down. The orchestra was disbanded for the summer, and apparently for all time.

The newspapers, as might be expected, had not been giving the musicians' federation a fair chance. The Chicagoan, a new sophisticated magazine of the boulevard type, an imitation of the New Yorker, devoted two articles in its first number to attacking the union. But with the orchestra all but killed, the dailies began to take notice. Some public-spirited citizens and music lovers made themselves heard. The feeling began to grow that the pillars of the association had been behaving like Tory diehards, and that under the shadow of fighting for a principle they were conducting a more or less personal war against the union chiefs and the union idea. Agitation developed for a public fund with which to meet the salary increase of approximately $30,000. A piano company expressed a desire to contribute; Paul Ash, Balaban and Katz's jazz demon, offered to pay $10,000 into a fund; and the Daily News, practically the only newspaper to concern itself with saving the orchestra, offered to donate "a substantial sum." But President Hamill and Vice-President Oakley refused to entertain the idea of accepting such contributions. They would take no offers with strings tied to them; any contributions must be made with the understanding that the association might use the funds as it saw fit; and the association would not go beyond last year's contracts. It was this irreconcilable attitude that swung the newspapers, and consequently public opinion, away from their anti-union bias. The Orchestral Association had accepted donations for special purposes, notably for pensions and scholarships. Why, therefore, should it not accept special donations for wage increases?

This naturally gives rise to the pertinent question, What is the Orchestral Association? Is it a private, closed corporation, or a civic organization? Who elects the members, and on what basis, and to whom are they responsible for their conduct of orchestral affairs?

"The affairs of the orchestra," one reads in a leaflet issued by the association, "are controlled by a governing body of forty men, known as the Orchestral Association. Appointment to that body is for life, and membership is considered an honorable distinction. Membership carries with it no financial obligations of any nature. The orchestra always has been distinctly a 'community affair' in Chicago, the financial burdens of its earlier years being distributed among many people, its financial support never having been regarded as the 'pet hobby' of any one rich man."

The orchestra has a deficit of about $85,000 yearly, which is met by income from three main sources: rental of the six-story building in which the hall is housed, rental of the hall, and cash endowment. The hall, situated on Michigan Avenue, Chicago's proudest thoroughfare, was built in 1904 by popular subscription, 8,500 persons contributing in amounts from 10 cents to $25,000. But for the fact that the orchestra owns its own home and draws substantial revenue therefrom, it would not be able to support itself without patronage of one sort or another.

". . . the financial burdens of its earlier years being distributed among many people." But the control of the orchestra is in the hands of respectable, solid, and substantial men who have made their mark in business and civic affairs. Among the members are three McCormicks, a couple of Ryersons, a Sprague, and Frank Lowden. These gentlemen have made many pronouncements in their time, but probably none which was expressly favorable to unionism.

In short, the Orchestral Association is a name for a class organization comprised of forty "pillars," electing each other for life, self-perpetuating, and responsible to no one but themselves. These gentlemen do not like unions; in particular they dislike the musicians' union; and in especial they detest Mr. Petrillo, the president. They started out to make this a matter of principle, a sort of vital issue between capital and labor, whether or not it led to wrecking the orchestra.

On the other hand, President Petrillo is not the most tactful man in the world. He does well in a dispute between a movie-house manager and a temperamental organist, but he is out of his element with the Gold Coast crowd. Between these two the symphony orchestra is beset from all directions. Press reports attempt to make something of the fact that this is a war of social strata as well as of economic principle.

The newspapers have also made capital of the allegation that the union "czar" hurled his demands out of the blue sky, and that the symphony musicians themselves were never consulted. Business Manager Voegeli of the Orchestral Association is authority for the statement that several men of the orchestra have told him so. They may have had reasons. For the purpose of this article five men were interviewed before the concert at Ravinia Park, the Gold Coast's playground. They talked when assured that no names were wanted. All said that while no direct vote was taken, the union had made inquiries among the musicians before taking the matter up. All were satisfied with the union's course.

At this writing it is not possible to prophecy with any confidence how the squabble will end. Rumor, with newspaper sanction, has it that if the association does not bend, the union will reorganize the orchestra and go ahead without the forty pillars. Substantial obstacles make this course dubious. Some days ago President Hamill made a trip to New York where he supposedly called on President Weber of the musicians' national organization—apparently with no results. Meantime the daily press has taken to the private subscription idea, and has suggested a compromise which would at the same time give the musicians what they want, and save the dignity of the life-members. The proposal is that, in the face of the association's refusal to accept donations to apply on the salary increase, a public and exterior fund be created, out of which the players will be paid. This would constitute a sort of supplementary wage ladled out to the musicians. Officially, the gentlemen of the association would know nothing about it. Technically, they will have won, for the old scale around which they rallied will remain intact. The latest report is that the association has accepted this arrangement. Thus, while the materialistic demands of practitioners of the most spiritual art will be satisfied, the dignity of the association will not be compromised—except for persons with an appreciation of the grotesque.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter has often wondered if there is such a thing as a distinctly Western type of humor. He thinks there is. There is the old, old story of the cowboy who returned to town alone a day after he had started with his bride for his ranch 100 miles away. On being questioned he explained sadly that fifty miles out she had been thrown from her horse and broken a leg; and so he had to shoot her. That is typically Western.

* * * * *

ANOTHER example the Drifter found in the newspapers a while ago when he read of a Western State Senator and rancher who was always reelected, despite the fact that he was a Democrat in a Republican camp, merely because of the stories he told. One of these stories was of how a newly appointed county agent came to his ranch one day and suggested that the senator raise hogs. The senator agreed. A few months later the agent made another visit. He was dismayed at the skinny proportions of the hogs. "Well," said the rancher, "they have the run of 10,000 acres. I'll bet they're the fastest hogs in Melett County." "They need protein," said the county agent professionally. So the rancher killed a horse and fed it to them. Pretty soon he was relieved of this duty, however, because they got so they killed their own horses, and when next the agent came he found fat sleek hogs racing over the place. "Now, why don't you sell them?" he asked. "Well," came the answer, "if I ever catch 'em in town, I will."

* * * * *

AS exhibit three the Drifter offers a story that many Western youngsters have no doubt been lulled to sleep with. It is always told as the experience of the pioneer grandfather of the child listener. "Once your grandfather and your Uncle Joe went up in the hills to get wood. In them days, you know, they made harness out of calfskin, and calfskin stretches. Well, they got up in the hills and filled their wagon and started back. Just as they started the rain came down in sheets—and that harness began to stretch. The wagon wouldn't move an inch. So your grandfather and Uncle Joe got on the horses and rode 'em home and unhitched the horses and then tied the harness to the hitchin' post right out here in front of the house. It rained all night. But the next morning the sun come out hot. Then of course that harness started shrinkin'. And about noon here come that load of wood down the road. . . . Yes, sir, that was when your grandfather first come here. Now what do you think of that?" What, indeed?

* * * * *

GIVING young hitch hikers a lift, says a warning, has added materially to juvenile delinquency. "It is difficult to refuse a ride to some smiling boy or girl," it goes on, "but it is far better to disappoint a child than to become a factor in carrying it to some distant city and causing parental worry." The Drifter doubts that denying rides to youngsters would make much of a dent in Parental Worry. He agrees with the opinion of most of the younger generation that parents will have their Worry even if they have to bootleg it. But while the air is full of warnings against giving lifts the Drifter would like to add one of his own: Beware of warnings. A friend of the Drifter was driving along a lonely road one evening in a heavy rainstorm. Suddenly, ahead of him he saw a hiker evidently very wet and very tired. The driver had taken the warnings against hikers so seriously that he had added a revolver to his equipment, so he felt safe in offering the foot traveler a lift. They rode along in silence for several miles. Then the driver reached into his vest pocket for his watch. It was not there. Quickly his hand slid to his hip pocket. He stuck the revolver against his passenger's ribs. "Put that watch in my pocket," he commanded, "and get out of here." The man put the watch in his host's pocket and stepped out once more into the rain. The saddened Samaritan arrived at home much upset. But he was even more upset when he discovered his own watch on the dresser where he had left it that morning. The Drifter doesn't know what he did about it. Advertising would seem the only way out.

> If the man who lost his watch on the evening of June 10 while riding in my automobile will call at my office I will return his timepiece. No questions answered.
>
> THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Sacco-Vanzetti

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: If I have ever said a word against the old Nation of 1880-1890 I will not repeat it of the paper of this day. The issues of the last three weeks put it at the head of critical journals in the whole world, and the editorial Justice Underfoot (August 17) is the finest areopagitic utterance for justice since Garrison. WILLIAM SLOANE KENNEDY

West Yarmouth, Massachusetts, August 15

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I wish to tell you of my deep appreciation of your article Justice Underfoot in the last issue of The Nation. It exactly expressed what I believe, and I am very grateful to have it all so well said. LOUISA CUSHING JAMES

Cotuit, Massachusetts, August 14

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I want to express to you my personal gratitude for your article on the Sacco-Vanzetti case in The Nation of the 17th. It means so much to those of us who feel so helpless in a situation of this kind to have such a ringing expression of it all put before the world.

I am in a continual state of gratitude for The Nation.

Penn Yan, New York, August 18 LOUISE A. ELSWORTH

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Concede that a Massachusetts gentleman, temporarily his Excellency, with an election impending, gave a sincere, unbiased judgment. It is unnecessary to question the integrity of the man whose blank, courteous face briefly decorated the front pages. Fuller's decision was instinctive and inevitable.

The evidence was circumstantial and irrelevant. Whether Sacco and Vanzetti were innocent was a point, but not the point in question. The issue was prominent, and the alternatives were neat: Sacco and Vanzetti killed Berardelli and Parmenter in Braintree, in 1920. Or, if they did not, if they were innocent, their judge was dangerously incompetent; the prosecution, with federal assistance, was unscrupulous and vicious; the jury all good men and moral imbeciles; and the Lowell committee guilty of unpardonable stupidity, if nothing more. And the Massachusetts legal system was a rotted, uninspiring wreck. Which is obviously inconceivable.

No, indisputably, this illiterate fish peddlar and his companion were guilty. Vanzetti sold eels, and Sacco did not believe in war. Judge Thayer was a gentleman, if sadly garrulous. And it was a most brutal murder. The Governor decides that they shall die, and leaves for Rye Beach.

The most sinister aspect of this affair is not the death of two men presumably innocent. Nor radical mass meetings in Union Square which demand editorial squeals of virtuous resentment. It is the high proportion of congratulatory telegrams sent to Governor Fuller. Apparently the death of two foreigners should gratify patriotic natives. The Governor might have saved these dangerous men; but he heroically declined, and is forthwith urged to run for the Presidency. It is a damning commentary on this nation.

Wilmington, Delaware, August 21 H. M. J.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The editorial Justice Underfoot might be excusable if published in almost any foreign country. But sympathy such as yours for the two convicted murderers, after a painstaking review of the crime and the trial which convicted them, by men of the character of Governor Fuller and Presidents Lowell and Stratton, and a unanimous opinion of their guilt and brutality, is indefensible in any true American publication. The Nation's championship of the reputable weak against the oppression of the oligarchy of "big business" is always admirable. A plea for clemency, because of Judge Thayer's reported shocking indiscretions, or on account of the circumstantial nature of the evidence, which is never absolutely sure, is commendable on the part of any journal. But a strong championship of the cause of these men, such at The Nation is capable of delivering, only incites weak and reckless minds to violence and is most disappointing to those of your readers who are not anarchistic in thought.

Burlington, Vermont, August 12 W. T. SCOFIELD

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Having read and re-read, not once but many times, your editorial Justice Underfoot, I must tell you at once that seldom or never have I been so moved by any writing whatever; it frightens me.

Rochester, N. Y. August 14 A. S. C.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have just read your article entitled Justice Underfoot and also an article from the Springfield Republican sent out by the Sacco-Vanzetti Defense Committee, and have been struck with the great contrast.

To a man who comes with unprejudiced mind, the Springfield Republican article would lead him to a leniency and compassion toward Sacco and Vanzetti while your article starting out in such an absolutely false way cannot help antagonizing him. You state they are innocent. Now there are but few people who know absolutely whether or not they are innocent, and I for one would rather depend upon what the courts and jury find regarding them than upon people who write in such a cocksure manner as you do.

New York, August 17 HAROLD PEIRCE

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: History teaches us that there have always been Sacco-Vanzetti cases; whether in the days before autocracies masqueraded under the guise of popular democracies or whether in the days, when, content to appear what they are, the same state and church, even in dissension, were as one. Having found an interesting parallel in Voltaire's day, I hasten to communicate it to your readers' attention, for this specific case, even if it were specious (it isn't), would contain an edifying moral or two. Brandes tells that:

Jean Calas was a merchant of Toulouse, aged sixty-eight, a Protestant. His youngest son had become converted to Catholicism, and was completely estranged from his family. The eldest son, a wild, dissolute young man, committed suicide. The Catholic clergy spread a rumor among the people that the father had strangled his son out of hatred for the Romish faith, which the latter, it was said, had intended to embrace on the following day. The whole family was imprisoned. The suicide's corpse lay in state, and performed one miracle after another. The bi-centenary of the massacre of St. Bartholomew in Toulouse occurred at the time of the trial, and in their fanatical excitement thirteen judges, despite all proofs of innocence, and without a shadow of evidence of his guilt, condemned Calas to be broken on the wheel. The sentence was carried out, the old man protesting his innocence to the last. His children, under the pretext of a reprieve, were shut up in a monastery and forced to adopt the Catholic faith. Then Voltaire at Ferney wrote his celebrated treatise on tolerance, and moved heaven and earth to get the case tried over again. He appealed to the public opinion of the whole of Europe. He compelled the Council of State in Paris to demand the minutes of the trial from the Parliament of Toulouse. They were refused; there were delays of every kind; but in the end, after three years of unwearied fighting, Voltaire gained his point. The Toulouse sentence was declared unjust, the dead man's honor was cleared, and an indemnification paid his family.

Philadelphia, August 9 H. H. HORWITZ

The Farmer's Future

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Will you allow a farmer to voice his protest against the conclusions drawn by Professor Tugwell in his article "What Will Become of the Farmer?" in your issue of June 15.

Professor Tugwell states that it is inevitable that fundamental changes must in the long run take place in agriculture, and he suggests two possibilities: thorough cooperation —of which however, he does not think the farmer capable; or the changing of agriculture from its independent position to one supplementary to industry with the extension of the modern industrial method of production into agriculture, so as to increase the efficiency of agricultural production.

As to the first suggestion, it seems to me that the reason why the American farmer does not succeed better in establishing cooperatives is mainly to be found in the fact that the banking trust does not want it, and that the farmer is consequently kept down to such a low level of subsistence that he has not enough strength left, political and economical, to get out of the mire. And this state of affairs will exist as long as our currency is controlled by the banking trust.

As to the other alternative, the history of agriculture shows abundantly that latifundia, for such industrialised farms would ultimately be, are never as productive as are the small freeholds and that they are very much less efficient.

Besides, what does "efficiency" mean? Most business men and many of the professors of economics understand efficiency to mean low cost of production. But does efficiency really mean that? An efficient economic system is to my mind a system which will allow each member of the community to have a safe existence, forestall famines, and grant sufficient leisure for the enjoyment of the higher pursuits of life. A glance at our industrial system shows clearly that not even our boasted industrial efficiency guarantees these three essentials of life. Quite the contrary. A system which throws on the scrap-heap men in their prime, and therefore beclouds the horizon of most men and women past their thirtieth year, is not efficient, no matter what the cost of production. But in agriculture the case would be even aggravated. If a thousand acres of wheat land could be operated with the help of modern machinery by five men working two months a year, producing 30,000 bushels of wheat, we might say indeed that the cost of production is low. If we assume that on these 1,000 acres 200 families could live happily and free of care, the picture changes completely.

If the 200 families had been living on the land first, but had been driven off because they could not find a market for their surplus products and therefore fell into debt, and their creditor, having levelled their homes, had established a wheat ranch, we would then have 200 families in want who would not be able to buy even the wheat produced on their former land, but who would live in penury without any hope of a better future. For where shall they go? Industry cannot take them, being oversupplied with men on account of the daily increase in the invention of labor-saving machinery, an ever-growing evil. The 200 families then would be a public charge living on doles with all the attending evils. As they could not be satisfied, their needs would not give employment to another set of workmen as they would if these families lived on their farms in comfort. The "low cost of production," therefore, would not only result in impoverishing the farmer; indirectly it would throw out of employment other sets of workers, because the market for goods would be restricted by that much. Where now is your efficiency?

As far as I am able to see, the main reason for the confusion of thought in the heads of our professors of economics and especially our business men lies in the fact that they do not seem to realize that however much money we may have, the world at large has never yet gotten away from the economy of exchange. There is no such a thing as a money economy. We do not buy and sell. All we do is to exchange goods by means of money. If that money is withheld, and consequently the exchange cannot take place, there is, as we have today, penury and want in the midst of plenty. All professors of economics learn at college that money has two characteristics, i. e. that it is the means of exchange and the measure of value. But they apparently do not understand, that money in itself is valueless; that what matters is not the price but the proper exchange of goods. They do not see that the gold standard is a humbug, merely designed to secure the private control of the currency, that it is a superstition kept alive in the minds of the people to enable the banker to keep his grip on the currency. Low efficiency, then, is the direct result of unsatisfied needs as a consequence of artificially restricted money circulation.

But we do not live by wheat alone. We need vegetables and fruit. Now is the large-production system for agriculture the most efficient? I believe the late Prince Kropotkin among others has given the answer to that question. And in this country it was decided decades ago, when the slave system was found unprofitable. The hired man can never replace the free farmer; neither can, for instance, large orchards or truck gardens compete in productivity with the small orchards or tracts of land of the individual owner. The reason is that a system of hired help precludes improvement. Where a hundred small owners work toward better results, a hundred minds are at work to invent new and better tools and to find out improved methods of cultivation and fertilization. But where one manager is set over an equal number of hired men, these hired men have to conform to the method in use. They have to do as they are told to; they are not interested in results but merely in wages. These facts have been proved to be true numberless times throughout the course of history, but the class system always falls back on the wage system.

To look at the farming situation without at the same time looking at the industrial situation, not only in this country but in other countries also, can lead only to false conclusions. The logical inference from industry to agriculture may be made, but psychologically the case is different. An industrialized farm system will, as we have seen, merely aggravate the industrial evil of unemployment and continue the vicious circle downward at an ever-increasing rate of speed. Industry in its own interest, therefore, had better help the farmer to stay where he is and what he is.

Parkdale, Oregon, June 23 F. Wertgen

Contributors to This Issue

Frederick Boselly is a pseudonym.

Paul Blanshard who is connected with the League for Industrial Democracy has just returned from China.

Lorine Pruette is the author of "Women and Leisure: A Study in Social Waste."

Raymond Fuller is the author of "Child Labor and the Constitution."

Lawrence Martin is a resident of Chicago.

Leslie Nelson Jennings is a New York poet and journalist.

Theresa Wolfson is author of "The Woman Worker and the Trade Unions."

Harry Elmer Barnes is author of "The Genesis of the World War.

George Genzmer is on the staff of the Dictionary of American Biography.

R. S. Alexander is a South African journalist who knew Olive Schreiner.

Harry Alan Potamkin is director of the Children's Play Village of Philadelphia.

Henrietta Straus, The Nation's music critic, is making a tour of the European music festivals.

Books and Music

The Gulls Know Best

By LESLIE NELSON JENNINGS

They overhung our diligence until
The tide began to push us back, and then
The beach was theirs, freely to take their fill
Of what we would not give the sea again.
It was a curious thing to note how well
Necessity had fitted them to wrest
The savory morsel from the stubborn shell;
And as I watched I thought: The gulls know best.

They are the shrewder salvagers who let
Our spade precede them, who despise our shift
Of building driftwood fires. Their beaks are set
On quicker feasts, whetted on wiser thrift.
These broken shells dropped where the surf heaves in Among the rocks tell where the gulls have been.

Vera Figner

The Memoirs of a Revolutionist. By Vera Figner. International Publishers. $3.

THIS is an age of memoirs and though the market is flooded with uninteresting autobiographies, occasionally a soul rises out of the mediocrity, a beautiful, clear, many-faceted soul born out of the chaos and the turbulence of a social movement. Such a soul was Vera Figner—such a movement was the terrorist movement of Russia in 1870, of which she was a leading spirit.

Coming to the political movement at the age of twenty-three, Vera Figner was already equipped with a medical education. She became a member of the Will of the People, a revolutionary Socialist organization carrying on educational and political propaganda among the peasants. In accordance with their policy she was sent "to the people." Turgenev has immortalized those thousands of young men and women who gave up their middle-class homes, their intellectual lives, and buried themselves in isolated, lonely Russian villages for the sake of educating peasants. The young Vera's description of her life among the peasants, their increasing confidence in her, and the growing antagonism of the village priests and police, is given with exquisite simplicity and naivete.

As she weaves her story, the book becomes a remarkable document concerning the psychological and social background which made possible the Russian revolution ten years ago. The political evolution of the country proceeded from the peculiar social and spiritual forces let loose by the thousands of men and women eager to overthrow the despotic monarchy and finding in their revolutionary activities the highest type of self-expression. Life was cheap. Hosts of Russia's intellectuals marched to the gallows or certain death in prison with a song or a challenge upon their lips. It was the era of the individual. The terrorist movement had a socialist philosophy but it functioned through the annihilation of individuals. There was no political mass movement, no general strike of protest. The leaders of the Will of the People could only hope to startle the apathetic masses in Russia and the mildly concerned world outside by throwing bombs or shooting Czars. When the masses were awakened then they hoped to carry on the constructive plans for the new social order. In a highly integrated and self-conscious country, or even in an industrial country such activities would be doomed to failure. Vera Figner, doubting the results of the terrorist activities of her comrades and herself, nevertheless could see no other course of action for Russian revolutionists at that stage of their country's development.

The stories of these activities are as pathetic in their victories as in their failures. There is the incident of the two revolutionists who opened a cheese shop on a main thoroughfare in Petrograd from which they laboriously dug a tunnel to the middle of the street on which the Czar was wont to pass. It was their plan to blow him up. After a year of tiring and heartrending digging, the bomb failed to explode at the appointed time. The revolutionists were caught and shot. There is another story of Solovyev who was appointed to fire at the Czar as he passed from the station, in an effort to secure some special privileges for the peasants. His elbow was accidently pushed by a bowing peasant in the crowd. The bullet went astray and Solovyev was caught and hung.

There is the story of Vera Figner's twenty years in prison—an extraordinary tale of one who entered prison a young woman, together with some sixty other comrades. As the years dragged by her fellow prisoners committed suicide, went insane, or died from tuberculosis. She lived on, weaving for herself and her friends a new life out of the gossamer threads of prison privileges. They lived through a thousand spiritual deaths and resurrections. Life came to them anew when the first prison code of tapping was evolved; when the first foot of land in the prison yard was given to them to cultivate; when a youth joined their diminished number after fifteen years of isolation from the world, and they learned for the first time that their seeds of political activity had not been sown in vain.

Life makes some individuals bitter; life has made of Vera Figner, who is seventy-five years old and still lives in Russia, a crystal clear and beautiful character.

THERESA WOLFSON

Senator Owen on the War

The Russian Imperial Conspiracy. By Robert Latham Owen. Albert and Charles Boni. $2.

CANDID scholars in all countries throughout the Western World are in essential agreement concerning the necessity of repudiating the war-guilt lie embodied in Article 231 of the Treaty of Versailles. Only William Stearns Davis believes Germany uniquely guilty. Very few reputable authorities believe Germany more guilty than the Entente states, while an ever greater number are coming to rank Germany with England and Italy as one of the three countries that did not desire any type of war in Europe after July 26, 1914. There have actually been more historians and publicists in the Entente countries than in the Central Powers who have demolished the war-time fictions regarding war responsibility.

There have, however, been very few statesmen in the Entente lands who have had the courage to come out squarely against the verdict of Versailles. Lloyd George has timidly suggested that no state or group of states deliberately plotted the war, but rather all "stumbled" into it. Caillaux, while awaiting trial, composed a devastating critique of Poincaré and his diplomacy, but since his return to French politics he has not lifted up his voice. Signor Nitti has been the only one to proclaim with power and thoroughness the hypocrisies of the "peace-makers." Senator Robert L. Owen occupies an equally unique position in the United States. He may with complete propriety be called the Nitti of America. His great speech of December 18, 1923, in the United States Senate will, in time, come to be ranked as one of the most notable historical and political orations of the ages. In it a staunch Wilsonian of the war period cast to the winds all of the facile Woodrovian rhetoric which has so subtly and effectively beguiled us into accepting the Entente version of the Great Crusade. Owen has secured few or no avowed disciples on Capitol Hill, but historians have already vindicated the essential accuracy of his contentions.

It is fortunate that it has been Senator Owen rather than an equally high-minded statesman with a "bad" war record, like the late Senator LaFollette, upon whom has fallen the task of the public exposure of the mythology born of war propaganda. No man in the United States had a better record from 1914 to 1918. As a member of the Wilson party in Congress he was, more than any other person, responsible for the passage of the Federal Reserve Act, the special pet of American financial interests. He warmly and comprehensively supported Wilson's policy of intervention and all of the war-time legislation designed to further an Entente victory. Nor need he fear to match his ancestry with such representatives of old American stock as Solomon S. Menken or Joseph Cashman of the National Security League, to say nothing of Henry Cabot Lodge or Theodore Roosevelt. There is on him or his record no trace whatever of the brand of the Hun or of Moscow. He is simply an honest man who, more or less accidentally, came into contact with some of the chief monographs and collections of documents concerning the outbreak of the war, realized his errors of the war period, and proceeded to place his political future in jeopardy in the interest of truth, justice and humanity.

The Senator has now brought together his views on war responsibility in a trenchant little book of some 200 pages. It is more in the form of a dignified legal brief than a consecutive history of European diplomacy from January, 1912, to August, 1914. It formulates in forceful fashion the case against the Entente and states the more cogent arguments in behalf of the Central Powers. There is a long concluding section which deals with the development of the revisionist position and the French and British protests against the Treaty of Versailles. Senator Owen holds Russia to be the chief culprit, though willingly abetted by France. When the reviewer first read the work in rough draft a year ago he felt that this position could not be sustained, but recent research in the Russian material assembled in the so-called "Red Archives," edited by Professor Adamov, has led some careful scholars to adopt this same view, and to hold that Poincaré was converted to the war program only upon the event of his visit to St. Petersburg in the summer of 1912. Here he became convinced that the extent of the Russian plans and intrigues rendered it necessary for France to jump in wholeheartedly if she hoped to make any substantial gains as a result of the Franco-Russian Alliance.

Microscopic pedants will detect minor errors and deride the book, but it presents a view of the crisis of 1914 which is certainly close to the truth. It should render an invaluable service to that large reading public which is without the time or training requisite to the mastery of the detailed manuals. And it is for just this group that Senator Owen has prepared his work. It was inspired by a noble purpose and it will serve an excellent cause.

HARRY ELMER BARNES

Shakespeare and His Audience

Shakespeare Studies. By Elmer Edgar Stoll. The Macmillan Company. $4.

SOME books are already old and established on the very day they are published. Such a book, for example, was Frederick J. Turner's "Frontier in American History"; and such a book, in another field, is "Shakespeare Studies." For over twenty years Professor Stoll has been a diligent student of the Elizabethan drama and particularly of Shakespeare. With his monographs on "Hamlet" and "Othello" and with his numerous shorter articles he has already made his mark on American Shakespeare criticism, although this is his first book to be addressed to the general reader. A member of the group of scholars who have applied the objective methods of the historian to the study of the Elizabethan drama, Mr. Stoll is distinguished alike for his learning and for his zestful literary style, but more especially for the unflinching rigor with which he applies the historical and comparative method to the study of Shakespeare's characters. While his colleagues have been content to show how actors and audience, sources and stage-craft, have variously affected Shakespeare's work, Mr. Stoll has gone further. Regarding Shakespeare as himself an Elizabethan in blood and marrow, thoroughly in sympathy with his audience and with his business associates, sharing to the full their ideas, tastes, and prejudices, a popular playwright unaware that his work would have a life beyond the boards of his own theater, Professor Stoll has raised a protest against the practice of psychologizing, subtilizing, sentimentalizing, and anachronizing Shakespeare. He has endeavored to put Shakespeare back into his Elizabethan environment, to see Shylock, Othello, Falstaff, Hamlet, the procession of ghosts and criminals, and all the other personae dramatis as the spectators at the Globe and the Blackfriars saw them, and as romantic critics, irregardful or unaware of ascertainable fact, have declined to see them. His work has been heeded. At this date it is no longer necessary to defend his method or to explain his main contentions. But it is desirable to point out one of the defects of that method.

Mr. Stoll's purpose, like that of every responsible critic, is to discover the intention of his author. This he attempts to do, with the minimum of subjective theorizing, by studying the general scope and conception of the characters, by treating them strictly as "dramatic" rather than as "historical" personages, by weighing the effect of stage conventions and the physical limitations of Shakespeare's theatre, by keeping within the bounds of Elizabethan ideas, and by observing the practice of other dramatists, both Elizabethan and modern. For many of his illustrations he turns to Molière and to the work of recent Molière scholars. Special emphasis he lays on the restrictions that a popular audience imposes on a dramatist, and he recognizes the mistake of attaching disproportionate significance to isolated single passages.

With a mediocre writer, such as Dekker or Middleton, this procedure would be practically unexceptionable. With Shakespeare, however, it seems inadequate. All that the historical and comparative method can do is to show to what extent he was like other Elizabethan dramatists and thus to guard the critic against obvious misinterpretations; what keeps Shakespeare green while his fellows gather dust upon the bookshelves it illumines imperfectly or not at all. The fact that Shakespeare was a popular dramatist does not mean that his every line and his every nuance of characterization must have been comprehended by his audience; that notion rests on the silent assumption that Elizabethan dramatic technique was invariably as facilely adroit and as calculatedly vulgar as that of a Broadway play-carpenter today. Though in connection with his plays, as Mr. Stoll believes, Shakespeare may never have thought of himself as a poet, he undoubtedly had the inner experience of a poet and knew when he had done a good piece of work. He may also have known that the crowd that trouped into the Globe Theater after weighing the rival attractions of the bear pit and the bawdy houses around the corner would not comprehend how good a play they were listening to. But what of that? They would comprehend enough to make the thing pay; the rest was his own affair. If the sixteenth-century audience took Shylock for a villain and a butt and laughed heartily over his undoing, that was what Shakespeare intended; if that audience missed "the happily human lineaments of his make-up" and "the splendor of poetry, shed like the rain and the light from heaven, on the just and the unjust," the poet did not. If the full flavor of Falstaff's dissertation on honor escaped the apprentices shuffling and yawning in the pit, we need not believe that it escaped the man who wrote it.

Mr. Stoll, of course, knows all this as well as anyone, but in this collection of somewhat technical and argumentative essays the knowledge seems at times to elude him. As a matter of fact his understanding of the poet is as sensitive as it is sane. "All that play of their imagination in excess of what is expected or appreciated by the public or required for the task," he says of the great artists in general, "is their gift to mankind, their precious but spontaneous tribute to creation, which comes or goes unnoticed." In this book Shakespeare's tribute to creation does not go unnoticed, for it opens with a movingly eloquent address On the Anniversary of the First Folio and closes with a capital Hazlittian essay on Falstaff. Though he occasionally rides his theories too hard, Mr. Stoll has written one of the indispensable commentaries on Shakespeare's art.

GEORGE GENZMER

The Real Olive Schreiner

From Man to Man. By Olive Schreiner. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

THE publication of her unfinished novel, "From Man to Man," will set the hearts of Olive Schreiner's friends at rest. Here in this incomplete story, which she herself, as she was writing it, felt would be "quite different from any other book that ever was written," the real Olive Schreiner lives for all time. "Rebekah is me; I don't know which is which any more," she wrote to Havelock Ellis in 1888, and the book is so much the book of Rebekah that even Baby Bertie, her beloved and hapless sister, is somewhat shadowy beside that intensely living figure. To read "From Man to Man" is to know the inner life and deepest thoughts of Rebekah as one rarely knows those of a very dear friend; but to read of Rebekah is also, for her friends, to hear and see Olive Schreiner moving and talking with a vividness almost too poignant. Even the physical gestures that she gives to Rebekah, the tricks of behavior in moments of excitement or of happiness, are her own. And the nobility, the loving kindness, the courage, the divine tenderness of Rebekah—these too are Olive Schreiner's. Those who would know her as she was, those who would understand why those who knew her so greatly loved her, trusted her, honored her, and mourn her, have only to read "From Man to Man."

This is not to say that the book is a perfect work of art as such. The long prelude, called "A Child's Day," is indeed a flawless and exquisite piece. In a letter to her friend, Mrs Francis Smith, she describes how, sitting at her desk in Alassio, working at something quite different, the whole of it flashed on her complete, and she sat down and wrote it out. And as it stands, this record of the doings and the thoughts of a five-year-old during one hot summer's day, the day on which her baby sister was born, and no one on the farm, accordingly, had thought or time to spare for her, is of so even a texture, so poetic a conception, that the rhythmic, beautiful prose and the deep, beautiful emotion of it fuse into one for the reader as they do only in the greatest of the world's literature. If Olive Schreiner had written nothing but this prelude, which together with the "Thoughts on South Africa" comprised the whole of her unpublished writings for the publication of which she left instructions in her will, her position as a writer of the first order would still stand secure. There is no lovelier short piece in the whole range of English literature.

Yet the novel for which it sets the key, of which, according to the complete list of proposed chapters given by her husband in his introduction, only a little more than half is extant, would never, if completed, have taken a similar place to the prelude as a work of art. The characters, though too sketchily indicated in comparison with Rebekah to fall into focus, are yet alive—all but the two bad respectable women, Veronica and Mrs. Drummond. The cat among women, to which species they both belong, was so feared as well as hated by Olive Schreiner herself that the detachment necessary to see them as human beings was not possible for her. Their sterile cruelty, their cold unlovingness filled her with a horror as of something both obscene and deadly. "It is so terrible to have to realize them and grapple with them," she wrote.

But the book that is "quite different from any other book that ever was written," though it may not be a great novel, is unquestionably a great book, and one of unique importance and interest. It is not only the revelation of the mind and soul of a noble woman, but it is the statement for all time of what the true woman desires to give to and to receive from the man she loves. In half-humorous despair she wrote of it to Havelock Ellis: "The worst of this book of mine is that it's so womanly. I think it's the most womanly book that ever was written. . . ." But she came to love the book more than any of her others, more than she loved any person, as she worked on it, because "I know it gives a voice to that which exists in the hearts of many women and some men." And in the midst of awful pain and weakness she finds support in the thought of it, in the fact that "'From Man to Man' will help other people, for it will help to make men more tender to women, because they will understand them better; it will make some women more tender to others; it will comfort some women by showing them that others have felt as they do." She was justified of her comfort. There will be women, and men, too, the world over, lonely of heart for the most part, who as they read this book will feel, with a yearning joy, that certain bleak solitarinesses of the spirit are no longer possible for them. And they will take up their lives with a new strength, saying within themselves, as she said, "Somewhere, sometime . . ."

R. S. ALEXANDER

Catching Pegasus Young

Singing Youth, an Anthology of Poems by Children. Edited by Mabel Mountsier. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

HAVING gathered numerous examples of the child's expression, I opened the present volume with curiosity. I was eager to know what the editor had deduced from her extensive examination of children's work. Miss Mountsier is not very informative upon this subject. Her concern, evidently, was more for "quality" than for significance. By significance I mean the psychological implications. She does say in her introduction that "humor, scarce enough as it is among older writers, is still more rare among children, who seem to grow serious when they set to work to put their ideas on paper." This observation astounds me. It has been my intimate experience, and that of numerous other educators, that mischief is very active in the literary life of children, as it is active in their physical life. Seriousness and humor are not antithetical. The little girl in my young group of writers who wrote

I give my body
Pies and cakes.
And the thanks I get
Are tummy-aches

was serious about her business of recording her experience, but she caught the irony of it, too.

There are some superlative examples of the child's writing in Miss Mountsier's collection. But the volume does not "help us to see the beauty of the world." It does not need to. As poetry and as verse-structure, most children's work is doggerel and inconsequential. This includes the work of even Miss Nathalia Crane, whom happily Miss Mountsier has omitted. The importance of the child's expression is as a child's expression, not as "it reveals the soul that has not yet felt 'her earthly freight.'" Writing is of major importance in the development of the child. But viewed comparatively, most of the writing by children is either a trite imagism or, in the older child, a sententiousness which is about all most verse-writers seem to get from Whitman. The work of the youngest child is usually the most pleasing, as well as the most "significant." The elimination of details and the seeming separation of ideas are indicative of a mental process which is more interesting than the mechanics of the verse. The mental process is interesting both as the mental process of the child and in its relation to the mental process of the adult attempting the construction of ideas in writing. I think Miss Mountsier would have recognized that the proper viewpoint for a collection of children's writings is psychological, had she not decided upon verse only. One cannot get the full import of the child's expression in a volume of "selected" verse. What is the attitude of the child toward prose, as distinguished from his attitude toward verse? Does every child understand poetry as a distinct presentation, as did the tot at the Ferrer Modern School who said, "In a poem you don't tell everything"? When experienced educators and psychologists study the "fine arts" of the child, they are as much interested in the average as they are in the exceptional. I refer the reader to "Children's Drawings," edited by Stella Agnes McCarty, and to "Der Genius im Kinde," by G. F. Hartlaub. As a matter of fact, it is a study of the average which explains the exceptional. And I am certain a collection of the child's work on the basis of the child's expression, rather than on the basis of the adult's pleasure, would prove no less pleasing to the adult. Even the best work in "Singing Youth" is made enjoyable to a reader familiar with the best poetry only by the knowledge that it is a child's work.

HARRY ALAN POTAMKIN

Intensity

The Drums of Panic. By Martin Feinstein. Macy-Masius. $2.
Death of a Young Man. By W. L. River. Simon and Schuster. $2.

IF conversation is written to amuse, it has a right to be artificial. But if it is set down as a serious transcript of the way people talk, the mot juste is out of place. In "The Drums of Panic" Mr. Feinstein makes this mistake. He tells a conventional story with the devastating intensity of a short lyric, an intensity which cannot be sustained throughout a novel unless the characters are under some terrific strain. Yet, except for the shattered nerves of the returned soldier who is one of the central figures, nothing has occurred out of the ordinary, nothing to warrant the displaying of these people in conversations charged and epigrammatic to the last degree. One closes the book with a sense, indeed, of having read a clear, poetic prose; but also with a sense of having wandered among people who are sadly and unreasonably distant from our life.

In "Death of a Young Man," on the other hand, Mr. River has written a novel full of burning conversation, and yet it is not unreal because there is a reason for its intensity. The book is a diary kept by a young man, David Bloch, who has been told by his doctor that he has only a year to live. He is desperately anxious to crowd a lifetime of experience into this one year, and the result is a tangle of impressions too bright and fleeting for his eager consciousness. Gradually his sanity gives way as he thinks and dreams of nothing but death and murder. The diary goes on for six months, and then ends abruptly on a new-found note of stoical serenity.

This novel has what Mr. Feinstein's novel lacks—the casual irrelevance of real life, the long stretches of unimportant cross-purposes and misunderstandings which swallow up our flashes of poetry. Yet all the time there is the ironic undercurrent of strain, the knowledge of imminent death. These qualities raise interesting questions. One wonders how David Bloch died. But even more one wonders how he lived on if the doctor was proved wrong. For six months he threw his whole being into every sensation, however trivial, that came his way. If the pressure were taken off, what would be the result? Would he recover the everyday balance between the casual and the intense, or would he live out his life without the merciful power of accepting the irrelevant and dismissing it as such? Perhaps David Bloch wondered about this too, but he did not wait to see.

MARTHA MOTT

Music

The Lower Rhine Festival in Aachen

TO the average foreigner the music festivals of Germany are usually summed up by the one word: Bayreuth. To the average German, Bayreuth is only one festival out of many. Community music-making has been natural to this music-loving people ever since the thirteenth century, when Landgrave Hermann of Thuringia held that famous competition festival on the Wartburg in which Tannhäuser and Wolfram von Eschenbach took part. It is not surprising, therefore, that when Elberfeld, in 1817, held a big community festival, the idea spread rapidly to other towns in the Rhineland, so that when Aachen, or Aix-la-Chapelle as we call it, joined forces in 1825 with Elberfeld in this annual Lower Rhine Festival, Düsseldorf and Cologne had already preceded her. The quality and importance of these festivals may be gauged by this first one held in Aachen, when Franz Ries, the pupil and friend of Beethoven, conducted the Ninth Symphony, then still in manuscript. And the far-reaching effect these festivals had upon the musical development of western Germany can be imagined when one realizes that they were directed for many years by Mendelssohn, who, more than any other conductor, preached the gospel of Johann Sebastien Bach by giving Bach's great choral works. Another element of great value in these festivals has been their long-adhered-to policy of encouraging local composers —one notes such names as those of Schumann and Brahms.

It was this policy, therefore, one had to keep in mind when judging the Lower Rhine Festival of 1927. From long tradition, the festival took place at Whitsuntide, lasting three days in all. And from this same tradition, many of the works offered were by local musicians and were receiving their first hearing. The "Grosse Messe" in G minor, by Walter Braunfels, which comprised the first day's program, came, for instance, under this category; so, too, did a "Sinfonia Brevis" by Phillip Jarnach, an "Intermezzo and Rondo" by Rudolph Beck for piano and orchestra, a posthumous work for piano and orchestra by Liszt entitled "Malédiction," which occupied part of the second day's program, and the "Heiliges Lied," by Josef V. von Wöss, which closed the third and last concert.

It cannot be said that anything great or significant was revealed by these newly heard works. The "Mass" was long-winded and ugly, belonging to that decadent post-Wagner, post-Strauss period which directly preceded the World War. Its only excuse for being given must have been the fact that its composer and conductor, Walter Braunfels, is director of the Hochschule für Musik in Cologne. The same might be said for Jarnach, a professor in this same school, whose "Sinfonia Brevis," written in 1919, was a depressing example of that dark period of hopelessness and despair through which the German composer took his rudderless course just after the war. On the other hand, Beck's little work, especially the "Rondo," was fresh and delightful in spirit, if not particularly original in content. Little is known about the composer other than that he early turned from music to religion and became a missionary.

On the whole the festival was interesting rather than inspiring. The local orchestra was ragged, the local chorus was like the average "Oratorio Society," the local conductor, Dr. Peter Raabe, was merely "well routined," and the local pianist, Eduard Erdmann, was more of a musician than a virtuoso. The soprano soloist, Amalie Merz-Tunner, who also took part in the Bonn Festival, was what is usually termed "reliable." None of these things, however, detracted from the real value of the festival, which lay in the spirit and purpose already mentioned. After all, a Schumann or a Brahms is not to be found every day. The main thing is that when they are found they have a ready and sympathetic hearing. This is the lesson that America can learn from the Lower Rhine Festivals.

HENRIETTA STRAUS

Books in Brief

The Conquest of Civilization. By James H. Breasted. The Ordeal of Civilization. By James Harvey Robinson. Harper and Brothers. $10.

These volumes, to which the publishers, apparently for advertising purposes only, have given the comprehensive title "The Human Adventure," are in substance a reissue, in revised and somewhat enlarged form, of Professor Breasted's "Ancient Times" and Professor Robinson's "Mediaeval and Modern Times," two well-known textbooks brought out some ten years ago by another publisher and still in print. Fortunately for the rather novel enterprise, the originals are themselves conspicuously readable, while the transformation has been further aided by the omission of such pedagogical apparatus as section captions, marginal headings, and assorted questions at the end of the chapters. A comparison of the two texts shows a good many minor changes and some rewriting, such variations being especially frequent in Professor Breasted's volume, where careful use appears to have been made of the results of recent exploration and study of the ancient world. Professor Robinson, in turn, has added a chapter on the course of events since the World War, and another which essays a general forecast of the historical trend. To the generations of students who have known the original books as textbooks, the present edition will not offer much that is new, but to others the volumes may be commended as, on the whole, the most useful brief survey of world history available.

Makers of Freedom. By Kirby Page and Sherwood Eddy. George H. Doran and Company. $1.50.

This freedom which we have today differs unquestionably from the sort prevailing centuries ago, but somehow, after reading a truthful but depressing account of the results of industrial feudalism, machine civilization, and the possibilities of modern warfare, we wonder how the sum totals would compare. Whatever we possess has been well paid for, as the brief biographies of these eight "makers" show. Messrs. Eddy and Page have picked William Lloyd Garrison, Booker T. Washington, Francis of Assisi, Martin Luther, John Wesley, J. Kier Hardie, Susan B. Anthony, and Woodrow Wilson as pioneers in social, religious, and spiritual progress.

A Primer of Medieval Latin. By Charles H. Beeson. Scott, Foresman and Co. $2.

All textbooks ought to be like this one. Prepared by a first-rate scholar in consultation with dozen of others, it presents 113 selections from medieval literature, from Cassiodorus to Roger Bacon, as an introduction to medieval Latin. At the same time it is a small anthology of medieval prose and poetry, valuable to any student of literature or civilization. This fascinating little volume is also a challenge to the classical Latinists. If they can put together as valuable a primer for classical Latin—and given the wealth of materials, why should they not?—students may yet be convinced that they ought to "take" Latin as well as sociology.

The American People: A History. By Thomas Jefferson Wertenbaker. Charles Scribner's Sons. $5.

Professor Wertenbaker thinks that American history, as commonly written, is not interesting, and that it ought to be made so. He has, accordingly, joined the ranks of those who "are making a conscious and determined effort to reinvest the story of America with the charm which naturally and rightfully belongs to it," and who, without sacrificing truth or historical perspective, or committing themselves "to any form of propaganda," have made it their sole desire "to tell the story with as much of the interest and glamor as may be possible to the imagination of the writer." As far as a lively style and a relative wealth of personal or local incidents are elements of success, he has achieved a considerable measure of success with his highly provocative program. To the reader, on the other hand, who cares more for a well-balanced summary of events or movements most worth knowing than for incidents or episodes which "the manner of the novelist" can make vivid or picturesque, the book will prove a disappointment. It is sadly disproportioned, as witness the 365 pages, out of a total of 471 of text, that are given to bringing the narrative down to the end of the Civil War; and what is offered, even in the scanty remainder of space, regarding the past sixty eventful years is the merest sketch. Perhaps there was need of the kind of book that Professor Wertenbaker apparently set out to write, but what he has written fills no gap.

A Voyage to the South Seas in His Majesty's Ship Wager in the Years 1740-1741. By John Bulkeley and John Cummins. With an introduction by Arthur D. Howden Smith. Robert M. McBride and Company. $3.

This is a reproduction, the second in the Argonaut Series edited by Arthur D. Howden Smith, of the narrative of the gunner and carpenter of the Wager, which was lost on an island off the southwest coast of Chile on Anson's famous voyage around the world. Most of the crew, tired of the arrogance and inadequacy of the captain, defied his authority, fitted out the long-boat, and sailed it to Brazil under the leadership of Bulkeley and Cummins, who published their story in 1743 upon getting back to England.

The Book of Troilus and Criseyde. By Geoffrey Chaucer. Edited from all the Known Manuscripts by Robert Kilburn Root. Princeton University Press. $6.

One of the best of all poems is at last given not only a definitive text—one established after long labor by an accredited Chaucer scholar—but an acceptable format. The stranger to Chaucer will be attracted to this large type on these tall pages; the student will have all he wants in the way of introduction, textual notes, explanatory notes, and glossary; and the adventurer in literature will be sent on his way through an intricate masterpiece of psychological narrative. Mr. Root's introduction is least satisfactory in its purely critical portions.

Ocean Tramps. By Themselves. Edited by Edgar Williams. The Norman Remington Company. $2.50.

In 1919 the unsalted and unseasoned United States Shipping Board revived the long obsolete office of supercargo, putting a business representative aboard each of its vessels. The innovation was hotly resented by the regular officers, with whose duties and privileges, to some extent, it interfered, and it was abolished after a couple of years. Some of the appointees, mostly young ex-service men, had the tact to make the best of a bad job; others didn't. Both kinds are revealed in these sketches, written by some thirty of the supercargoes.

The Passaic Textile Strike. By Mary Heaton Vorse. The General Relief Committee of Textile Strikers. $.35.

Here is a splendid account of the historic struggle in Passaic. "This pamphlet," says the author, "aims only to show the workers passing through the many phases of the strike and overcoming the successive difficulties and disappointments standing between them and a final victory."

Book Reviewing. By Wayne Gard. (Borzoi Handbooks of Journalism.) Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

Written "for freelance reviewers and for classes in reviewing," this work will serve its purpose very well among those who do not care to take criticism as seriously as the best reviewers take it. It is in fact a useful compendium of information for the "craft."

International Relations Section

A Forger of Soviet "Documents"

By L. T.

THE case of Serge Drujilovski which was tried in the Supreme Court of the Soviet Union, July 8-11, received only scant attention in the American press, notwithstanding the fact that it contained all the elements of an international sensation involving the American press along with the governments of several European countries.

Drujilovski first came into prominence in the summer of 1925 when he was twice arrested by the Berlin police on charges of forgery. At that time a large number of blanks of the Communist International, various rubber stamps of Soviet institutions, and other tools and materials used in forgeries were discovered in his possession. This discovery confirmed the belief that Drujilovski was one of those engaged in the manufacture of forged Soviet and Communist International documents which have been widely circulated and used as material for anti-Soviet and anti-Communist campaigns in a number of countries. After both his arrests Drujilovski, as was disclosed at the trial, was supported by the Bulgarian Berlin legation which intervened in his behalf. The first time he was under arrest only a few days. After that he was deported from Germany and went to Latvia and Esthonia. In the summer of 1926 he attempted to cross into the Soviet Union but was arrested at the border by the Soviet authorities. An investigation of his activities followed and he was then brought to trial.

Some of the important details of Drujilovski's activities and his trial as recorded in the Moscow press follow.

> The two main points of the indictment were: (1) That after the end of the civil war and the rout of the Judenich army Drujilovski was employed in the second division of the Polish General Staff and was engaged until 1926 as a spy against the Soviet Union. . . (2) That during the year 1925 and part of 1926 he, in executing the requests of agents of the secret-service organs of foreign governments, produced for their use forged documents, allegedly emanating from the Soviet Government and the Communist International, which were to be utilized for the purpose of bringing about rupture of agreements and diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union, and to be the occasion for armed intervention in the internal affairs of the Soviet Union and other hostile acts.

Drujilovski pleaded guilty to both charges and asked for mercy on the ground that he was ignorant of the effects his activities were to produce.

His activities as forger of Soviet documents, as established by his own story and the investigation of the prosecution, began late in 1924 after a variegated career first as officer in the Czar's army, then in the Red army which he deserted in 1919 when he fled to Finland and thence to Esthonia where he joined the anti-Soviet forces under the command of General Judenich, then as journalist working for anti-Soviet publications in Riga and Reval, and as spy and agent of the second (secret) division of the General Staff of the Polish army, later as collaborator in various "press bureaus" furnishing "information" on the Soviet Union. In 1924 he settled in Berlin where were many of his emigre friends engaged in activities designed to discredit the Soviet Government. Among others he worked for Herald Sievert, former officer of the Russian army, who had entered the employ of the German army during the occupation of Riga by the latter. Herald Sievert maintained an information agency in Berlin, known as the "Deutsche Ost Press Bureau" which had been furnishing information on the Soviet Union to a number of foreign governments.

The first forged document manufactured by Drujilovski was the one concerning alleged Soviet and Communist activities in the United States. Drujilovski as that time was in the pay of the Polish legation where he worked as a spy on the Soviet Union and on Communist activities, receiving a monthly wage of 300 gold marks. According to Drujilovski, the Berlin representative of the second division of the Polish General Staff, Mr. Pacierkowski, suggested that he get some documents relating to Soviet activities. Drujilovski consulted his friend Gavrilov-Tkachenko who had had experience in the manufacture of various documents in Vienna. Gavrilov furnished him with a blank letterhead on which was the printed emblem of the USSR. Drujilovski used the letterhead to produce a document purporting to be "Instructions on the Order of Elections to the Executive Committee of the Communist International in the United States of America." The "instructions" were signed by the names "Kolarov" and "Stuart" and they contained references to sums of money allegedly advanced by the Communist International at Moscow for the activities of the Workers' (Communist) Party in the United States. According to this document "Comrade Rutberg" received from Moscow $40,000 at one time and the Worker's Party was to receive in further payments $25,000 a month to carry on its activities.

At the suggestion of Pacierkowski, Drujilovski took the document to the American consulate in Berlin. Here he got in touch with the Berlin correspondent of the Chicago Tribune who, he thought, was likely to be interested in a document of this sort. Mr. Seldes of the Chicago Tribune found the document interesting and instructive, but he pointed out that the name of the secretary of the Worker's Party was Ruthenberg and not "Rutberg" as it was spelled in the document. Drujilovski, however, easily overcame this difficulty by producing another document, this time on a letterhead of the Berlin office of the Moscow Izvestia which he obtained from the manager of a private detective bureau, A. P. Konrad. This new document purported to confirm that the money for Communist activities in the United States was being forwarded by the Communist International to the address of "Rutberg-Ruthenberg." As a further explanation Drujilovski printed at the bottom of the document the information that the Berlin office of the Izvestia was a branch of the executive committee of the Communist International. Mr. Seldes cabled the documents to the Chicago Tribune and the New York Times where they were prominently published on February 15, 1925. In his explanatory remarks Mr. Seldes declared that he was perfectly satisfied as to the authenticity of these documents.

These and further forgeries of documents relating to alleged activities of Soviet agents in the United States and other countries proved a great success, and were much in demand by official and press agencies of the various countries. Drujilovski organized his business on a large scale and he had even had an advertisement running in the Russian emigre journal Rul in Berlin. The advertisement read as follows:

> Russian Information Agency "Russino," Ansbacherstrasse 8-9, Gartenhaus, Greistock. Registered by the German authorities. Accepts orders for information on the activities of the Comintern all over the world [literal translation: on a world-wide scale]. Correspondence and information on the state of affairs in Russia. Correspondents wanted. Remuneration by agreement. Hours: from 5:30 to 7:30 P. M. Director S. M. Drujilovski. Secretary G. P. Kipp.

Beside the "Rutberg-Ruthenberg" document Drujilovski was the author of a number of other documents revealing "subversive activities" of Soviet agents in the United States. Among these was a letter supposedly addressed to the "Plenipotentiary Representative of the Comintern" and containing an expression of the appreciation of the Council of People's Commissars of the activities of said "Plenipotentiary Representative" in the United States. It also contained references to money allegedly sent for these activities, it mentioned Senator Borah, and there were references made to poison which was to be used in assassinating "Attorney General Warren," etc. Another document purported to reveal certain transactions of the Communist International in disposing of diamonds in the United States.

However, the chief customer for Drujilovski's documents was the Bulgarian legation at Berlin. According to Drujilovski, he was responsible among others for the following documents:

A letter from the Communist International to the Communist Party of Bulgaria with detailed instructions on the steps to be taken in strengthening the activities of the party; a document purporting to confirm the forwarding of a large sum of money by the Communist International to Pastermagiev; a circular letter of the Communist International ordering a general uprising in Bulgaria to take place on April 16, 1925; an "order" addressed to the "chief of the Balkan Operative center": by this order the Bulgarian Communist Dmitriev was appointed chief of the operative center and M. Krassovski was appointed chief of the General Staff.

These and a number of other documents were used by the Zankov government in connection with the explosion in the Cathedral at Sophia which occurred on April 15, 1925, to lay the blame for the explosion on Moscow and to justify the reign of terror which followed and during which the Communist Party and most of the radical peasant leaders were virtually annihilated. These documents were also used by the Zankov Government in pleading before the Council of Ambassadors for permission to increase the Bulgarian army from 33,000 to 40,000, and on the strength of these documents this increase was allowed.

According to Drujilovski, negotiations over the manufacture and sale of the incriminating documents were conducted on behalf of the Bulgarian legation by a man who introduced himself as Angelov but who later turned out to be the Bulgarian minister, Popov, himself. Angelov-Popov suggested the nature of the documents desired and Drujilovski did the rest. The most significant of these documents was the one containing the alleged order of the Communist International for a violent uprising to take place on April 16, 1925. This document was subsequently given the widest publicity in the press all over the world.

WORLD-FAMOUS WRITERS PRAISE BEST SELLING NOVEL IN AMERICA*

OIL!

By

UPTON SINCLAIR

JOHAN BOJER:
"This novel is created by a great poet, a great artist, and a great heart. Since Emile Zola I can't remember a similar work."

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD:
"One of the most remarkable books that I have ever perused and one of the most readable."

WILLIAM McFEE:
"Story-telling with an edge on it. A marvelous panorama of Southern California life."

FLOYD DELL:
"Tremendously absorbing. I love the book for all the richness of life that has gone into it, the immense range of its interest, the eagle-swooping vistas of American life."

WILLIAM ELLERY LEONARD:
"Great fiction and great thinking. It has vision and power."

MAY SINCLAIR:
"It is a very fine novel. A good big Theme, splendidly treated."

CLARENCE DARROW:
"Few novels have impressed me as much as 'Oil!'"

HAVELOCK ELLIS:
"I place this book higher than any earlier novel of yours both as regards maturity of outlook and artistic grasp of varied aspects of life."

JOHN MASEFIELD:
"I read 'Oil!' with interest and pleasure."

ARTHUR CONAN DOYLE:
"I was amazed at the power of the book."

*First on the list of one leading wholesale distributor. Second on the list of the other. At all bookstores, $2.50

ALBERT & CHARLES BONI : NEW YORK CITY

SCHOOLS IN FRANCE

Château-Neuvic School

A Church School for American Boys preparing for American Colleges.
Wholesome country life organized in a historic feudal castle.
American standards of hygiene and diet; yearly tuition $1,200.
Full sports program, including crew.
The Rt. Rev. Charles H. Brent, Bishop of American Churches in Europe, Chairman of Board of Trustees.
Address: Dr. Conrad Chapman, Head Master, Chateau-Neuvic, Neuvic-sur-l'Isle, Dordogne, France

BOOKS

THE EVOLUTION OF MAN, by Wilhelm Boelsche

A clear, strong, simple summary not only of Darwin's theory but of the work of a generation of scientists along the lines Darwin opened up. Just what a busy man wants to give him a bird's-eye view of Evolution. Cloth, illustrated, 60 cents by mail. Catalog free.

Charles H. Kerr & Co., 347 East Ohio St., Chicago, Ill.

THEATER

Little Theatre

44th Street West of Broadway
Evs. 8:30. Mats. Tues. and Thurs. at 2:30

THE GRAND STREET FOLLIES

more ideas, more fresh satire

Please mention The Nation.

and was accepted as proving beyond further doubt that the Sophia explosion had been directly engineered by the Communist International at Moscow. The document, according to Drujilovski, had been manufactured by him early in March 1925, i.e. before the explosion took place. The coincidence of the date of the explosion with the date set for the uprising in the Drujilovski forgery led the prosecutor at the Moscow trial to express the belief that the explosion was one incident in a chain of provocations carefully prepared by the Bulgarian government with the aim of finding sufficient justification for wiping out the Communist and radical agrarian elements. The prosecutor found further confirmation for this belief in the story told by Drujilovski to the court of a conversation which he had overheard once while in the anteroom of the Bulgarian legation in Berlin. According to this story, the conversation was between the Bulgarian Minister, M. Popov and a man who, he later found out, was the British Colonel Holst who had just arrived from Sophia. Drujilovski heard the voice of M. Popov who asked excitedly: "But how could you admit an explosion, Colonel?"

The prosecutor of the Supreme Court said in summary:

> The inference which is naturally to be drawn from Drujilovski's testimony is that the same hand prepared and executed the explosion in the Sophia Cathedral (apparently there was to be only an attempt at an explosion; the explosion itself was the result of a miscalculation) that directed the manufacture of the forgery concerning the armed uprising in Bulgaria. We know whose hand that was: It was the hand of the Bulgarian Minister, Popov. And this hand was supported and directed by the British Secret Service in the person of Colonel Holst, the same Holst who, according to the evidence disclosed at the trial, had been meeting the Bulgarian Prime-Minister Zankov himself at the secret headquarters in Sophia maintained by an English spy.

It may be noted that the forgeries produced by Drujilovski were on the whole done rather poorly. They revealed the political illiteracy of their author and his utter ignorance of actual relations. They were produced mostly in the style of the sensational detective stories which Drujilovski had been engaged in publishing during the first period of his sojourn in Reval after the defeat suffered by the forces of General Judenich. Drujilovski explained at the trial that this was done by him purposely out of sympathy with the Soviet cause. He believed that because of their ineptitude the forgeries would be easily detected and would fail of their purpose.

Fascist Culture

The article published below was taken from the Liberte, an anti-Fascist paper published in Paris; it appeared on Jun 26, 1927, under the title Cultural Grayness.

> The Rome correspondent of the Echo de Paris has just announced as "a great event of the day" the appearance of a novel by Sibilla Aleramo, adding: "In the grayness of the present output this book shines by its own light." A melancholy fact! The grayness has persisted since the Fascist regime commenced to rage, and it extends to all Italian arts though it has hit literature the hardest.
>
> Fascism has reduced to silence or intimidated our best pens; those to whom it has given courage either write like hacks or are reduced to making themselves Mussolini's bootblacks. The finest example of bootlicking was offered last year by Margherita Sarfatti with the publication of

A Magazine of Prose

IN connection with a course on Style and Form in American Prose by Gorham B. Munson, The New School for Social Research will publish a thirty-two page magazine made up exclusively of prose contributions from the members of the class. The Magazine will be edited and controlled by a member of the class, designated as Fellow Editor, assisted by two or more scholar editors. Those chosen as fellow and scholars will receive free tuition in the course.

A rare opportunity for young writers to gain actual editorial experience.

Applications should be addressed to Alvin Johnson, Director. They should present a record of literary activities. Clippings of published articles are desired.

For further information, write for catalogue to
The New School for Social Research
465 West 23d St., New York City.

Now on Sale

The First Number of

The BOOKMAN

Edited by
BURTON RASCOE

With the September issue, THE BOOKMAN demonstrates how interesting and stimulating a Review of Life and Letters can be made. Here is a new magazine, from cover to cover. Dreiser, Cabell, Upton Sinclair are in it. So are Dorothy Parker, Arthur Maurice, John Farrar. There is the late Keith Preston's last essay—and other contributors, new departments, ingenious features that give The New Bookman a sparkle and a mellowness seldom encountered in such abundance.

50c at your newsdealer

To insure receiving every number of the new Bookman, use the blank below. Important note: The price of The Bookman under this arrangement will be increased on January 1 from $4 to $5. Subscribe now and get the advantage of the old rate.

(N. 8-25)

THE BOOKMAN 452 Fifth Avenue New York City

Please enter my subscription to The Bookman for one year, to start with the September (or October) issue. I enclose $4.00 (money order or check), or, send me bill. (Or $7.00 for the magazine for two years.)

Name .....

Address .....

Canadian postage 50c. a year extra; foreign, $1.00 extra.

"Dux"; for our contemporary literature that was also, alas, an event. But no other book of interest to the booksellers has appeared either before or since.

D'Annunzio is now in his dotage; to amuse himself in the Vittoriale "prison" he has a cannon fired now and then from the ship "Puglia"; and in order to let him have some more rolls of banknotes Mussolini has authorized Gioacchino Forzano to give a performance of the "Figlia di Jorio" at the poet's villa in September, selling tickets at 1,000 lire.

So D'Annunzio can no longer be counted on. Fascism placed considerable hope in Guido da Verona, but he in his "La Lettera alla Sartine d'Italia" has shown such signs of softness that not even the address which he gave, he says, in the name of all Italian writers, in a square of Milan to exalt the book fair, was sufficient to restore him to his former prominence. Other writers are silent. Sem Benelli, after humiliating himself with conciliatory statements to obtain Fascist permission for the performance of his tragedies, has since given nothing to the theatre. Roberto Bracco, persecuted, insulted, wrathful, exasperated, allows his pen to grow rusty. Papini, in order not to get into legal difficulties or compromise himself, remains immersed in aceticism. Only the mediocrities, or sly foxes like Trilussa, pretend to acknowledge Fascism in order to be allowed to live on.

In journalism it is still worse. Not one fascinating writer. Not one dynamic writer on controversial subjects. Not one who shines by his own originality. The Scarfoglios are hunted, the Malagodis are discouraged, the Sacchis outraged! There remained only Giovanni Ansaldo. His articles were a terrible indictment, especially when in the vein of ironical literary ramblings. To silence him the regime first shut him in a cell and then deported him to the islands of despair.

There is the same humiliating catastrophe in all the arts. The genuises, the personalities which were an honor to the country, have either been taken into custody or, if arrived at the extreme limit of decrepitude and imbecility, like Gemito, have sought patronage by some loudly proclaimed act of approval.

The highest positions in connection with the arts have naturally gone to Fascists. The insignificant composer of the music of "Giovinezza" has been catapulted into the position of commissary general for the musical institutes of Piedmont. Another figurehead, whose name is entirely unknown, holds the post of director of the Bologna Ly[illegible], formerly occupied by Martucci.

Conclusion: from the Fascist generations only donkeys issue. Not one poet, novelist, painter, sculptor, comedian, musician or architect. Only nonentities.

And this is self-explanatory. The Fascist regime instills into the boys a passion for arms (formerly the crossbow, now the revolver), rather than a love of books. Youth is becoming pugnacious, instead of studious. Unconsciously [illegible] initiate Mussolini, who once boasted of never having visited a museum.

In former times the schoolmasters explained [illegible] read Manzoni; the professors explained Cesare and Dante. Now the poor schoolboys have read to them, with comments, Mussolini's discourses. That explains everything.

(signed) S.

In preparation

THE MOVEMENT OF WORLD WEALTH

by Scott Nearing

SUMMER PLACES

RIVERLAKE LODGE

A Camp Superb FOR ADULTS

OUTSIDE KINGSTON, N. Y., ON THE HUDSON RIVER AND LAKE ESOPUS

A beautiful place with wonderful views of the Hudson River and mountains, where [illegible] people will meet congenial company. Bathing, Boating, Fishing, Tennis, Hand Ball, Dancing and other amusements. Golf [illegible] Excellent Food. Terms: $[illegible] week-ly, $[illegible] a day. Write for camp booklet.

Special 3-Day Labor Day week-end—$20.

RIVERLAKE LODGE

70 West [illegible] St. New York City Tel. Longacre 3693.

Ulster Park, Ulster County, N. Y. Tel. Kingston 2810.

HARRY WEINBERGER HARRY KELLY

Directors

TIMBERLAND

IN THE HEART OF THE ADIRONDACKS

The Camp Purposely Limited to a Congenial Group of 40

Bungalows and Main House modern in every respect. Rate $27 per week.

Excellent facilities and equipment for all camp sports; also golf.

Round Trip Fare to Riverside, N. Y., station, $13.27.

OPEN UNTIL OCTOBER 1st.

N. Y. Office, 55 West 42nd St. Pennsylvania 7663

Mail your reservations to POTTERSVILLE, N. Y.

Lovers of the Out-Of-Doors

A Treat for the Labor Day Week End

THE C. J. I. CAMPS at PORT JERVIS, N. Y.

Swimming, Boating, Canoeing, Fishing, Tennis, Entertainment, Athletic Field Games, Horseback Riding

Wholesome Kosher Food

Conducted by

Central Jewish Institute

CITY OFFICE:—125 East 85th Street

Rates on a non-profit basis For the Labor Day Week End $12

Phone Now! For information and reservations, Butterfield 2956

MISCELLANEOUS

REAL HARRIS HOMESPUNS Direct from the Makers at Manufacturer's Price

Suit Lengths Cut to Order. Postage Paid

NEWALL, 150 Stornoway, Scotland. Write for patterns stating shades desired

Your Fall Problems

If you want to rent a house or an apartment for the coming winter, or if you have one to rent—or sell, advertise in the classified section of The Nation, read by desirable landlords and tenants. Rates on application. Special three-time rate. Dept. Y. W. P., The Nation

Do you want to make extra money?

Address Dept. 11

The Nation

20 Vesey Street New York

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXV NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 1927 No. 3244

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 217

EDITORIALS:

Sacco-Vanzetti—Next Steps 220

Mr. Gary and His Times 221

William Blake, 1827-1927 221

A New Labor Library 222

A CARTOON by Boardman Robinson 223

THE REAL AMERICAN LEGION. By Sylvanus Cook 224

BIG BUSINESS IS VERY HAPPY. By Percy Musgrave 225

IN A BOSTON INSANE ASYLUM. By Powers Hapgood 226

MASSACHUSETTS—WHERE DOES SHE STAND? Letters from Our Readers 227

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 229

CORRESPONDENCE 229

BOOKS:

Poems. By Louise Bogan 230

The British and American Tariff. By William MacDonald 230

The Biography of Buddha. By William Norman Brown 230

Really a Novel. By Johan Smertenko 231

Mumbo-Jumbo. By Irwin Edman 232

The "Makings" of Michael Collins. By Norah Meade 232

Books in Brief 233

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

The Movement of World Wealth. By Scott Nearing 234

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor Literary Editor

FREDA KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

THE NATION TAKES PLEASURE in announcing the appointment to its staff of Heywood Broun as contributing editor. He will write for every issue a page entitled "It Seems to Heywood Broun." In appointing him The Nation has assured to Mr. Broun complete freedom of utterance whether his opinions do or do not agree with those of its editorial pages. His first article will appear in an early issue.

NOW THAT THE POLITICIANS have decided that "I do not choose" means I will not, everybody is trying to find out upon whom the robes of royalty will fall. There are wiseacres who insist that months ago the President picked Charles E. Hughes and that Wall Street, more than satisfied with the choice, is not disturbed by the fact that Mr. Hughes is sixty-five years old. There is another school that is for Mr. Hoover, and there is no doubt that Mr. Hoover emphatically belongs to this group. The Presidential bee has never ceased to buzz in his bonnet; he has been watching for a favorable break for eight years, and he will continue to do so as long as there is any chance at all. But there is strong political opposition to him, which is at least partly to his credit, and it is an open secret that interests hostile to him have recently had agents in China investigating Mr. Hoover's early career. We do not believe that anything very damaging to him will be dug up in China, but we do know that there will not be much enthusiasm in the Cabinet for Mr. Hoover. At one time it was reported that no less than six of his colleagues had complained to the President that Mr. Hoover was trying to run their departments besides his own, and it must not be forgotten how emphatically Mr. Coolidge himself denied the report that Mr. Hoover might become Secretary of State. When Mr. Hoover and Mr. Coolidge met recently at Rapid City the newspaper correspondents were amazed at the deliberate coolness shown by the President. It will take a genuine public demand, such as we cannot feel will be forthcoming, to put Mr. Hoover across with the gentlemen who will manipulate the Republican Convention.

SECRETARY KELLOGG has officially placed the blame for the failure of Panama to ratify the new treaty between the United States and that country. To our intense surprise it seems that it was western Europe and not Russia that kept the Panama Congress from approving this treaty "of alliance and friendship" under which Panama would automatically have to go to war whenever the United States became involved in hostilities. We were willing to bet our best hat that when Mr. Kellogg's explanation appeared it would prove the Bolsheviks guilty. It was a good bet because, so far as we can recall, this is the only time that Moscow has not been accused of blocking the Secretary's plans when they went awry. But it was the European press this time which was so unkind as to point out that the proposed treaty robbed Panama of the last vestige of her independence and was in conflict with Article 12 of the Covenant of the League of Nations. Mr. Kellogg knows better and does not hesitate to say so, but the Panamanians have clearly shown their intellectual inferiority by refusing to take the Secretary's word for it and by declining to start fresh negotiations in spite of strong hints that it would be wise for them to do so. Let them take warning by Haiti. There the marines adjourned the parliament by force when it refused to do General Smedley Butler's bidding. And as we created the Republic of Panama by a revolution cooked up in the State Department, it would, of course, be easy to start another. Meanwhile, we have an easier suggestion for Mr. Kellogg. His chief, President Coolidge, last spring ordered the American press to cease from criticism of his foreign policy. Let him now go a step further and notify the European press that it is forbidden to speak other than favorably of anything Mr. Kellogg does in the Caribbean under penalty of being adjudged guilty of violating the Monroe Doctrine.

IT IS A FAR CRY from the days of 1914 when England reached out a hand over Turkey's head and drew Egypt into the "protection" of the British fist. Egypt protested then, and continued to protest at regular intervals until the day the British Protectorate was abandoned, beginning with a formal list of proposals presented two days after the signing of the armistice in 1918. And in every one of these periodical jerks against the British rein, Zaghlul Pasha, once Egyptian Prime Minister, was the guiding spirit. Now Zaghlul is dead and his death leaves a gap that will not be easily filled. King Fuad is a figure-head; Zaghlul was not only the leader of his party, the first and fiercest champion of Egyptian independence, but the acknowledged strong man of the country as a whole. His resignation as Premier came after the intemperate demands of Great Britain made on Egypt when Sir Lee Stack was assassinated. But if he was not in office, Zaghlul was in power. His nephew, now Minister of Agriculture, is thought to be a possible choice for leader of the Wafd Party, but it is not likely that he will measure up to his uncle. It is by no means impossible that the Wafd will disappear as it is now constituted, and Egypt's nationalists arise later in some other form.

THE LONG ARM OF MUSSOLINI reaches across oceans and around the corners of mountains; if you are sitting on the top of Mt. Everest, comfortably libelling the Fascist Government and all its works, beware! If you are engaged while secluded in the recesses of India, your mother country, in manufacturing a bomb to blow up your brother-in-law, who happens to be an Italian—but all this is confused and doubtless hypothetical. The point is that Mussolini has drafted a new code of laws, among the extraordinary provisions of which is the following (italics ours):

> Article 6. Any citizen or foreigner who commits on foreign territory one of the following lists of crimes is punishable according to the Italian law: First, crimes against the personality of the state; second, crime in counterfeiting the seal of the state; third, the falsification of money legally used in the territory of the state or any stamp of Italian public credit; fourth, crimes committed with explosives or materials which produce blindness or asphyxiating gases against Italian citizens; fifth, crimes against individual Italian persons; . . . eighth, every other crime committed on foreign territory by a citizen or a foreigner wherefore special dispositions of the law or international convention have been established in applicability of the Italian penal law.

Penalties for these offenses range from confiscation of all property and imprisonment for one year to life imprisonment and death. How the Fascist Government proposes to enforce these drastic provisions remains to be seen; it would seem that a more than human eye might be required, a longer than human arm, a super-human wisdom and strength. More than once words have been uttered by Italy's premier which indicated that he possessed something of the sort. This is to be the acid test.

THE CRUSADE in the South against mob lawlessness continues, a court in Georgia having just sentenced Raymond Lee to three to five years in prison for taking part in the beating of H. M. Flanders, editor of the Superior News. Lee has moved for a new trial and is at liberty under a $3,000 bond. Meanwhile the Ku Klux Klan, whose members are believed to be the instigators of most of this lawlessness, is trying to strike back. In Alabama, where as noted in our issue of August 24 (page 178) a number of newspapers have been spurring public officials to prosecute floggers, an attempt is on foot to stifle criticism. The judicial committee of the House has reported favorably a bill which gives any city or incorporated town, any county, or the State itself, the power to prosecute any newspaper in which "libelous matter" is published against such locality. The newspaper may be prosecuted in any county in the State in which it circulates and it may be fined up to $25,000 or condemned to pay damages by a jury, the amount of which no other court "shall have any authority to mitigate or reduce." The proposed law is made retroactive for a period of one year. The bill failed to come to a vote in the session of the legislature which has just adjourned, but it is thought that it will be pressed at the next opportunity if the bitterness between the Klan and its opponents continues.

SOMETHING OF THE CHARACTER of the fight and the conditions which form its background is evident from the report of a special grand jury just made in Wedowee, Randolph County:

> The grand jury has diligently, deeply and earnestly investigated the alleged kidnapping and flogging of citizens of this county. The investigation reveals most intolerable conditions. Evidence developed disclosed that seventeen persons have been whipped.
>
> In each case the victims of these criminal activities have been whipped in the late hours of the night by organized mobs of men wearing white robes and white masks over their faces, who travelled in automobiles with tags covered. Most of them were lashed on the naked skin with instruments of torture that in some cases left wounds, scars and bruises that the victims will apparently carry through life.
>
> It is the unanimous conclusion of the grand jury that the kidnapping and lashing of these victims has been done by lawless members of an organization known and called Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, who have bound themselves to secrecy with reference thereto.

The grand jury recommended that the legislature pass laws against the wearing of masks and the concealment of automobile license tags on the public highways.

NOT ONLY IN BOSTON but elsewhere, with less excuse, law and decency were trampled upon in the hysteria preceding the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti. According to a United Press dispatch, Mrs. Lenora H. Jones, a fifty-nine-year-old Quaker, lost her job as a tourist guide in the Capitol at Washington because she was so agitated over what she conceived to be the injustice of the proceeding that she couldn't keep still about it. "She has been indefinitely suspended," said J. J. McGrain, Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, "because she talked too much. We did not think she should be filling tourists with Sacco-Vanzetti talk while we have to place extra guards on the Capitol to prevent radical demonstration." Mrs. Jones said:

> I do not know Sacco and Vanzetti, but all my life I have worked in the interests of peace. I saw in the execution of these men a great possible harm to the United States because of the belief that these men are not guilty. I want to prevent the international hate which carrying out of this sentence would create. If my little life could prevent the harm that might come from such a wave of hatred I would gladly go to the electric chair in the place of Sacco and Vanzetti.

IN NEW YORK CITY Magistrate Ewald sent to the workhouse for sixty days a man who was arrested while distributing Sacco-Vanzetti circulars in front of the court building. According to press accounts the magistrate said:

> There is too much of this going on in New York. There is no room for you Reds here. The time is here when the laws must be obeyed, and I'm going to do my part to see that they are. I am only sorry that I cannot give you more time, but I understand the workhouse is congested.

It is no crime in New York to be a Red—whatever that is. There is a city ordinance—intended to prevent litter—against distributing circulars in the street, but it is never enforced unless as a subterfuge for some other reason. In another court Magistrate Simpson fined a man $5 for displaying signs from his automobile expressive of sympathy with Sacco and Vanzetti and thus, it was alleged, obstructing traffic. There may have been some unreported circumstances in these cases justifying the action taken, but as recorded in the press both magistrates seem to have resorted to laws designed for another purpose in order to suppress legitimate personal expression, thus holding up the courts before the public not to honor but to contempt.

WHEN THE HISTORY of public sentiment in regard to Sacco and Vanzetti in Massachusetts is written much will have to be attributed to the poltroonery of the Boston newspapers, with the booby prize going to the Herald. For a time that journal made a forthright demand for a retrial of the case, and the writer of a plea for such a course was awarded the Pulitzer prize for the best editorial of last year. But pressure from Big Business and Back Bay led to a face-about, and the depth of pusillanimity was attained in an editorial after the execution entitled "Back to Normalcy":

> The asperities which have attended the Sacco-Vanzetti case in its long and tedious journey through the courts are greatly to be regretted, and should be forgotten as promptly as possible. Let us get back to business and to the ordinary concerns of life, in the confident belief that the agencies of law have performed their duties with fairness as well as justice. We hope that the large number of our readers whose letters we have been unable to print—letters that we now find it too late to print—will recognize that what we have printed have been representative of the two sides of the case, and so have been as liberal to one view as to the other.
>
> It has been a famous case. It has attracted the attention of the world to an extent quite without recent precedent. It has presented phases which no serious student of our public affairs could fail to regret. But the time for all such discussion is over. The chapter is closed. The die is cast. The arrow has flown. Now let us go forward to the duties and responsibilities of the common day with a renewed determination to maintain our present system of government and our existing social order.

The italics in which the last four words are printed are ours.

TO ELIZABETH GLENDOWER EVANS of Boston, and her noble associates in the fight to save Sacco and Vanzetti go our deepest sympathy and our profound admiration. We do not know of anything finer than their gallant fight against public opinion on behalf of these two despised foreign anarchists. No sacrifice has been too great for Mrs. Evans to make, and to the end she kept her spirit serene. That the world today must seem to her a very dark and hopeless place there can be little doubt. But she and those who fought with her must console themselves with the knowledge that they have the gratitude of all the people of generous and humanitarian minds who are determined to fight for justice in America no matter how often defeated. She and her co-workers were the ones who stood for the good name of Massachusetts and her judiciary, and their gallantry and self-sacrifice will be held in grateful memory as long as those who fought with them survive. We must also commemorate the superb services of Professor Felix Frankfurter of Harvard, who threw himself into the fight for Sacco and Vanzetti without a thought as to the cost, and without seeking the slightest recompense. Yet the old lie that he has been a paid attorney came right out of the State House during the last few days of the fight. The Governor knows better; at least the facts were put in his hands months ago. But the lie is still current. Mr. Frankfurter was not asked by the Governor or Mr. Lowell for his facts or his opinions, and he has been the target of the bitterest abuse. That this is what historically happens to a Harvard professor who espouses an unpopular cause is witnessed by the case of Professor Charles Follen, who lost his professorship because of his espousal of the abolition of Negro slavery—and the name of Wendell Phillips, the greatest orator of his day, appears on the list of Harvard graduates without a distinction from his recreant Alma Mater. Yet it is the Frankfurters and Follens that keep the best that is in Harvard alive.

WHEN ANNA WAS FIVE months old her mother gave her away to John Odams, colored. Anna, twelve now, has lived with the Odams family ever since. The other day, in Milwaukee, where she lives, the police picked her up while she was following a carnival company along the street. Then it was discovered that Anna was—white! In her short life Anna has learned to despise white people. She says they're mean. "I'm a colored girl," she insisted, "and I'll always be a colored girl." Her colored foster father wants to keep her and she wants to stay. But the city officials, realizing at once their great and solemn duty, performed it. Promptly and courageously they removed this dangerous menace to the color line—removed her to the Home for Dependent Children "pending investigation of the ability of the Odams family to care for her." (They have supported her for twelve years.) It is confidently expected that within a year, with the proper training, Anna will become a normal, healthy white girl, with all the normal, healthy prejudices that are her inalienable birthright.

JOHN ST. LOE STRACHEY was a fine type of the conservative British editor, the exact opposite in his views of the world from the lamented H. W. Massingham who for so long made the London Nation one of the greatest liberal publications. Mr. Strachey, whose death has just been reported, kept the London Spectator to a very high standard both in its book reviews and its editorials; in consequence it achieved the largest following of any British journal of its type. One thing ought always to be remembered about Mr. Strachey besides his learning and geniality; he was a warm and devoted friend of the United States and labored unceasingly for that friendship between the two countries which has just been put in jeopardy by stupid admirals at the disarmament parley at Geneva. Since Mr. Strachey retired several years ago from the active direction of the Spectator his death will not affect that historic paper. It is striking evidence, however, of the passing of that England for which Strachey labored all his life that a gifted daughter and son of this conservative imperialist editor are Socialists playing an earnest part in the development of the British Labor Party.

Sacco-Vanzetti—Next Steps

WE are glad to record that a new Sacco-Vanzetti committee on a national basis is in process of organization to clear up the record in the case and deal fittingly with the memory of the two men whose guilt many believe was not established beyond the reasonable doubt which, according to the law, required an acquittal. To establish the innocence of these men may be an impossible undertaking, but it is worth devoted and long-continued effort.

In the meanwhile it is not impossible to clarify and set forth the record, and that is one of the immediate tasks before the new Sacco-Vanzetti organization. A detailed and scientific analysis of the Lowell report ought to be made by men whose names will carry weight. It was this report which swung the scales against the prisoners, and there is a great deal about it which remains provocative and unexplained both in the text and in the manner in which the inquiry was conducted. The Governor and his advisors did not content themselves with examining the court records in the case, as most persons supposed they would do. They reexamined the original witnesses and called new ones without the safeguards of legal procedure. The new witnesses apparently were an influence in leading to the committee's decision, and yet it held that this fresh testimony was not of enough importance to warrant another trial. It is an open secret that there are a number of federal judges who question the whole procedure. The custom of their profession made it impossible for them to speak out before the execution; it would be an honor to their calling if they would now join in an impartial study of the facts.

How did it happen, we should like to ask here, that although President Lowell was named first in the appointment of the committee, and was therefore assumed to be its chairman—how did it happen that Robert Grant was the first signer of the report and so presumably the man who drafted it? Mr. Grant was one member of the committee who from the outset was recognized as reactionary in his political and industrial views.

So far as the files of the Department of Justice are concerned, we believe there is not one chance in a thousand that they contain anything which establishes the innocence of Sacco or Vanzetti. Probably, though, they contain considerable extra evidence in regard to the terroristic methods of Mr. Palmer's "red raids" of 1920-1921, certain major aspects of which were halted by the federal courts at the time as illegal, while the whole proceeding was investigated later by a committee of nationally distinguished lawyers and condemned in the strongest language. That the "red raids," as well as numerous bandit activities in Massachusetts in 1920-1921, established a sentiment of fear and hate in the community which must have been prejudicial—however unconsciously—to Sacco and Vanzetti is too obvious to disinterested persons to require emphasis. In their declaration to the contrary Governor Fuller and the Lowell committee have merely confessed themselves to be still in the grip of that prejudice. From the standpoint of the nation at large, even more than from that of the reputations of Sacco and Vanzetti, we think the material in the archives of the Department of Justice ought to be made the subject of a Congressional investigation.

Beyond these things a record of the case from the point of view of the protestants should carefully be made. This should include a study of the psychology of the State of Massachusetts. That State thought it necessary to arrest and inquire into the sanity of Powers Hapgood (as he describes on another page). Perhaps it is time now that somebody inquired into the sanity of Massachusetts. Especially important is the attitude and influence of the Boston newspapers. Since the prostitution of the Pittsburgh press during the coal strike of 1919 we do not recall any episode in recent times so dishonoring to journalism. The action of the Boston Herald (set forth in an editorial paragraph on the preceding page) was especially discreditable. In contrast we are glad to point to the tolerant and intelligent attitude of the best newspapers of New York City along with such journals as the Pittsburgh Press, the Waterbury (Connecticut) Republican and American, the Springfield Republican, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, the Milwaukee Leader, and the Baltimore Sun. There ought to be an investigation also of the tip given from the State House in Boston early in August that the Governor would not send Sacco and Vanzetti to the chair, in regard to which the testimony of the staff correspondents in Boston at the time of the New York Times, New York Herald Tribune, and New York World would be valuable.

The suppression in Boston of constitutional guaranties in regard to the right of individual persons to carry placards in the streets ought to be taken, if need be, to the highest courts.

Nor must the more personal side be forgotten. There should be adequate provision for the support of Mrs. Sacco and the education of the children, while another fund might be raised for some fitting memorial to the two dead Italians. It is to be hoped that this will take some unique and creative form—possibly a scholarship or prize in a labor college. (Or the endowment of a chair of equity in Harvard University.) One contribution toward keeping alive the memories and worth of the two men occurs to us at once. We would suggest the publication of a selection of the letters and speeches of Vanzetti and Sacco. In no other way can the character and courage of the men be so well preserved for posterity. This volume ought to be a pamphlet, or at least to be accompanied by a paper edition in order that wide distribution be obtained by means of a low price. Possibly also a pamphlet might be compiled of articles and editorials on the case since its beginning.

Finally, we would direct attention to two lines of constructive effort of a sort that would better be undertaken under wider auspices than that of any Sacco-Vanzetti organization. The first is a movement for the reform of the Massachusetts judicial procedure, bringing it in line with that of New York and other States, so that the judge at the original trial may not remain as the sole arbiter of whether that proceeding was a fair one from the standpoint of the defendants. Such a reform would best be initiated, we think, by the bar of Massachusetts. Another impressive opportunity for constructive effort lies in a general campaign for the abolition of capital punishment, the barbarism and unreason of which the Sacco-Vanzetti case has strongly emphasized. To this we shall return at greater length in a forthcoming issue.

Mr. Gary and His Times

THOSE dailies who make a practice of worshipping the rich and prosperous have been, it strikes us, a bit labored in their eulogies of the late Elbert H. Gary. They stressed, of course, his rise from a poor boy to the head of our greatest trust; it is the usual heroic picture which is held up to us all as final proof that every American child carries in his knapsack the baton of a field marshal of industry—to what higher place in life could one aspire? They have dwelt upon his unfailing optimism, his ability to preserve the peace in the iron and steel industry, and, above all, his ability to keep public and political opinion friendly to his great corporation. But when they have termed him a statesman—Mark Sullivan declares Mr. Gary "deserved more than any other man of his generation to be called a leader in economic statesmanship"—they are quite unable to cite any acts or any teachings which warrant the bestowal of such a title.

It is quite true that he poured oil on the troubled business waters of our country during and after the first years of the present century. It is correct that he claimed to pay higher wages than some union scales. It is also true that he refused to blot out all his business competitors as he could have done and that he modestly contented himself with less than 60 per cent of the industry. It is also unquestionably true that he could have gouged the public by charging more for his products than he did. But one may still be allowed to ask whether such self-restraint as the last two assertions indicate was really statesmanship or merely the result of a deliberate intention not to come into conflict with the government and invite further public hostility.

As for Mr. Gary's kindly treatment of labor, in defense of which that amazing writer, Ida Tarbell, is once more cited in his behalf, why, he fought unions to the last, fomented those hermaphrodite affairs, company unions, where he could, and beneficently bestowed bread and circuses in the shape of welfare work, the right to buy stock, hospitals, etc., etc. But Mr. Sullivan, like the other adulators, fails to recall how long our greatest economic statesman persisted in the twelve-hour day and the seven-day week and how often he is on record as declaring that the trust could not survive without them. It was public opinion, unceasing press attacks, and, finally, a direct onslaught by the conscience of the churches which compelled him to change his opinion. Perhaps that is his surest claim to statesmanship—he yielded to the larger battalions, like most political statesmen, even after he had conquered the bitter strike of his ungrateful laborers in 1919 when they tried their best to achieve a position where they could have some say as to their labor, their hours, and their wages. It is well, indeed, to throw the curtain of forgetfulness over these things and then to cite Miss Tarbell's rare conviction that Mr. Gary "introduced a new code of business ethics . . . he was a very good friend of labor. He kept wages high. He instituted one of the best plans for employee ownership that there is in the country. The United States Steel Corporation built good industrial villages." Why disturb those who do not know that there is such a thing as democracy in industry, or that industrial paternalism is not a virtue but a survival?

It is much, much better to fall back on the different status of the steel corporation before the public. But here we are confronted by the fact that the change in its position is no different from that of all others, no more remarkable than that of the Standard Oil, for example. The muckraking period has passed—not because of the wonderful powers of exorcism of Mr. Gary but because of political and economic changes in considerable measure due to the World War. That was a life-saver for the trusts, and we are quite willing to admit that Mr. Gary and other statesmen of industry realized its possibilities. They were no more pleased with Woodrow Wilson, author of "The New Freedom," in the Presidency, who refused to receive Mr. Gary or any other business chief in the White House and demanded that there be a new revolution in America, than they had been with Mr. Roosevelt. But the war came and went, absorbed and then smashed Mr. Wilson, and all interest in the crusade against big business vanished—big business itself was then in the saddle. Since then it has chosen two Presidents and elected them. Aided by unprecedented prosperity it has drugged the public and by means of stock-selling in small quantities in all sections, after the manner of the sale of the Liberty Bonds, has rallied to its banner thousands upon thousands who now look upon the trusts not as mulctors or cheats or enemies but as sources of profit.

Mr. Gary profited by his times; he did not mould them, though he made his contribution to their fashioning. But he is bold, indeed, who credits him with a powerful intellect, or great vision, or true economic leadership. We grant that he represented in these latter days the spirit of the hour, precisely as does Mr. Coolidge in the White House. But we deny, in spite of Mr. Sullivan and the big-business press, that the present attitude of the public toward the trusts, and their complete domination of us and our economic and political life, represents an advance for the United States.

William Blake, 1827-1927

ONE of Blake's friends and disciples recorded how, long after the death of his master, he remembered him at an exhibition in the Royal Academy—"Blake in his plain black suit and rather broad-brimmed, but not Quakerish, hat, standing so quietly among all the dressed-up, rustling, swelling people, and myself thinking: 'How little do you know who is among you.'" There is less excuse, now that a hundred years have passed since the great poet and painter died in comparative obscurity, for failing to know who is among us. He always had his admirers; his last years were spent in a house which worshippers called the House of the Interpreter; and the nineteenth century was not without scholars capable of rendering a fair account of the man. But the past thirty years in particular have witnessed a zeal in expounding him and a passion in praising him which might have amazed Blake himself, and which certainly leave it settled that he is a very famous artist whom anyone willing to make the effort may know about. The work of Ellis and Yeats, Sloss and Wallis, Geoffrey Keynes, John Sampson, Darrell Figgis, Laurence Binyon, Paul Berger, and Foster Damon is almost without parallel in the literature of its kind. Few authors guilty of words as wild as Blake's have been paid the compliment of a disciplined search through all these words for meaning and cross-meaning.

That Blake is still difficult or impossible to understand is no fault of his interpreters, who from Yeats to Damon have labored lovingly with his symbols in an attempt to make his sentences cohere. The difficulty is in Blake himself, who after thirty fed his imagination wholly upon apocalyptic writing and who, in a desire to achieve one more apocalypse which should outblaze its predecessors, wandered into a symbolism and a nomenclature so strange that only the initiate now can read him with continuous pleasure. The prophetic books are gorgeous and impressive, and lines of a demoniac beauty gleam here and there as one goes through them; but it is doubtful whether any but a member of the cult will ever care very much what states of mind were represented by Beulah, Albion, Tiriel, Myratana, Heuxos, Yuva, Hela, Ijim, Mnetha, Heva, Oothoon, Theotormon, Enitharmon, Los, Orc, and Har—to name only a few of Blake's metaphysical creatures.

He undoubtedly had his own wonderful way of seeing the universe, and one may well believe that there was no simpler way than he found of communicating the vision. One can only regret that the vision grew less and less simple as Blake advanced in years, and that a certain fiery contempt for the commonplace, combined with an imperfect education, prevented him from trusting the language that is spoken by men. He saw God when he was four years old; while still a child he met the prophet Ezekiel under a tree; his father came near whipping him for saying that he had seen a tree filled with angels; and he witnessed a procession of angelic forms among the haymakers one fine summer morning. We like to believe this, and can manage to do so. The trouble with the prophetic books is that we do not know what they are calling upon us to believe.

With so much said for his obscurity, it remains to be said that Blake is one of the precious spirits whom we could not do without. It is doubtful if there was ever an illustrator equal to this illustrator of Virgil, Dante, Chaucer, Job, and his own books. His paintings and engravings are among the weird miracles of the earth; and one of the reasons is given by Blake himself in a note on his rendering of Gray's poem "The Bard": "A spirit and a vision are not, as modern philosophy supposes, a cloudy vapor or a nothing; they are organized and minutely articulated beyond all that the mortal and perishing eye can produce. He who does not imagine in stronger and better lineaments, and in stronger and better light, than his perishing and mortal eye can see, does not imagine at all." If his elaborated doctrines are often obscure and wearisome, his instinctive ideas are as bright as the words he finds for them, and valuable beyond the power of criticism to explain. He was romantic, of course, to the core. He hated imitation, discipline, prudence ("a rich, ugly old maid courted by incapacity"), order, and reason. And he was such a Christian as could say: "No virtue can exist without breaking the ten commandments. Jesus was all virtue, and acted from impulse, not from rules." He was the most extravagantly romantic man conceivable; and as such has his value. Finally, the author of "Tiger, Tiger," "A Poison Tree," "The Sick Rose," "All Solemnity," and "Piping down the valleys wild" was a lyric poet of a unique and lovely order.

> He who binds to himself a Joy
> Does the winged life destroy;
> But he who kisses the Joy as it flies
> Lives in Eternity's sunrise.

A New Labor Library

A LABOR library of national importance, built along somewhat different lines from the collection at the University of Wisconsin, is being created at the University of Michigan. The nucleus of the collection at the University of Michigan was given by Joseph Labadie, veteran Detroit trade unionist and anarchist. He was the first president of the Michigan Federation of Labor, organized in 1888, and was also the first Detroit organizer of the Knights of Labor. Labadie, a printer by trade, is now seventy-seven years old and no longer works in a printing shop. But he maintains his old contacts with the labor movement and is justifiably proud to have his name given to the labor library at the University of Michigan.

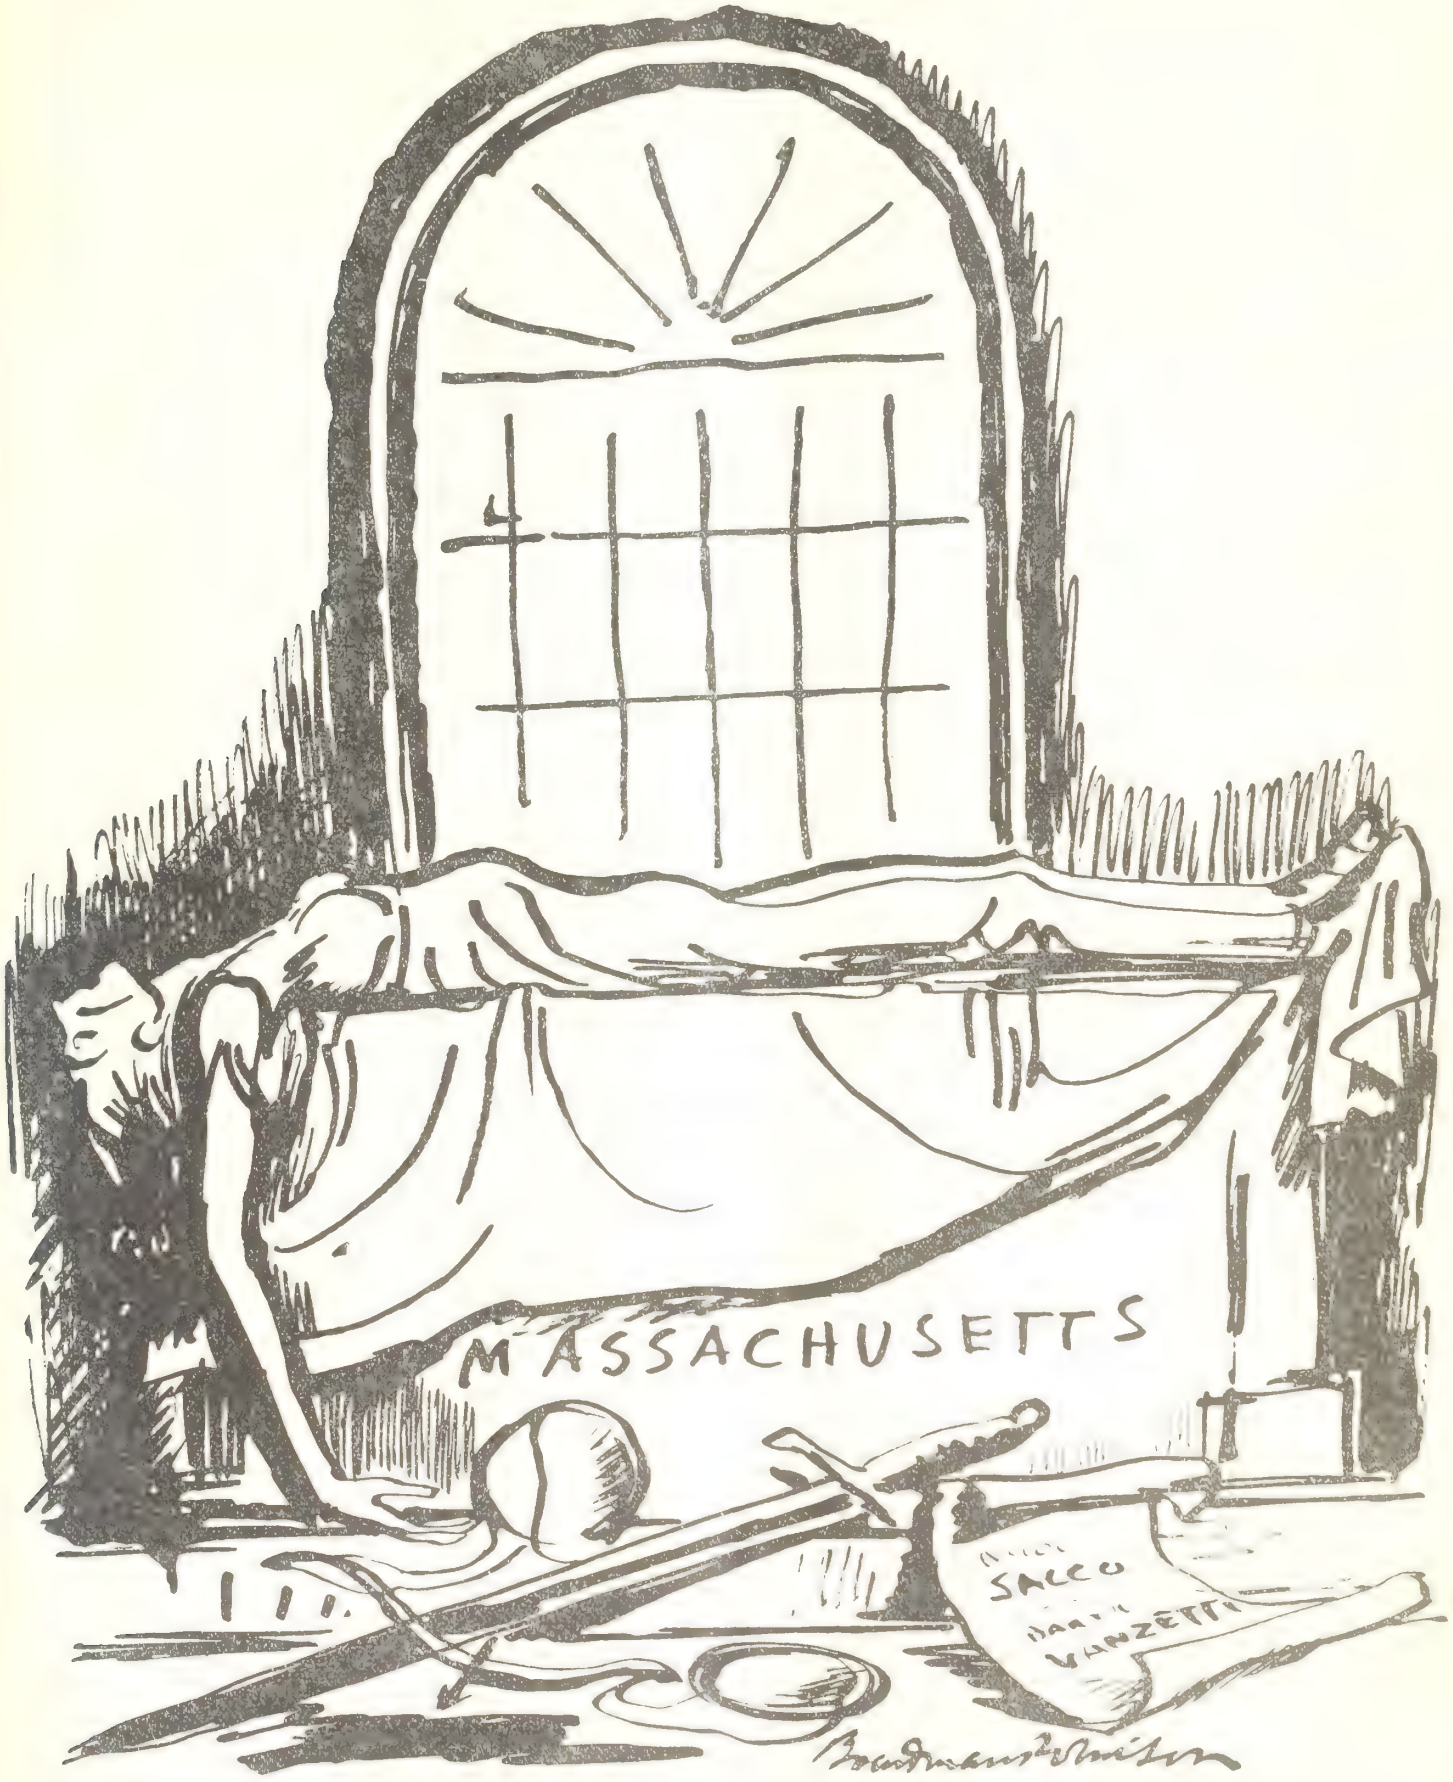
When the university librarian accepted Labadie's collection as a permanent possession of the institution, taking responsibility for its maintenance, it proved a formidable job to move the shelves of pamphlets, newspapers and magazine files, documents bearing on the development of the labor movement locally and nationally, clippings and books. And since that time, through the efforts of Labadie and his friends, bookcases and old trunks in many parts of the country have been ransacked for supplementary material. The collection is particularly strong on the subject of the eight-hour day movement up to the time of the Chicago Haymarket tragedy.

If the labor library at the University of Wisconsin is deficient in material after 1905, the Labadie Collection is not. It contains an abundance of material up to 1921, bearing on the major phases of the labor and liberal movements. It includes, for example, files of Industrial Solidarity, the Detroit Labor News, and the Liberator. A complete file of The Nation is in the library. Although the Detroit Labor News is intended to serve only the Detroit industrial district, it carries the Federated Press and International Labor News services. The Federated Press service is also carried by Industrial Solidarity.

Among the most interesting and valuable of the complete newspaper files in the Labadie Collection is that of the publication known during its strenuous lifetime as John Swinton's Paper. It was published in New York during the most militant days of the eight-hour day struggle, up to the Haymarket affair, but it attempted to cover the nation. For example, an item in the issue of April 15, 1886, announces that the Detroit Free Press has entered into a contract with the Detroit Typographical Union after being for nineteen years an open shop. "We take great pleasure in announcing that the Detroit Free Press is now a union office after having been closed to union printers for nineteen years," the account says. It is signed by the president of the Detroit local and is run under a Detroit date line.

Another account from Michigan tells of conditions in the lumber camps. It is dated Bay City, December 23, 1884. "The mills are all closed," this account says in part. "Firemen and cart drivers are getting $1 a day for twelve hours. Men are asking to be sent to jail."

As the years pass the Labadie Collection will grow larger and more valuable. The housing of the material at the University of Michigan instead of in a workers' school may be regrettable from certain points of view. But it has equally obvious advantages in the circumstances under which the Labadie Collection has been assembled.



MASSACHUSETTS
SACCO
VANZETTI

The Real American Legion

By SYLVANUS COOK

EIGHTEEN thousand American veterans are either on French soil or preparing to set foot there to attend the ninth annual national convention of the American Legion. The number falls far short of the 30,000 "pilgrims" whom the optimists of the organization originally anticipated for the trip, but even so a noteworthy group has responded. That part of the American public which is at all interested in the event is divided into two camps, one of which subscribes to the idea that the expedition is a "sacred pilgrimage" while the other nurses the notion that it is more of an extraterritorial spree entered into by an army of hoodlums. As a matter of fact, its true significance probably lies somewhere in between. To characterize it as a spree is to do gross injustice to hundreds of men who have taken the trip in a serious mood; men whose brothers, either in blood or in spirit, went to death in France and perhaps are now buried in its soil. On the other hand, it should not be supposed that there are no hoodlums among those 18,000 Legionnaires. But it should not be forgotten that a half-dozen hoodlums can bring an atmosphere of carousal to a group of decently behaved men who far outnumber them. Therein lies the misfortune of the American Legion. It is an organization of war veterans which requires no other qualifications for membership than an honorable discharge from military service in the period between the entry of the United States into the World War and the armistice; and as such it is inevitably infested by a crowd of roughnecks and spread-eagle patriots who have brought upon it the charges of rowdyism and chauvinism.

Adverse critics of the Legion are given to generalization. Recently, a ridiculous ass in the War Department assumed Legion authority in an attempt to oust from the school system of Washington a teacher who had written a definition of socialism in a magazine contest; a post in Pennsylvania was misled by a stormy idiot in Philadelphia —not a Legionnaire—to bring charges of sedition against several instructors in the State normal school; an ill-advised commander in Illinois engaged in a tirade against Miss Jane Addams, and the result is a wholesale indictment of the entire organization of 700,000 men by the American Civil Liberties Union and various liberal leaders. Let us put the shoe on the other foot for a moment. On August 5, two New York subway stations were bombed. This was only one of several outrages committed within a few days, supposedly by sympathizers of Sacco and Vanzetti. Does the American Civil Liberties Union or any sane liberal leader suggest that these crimes had the sanction of the many thousands of law-abiding citizens who have raised their voices in protest against Massachusetts justice? The cases are exactly parallel.

I enjoy the peculiar privilege of being in the confidence of both Legion and liberal leaders. I do not find any wide divergence of opinion between them. Almost without exception, the national and State officials of the Legion are liberals themselves. There was almost as much indignation in the Legion over the action of General Fries in attacking Professor Flury as there was among the readers of The Nation. The General has since received a public reprimand. Similar comment may be made on the West Chester Normal dispute, the attack of Commander Watkins on Jane Addams, or any of the other occasional displays of nationalistic bigotry and intolerance which are accredited to the Legion.

It is natural to inquire why the temperate element in the Legion permits itself to be advertised by die-hard extremists of the Fries-Watkins type without objecting. The reason is twofold. First, temperateness is seldom controversial. The temperate Legionnaire may feel totally out of sympathy with an act or pronouncement masquerading under Legion authority, but because he is temperate, he will say nothing about it save to his more intimate associates. Second, absurd as it may seem, the Legion as a whole is rather fearful of its swashbuckling minority. This is particularly true of its officers. Of the eleven or twelve men who hold positions of real responsibility at its national headquarters, seven of them at least—the most responsible seven—are advanced liberals in spirit. If they were to speak their minds, they would undoubtedly be branded as dangerous radicals by the superpatriots both in and out of the organization. Therefore they keep still, for the Legion affords them their bread and butter. The remaining four or five officials are either too colorless to classify, or too weak to voice a private opinion, but not one of them is of the superpatriotic type. From top to bottom, however, they cringe before the potential wrath of the superpatriotic minority, for the minority presents a united front while the temperate or liberal majority, which ought to back them, is no support whatsoever.

The thing for the Legion critic to keep in mind when he opens a broadside on the organization, is that the majority—a very large majority—of the Legion itself is virtually as antagonistic to the evils which he denounces as he is himself. His denunciation is not supported from within the Legion because of the fear of those who would like to support it. Their fear coerces them into neutrality. To charge the present staff of national headquarters with sanctioning any suppression of civil liberty is to speak either from misinformation or from a deliberate desire to falsify the facts. The staff has remained almost intact for the last three years, and what changes have been made in it have not changed its complexion. State headquarters are more changeable, but practically all of them are liberal in tendency. Intolerant nationalism is almost invariably a local phenomenon, and a remarkably infrequent phenomenon, too, when one considers the Legion's vast and heterogeneous membership.

It is impossible to do more than broadly indicate the hundreds of diverse useful activities in which a large proportion of the 11,000 Legion posts are engaged. Eleven thousand posts, and in the course of a year perhaps a half-dozen of them fall under unwise counsel! The report of the American Civil Liberties Union for 1926 records that the Legion post in Atlanta, Georgia, succeeded in cancelling a speaking engagement of Mrs. Lucia Ames Mead. The report for 1927 will doubtless record several similar actions. Will it also record that the Legionnaires of Emporia, Kansas, defended the right of a militant pacifist to speak in their midst? The Emporia incident is not unique, but it gained attention because it was witnessed by a well-known publicist, William Allen White.

The greatest of all the Legion's work has been conducted in behalf of disabled service men. In recent years it has given assistance to more than 35,000 unfortunates. Now it has expanded its work of mercy by establishing a $5,000,000 fund for orphans of men who gave their lives.

Another great work has been its service in time of disaster. During flood or fire, earthquake or tornado, explosion or mine catastrophe, the emergency units of the Legion have swiftly gone into action. When the Mississippi river broke its levees and laid waste the homes of 300,000 persons, the Legion mobilized immediately to support the Red Cross in its relief work. It sent out rescue crews, built rafts, guarded dikes, organized refugee camps, set up field kitchens. Legionnaires worked day and night in every phase of the Herculean task. The American Red Cross considers the Legion its chief aid in every disaster.

Legion posts have established fire departments, ambulance units, hospitals, public libraries, playgrounds, aviation fields, scores of material things of benefit to their communities. Across the entire expanse of the Southern United States from coast to coast, there is an excellent highway which owes its origin and maintenance to the Legion. Legion posts have organized municipal concerts, art exhibitions, harvest festivals, a hundred activities to improve community spirit and to add to the joy of living.

President Harding effusively declared that the destiny of America in the next half century was in the Legion's hands, and added that he thought it was in good hands. Thousands of Legionnaires believe that he spoke the truth. Another legend, which is supposed to have come from the same source, is that the honor of being National Commander of the American Legion is second only to that of being President of the United States.

What is the real American Legion? It is an organization of three-quarters of a million men who had some place in the military forces of the United States during the World War. It is made up of every creed, political and religious, of every type of character and mentality, from every social and occupational plane. It is a cross-section of America. In some communities it has been captured by hoodlums and irresponsibles and in those communities it rightfully holds an unsavory reputation. In other communities it enrolls the best of the citizenry. The Legion is not unaware of its rotten spots. It should cut them out. If a split resulted the Legion which continued would profit greatly even though reduced in numbers, and one wonders if it would not quickly repopulate its ranks with a better class of veterans who now hold aloof from it.

Big Business Is Very Happy

By PERCY MUSGRAVE

BIG business is very happy. It says so, and so there can be no doubt about it. If anybody questions it, let him look at the continued boom in the stock market, the unprecedented speculation which is filling the pockets of bankers, brokers, and the general public in a way to alarm even Wall Street itself. Look at General Motors' earnings; see how well on the whole the Steel Corporation has come through this summer, and read how confident Republican politicians are that agricultural prices will go up this fall.

Yes, our prosperity is at high tide and it has not been affected by the choosing of President Coolidge to get out of the White House while the going is good. Prosperity has risen above its—well, not its creator, but its patron saint and safeguarder in the White House, the President, who, like his predecessor, was sworn to take the government out of business, to break up all relationship between business and government—except when and where business was in trouble and needed to unload upon Uncle Sam. Yes, Big Business says it has been very, very happy. And yet as I have been turning over the pages of the daily newspapers and of a financial news service I have been struck by the number of sweet business bells that somehow are jangling out of tune.

Somehow cogs seem to have slipped in this matter of cutting loose the government from business. What does Mr. Coolidge's Government mean, for example, by letting its Department of Justice institute proceedings against the Standard Oil Company of Indiana and fifty-one other oil companies, charging them with being a monopoly in restraint of trade? Why is it that Mr. Coolidge didn't call off the Federal Trade Commission before it issued an anti-trust order directed against Adolph Zukor, Jesse L. Lasky, and the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation? Was it playing the game to let them be cited for conspiracy to "monopolize or attempting to monopolize the motion picture industry"? Was it playing the game with Big Business for the Department of Justice to bring action against the potash monopoly and the sisal sales trust, to charge them with violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law, and to have the Kodak trust punished by the Supreme Court? Was it according to Hoyle for Mr. Coolidge to allow his Secretary of Labor to make a "socialistic" speech charging that the coal industry is "fifty years behind the times," that it is subject to cut-throat competition that "keeps the country in constant suspense and slows up all the other industries we have"?

And what has Secretary Work meant by choosing one of these happy days to make a speech on the oil industry, declaring that it is in a state of chaos, that the competition which we have hitherto believed to be the life of trade is ruining the industry, that there is a grave overproduction, that the Government is willing to do anything about it—to pass new laws or anything else which the industry may want if the industry will only say what it wants? If this isn't mixing up government and Big Business and encouraging those who want government ownership, what could be? And is it helping to say this just when 200,000 men have been out on a strike since April 1 in the soft coal industry, which none the less has produced 4,500,000 tons above the 1926 mark up to July first? Is it tactful to say this when the president of the Standard Oil and the head of the American Petrolum Institute have both been rushing to Calvin himself to demand that the Government come to the rescue of the chaotic oil industry and control it for the next few years, when other practical oil men have urged a Government czar to do the same thing, when the Seminole Oil Field has been controlled by a czar, R. H. Collins, appointed by the corporations in that field themselves?

Speaking of czars in these happy days, one is struck by the readiness with which our flexible Big Business resorts to this delightful new device—whenever it gets into trouble. Besides the proposed national czar for oil, the great Northwestern railroads have come together and asked for the appointment of a rate czar to demand of the Interstate Commerce Commission a new railway tariff for all their region. This czar business has gone like the craze for overseas flights; it is proposed that there shall be a czar of the building trades and the building industry in New York City and even a czar for the taxi business there.

As for the railroads, in these happy, happy days they are at each other's throats like a pack of wolf-hounds. They are hourly quarreling over the proposed mergers. Every day gives us news about the four-system fight in the East against the five-system, the rows between Loree and the Southwestern railroads, the Commerce Commission's opposition to the proposed New York Central merger with six other lines, the howls from several railroads as to the low valuations of their property as of 1916 by the same Commerce Commission and its attack upon the criminal waste of money through nepotism in the Erie Railroad. Yes, these are very happy days indeed for the railroads. If you don't believe it, look into the Van Sweringen fight for the Chesapeake and Ohio and the other railroads whose merger the Commerce Commission has so far failed to approve.

Yes, these are happy days for us all, especially the farmers, since the Department of Agriculture has announced that there was a decrease of 20 per cent in their net income for the year ending June 30, which gives them a magnificent average income per farm operator of $853 in that year. It is a particularly happy period for the 200,000 coal miners who are out of work and for the cattle men who have come to the President begging for help so they can make a little money through a Government cattle stock-selling bureau—they say they have not made a cent of profit in six years. And the big packers are equally unhappy, and banks are continuing to fail—in Kansas City and Milwaukee two Government joint-stock land banks—and there has been a heavy drop in cotton and the Massachusetts textile industry is down and out; and the big oil-stock bubble in California has burst, revealing the swindling operations of some of the biggest business men in Los Angeles; and the American tariff is getting knocked all over the United States and at every conference at Europe though everybody knows that it is the basis of our prosperity; and the French are putting through a high tariff against us and the Germans are dumping stuff upon us and the European trusts are becoming international—why yes, these are happy days for Big Business. Very, very happy days.

In a Boston Insane Asylum

By POWERS HAPGOOD

Boston, August 24

THE following is an account of the facts leading up to my being imprisoned for twenty-four hours in the Psychopathic Hospital in Boston and what happened while I was there:

On Sunday, August 14, 1927, I attempted to address a mass meeting in Boston Common on the Sacco-Vanzetti case. After speaking about five minutes the police arrested me, broke up the crowd, and took me to the police station. An hour or so later I was bailed out on $50 bail for appearance at court the following day. At the trial I was found guilty of "speaking without a permit" and sentenced to pay a $20 fine. Rather than submit to a verdict of guilty when I felt I was right in speaking, I appealed the case to the superior court in September, announcing as I did so my intention of fighting for free speech.

Five hours later, while I was working in the office of the Sacco-Vanzetti Defense Committee, at 256 Hanover Street, three police officers rearrested me because of the Sunday meeting, this time on a charge of "inciting to riot." My friends bailed me for $500 and the next day at the trial I was found guilty of "inciting to riot" and sentenced to six months in the House of Correction. Arthur Garfield Hays, who defended me, made a splendid fight, bringing out the fact that there was no truth in the arresting officers' testimony that I called to the crowd to rescue me and to "fight the police and that the said Hapgood did unlawfully, riotously, and raucously beat, wound, and ill-treat, and other wrongs to the said McTierman (the sergeant who arrested me and filed the above complaint)."

I appealed from this sentence and am now under $1,000 bail awaiting trial in September on the charge.

Saturday, August 20, I was again arrested, this time in company with about twenty others on a charge of "sauntering and loitering" for picketing the State House. At the trial the following Monday we were given the choice between pleading guilty and paying a fine of $15 for each man and $5 for each woman or pleading not guilty and appealing the case. We were told, however, that if we pleaded not guilty and appealed, an additional charge of "rioting" would be made against us. Four of us, John Dos Passos, Paxton Hibben, George Krasko, and I appealed and are now awaiting trial, the case having been continued until Friday.

Monday afternoon, August 22, I was again arrested for picketing the State House, this time in company with about ten others, including Dos Passos, Edna St. Vincent Millay, Lola Ridge, and Margaret Hatfield. While we were waiting for bail in our cells, three plain clothes men who are members of the State Police force took me out and rushed me, without giving me a chance to tell anyone, into an automobile and drove me to the Psychopathic Hospital. It was not until I was in the office of the hospital that I got a chance to examine the commitment papers; they were signed by Captain Bligh of the State Police, and offered as reason for my commitment the statement that I was in a "state of unusual excitement."

I was then told to undress, take a bath, and get into a bed in the ward which the attendants told me was "the same bed that Sacco had had when he was here four years ago." I insisted that the hospital authorities let me use the telephone to let my friends know where I was, but they refused to allow me to do it or to do it themselves. Fortunately my friends on the outside found out about it and immediately attempted to have me released.

About 10 o'clock that night, just two hours before Sacco and Vanzetti were to die, one of the doctors asked me to come into his office and from then until 11:30 examined my mentality. He asked me how much seven times seven and eight times eight were, to substract seven from one hundred, to repeat in my own words a story he told me. He also wanted to know all the characteristics of my father and mother, their parents, and family. I was also asked whether I thought God asked me to do what I am doing, whether I had received a "call," and when I laughed at that I was asked at length about my social and economic ideas.

At 11:30 I went to bed. I stayed awake until 1 o'clock, asking now and then for news about Sacco and Vanzetti, but I could not get any. At 5 o'clock they woke me out of a sound sleep and then I could not get to sleep again. With me in the ward were seven or eight patients, most of them out of their minds but not very noisy.

After breakfast I was called into the office again and given another complete physical and mental examination. In addition to the usual eye, heart, and lung tests, the doctors scratched my chest with a needle to see if I gave a normal reaction, tickled the soles of my feet, and gave me other tests to see if my reactions were normal or insane. Then I was again asked to repeat numbers, answer questions of multiplication, etc.

After about an hour I went back to bed, but when I wanted to lie down I was told by an attendant it was against the rules to stay in bed in the daytime. I immediately went to the office, protested at this rule, said that as long as I was confined I wanted to make use of the time for resting, and eventually got special permission to stay in bed while the other poor patients had to either stand or sit up.

After being in bed for about half an hour I was called out into the office where a psychologist gave me more tests.

About 1 o'clock I was asked to go upstairs, where a staff meeting with about forty people present was going on. Because my bathrobe had a low neck in front and I was to face the audience, the attendants insisted that I wear my bathrobe backwards, so that the collar did come up around my throat but so that the buttons were down the back.

Sitting beside the chairman on the platform, I was asked questions for some time about my economic and political views, why I felt the present situation unjust, whether I believed in force, whether I had ever been arrested before I came to Boston, the details of my being arrested in the coal fields, what I thought about the Sacco-Vanzetti case, what I thought about the recent bombing of the juror's home, and many other things. After the meeting I was privately questioned by two other alienists, who said they would report that my condition was normal.

About 3 o'clock word came that I was to be released and I was given my clothes. The hospital officials all assured me that never had a patient gotten out so quickly, the rule being that no one could be released in less than ten days. When I went down stairs I found Arthur Garfield Hays and other friends waiting for me. Mr. Hays had obtained a writ of habeas corpus for me but it was not necessary for him to use it because the authorities, after this unusual pressure had been brought to bear on them, released me. I was freed about 4 o'clock, the last picketing charge against me having been dropped, and I am now waiting trial for the other two cases. My friends expect to bring legal action against the State Police Captain to make an issue of such use of a psychopathic institution.

It is interesting to add that while I was detained at the hospital Mr. Hays, as my counsel, tried to see me and was not permitted to, nor were doctors who accompanied him for the purpose of examining me.

Massachusetts—Where Does She Stand?

LETTERS FROM OUR READERS

What History Says

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In studying the history of Massachusetts we are compelled to conclude that she has, "legally" and by the position of her "best minds," in every stage of her history stood on the wrong social side; and that what we now try to acclaim in her as her integrity toward the historical right has been gained for her only by the few radicals who dared to stand against her till they were justified by the might of facts and so by popular approval.

The settlement: She enters the picture with an injustice to the original inhabitants of the land which has been dismissed without a conscience—for in that instance there was no protest strong enough to have weight. It was "Good night" for the poor Indian!

The colony: Her stand throughout the founding period was similar to that of any element trying to acquire dominance: i.e., an intolerance which stopped at neither exile nor death for those holding different opinions.

In the case of the hysteria over witchcraft (with a difference, but like the present hysteria of the extremists—the Boston Transcripts, the Ralph Easleys, the Margaret Robinsons, etc.), to read the recantation of Chief Justice Sewall is to understand where Massachusetts stood in that issue, and it is not a pleasant prospect.

In the period leading to the political revolution, after some front put up against England for purely selfish purposes (by the merchants), with the Stamp Act repealed and no apparent grievance against England, Massachusetts was quite ready to go on as before, blind to the great social forces under way, viz., the change from feudal to commercial (democratic) determination. Almost alone Samuel Adams stood against Massachusetts till men of ability, John Adams, Josiah Quincy, and others again came to the front and gradually public opinion rallied to the radical against the conservative.

In the abolition movement: Massachusetts dragged William Lloyd Garrison through the streets with a rope around his neck. Only such radicals as Garrison, R. H. Dana, Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, R. W. Emerson, Thoreau, Thomas W. Higginson, and the few other brave and intelligent men and women set up the front against the legal and moral position of Massachusetts.

In the Great War: The less said the better; we are so near it. But perhaps we can take the Boston Transcript as the mouthpiece of where Massachusetts stood—and trust to history.

In the present issue: (a) The Sacco-Vanzetti case is in itself a question of the fair trial of two radical foreigners. (b) It has also given us a sign of the times. A great social change is in motion. Is the mass, hitherto neglected in history, coming into a place which means its domination as the social factor? Are life and the comforts of civilization to be for all or for the few? Is there something no longer adequate in the social form of capitalism?

Can we say again, as James Russell Lowell

> Massachusetts, God forgive her,
> She's [illegible] with the best,
> She the [illegible]
> In her grand old [illegible]
> She that ought to stand as [illegible]
> We've the wisest [illegible]
> Holdin' up a [illegible]
> To the [illegible]

We believe history shows Massachusetts, in all her stand, up and including the present issue, in so far as her vested interests appear, to have been and to be impervious to social thought; and her integrity in this respect to have been saved only by those radicals who had and have social courage and intelligence enough to stand up till supported by historic facts.

Boston, August 21 ROBERT S. CHASE

Have Faith in Calvan T. Fullidge!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Well, the incredible has happened—but perhaps, after all, it is the credible, and it is we who are naively incredulous.

It is barely possible that the innocence of Sacco and Vanzetti will some day come to light, with the confession of some of the five participants in the South Braintree crime. But it is unlikely. The entire machinery of government is set to vindicate the majesty and infallibility of its procedure, to suppress all possible evidence of a miscarriage of justice, and to keep truth crushed to earth.

In respectable Boston there is wide-spread, solid satisfaction. "We can again lift up our heads," writes Mrs. Amory Wigglesworth, to Governor Fuller. "You have restored our waning faith in American institutions," writes Mr. Larz Anderson of Brookline.

I find strangely applicable, though written seventy-five years ago, the words of one of the literary geniuses that flourished here before bicycle repair men became Governors under the Sacred Codfish:

> Old Matthew Maule, [illegible]
> [illegible]

Have faith in Massachusetts: Have faith in Calvan T. Fullidge!

Boston, August 23 G. E.

Mobilizing Public Opinion

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: To say that the [illegible] condition of the Massachusetts criminal code [illegible] proper that it has already been [illegible] civil cases because suits involving money strike home to the New England consciousness [illegible] all this is useful propaganda but it does not bear directly on the issue for which Sacco and Vanzetti have been seven-year martyrs. It is obvious to any thinking person that the flippancy with which the State Supreme Court dismisses the fact of Judge Thayer's prejudice is an outrage to common sense and decency, however well it may be covered up in apparently legal citations. One gets the impression that these gentlemen find it humorous that neither Judge Thayer nor any of his colleagues had a right to decide on his prejudice.

The public has a right to form its own opinion on this matter, although that opinion cannot stay the electric current that kills the two men. If hope is lost, if the two must die, they will not have died in vain if a portion of public opinion is mobilized and stays mobilized. The fact that the State Supreme Court will not act is part of a chain of evidence, not legal but moral. The fact that the nation's Supreme Court cannot act, the fact that President Coolidge cannot intervene, the fact that the Department of Justice files cannot be opened, all these are links in a chain of evidence. Let people wake up to the fact that this impotence is our much advertised American justice. Both due process of law and the rights of free speech are more liberally interpreted in the majority of foreign countries than in our United States—so much so that the conservative opinion of all Europe is immeasurably shocked. Sacco and Vanzetti cry to us to mobilize for change.

Boston, August [illegible] HOWARD LAWSON

A Humane Warden

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I feel sure that all your subscribers owe you a debt of gratitude for your clear and clean-cut articles on the Sacco-Vanzetti case. I herewith tender mine.

The action of Warden Hendry in allowing Vanzetti to greet his sister deserves to be commended—an act of common humanity we do not look for in a state prison. I hope The Nation will see fit to make mention of it. I have written the warden expressing my personal feelings. In closing, would say, I hope to read The Nation while life lasts.

Malden, Massachusetts, August 21 GEO. B. SUTHERLAND

A Call for Organization

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The will of those in power has been done and the lives of two men snuffed out, while those who believe in decency stood by and felt the shame of their impotence.

The tragedy is closed as far as the victims are concerned; they have paid the price for the apathy and weakness of those who call themselves progressive.

Is there nothing in these United States which can bind together into some sort of organization those men and women who stand for progress. Are we really so overwhelmed by the cynicism and indifference of our neighbors and the ruthlessness of our rulers that we must allow those impulses to perish which, in a previous, more hopeful time, we felt would give those who come after us a freer, fuller life.

New York, August 23 H. L.

A Note of Discord

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Now that your field for agitation has been to some extent curtailed by the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti, I would suggest a certain new field as an outlet for your restless editors. Why not start an investigation to determine what amount of money has been spent during the last few years in the organized effort to nullify the procedure of the Massachusetts courts. In doing this don't forget to figure in the cost of the bomb that was exploded under the home of one of the jurors.

Boston, August 23 AUG. J. BOYDEN

In the Driftway

HIGH school students have been exploited before for the purpose of reducing their elders if not necessarily their betters to ribald laughter. Ordinarily the Drifter does not approve of such practices; he feels too keenly his lack of knowledge on all sorts of subjects, on some of which a high school student would be expert. But when a document like that printed below comes to his desk, he cannot resist it. As he understands these extracts they are a compendium of wisdom culled from the papers of a Los Angeles sophomore history class, after being exposed for a semester to James Harvey Robinson's "Medieval and Modern Times." With apologies to all high school students, therefore—

If Christ had not preached we would know nothing about Christianity but would be pagonists. He was a great healor but didn't have an education so he was helpless. Up to this time the people had been worshipping the Roman gods but they saw no sense in it and went through the motions because their fathers did. By the time of Boniface they wasn't any pagons left to blot out.

It was Leo's idea to have popes therefore he was the first pope. Charlemagne was the first emporor crowned by the pope and therefore started that habit.

The church was arranged with the priest in front and the quire on the sides, leaving the people to sit in the back. This seating was inconvenient because not everybody could see what was going on around them.

The monastic system was when people lived in monasteries. It trained them to be real men and women and not those tough people that just hang around. Everybody went to church but the heretics. Heretics are people that harp on something all the time and don't believe in God. They were torchered by the inquisition. Being burned at the steak was the most severe punishment a person could get.

The medieval universities taught Aristotle, but he differed from the Christian religion. After his death it was found he had left many helpful hints to students. Roger Bacon didn't know or have any idea where the soul went after it left the body. He thought a great deal of Aristotle's books but his being a Christian and Aristotle's being a pagon didn't go over so big. He became famous for his fault-finding about Aristotle.

The church started a system called chivalry to make people more polite and religious. We need chivalry today. By chivalry I mean a man should always be polite to the weaker sex. They should not merely tolerate them but the little courtesies are what counts. If a lady gets into trouble and there is a gentilman involved and he can get out of it but not help her, in most cases he tries to save his own neck.

It was important when Gregory VII was pope. He was the pope that had the corruption with Henry IV. Henry was forced to humiliate himself by going round the pope's house for three days in his bear feet.

The Babylonian Captivity was when the popes moved their offices over into Avignon instead of having them in Rome.

Charles VIII led an army from France into Naples and brought back the Renaissance. When he was in Florence the people hooted at him because he was so ugly. This shows they were drifting from the church to the art of the Greeks.

The Protestant Reformation was when the Protestants broke away from the Catholic church and began to forgive their own sins. Luther said the whole Catholic Church was a fake but Erasmus was just in favor of a good cleaning, but most of the people were beginning to think they could go to God without the pope's help. Some of the clergy revolted with Luther. They were on the inside and saw and heard about the dirty work.

When Luther nailed the ninety five theses he hit the church hard!

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The American Woman

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In The Nation of August 3 Professor Huntington advanced an interesting theory to account for the seeming difference between the average woman of America and the average woman in the old world—that the early settlers of America, both men and women, were adventurous pioneers and, perhaps, this adventurous spirit in the women was a sex-linked trait which passed on to their female descendants. It is an interesting theory, but I wonder if facts can be found to support it.

Undoubtedly there were some adventurous spirits among the early settlers in New England, but is it certain that such was the case generally? A large proportion of the folks who came to America in colonial times, as I understand it, were indentured servants, and it seems hardly probable that they were adventurous spirits. Then there were the convicts that came to escape jail or the gallows—but probably they were adventurous.

And suppose the men among the New England colonists had the spirit of adventure strong in them, how much did the wives of these men have to say about whether they should stay in England or go to America? From my slight reading I do not get the impression that the Puritan woman was the head of the house.

If it is this inherited trait that today makes the difference between the American woman and the European, how does it happen that it did not operate in the South? The wife of the slave owner certainly did not exhibit any particular spirit of independence or desire to do for herself; neither did the wife of the poor white.

As a boy in central Illinois, I saw the people in the covered wagons travelling to cheaper farm lands in the West, but as I recall it they were rather slatternly looking as a rule, not at all adventurous in appearance. Some from our own community went West, but they were not the best we had. The strong men and women fought it out where they were.

It may be, of course, that Professor Huntington's theory is sound, but I wonder.

Chicago, August 1 WILLIAM H. HOLLY

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Professor Huntington says that our women are said to be bolder, less domestic, more ambitious, more dominating or less submissive, and more competent than those of the Old World. Unquestionably they are unique. He attributes these qualities to temperament. The description is probably apposite and his deduction is correct—so far as it goes. But it omits the major premise, which is that for three centuries the women of this continent have been a minority sex, a condition that is reversed everywhere in the Old World. A unique condition has produced a unique result.

My experience points to the conclusion that the difference between our women and others is mainly psychological. They have always been in a position to pick and choose among the males. If four or five of the surplus millions of women now in the Old World could be dumped down in the United States the temperament of the female sex in this country would probably be changed in a generation.

University of California, August 3 R. ESTCOURT

Books

Poems

By LOUISE BOGAN

Late

The cormorant still screams
Over cave and promontory—
Stony wings and bleak glory
Battle in your dreams.
Now sullen and deranged,
Not clearly, as a child,
You look upon the earth
And find it harrowed and wild.
Now only to mock
At the sterile cliff laid bare,
At the cold pure sky unchanged,
You look upon the rock,
You look upon the air.

Tears in Sleep

All night the cocks crew, under a moon like day,
And I, in the cage of sleep, on a stranger breast,
Shed tears, like a task not to be put away—
In the false light, false grief in my happy bed,
A labor of tears, held against joy's undoing.
I would not wake at your word. I had tears to say.
I caught at the bars of the dream, and they were said,
And pain's derisive hand had given me rest
From the night giving off flames, and the dark renewing.

The British and American Tariff

Safeguarding and Protection in Great Britain and the United States. By Francis W. Hirst. London: Richard Cobden-Sanderson.

MR. Hirst has been moved by the course of the Baldwin Government to frame, for British and American readers, a statement and criticism of the modern theory and practise of protection as illustrated by the scheme of "safeguarding" duties in England and the Fordney-McCumber tariff in this country. The story, as far as Great Britain is concerned, is one that may well be pondered by all who have been taught to believe that a parliamentary system insures a ministerial program corresponding to the views of that portion of the electorate by which a legislative majority is returned, or that a ministry which turns away from a popular mandate and follows one of its own devising is likely soon to go out of office.

In 1923 Mr. Baldwin, [illegible] . . . . came boldly into the open with a protective and preferential tariff as a cure for unemployment," and on that issue the Conservatives were emphatically rebuffed. In 1924, notwithstanding that the main issue in the election was opposition to Socialism and Communism, Mr. Baldwin's majority turned out to be composed mainly of protectionists, and with that advantage the principle of "safeguarding" duties, first brought forward in the Safeguarding of Industries Act of August, 1921, imposing protective duties on certain "key" industries professedly making war materials, and prohibiting dumping, "has been resurrected for the purpose of concealing from the public eye a new series of protective and preferential duties." There was this difference, however, between the earlier policy and the later one. The original Safeguarding of Industries Act, as Mr. Churchill explained to the House of Commons on June 25, 1925, "proposed the safeguarding of industries by duties imposed from time to time against exceptional competition of particular countries," while the later policy although retaining the anti-dumping provisions, "proposed to give effect to the safeguarding policy by duties of a general character." The Baldwin Government, in other words, by speciously substituting safeguarding for protection, has contrived, without either political or moral mandate, to undermine free trade piecemeal.

Mr. Hirst does not stop with examining in detail the history of this new camouflaged protectionism. He goes on to point out that "every protectionist success since 1914 has been won with the assistance of war, waste or public extravagance," and that it is by this "unholy alliance" that British tariff reformers (a term which in England means the reverse of what it usually means here) hope to overthrow the historical free trade system. Having installed protection, Mr. Baldwin went further and on June 29, 1925, committed himself to the policy of bounties or subsidies, intended to give "that stimulus and lift in the region of those industries which seem at the moment beaten down into a position of hopelessness." How completely the combined policies of protection and subsidies have failed to make good the promise of economy appears in an increase of proposed expenditure from £790,000,000 in the budget of 1924 to £826,000,000 in that of 1926, "in spite of automatic savings in war pensions and the service of the debt, and in spite of the efforts of the committee appointed to effect economies in other services." Actually, as Mr. Hirst shows, the expenditure has been much greater. "In the financial year ending March 31, 1926, Mr. Churchill spent 26 millions more than his estimates, and his first budget showed a deficit of 14 millions. The estimated expenditure for his second budget (April 26, 1926) was 30 millions above the actual expenditure of Mr. Snowden's two years earlier."

The book is completed with chapters on the tariff situation in the United States, the effect of the American tariff on the payment of the war debts, and the tariff walls of Europe at which, last October, the international bankers directed their manifesto. Mr. Hirst is opposed to the principle of "capacity to pay" upon which the war debt settlements with the United States have been adjusted, as well as to the maintenance by the United States of high tariff taxes on the goods in which the debts must ultimately be paid. The book is a small arsenal of destructive ammunition against the protectionist stand-patters, and a forcible indictment of a tariff system which merits to the full the condemnation which the bankers pronounced upon it.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

The Biography of Buddha

The Life of Gotama the Buddha. Compiled exclusively from the Pali Canon. By E. H. Brewster. E. P. Dutton and Company. $4.

The Life of Buddha as Legend and History. By Edward J. Thomas. Alfred A. Knopf. (The History of Civilization Series). $5.

THE life of the Buddha, like that of Jesus, is preserved for us only in legend that cannot be substantiated by contemporary historical testimony. At the best, therefore, when we mention details in his history we must recognize that we are speaking of probabilities, not mathematically demonstrable certainties. Attempts have even been made, as again with Jesus, to show that he is only a myth, and, while these are now discredited, they are significant of the nature of the evidence we have concerning his existence. Most lives of the Buddha, therefore, are frankly compilations of legends, and the compilations vary according to the compiler's design, which may be to present either all the stories that have been credited in Buddhist communities concerning his personality or only those accepted at a certain period and place.

Mr. Brewster's aim is the more limited. His line of reasoning is somewhat as follows. The oldest source books we have for Buddhism are those of the Pali canon, dating from about 250 B. C., but containing materials which in many cases come from the 6th century B. C.; in them we find the oldest legends of the Buddha; and these are therefore the legends most worthy of our consideration. Hence his excerpts are entirely from that version of the canon. Almost every proposition in his argument is open to dispute. It is true that the Pali canon is our oldest literary record of Buddhism, but it is not at all certain that it was "arranged" about 250 B. C. While this point may be one of not much interest to popular readers of books on the Buddha, they will certainly be concerned with the fact that there are legends not found in the Pali canon which, from the evidence of non-canonical works and sculpture, may reasonably be thought to have attained standing in the Buddhist community as early as did some of those appearing in the canon, and have been equally important in Buddhist hagiography. Mr. Brewster's book therefore gives an incomplete account of beliefs concerning the Buddha even for the period which it affects to cover. With this reservation the book is to be recommended. The selections, which are presented without commentary or apology, are with only a few exceptions happily rendered by our best translators and reveal the character of early Buddhist feeling for the great Teacher.

Mr. Thomas's book is of an entirely different sort, his method being critical, his aims apparently mixed. As the title itself indicates, he wishes to sift the historical from the legendary, and his efforts in this direction are probably about as successful as could be asked. In the second place he sifts and compares the legendary material, using both Pali texts and the Sanskrit and Tibetan, referring to non-canonical literature as well as the canonical. We could wish that his pen had been gifted with more facility of expression, for the net result of his labored discussions over points that are often minute and unimportant is frequently tedium and lack of clarity that will prevent the book from giving the lay public the intelligible account of the Buddha that should have been the object of a contributor to the History of Civilization Series. The fault is not merely one of diction or style. For example, Mr. Thomas frequently attaches much importance to the difference between "early" and "late" sources. In view of that fact we should have been given at the outset a statement of the different strata of Buddhist literature, even though the statement were not attended with discussion. We must sympathize with Mr. Thomas for avoiding the task, which would have carried him into uncharted seas, particularly with regard to the Vinaya and Sutta Pitakas of the Pali canon, yet without it much of his work is rudderless, and his conclusions can often hardly appear as more than the vagaries of subjective speculation.

A less clearly enunciated purpose seems to have been to discredit the theory of Christian Gospel borrowings from Buddhist sources. The theory gets frequent, sometimes irrelevant, mention in the earlier parts of the book, and toward the end a whole chapter with a corresponding section in the bibliography. It is obviously a theory of repugnance to Mr. Thomas, which he condemns roundly. Yet he does not seem to have given it the scientific consideration that it deserves from a responsible scholar. In his treatment of some of the parallels he seems, at least to this reviewer, to employ very dubious methods to refute the notion of a genetic relationship. To escape the possible conclusion that the Buddhist legend is the source of the Christian, Mr. Thomas goes to much effort to show it "late" —one version of it surely is not—and by referring to details in which variants disagree to make it appear no parallel at all.

The book remains in the final analysis lacking in inspiration, adding little, if anything, to our knowledge, never giving a living picture of its subject, marred by subjectivity. In spite of occasional footnote references to works published since 1917, large sections of the book might have been written before that date. Let us hope other great religious teachers may get more adequate treatment in the series.

WILLIAM NORMAN BROWN

Really a Novel

Meanwhile. (The Picture of a Lady.) By H. G. Wells. George H. Doran Company. $2.50.

MILADY, the Genteel Reader, sits down in her library to read a book. On the walls around her are shelved well-bound sets of unread classics—and near-classics: Voltaire and O. Henry, Balzac, Tolstoy, and Kipling, "The Memoirs of Royal Mistresses and Favorites," and Emerson and Henry van Dyke. With a proud glance at this well-bound cultural background Milady picks up a novel from the books on her table.

Does she read: "The disposition of the human mind to apprehend, to assent and then to disregard, to understand and yet flag and fail, before the bare thought of a translation into action . . . "or "This new world cult would have an infinitude of parts and aspects but it must never lose itself in its parts. It must be held together by a common confession and common repudiation. Its common basis must be firstly . . ." She does not! Milady does not read, does not even buy the books of Mr. Wells because her guide and gossip of the Sunday Supplement has informed her with just a shade of querulous condescension that the old, readable Wells, the pre-historic, popular Wells is no more. And Milady feels there is a limit somewhere. She will even buy fashionable histories of philosophy and religion, but not tracts. One must draw the line at tracts.

Mr. Wells is not an isolated phenomenon but an outstanding one. Others have deserted the field of fashionable fiction for the realm of ideas and have been roundly damned by impatient reviewers; but the amazing element in the position of Mr. Wells is that he should have so roused the ire of the lovers of house-maid literature while he has retained so much of the conventional novel. After all, the Lady Catherine in trying to supplement one illicit relationship with another affair does perch "on a lump of rock so high that her legs extended straight in front of her"; does it matter that Sempack declared "I am disposed to make myself relevant to the truth" when in the end "he drew her into a standing position and kissed her very seriously and thoroughly on the mouth"? Is the hero's fall from grace less typical of society romances because it is followed by an original idyl of married life in which the spontaneous biological attraction of two adolescents ripens into appreciative affection and intellectual comradery.

The caviling criticism which would deny to Mr. Wells the quality of a novelist is as unfounded as it is unfair. He is still, in fact, producing "popular" fiction. There lies his virtue and his failing. He is still drawing active characters rather than living ones, still creating incidents rather than reporting developments, still achieving representative studies of contemporary life rather than rendering that life through the medium of art. That he is more concerned with the adventures born of conflicting ideas than with those brought about by clashing desires does not change his status at all. To say that he differs from the run of novelists is the height of irreflective absurdity. It is precisely in his likeness to authors whose superior he is as a thinker and an artist that Mr. Wells falls short of greatness.

"Meanwhile" is an interesting story, less the picture of a lady than the panorama of a period. It stands midway in the uneven achievements of the author but is immeasurably superior to the dull and inconsequential average of English fiction. In the problem of the Rylands Mr. Wells offers the challenge direct to the aristocracy of capitalism. Will they live as befits an aristocrat or will they continue living "like a suburban clerk in the seventh heaven of suburbanism"? And the question is put without snobbery, without cant; there is no nonsense about "service" and noblesse oblige. The problem is wholly a matter of personal happiness and individual self-expression.

In clarifying this problem Mr. Wells interprets his time. It has been his peculiar virtue in the past to lean heavily on the staddle of observation as he tramped through the slough of human stupidity. In "Meanwhile," where the militant idiocies of our own day attack his intelligence, he does not hesitate to turn the stick into that stout English weapon, the quarter-staff, and lay about him vigorously. Fascism and "kosher liberalism," the neurotic patriotism of anglicized Armenians and the jejune religiosity of converted Roman Catholics, the voracious greed of capitalists and the docility of labor are all thoroughly whacked and many another foible is cracked by his incidental blows until contemporary civilization lies dizzy and bleeding at our feet. But the bugle does not sound taps. Mr. Wells, the optimistic evolutionist and popular novelist, permits no dies irae; he cannot see the utter defeat of Progress. Instead, a son is born, a peace is proclaimed, Milady, the Genteel Reader, can regain her faith in the future.

JOHAN SMERTENKO

Mumbo-Jumbo

Science, the False Messiah. By C. E. Ayres. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.

MR. Ayres has gone superstition-hunting at home. He knows very well that primitive ideas can be found more proximately than in Central Africa, and among neighbors closer in time than the age of paleolithic man. He has undertaken to explore the dominant current folklore, Science, to indicate its perilous powers, map its foolish pretensions, and expose the unsalubrious illusions upon which its priests and votaries have taught us to feed. The result is a brilliant and essentially sound if sometimes petulant and extravagant book. At the very least it may be said that this volume of less than three hundred large-type pages contains a greater number of germinative ideas than far more pretentious tomes that have hastily been called revolutionary. In some ways it is the most refreshing piece of intellectual emancipation since William Jones took philosophy out of the classroom and gave it a long breath of fresh air.

Mr. Ayres makes it easy for the reviewer and the reader by summarizing the essential content of his book in twenty-three "theses to be nailed to the laboratory door." The reader who merely turns to the back of the book to peruse these theses will miss a deal of wit and edge and erudition that have gone into their making. He will miss, too, a considerable number of petulant but entertaining grudges that Mr. Ayres voices against the following: scientists, pseudo-scientists, universities, university presidents, research foundations, suburban realtors, pious chemists, and weasel-wording philosophers. Both for entertainment and edification the book ought to be read through. (Mr. Ayres can popularize salutary heresies as vividly as others have of late vulgarized platitudes.) The guess is here submitted that it will be read by a large number.

It is to be hoped, however, that that large number will not be blinded by the haste of Mr. Ayres's seminal paradoxes and prevented from noting the ideas of cardinal importance to which he is giving voice. The first of these is that science, except for a very small group of professionals, has become a current folklore, a magical and saving faith that rivals and threatens completely to anachronize the otiose Hebraic-Christian tradition to which many, including scientists, still pay lip service.

The second idea in order of importance is that the current Science which has become for the current secular believer the repository of noble Truth is the product of machines and machine technology, not the reverse. Scientific ideas arise out of mechanical inventions, mechanical conditions, and mechanical demands, and find their only verification in mechanical measurement and the machine. The character of our era and the direction of our destiny are not in the deliberate hands of omnipotent Science, but in the inevitable course of a machine-involved civilization.

With these two ideas Mr. Ayres makes serious havoc of those tom-tom enthusiasms with which H. G. Wells and a thousand littler optimists of the current folklore look to the future. The supposed freedom which science gives us is in fact "the loosening of the bonds of order and belief by the Industrial Revolution." The old social and religious matrix of our lives is passing not because of what Newton and Darwin said but because of what machines are doing to the conditions of life. The factory, the tenement and the five-room bungalow on a suburban subdivision are killing Christianity far faster than the theory of evolution or the quantum theory in physics.

Mr. Ayres continues with gusto his examination of the havoc machines have brought upon the older ideological and social order, and threaten to bring still further. He notes with accurate contempt the endeavors socially conservative scientists have made to buttress a falling citadel of belief by a disingenuous use of the new language of science. He is convincingly scornful of the tidy little Utopians who think by "intelligent control" of the laws of nature they can provide a new and secular salvation.

This book will alarm another kind of Fundamentalist. It will offend the priesthood of the new Messianism of science which is growing among us. It will offend those scientific administrators who, Mr. Ayres plausibly suggests, in this age of experts may become controllers of society as inquisitorial and obnoxious as any sacerdotal caste in the past.

This book is recommended to anyone who thinks because he believes in "molecules and electrons, matter of heaven and earth and electrical energy its only form" that he is intelligent and free. Mr. Ayres wittily demonstrates that most of us intelligentlemen are talking Mumbo-Jumbo. If we keep it up, it may cease to be a joke.

IRWIN EDMAN

The "Makings" of Michael Collins

Michael Collins and the Making of a New Ireland. By Piaras Beaslai. Harper and Brothers. Two volumes. $10.

THE author has himself said the best and the worst of this book when he declares with damning candor in the preface: "I aimed not at summing up my impressions in a vivid pen-picture, but at giving the greatest possible number of data for the reader to judge by." Those who look to it then for a living presentment of the human meteor that was Michael Collins will find but a collection of dry bones which Piaras Beaslai lacks the skill—or is it the courage?— to compose into a skeleton. Certainly he has not the genius to infuse them with life.

The value of the book lies in the information it gives concerning the Irish war that terminated in the victory of the Free State, and here Mr. Beaslai has kept the promise made to his readers. Those with imagination and some knowledge of the background are given the raw stuff from which to re-create the man who was soldier, statesman, financier, efficient office manager, and what might be called expert in individual friendship.

"Mick," says Dan Breen," was the only member of G. H. Q. who stood by us consistently." "Us" included warders in English pay in Irish jails, spies similarly supported in Irish detective bureaus, shipping clerks in Europe and America, stokers on liners, farmers, fighters—every form of patriot, in short. Collins was as thorough an expert on every job as the most exacting captain of industry could require. He was as daring an adventurer as any writer of fiction could hope to conceive; as satisfactory an epoch-maker as any historian may ever hope to portray. He was the kind of a friend to have with one at one's death-bed. It is Mr. Beaslai's failure that one has to see all this by inference, by the light of one's own burning desire to see.

An untried quantity in the Easter Week rising, Collins attained importance only after his release from Frongoch prison, where he reaped the reward of his revolutionary activities. We see him later arming, organizing, and strengthening the Volunteers or so-called I. R. A. He was once Commander-in-chief, Quartermaster, and Director of Intelligence. He broke down in a year a spy system by which the British had held Ireland subject for centuries, penetrating at midnight into the headquarters of the famous "G" Division to read the secret dossiers and laughing over his own. "He comes," it began, "of a brainy Cork family."

He was Minister of Home Affairs and Minister of Finance, and collected in Ireland over three hundred thousand pounds, though his advertising was killed, his leaflets removed from the letter boxes, his agents and his subscribers jailed. The only time he lost heart and objected to a job was when they sent him to London to help negotiate the Treaty. He thought De Valera should have gone, and said he went simply as a soldier taking orders he did not approve from a superior officer. The one note of bitterness from Collins that we hear is struck a propos of this. "The captain of a ship," said he, quoting De Valera's defensive description of himself, "who sent his crew to sea and tried to direct them from dry land." Those interested in Free State politics now, and in the attitude which De Valera as head of Fianna Fail takes in regard to the oath of allegiance to the king, should read the instructions which as "Captain" or "President" he issued to the men he insisted on calling plenipotentiaries.

Collins stood for "Bloody Sunday" because he had the moral courage and intelligence to decide on the only form of warfare that would get Ireland what it needed. And those who have benefited by this courage would like to see him "placed" properly in the long line of soldiers and statesmen who championed but failed to win the Irish case. One hopes that Mr. Beaslai's book will give, indeed, the data for someone capable of showing Collins as he must have been. Beaslai, his friend, must know much more than he has set down.

NORAH MEADE

Books in Brief

An Experiment with Time. By J. W. Dunne. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

It would be quite impossible for even the author to reduce his thesis to a simple statement. It is the daring speculation of a scientific mind, an expert in aeronautics who gets out of range of ordinary terrestrial comprehension. He begins with certain striking premonitions that occur to him in dreams; they convince him that what first he dreams he later experiences—yet rarely. To this chance he adds experiment, and anticipates the future in waking states, even guessing (now and then) what is in a book before he reads it. (The most remarkable of these previsions was spoiled by the after-memory that he had read the book before.) But Mr. Dunne is not disposed to accept the super-normal theories of "psychic researchers." On the contrary, he finds support in Einstein and relativity, making touch with H. G. Wells and Bergson on the way. His experience suggests a new theory of the universe called "serialism." Our separation of time into future and past, with a crossing at the present, is a limited way of conceiving what is; once transcending it, the possibility of seeing or dreaming things before they happen is within range. Occasionally, we can read time backward, take it literally by the forelock. It is all intricate, mysterious, but not mystic; it may be a vast illusion, this attempt to explain a psychic event (which perhaps isn't so at all and is really something else) by way of a reshaping of our views of time and space. It seems a strange approach, but it takes a strong as well as strange intellect to make the proposal. It will hardly affect our relations to our space-bound and time-tyrannized existence, nor yet convince the skeptical that our psychic functions may give proof of a fourth or other foreign dimension.

Jefferson and the Embargo. By Louis Martin Sears. Duke University Press. $4.

The Jeffersonian policy of embargo has always fared badly at the hands of historians and economists. New England's commerce was destroyed by a Southern President, the nineteenth century's system of economic philosophy was flouted by a theorist. Enough said! The embargo was a criminal blunder; Jefferson was an irresponsible crank. The present author approaches the subject with an open mind, determined to weigh all the elements of the problem on the sensitive balances of scientific scholarship. He finds that the policy was a logical outcome of Jefferson's own thinking, that, outside of New England, where the commercial classes and politicians united to defeat him, the President was generously supported, that the development of manufacture in the States afforded some compensation for the losses entailed, that the opening of the South American trade to the English merchants introduced an unanticipated element in the experiment, and, finally, that the policy was not maintained long enough to prove either its inutility or its efficiency. The author is of the opinion, however, that Jefferson made in the embargo an important contribution to the cause of international peace and that, if it had been persisted in, war with Great Britain might have been prevented at a cost much less than resulted from the appeal to arms. But in that case how compensate our writers of school histories for the loss of the glories of the War of 1812?

Further Dialogues of the Buddha. Translated from the Pali of the Majjhima Nikaya by Lord Chalmers. Oxford University Press. Two volumes (Sacred Books of the Buddhists, vols. 5 and 6). $4.25 per volume.

Lord Chalmers, like Lord Ronaldshay, is one of those rare administrators in India who have united to executive ability an appreciation of Indian culture and the power to express it by literary means. Well might he be fascinated by the lore of the people he was ruling, for the Pali scriptures hold a delight that is at once the beauty of religious idea, the revelation of human feeling, and the gift of narrative. These two volumes are a translation of that portion of the Pali canon known as the Majjhima Nikaya, or collection of discourses (by the Buddha) of medium length. That the Buddha could not possibly have uttered all that is ascribed to him is a matter we need not pause over; there is a higher criticism of Buddhist sacred texts, as of Christian. What we have consists both of teachings by the Buddha and of accretions by his followers; how to unscramble the two is still a mystery too deep for scholars. It is sufficient that we find here in sermon form the ideas that are the heart of Buddhism—the Four Noble Truths, the Chain of Causation, the questions which tend not to edify, and many others. In this day, when the Buddhist scriptures are becoming increasingly available in adequate translations, there is no longer reason why anyone should speak of that faith without understanding and sympathy.

The Jewish Daily Bulletin Index. A Key to Contemporary Jewish History. Vol. 1, No. 1, January 1-December 31, 1925. The Jewish Daily Bulletin.

The Jewish Daily Bulletin daily sends out bulletins comprising cabled reports of Jewish events the world over. This index is the first effort on the part of a Jewish newspaper to make available a reference book on current Jewish events. It should be of value to students and editors, and seems to us to have been well done.

International Relations Section

The Movement of World Wealth

By SCOTT NEARING

PROFOUND changes have recently taken place in the relative economic positions of Europe, America, and Asia. The nature of these changes is suggested by the shift in the volume of wealth and of production.

When the modern imperial struggle was launched about 1870, there were four nations whose wealth was practically equal: Britain, with $40,000,000,000; Germany, with $38,000,000,000; France, with $33,000,000,000, and the United States, with $30,000,000,000. Next in order came Russia with $13,000,000,000 and Spain with $10,000,000,000. For most countries, no wealth data are available, but the four countries that headed the list were well in the lead as far as wealth was concerned, and were bunched rather closely together, with Britain at the head and the United States at the bottom of the list. (These figures appeared in the Bulletin of the National City Bank for December, 1924.)

Twenty years later, in 1890, the four wealth leaders of 1870 were still far in advance of the other nations, but they had changed places. At the head of the list was the United States, with $65,000,000,000; Britain followed with $53,000,000,000; then came Germany with $49,000,00,000, and Frence was fourth, with $43,000,000,000. The four were still bunched together, but the United States had moved from fourth to first place in twenty years.

Another twenty years passed. By 1912 the list had altered in two important respects. First, the four leaders in the wealth race were no longer alone. Russia had joined them with national wealth estimated at $56,000,000,000 as compared with $57,000,000,000 for France. Italy and Spain had both forged ahead, each with more than $20,000,000,000. The wealth of India was estimated at $20,000,000,000. Japan, Canada, and the Argentine had appeared on the horizon, each with wealth estimated at $11,000,000,000. Australia had a wealth of $8,000,000,000.

The other important alteration in the wealth position of the leading nations had to do with the relative status of the leaders. In 1890, the wealth of the United States, which stood number one, was only a little greater than that of Britain, which stood number two. But in 1912 the United States reported national wealth of $[illegible], while the wealth of Britain, $79,000,000,000, was less than half that of the United States. The third nation, Germany, reported wealth of $77,000,000,000, so that the wealth of the United States in 1912 was equal to [illegible] the wealth of the two other wealthiest nations in the world combined.

The wealth of the modern world was concentrated in Europe in 1870. With the exception of the United States, no other country could compare with the leading European wealth centers of that date, and even the United States was a poor fourth among the four wealthiest nations. Twenty years later the United States headed the list. Another twenty years and the United States was far in the lead.

Other American countries, such as Canada and the Argentine, had appeared as important figures in the wealth list. Furthermore, most of the Asiatic countries were listed well up among the third-class wealth nations, while Russia had joined the first-rate nations.

These changes had already taken place before 1914. They mark the economic shift from Europe as the wealth center of the world to the Americas and Asia as wealth centers, one of them far outrivaling any of the European empires; the other challenging their undisputed supremacy. The war of 1914 speeded up these changes.

War losses were largely confined to Europe. Almost all of the fighting was done there. Other portions of the world turned out record quantities of supplies, sold them to Europe at record prices and thus profiteered on the European war crisis. While the European empires were burning up wealth—and each other—on eastern and western fronts, Americans and Asiatics were busily converting their war profits into capital—building blast furnaces and railroads, opening factories, and drilling oil wells.

In a very real sense, the Americas and Asia provided the European empires with the materials for their own destruction, and the European empires paid fancy prices to America and Asia for the suicide tools.

When the war was over, and the immediate losses were counted, Europe had ceased to be the world's wealth center. America had taken her place, and some of the leading Asiatic countries had made phenomenal gains in their wealth positions.

In 1922—at the end of the war—there was one first-rate wealth nation in the world; four second-class nations; seven third-class nations, and six or more fourth-class nations. Here are some of the figures:

First Class	United States	$321,000,000,000
Second Class	Britain	89,000,000,000
	France	68,000,000,000
	Germany	65,000,000,000
	Russia	55,000,000,000
Third Class	Spain	29,000,000,000
	Italy	26,000,000,000
	Poland	17,000,000,000
	China	25,000,000,000
	India	25,000,000,000
	Japan	20,000,000,000
	Canada	22,000,000,000
Fourth Class	Brazil	13,000,000,000
	Argentine	13,000,000,000
	Chile	8,000,000,000
	Mexico	8,000,000,000
	Australia	14,000,000,000
	Netherlands	8,000,000,000

The wealth of the one first-class nation, the United States, was equal in 1922 to that of all of the second-class nations combined, with a comfortable margin besides. The wealth of the United States was equal to that of all the third- and fourth-class nations combined, and half as much again. Thus by the end of the war one nation had become the unquestioned wealth leader of the world.

Further changes had occurred in the geographic distribution of the wealth leaders. Among the second-class nations all were European but one was Soviet and bidding for position in Asia. Of the third-class nations three were European, three were Asiatic, and one was American. Here is a basic geographic shift from the wealth supremacy of Europe which was so overwhelming in 1870. By 1922 this European supremacy had disappeared. America had taken her place as the wealth center of the world, and in the East had appeared the rapidly rising wealth power of Asia.

This shift in wealth power follows, as a matter of course, the changes in production. In 1870, Asia, largely in a stage of village economy, produced meagerly and almost exclusively for use. The United States will still predominantly agricultural. Only in Europe had industrialization made notable headway. During the next half century, however, industrialization spread across the United States and invaded China, India, Mexico, Argentina, Canada.

Take, as an example, the production of coal, which is the major fuel of industry. In 1890 Great Britain and the United States were the leading coal producers of the world. Great Britain led with 184,000,000 tons; the United States followed with 143,000,000 tons; German production was 70,000,000 tons; French, 25,000,000 tons. Russia produced 6,000,000 tons of coal. Japan produced 2,600,000 tons. (Statistical Abstract, London, 1914, pp. 489-91.)

Between 1890 and 1913 coal production increased 75 per cent in Britain; 301 per cent in the United States; 483 per cent in Russia, and 823 per cent in Japan. At the outbreak of the war of 1914, the United States stood first in coal production; Britain stood second, and Germany third, but there was a great deal of production taking place in Asia.

Average coal production for the years 1909-1913 was 576,000,000 tons for the whole of Europe, 478,000,000 tons for America, and 49,000,000 for Asia. The figures for 1925 show 578,000,000 tons for Europe; 543,000,000 tons for America, and 80,000,000 tons for Asia. Europe had stood still in coal production; America had gone ahead by a small amount; production in Asia had increased by two-thirds. (Monthly Circular, Labor Research Dept., June, 1927.)

Similar changes have occurred in the production of pig iron. European production was less in 1926 than it was in the years immediately preceding the war. American production increased by 40 per cent. Asiatic iron production was seven times as great in 1926 as it was in the pre-war years 1909-1913.

Textile production provides another illustration of this shift in production power. The total of Europe's cotton spinning spindles was 99,500,000 in 1913. In 1925 the total was 102,900,000. In America the total was 34,300,000 spindles in 1913 and 42,100,000 in 1925. Thus Europe remained practically stationary, while America showed a gain of more than 20 per cent in her cotton spindles. But the spindles in Asia were 8,400,000 in 1913 and 17,500,000 in 1925. Here the increase was slightly more than 100 per cent (Ibid., p. 133).

Here, in a few summary figures, is the economic background of those far-reaching changes that are now taking place in the centers of world wealth power. Fifty years have witnessed a complete transformation in world wealth relations. The wealth and production of Europe are relatively very much less important. The Americas are the world wealth center for the time being. But the movement across the Atlantic promises to continue across the Pacific as well, making that ocean the principal scene of world economic activity. On the Pacific live the vast majority of the world's people. Around the Pacific the struggle of the next economic and social epoch will evidently be waged. The Atlantic was the center of major world activity during the nineteenth century. In the opening years of the twentieth century the scene is rapidly shifting to the Pacific.

Contributors to This Issue

SYLVANUS COOK is a pseudonym.

POWERS HAPGOOD has worked in mines in the United States, Wales, France, Germany, and Russia.

PERCY MUSGRAVE is the pseudonym of a New York journalist.

LOUISE BOGAN is an American poet.

WILLIAM MACDONALD is a regular contributor of historical and political reviews to The Nation.

WILLIAM NORMAN BROWN is professor of Sanskrit at the University of Pennsylvania and has been professor of English in the Prince of Wales College, Jammu, India.

JOHAN SMERTENKO is a New York critic and student of the history of criticism.

IRWIN EDMAN is assistant professor of philosophy at Columbia.

NORAH MEADE is a student of Irish literature.

SCOTT NEARING, author of "Educational Frontiers," is an economist and teacher.

EXECUTION OF THE CHICAGO ANARCHISTS

Do you want to know about the Haymarket Riot, the police frameup on those innocent Labor Organizers? Read their SPEECHES, delivered in court, when sentence of death was passed upon them.

LIFE OF ALBERT R. PARSONS, containing Gov. John P. Altgeld's scathing arraignment of the authorities for sentencing eight innocent men to the gallows. Five were Judicially murdered. Three he released from prison. Read his "Reasons" in THE LIFE OF ALBERT R. PARSONS, published by his widow.

LIFE OF PARSONS $3.25. FAMOUS SPEECHES $0.65.

LUCY E. PARSONS, 3130 N. Troy Street, Chicago, Ill.

Why Travel for a

LIBERAL EDUCATION!

From the middle ages onward the value of travel in foreign countries has been recognized as adding the final touch to a liberal education.

The broadening of one's views accomplished by travel can also be effected by coming in contact with the fresh viewpoint on world affairs and the unbiased ideas on men, letters and things presented in

The Manchester Guardian
WEEKLY

It is a store-house of information on international politics, European trends of thought, current English literature, and cultural developments the world over.

The intellectually inclined in more than sixty countries depend on The Manchester Guardian Weekly to keep them furnished with reliable information on all important world happenings and to keep their viewpoint on vital affairs clear and unprejudiced.

----------MAIL COUPON BELOW----------

The Manchester Guardian Weekly,
[illegible] West 42nd Street,
New York City.
I enclose three dollars for a year's subscription to THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY.

Name . . . . . .

Address . . . . . .

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

SUMMER PLACES

FEW RESERVATIONS LEFT FOR SUMMER. SPEND SEPTEMBER, INDIAN SUMMER IN THE PINE-CLAD ADIRONDACKS. AN IDEAL TIME FOR REST AND RECREATION

RATE $30 WEEKLY

ECHO LAKE TAVERN

WARRENSBURG, N. Y.

Tel. Warrensburg 55.

MOE NUDEL

REBECCA B. NUDEL

INDIAN HEAD CAMP

on

ECHO LAKE

WARRENSBURG, N.Y.

SWIMMING LIFTING
CANOEING
ROWING
DANCING
BASEBALL
TENNIS
BASKETBALL
HANDBALL
HORSEBACK

A camp for Adults in the Adirondack Mountains

$30. per week

$5. per day

Labor Day week-end, $17.50, which includes free transportation from Albany to Camp and back. Take Albany Night Boat on Friday, September 2nd and meet our sightseeing bus at the Albany pier on Saturday, September 3rd, which will carry you to camp through the Adirondack Mountains, passing through Schenectady, Saratoga, Glens Falls, Lake George and Warrensburg. Otherwise, N. Y. Central to Lake George where our cars will meet you. Make reservations by mailing $5 deposit as accommodations are limited.

Write for Camp Booklet direct to Camp or to R. Helfant, 885 Brook Avenue, Bronx, N. Y. Tel. Melrose 1821

SUMMER RESTFULNESS forty miles from New York. In the least frequented part of Westchester County, where chance has preserved some of the wildness of the Adirondacks, a roomy old manor house, with its orchards, woodland and vegetable garden, receives guests for week-ends or longer periods. R. UNDERHILL, Amawalk, N. Y.
Telephone Yorktown 140.

POSITIONS WANTED

PH.D. and graduate fellow in philosophy, ousted from professorship because of liberalism, seeks temporary or permanent position. Consult Box 837, % The Nation, for highest scholastic and executive references.

TEACHER-PSYCHOLOGIST, experienced in modern educational techniques, seeks opening in private family caring for child 3-7 years; will handle all behavior problems. Training in self-reliance, initiative thru work and play. Box 859, % The Nation.

EXPERIENCED EDITORIAL ASSISTANT, [illegible] to temporary engagement, few hours daily; [illegible] Box [illegible] Nation.

YOUNG [illegible] Box [illegible] Nation.

YOUNG [illegible] man, etc. Wide experience. Box 872, % The Nation.

HELP WANTED

RESIDENT TEACHER wanted to take charge of English department. Send references. State salary and [illegible] Home School, R. F. D. No. 3, Plainfield, N. J.

RADICAL Sunday School desires teachers in history, [illegible] years. Reasonable compensation. Telephone Had[illegible] Box 869, % The Nation.

VOCATIONAL SERVICE

GERTRUDE R. STEIN, INC.
18 East 41st St., N. Y.

A PROFESSIONAL and Commercial Employment [illegible] unusual jobs. No job, however, too small to be done well.

For extra money

write

Dept. 11 The Nation

OPEN SHELF

GOOD CHEER, COMRADES! Want to buy, sell, or swap books, [illegible] etchings, lamps, paintings, prints, oriental rugs? Bus, or stroll to Daca's, 63 Washington Sq. So., N. Y. C. Books always [illegible]. Open eves.

BOOKS [illegible] free anywhere at 15% discount from [illegible] Send for request.

ISRAEL SOIFER

1244 Clay Avenue New York City

ANTIQUES

FAMILY AMERICAN FURNITURE at
ANN-SELEY'S 5 Christopher St.
New York City

RUSSIAN SHOP

IF you are interested in vintage Russian dresses, [illegible] I would like to see you. [illegible] Summer Sale [illegible] at half price. MARIA, A. de Chevalier St. (near 5th St. & 6th Ave.).

MISCELLANEOUS

PATENTED Cultivator for sale or to be manufactured. Plans and specifications on demand. Owner E. G. Hillers, 640 W. Cedar St., Compton, Calif.

SCHOOLS

The UNIVERSITY Preparatory SCHOOL

STATE BANK BLDG · FIFTH AVENUE AT 15 STREET

Telephone UNIversity 5149

REGENTS::COLLEGE ENTRANCE
COMMERCIAL

Prominent in faculty—Strong in Equipment—A keen school for those who want good teaching—Co-Ed

Moderate Tuition Fees

DAY and EVENING SESSIONS

Catalogue upon request

TIMBERLAND

IN THE HEART OF THE ADIRONDACKS

The Camp Formerly Leased to a Congenial Group of [illegible]

Bungalows and Main House modern in every respect. Rate $27 per week.

Excellent facilities and equipment for all camp sports; also golf.

Round Trip Fare to Riverside, N. Y., station, $13.27.

OPEN UNTIL OCTOBER 1st

N. Y. Office, 55 West 42nd St. Pennsylvania [illegible]

Mail your reservations to POTTERSVILLE, N. Y.

THE LITTLE WHITE SCHOOLHOUSE

Valley Cottage, N. Y.

AN informal school in the country one hour from New York for children from five to seven. Boarding pupils limited to six in number.

AGNES DE LIMA, [illegible] Valley Cottage, N. Y.

Tel. Nyack 975 W

SCHOOLS IN FRANCE

Château-Neuvic School

A Church School for American Boys preparing for American Colleges.

Wholesome country life organized in a historic feudal castle. American standards of hygiene and diet; yearly tuition $1,200. [illegible] sports program, including crew.

The Rt. Rev. Charles H. Brent, Bishop of American Churches in Europe, Chairman of Board of Trustees.

Address: Dr. Conrad Chapman, Head Master.
Chateau-Neuvic, Neuvic-sur-l'Isle, Dordogne, France

CHATEAU DE BURES

par-Villennes Seine-et-Oise France

Preparation for College and Cultural Advantages. Non-sectarian; scientific thoroughness; modern progressive methods; American and [illegible] masters. Beautiful grounds, thirty acres, thirty miles from [illegible] New gymnasium with [illegible] sleeping porches and indoor private stables. All sports. Own Farms. Address:

Thomas C. Burton, Head Master, 47 Claremont Ave., New York City

An American School for Boys in the Old World

Leaves at the Out-Of-Doors
A Treat for the Labor Day Week End

THE C. J. I. CAMPS at PORT JERVIS, N. Y.

Swimming, Boating, Canoeing, Fishing, Tennis, Entertainment, Athletic Field Games, Horseback Riding

Wholesome Kosher Food

Conducted by

Central Jewish Institute

CITY OFFICE: 125 East 59th Street

Phone Now! For information and reservations, Regent 2656

Rates on a non-profit basis
For the Labor Day Week End $12

MISCELLANEOUS

REAL HARRIS HOMESPUNS Direct from the Makers at Manufacturer's Price Postage Paid

Suit Lengths Cut to Order.

NEWALL, 150 Stornoway, Scotland. Write for patterns stating shades desired

[illegible] The Nation

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXV NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1927 No. 3245

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 237

EDITORIALS:

A Survival of Barbarism 240

Geneva and Neutrality 241

Even a Student Has Some Rights 241

The Noble Art of Mystery 242

IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 243

HOW "AL" SMITH FARED IN MISSISSIPPI By Hilton Butler 244

BRITISH WOMEN IN POLITICS. By Jessie Stephen 245

SILLY MARTEN. By Madefrey Odhner 246

OKLAHOMA GOES ROSICRUCIAN. By Melvin Blake 247

DIPLOMATIC SONNET. By Harrison Dowd 248

IS AFRICA GOING WHITE, BLACK, OR BROWN? By Wynant Davis Hubbard 249

PRESS COMMENT ON THE SACCO-VANZETTI EXECUTION 250

"HAVE FAITH IN MASSACHUSETTS" Letters from Our Readers 252

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 255

CORRESPONDENCE 255

BOOKS AND MUSIC:

Legend of the Bronzier Man. By Pierre Loving 257

Voyaging on the Unconscious. By Alter Brody 257

Acknowledge the Wonder. By Carleton Beals 257

The Sense of Tragic Life. By Alice Beal Parsons 258

The A B C of Communism. By George E. G. Catlin 259

A Major Prophet. By Ernest Sutherland Bates 260

A Lyrical Mind. By Irwin Edman 262

Superior History. By Sidney B. Packard 262

Books in Brief 263

Music: The Tail Wags the Dog. By B. H. Haggin 264

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

The Soviet Opposition 266

Soviet Courts 267

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editor

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor Literary Editor

FREDA KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS HEYWOOD BROUN CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOSHI Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent for subscriptions and Advertising: Manager, M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

WORD COMES FROM WASHINGTON that France is probably to get a 6 per cent loan of $100,000,000 from this country with which she will refund some of her bond issues bearing a higher rate of interest. A special dispatch to the New York Times predicts > that a banking syndicate will be permitted soon to float a refunding issue in this country for the French Government, so that France may be able to take advantage of her improved financial position and call in issues on which she is now paying as high as 8 per cent.

>
> Because of failure by France to ratify the Mellon-Bérenger agreement for the repayment of the French wartime indebtedness the American money market has been closed to that Government, so far as public offerings of bonds and other securities are concerned.
>
> But the feeling here is now reported to be that, despite the continued inaction by France on the war debt, the ban should be lifted if a purely refunding loan is proposed, as this would simply result in permitting France to replace bonds already existing with others on which she would make a very material saving in interest rates.

We doubt if the purpose to which the loan is to be devoted has melted Washington's stony heart; rather, we imagine, the improved financial position of France has suggested that if Americans do not make the loan somebody else will, and we shall thus lose control. What interests us especially, though, is the wording of the dispatch so as to imply that there has been a legal embargo on loans to France. Of course the administration has no such authority. There has been merely a "gentleman's agreement" with the chief powers of Wall Street, resting on mutual interests and fears. Just to show our sporting blood we hereby offer to float a non-callable loan of $1 for France, without security, without interest, and without permission of Washington.

WE SEE BY THE PAPERS that the members of the United States Marine Corps now resident in Nicaragua have killed two "bandits" in the northern jungles. It is hard to keep track of the precise purpose of "our boys" in the Central American republic, because for several weeks last winter our mission varied with every successive utterance from Washington. We do recall, though, that we sent the marines back to Nicaragua a year ago with the announcement that they were there solely to protect the lives and interests of our citizens and would maintain "strict neutrality" in the internal political quarrel. From that we have gone on to setting up a puppet president and finally to clearing the northern jungles of "bandits." But as this latest news issues from Washington we are led to suspect that it may not be quite frank, and as we read on into the heart of the dispatch we find: "The incident occurred in a region where General Sandino, Nicaraguan guerrilla, had been operating, but he is now believed to have left the country." In other words the "bandits" would be better known south of the Rio Grande as the remnants of the Liberal army which has been opposing the made-in-America President Diaz. What a pity George III did not have the services of our propaganda experts in Washington, who know that more battles are won by calling names than by firing bullets! The history of the American Revolution might have been written so as to read that the British were attacked by sneak thieves at Lexington, Burgoyne was ambushed by gunmen at Saratoga, and Cornwallis had to surrender his sword at Yorktown to a pickpocket named George Washington.

HOW GERMANY WILL MEET the rapidly increasing reparations called for under the fourth year of the Dawes Plan is the perplexing question economists are asking themselves. This fourth year (which began on September 1) of the experts' scheme is viewed as the critical period. The opinion of such men as Bernard Baruch and John Maynard Keynes is that the joint burden of reparations payments and interest payments on foreign loans is too great and that, as the latter put it, "the Dawes plan will break down according to schedule." The statistics supporting this fear seem even more convincingly to presage a crisis. In the first three years of the Dawes payments the annuities were moderate and rose slowly, while Germany was helped considerably to meet them by foreign loans. The first annuity of $250,000,000 in 1924-1925, for example, was largely paid from the Dawes loan. The second annuity (1925-1926) was $305,000,000, and the third (1926-1927), $375,000,000. Then they jump rapidly from the $437,000,000 of the fourth (1927-1928) to the $625,000,000 of the fifth (1928-1929). Germany's burden is further increased by the $60,000,000 interest payment on foreign loans. The contributions of the German budget are expected to increase from $125,000,000 (1927-1928) to $312,000,000 (1928-1929). But the discouraging fact here is that the budget has already had a deficit for the last two years. Even with drastic budget reform it is difficult to see how the future payments are to be covered from this source.

THE OUTLOOK FOR SUCCESSFUL payment of the Dawes annuities from the other remaining source—the balance of international payments—is even more serious. Out of surplus exports over imports Germany is expected to finance her tremendous payments abroad. But up to the present the German trade balance has contributed nothing to the payment of reparations. For the two and one-half years ending April 30, 1927, her net excess of imports was $795,000,000, and, moreover, the excess of imports over exports has been rising steadily. To make her export surplus pay for the 1928-1929 annuity, it is pointed out, would require an increase of between 40 and 50 per cent. Furthermore, this would have to be chiefly in coal, iron, steel, and textiles. Obviously, this expansion in Germany's export trade would probably drive England and France out of their own markets! It does not take a vivid imagination to vision how Stanley Baldwin or Raymond Poincaré would welcome such a prospect. In connection with the approaching crisis we note the conclusion of Mr. Keynes that "it is probable that the authors of the Dawes Plan did not expect their scheme to work." It was their plan, he continues, to gain time, and "so to arrange that, when the breakdown came, it would come as something inevitable and involuntary." This would allow a sane and reasoned revision of the reparations problem. With the present tendency toward amicable trade relations between France and Germany, the possibility for this working out of the Dawes Plan grows more likely.

THE ABOLITION of governmental censorship of the press during peace time was the most important resolution urged by the International Conference of Press Experts, which met in Geneva the last week in August. Representatives of the Italian press, at present among the chief sufferers in this sort of surveillance, supported the motion. A resolution was also passed asking that no journalist be expelled from a country for professional reasons without consultation with a committee of journalists; and in this matter also foreign journalists writing from Italy have a grievance. It is interesting to record that while discussion of the no-censorship motion was going on, Señor Asturias, editor of the Imparcial of Guatamala, declared that in some Latin American countries an official censorship was exercised by the United States Government which extended not only to the national interests of this country but "to the North American companies established" in South American regions. The pressure is applied by our diplomatic representatives; when a journal takes an attitude regarded as objectionable from the standpoint of our interests, the editor receives an intimation that a change would be advisable. In other words, the United States Government is not only prepared to send marines to protect our investments in out-of-the-way-places, but is ready and willing to bluepencil Latin American papers which print statements possibly derogatory to American investors. The conference went on record also as in favor of the "open door" principle in regard to information—that there should be no discrimination on the part of government as between official and independent news agencies.

A LETTER has come to us from the secretary of the Boston Young Men's Christian Union, 48 Boylston Street, which reads in part:

> As chairman of the Library Committee of the Boston Young Men's Christian Union, I have cancelled their subscription to your paper as I cannot have such propaganda circulated amongst the young men of this community. We have an able and fearless Governor who has done his duty in spite of the insidious propaganda that he has been subject to. Its citizens are behind him. . . .
>
> God reigns, and the government at Washington still lives.

Our reply, in part, follows:

> Has it occurred to you that you are taking a good deal of responsibility in deciding what facts and opinions the young men of your community shall or shall not read? How are you so sure that you are right and those who disagree with you wrong? Is it not rather the work of the library to present readers with material from all sides, encouraging them to think for themselves and reach their own conclusions?
>
> A course of action with which one agrees is always "able and fearless," and the chief actor seems invariably to have "done his duty." Any opinion to the contrary is always "insidious propaganda." The church of Luther's day regarded his theses as "insidious propaganda." The church of an earlier day took the same position in regard to the teachings of Christ.
>
> "God reigns," you say. We do not know what God you have enthroned in Boylston Street, but if the God of justice and mercy of the Scriptures looks down on Massachusetts today, we feel that He must cover His eyes in sadness and discouragement.
>
> Or is it that Massachusetts has set up a god of its own, whose indifference equals that of Pontius Pilate, whose hardness surpasses that of Plymouth Rock?

THE BOSTON POLICE did not cease their illegal activities with the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti. Their invasion of the funeral procession is described by Creighton Hill of Wellesley Hills as follows:

> Acting for weeks without consideration for the fundamental rights of the living, the police yesterday violated the decencies which any civilized society owes to the dead. They broke up an orderly funeral procession, assaulting and clubbing defenseless men and women who were guilty of no crime but that of following in an orderly manner the bodies of Sacco and Vanzetti.
>
> I was in that solemn funeral procession and I can testify that not one inflammatory movement was made or intended by that crowd. Sincere, poignant grief and the dignity of deep sorrow brought those thousands together. Nothing else. And what happened?
>
> Instead of offering the testimony of one who might be accused of sympathetically exaggerating the facts, may I quote briefly from the press this morning:
>
> "One officer was to be seen beating a woman in the face with his fist. A girl was standing near the coal company office [illegible] face buried in her hands with a split chin. . . . A policeman stuck his pistol at the window of a taxicab, then turned suddenly, went to another car, dragged a man out to kick him toward Boston. Persons who were riding on running boards of autos and taxicabs were dragged off and beaten or booted in the direction of Boston. By this time the main body was in flight toward Boston, pursued by a line of policemen who still used their clubs. Women were given no mercy in the panic. . . . While one man was being beaten by a sergeant with an umbrella, his hat was knocked off and, stooping to pick it up, he was booted by a patrolman. He went down and the patrolman kicked the hat high in the air."

FURTHER TESTIMONY is given by Fred E. Beal of Lawrence, a letter from whom, we are glad to say, was printed by the Boston Herald. Mr. Beal, a veteran of the World War, says in part:

> At this time we were all arrested and brought to the Charlestown station in City Square. On the way along one of the policemen said: "The crowd didn't beat you up, but, O boy, wait until you get to the station." After being booked at the station I was taken in hand by four husky brutes. After closing the cell-room door one of the brutes said: "So you're an American, eh?" and delivered a right to my jaw. The others used unprintable words and continued punching me in the jaw and the stomach. Not satisfied with this, two of them held my hands while a third gave me a dozen slaps in the face. And then they threw me with force into the cell. The next victim was treated much worse and the last one was kicked and punched so that he was unconscious for 15 minutes.

Beside such conduct the minor infractions of the law of which the police were guilty in connection with the sale of The Nation were trivial, but are worth putting in the record. Fourteen boys who were selling copies of The Nation containing the editorial Massachusetts the Murderer were arrested in various parts of the city on charges running from loitering and selling without a license to attempting to incite a riot. Our agent in Boston got in touch with the Superintendent of Police, who agreed that the arrests were unjustified and the charges were dropped in court.

WE HAVE RECEIVED from the printing press of Horace and Nettie Burton Carr in Cleveland, some posters two by three feet in size. In handsome black type on a cream-colored paper appears the following inscription:

> On the twenty-third of August, 1917
> NICOLA SACCO
> and > BARTOLOMEO VANZETTI
>
> workingmen and dreamers of the Brotherhood of Man, who thought to find it in America, after seven tortured years in prison were done to a cruel death by the children of those Pilgrims who, long ago, fled to this land—for Freedom.
>
> They are at peace; but their voices are gone into all the earth, and they will be remembered with gratitude and tears when the names of those who murdered them—Statesmen—Judges—Scholars—have gone down into everlasting shame.

We have put this poster up where we and others can see it; we think we shall appreciate rereading it after a good many other comments on the Massachusetts tragedy—including some of our own—have grown stale.

IN THE DISMISSAL of two of his professors, President Shawkey of Marshall College, in Huntington, West Virginia, used what is known in military circles as a "smoke screen." When Watson Selvage, head of the department of philosophy, was asked to resign last March, a vague ministerial protest was given as the reason for the president's action. At the hearing on August 25 before the State Board of Education it developed that this religious issue was raised by Mr. Shawkey to cover more embarrassing reasons (whether to him or to the dismissed professors he did not specify). The "real" reasons were finally elicited from the president:

> That there had always been a question about Professor Selvage's ability to adapt himself to the situation at Marshall.
>
> That for this reason the instructor had been employed only on a temporary basis.
>
> That he was careless or indifferent as to his financial obligations.
>
> That he had many impractical ideas about business affairs.
>
> That he was "unnecessarily offensive toward those who differ from him in their thinking."

Yet this same Mr. Shawkey sent Professor Selvage (upon his resignation last March) a warm letter in which he highly praised the professor, admitting that the latter had "rendered a valuable service" to the college throughout his stay, commending his "splendid loyalty" to the institution, and, finally, expressing regret at his departure from Marshall. At this time Dr. Arthur S. White of the chair of economics leaped to the defense of his colleague. Result: he too was dismissed, with the following "smoke screen" from Mr. Shawkey: "He has always been something of a problem. He is always active, but not always ethical in his actions. In four years of my association with him I have never heard him speak enthusiastically about either Marshall College, the State of West Virginia, or the American Government."

WAYNE B. WHEELER was still in his fifties when he died, and he had served the Anti-Saloon League for more than a third of a century. He was working his way through Oberlin College as assistant to a janitor when the Ohio branch of the league, then hoping for a spread of local-option territory, discovered in him a young man accustomed to work the long hours of a farm hand and devoted to its cause. He was one of those little men who are raised to greatness by a fanatic absorption in a single cause. The prohibition movement, growing out of its adolescence as a temperance movement, was his whole life; his bitterest enemy never suspected him of anything but passionate sincerity. He never saw two sides to a case. He saw Right, and Wrong, and crusaded without a shadow of the doubts which might have tormented a broader mind. In large measure he was personally responsible for making the Anti-Saloon League the most effective nonpartisan political organization in the United States, and for the final victory of the National Prohibition Amendment and the Volstead Act. Wayne Wheeler never lost his intemperate faith that all that was necessary was to browbeat his opponents into obedience to his law. To his mind any means was justified that helped the good end—poison, sharp politics, perhaps even near-bribery. He preferred a drunken congressman who would vote Dry to an honest tippler who voted as he acted. And in that preference lies one explanation, among others, of the moral failure of national prohibition.

A Survival of Barbarism

I shall ask for the abolition of capital punishment until I have the infallibility of human judgment established to me.—The Marquis of Lafayette.

OR, as the writer of a just-published volume* puts it, an "irrevocable punishment" can be safely imposed only by an "infallible tribunal." The idea has been in the minds of many in connection with the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti. Supposing new evidence comes to light later? they ask. Supposing the innocence of these men is one day irrefutably established? That the state cannot give life, nor restore it in case of a mistake, has always been a sound reason against the death penalty, but it has been only one of the many emphasized by the tragedy in Massachusetts, the culminating effect of which, we hope, will be a public revulsion against capital punishment and a strong movement for its abolition in those States of the Union where this survival of barbarism still exists.

In origin the death sentence for murder is, of course, merely a relic of private vengeance; it is the job of "getting even" transferred from the individual to the state. But there are few who defend it on that ground today. What maintains it in modern society is chiefly a false belief in its value as a deterrent to crime, although history indicates that it has had a contrary effect. In the days when picking pockets was a capital crime in England the artists in this particular kind of thievery used to recognize the occasion of a hanging as one of exceptional opportunity and gathered in unusual strength to ply their trade. Nor has the abolition of capital punishment resulted in the sometimes-predicted "crime wave" where it has been tried. Take, for instance, the eight States of the Union that have abolished capital punishment even for murder—Michigan, Rhode Island, Wisconsin, Maine, Kansas, Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota. If we glance at the figures on homicide for the eight years 1912-1919, in the twenty-six States of the Union for which statistics exist, we discover that the eight States having the lowest rate include five of the States in which the death penalty has been abolished. The State having the lowest homicide rate in the entire list is Maine, where capital punishment has not been in existence for forty years. The only way to decrease murder is to make human life more sacred, and this principle is violated every time a human being is sent to the scaffold or the electric chair far more dangerously than when an individual kills. For in the first case the killing is an acceptedly righteous act carried out by the will and theoretically supported by the conscience of the whole community. As the author of the book already quoted because of experience in his own country, England:

> Anyone who recalls the public executions of the last century must realize how degrading a spectacle an execution inevitably must be. The reason for the change to private executions was [illegible] as its advocates pointed out, it follows that the more who witnessed it the greater would be its wholesome effect; the contrary proved true. Each succeeding public execution became the occasion for an increasing debauch in brutality which eventually compelled the authorities to abandon the practice.

> For the more enlightened methods which are being introduced into our prisons today we need to call out the devotion of the best men and women of the community. We certainly shall not obtain men of the high standard required if we ask them to participate in such a degrading operation as an execution must be. . . . Public officials always act as our agents. It is on our behalf that they execute a condemned man. Few—even the stoutest upholders of capital punishment—would be willing to carry it out. We have no right to ask the paid officials of our elected representatives to perform on our behalf what we should have a moral objection to doing ourselves.

A serious objection to capital punishment nowadays is the aversion of most decent people to finding a prisoner guilty of a crime which will send him to his death. This objection is strong unconsciously even when not admitted or not realized. In a case like that of Sacco and Vanzetti, tried in a time of hysteria, it was overcome all too easily by fear and hate of the defendants. But ordinarily it works for the acquittal of the guilty.

This unwillingness on the part of juries to send another another human being to his death was recognized in an interesting way in England as long ago as 1830 when public sentiment in support of the sacredness of life was behind what it is today. At that date, when forgery was punishable by death, more than 1,000 bankers from 214 towns sent a petition to the House of Commons, saying:

> That your petitioners as bankers are deeply interested in the protection of property from forgery and in the conviction and punishment of persons guilty of that crime. That your petitioners find by experience that the infliction of death, or even the possibility of the infliction of death, prevents the prosecution, conviction, and the punishment of the criminal, and thus endangers the property which it is intended to protect. That your petitioners, therefore, earnestly pray that your honorable House will not withold from them that protection to their property which they could derive from a more lenient law.

Admittedly one of the most degrading aspects of capital punishment in these days is the increasing tendency of the press to turn murder trials into public hippodromes for the gratification of their readers. To quote Mr. Calvert once more:

> That the press publicity given to the details of murder trials would continue on its present scale were the death penalty abolished is most unlikely. There is only one other kind of legal proceeding which—until recently prohibited by law—received anything like the same degree of publicity, viz.: the divorce case, and this was almost entirely due to an unfortunate public demand for sordid details concerning private sex relationships. With this one exception, there is no parallel to the publicity which a murder trial receives, though many a trial for a lesser offense, such as attempted murder or robbery, may have circumstances connected with it quite as dramatic. In a murder trial it is the fact that the accused person is fighting for his life which creates the wide-spread excitement and morbid interest; and this feature would at once be removed by the abolition of capital punishment.

We agree with Lord Buckmaster when he says: "But to me the only hope of the human race lies in increasing the feeling of sanctity for human life. Without this realization we shall never get rid of slums, of poverty, or of crime."

* Capital Punishment in the Twentieth Century. By E. Roy Calvert. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $5.00.

Geneva and Neutrality

OUR contemporary, the New Republic, seems to be correct in pointing out that the lamentable breakdown of the disarmament conference in Geneva was due to British insistence not merely on "protecting" her trade routes but on preventing neutrals from trading with Britain's enemies, according to the time-honored legal right of neutrals. That is, having illegally set aside all those restrictions on belligerent rights which international law had developed for the benefit of neutrals, and having justified this lawlessness during the war on the ground of "necessity," Britain now finds it desirable to enforce a similar policy in the future. Our contemporary, in acquiescing in such violations on the theory that nothing can be done about it until the United States joins some future association of nations which shall outlaw war and prevent lawlessness, is in the same position as those who supported the late catastrophe as a "war against war" and thus postponed the end in view to the accomplishment of the means. This is as profitable and useful as chasing a rainbow.

No one can look at the Europe of today, politically disorganized by as unwise and cynical a treaty as has ever disgraced European history, without realizing that the danger of war is at all times considerable. If possible future conflagrations, instead of being confined to small areas by keeping as many nations as possible neutral and by protecting the time-honored rights of neutrals, are to become general wars because it is now a "disgrace" to be neutral and because there are no rules to protect the rights of neutrals, the world faces chaos. The League of Nations proscription of neutrality was fantastic. In part, the proscription of war itself by the type of men who drafted the Treaty of Versailles raises the suspicion that they thus hoped rather to forestall any future challenge to their ill-advised political arrangements and to their ill-gotten gains and hypocritical and irresponsible conduct of international affairs.

It won't work and the British Government knows it. Instead, therefore, of permitting, as after past wars, the restoration of rules of law with their assurance of some degree of certainty and security, the British Government has refused, by arbitration of violated neutral rights or otherwise, to permit any challenge to her conduct of the war at sea; and by insisting on an enlarged navy she implicitly indicates her intention to act similarly in the future. Naturally, American admirals know that too. Hence the reciprocal struggle, one to maintain British supremacy in a European or Asiatic war, regardless of law, the other to maintain American neutral rights—now ostensibly cast into confusion—by force if necessary.

Both parties are wrong. But by intentionally leaving the law in doubt and uncertainty, war is invited, not discouraged. Instead of postponing the clarification of the law until we join some future association of nations—a distant day—we prefer to insist now on such clarification. British opposition could only be explained on the theory that Britain figures herself as a future belligerent rather than a neutral, that she prefers a British-manufactured uncertainty to law and order, and that she relies on force to make British policy prevail at any given time and place, regardless of the legal rights of others. It is a dangerous position, dangerous to Great Britain and to the world.

The Geneva conference disclosed a fundamental conflict of naval policy. Before the difference progresses to a point of irretrievability, we invite either learned societies, if governments are not yet ready, or such governments as are ready (as occurred in 1780, 1800, 1856, and 1908) to meet in conference and to redefine the law of neutrality at sea. That elaborate structure, which had been moulded and shaped during a century and a half by the combined efforts of all nations interested in working out a fair and satisfactory compromise between the otherwise irreconcilable claims of the belligerent to prevent all trade with his enemy and of the neutral freely to continue such trade, is now threatened with destruction by the British Government.

No single government can thus be permitted to destroy established institutions. The result would be to bring back, in a highly integrated and delicately balanced world, that chaos which prevailed in the days before Grotius and induced the armed neutralities of 1780 and 1800. Such a condition can hardly in the long run benefit the possessing nations, including Great Britain herself. The breakdown at Geneva is the first public manifestation of the seriousness of the situation. The sooner active steps are taken to frame a revised Declaration of London, in which neutrals shall be adequately represented, the better for the welfare of all peoples.

Even a Student Has Some Rights

SYRACUSE University learned recently from Supreme Court Justice Edward N. Smith that even universities must observe some semblance of common civility in their relations with students.

This unusual happening in which the authorities were given a little instruction in the fair treatment of students occurred when Justice Smith ordered a dismissed student reinstated. The student, Miss Beatrice O. Anthony, was dropped last October, but the university officials gave only the vaguest reasons for their action. It was intimated that Miss Anthony had violated "the moral atmosphere," the "ideals of scholarship," and that—the unpardonable sin!—"she was not the Syracuse type."

Quite properly, the court would not uphold a dismissal based on such flimsy evidence. Furthermore, the Justice said, dismissal of a student without giving adequate reasons, "may spell ruination of a life," and that the university could not have the right to inflict.

The university, of course, looked at the matter quite differently. One of the rules of registration at Syracuse states that attendance after tuition is paid is "a privilege and not a right." It is a most convenient arrangement, whereby Syracuse takes the student's money and then denies him any rights in exchange for it. "This rule," commented Justice Smith, "is repugnant in its very terms." In accepting the tuition fee, he explained, the university entered into a contract with the student, yet the clause objected to was a deliberate attempt to evade obligations under that contract. In other words, by inserting the clause, the university placed itself outside the contract laws. The injustices inherent in such rules are apparent enough and we quite agree with Justice Smith that "No such situation can be tolerated."

But it is tolerated to an amazing degree. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, a dismissed student will have neither the courage nor resources to fight, regardless of whether his dismissal was justified or not (we are, of course, considering only dismissals for other than strictly scholastic reasons). The men who run the colleges often feel that "firing" is the best thing for a student who threatens to disturb the conventional complacency of the campus. Innocuous conformity is too generally the academic ideal.

The campus conformity, naturally, does not grow of itself. Many students, and even some professors, find it difficult to bend themselves to the proper pattern. To aid these misplaced scholars, therefore, the universities provide numberless petty rules prescribed by the pedagogues for the daily footsteps of those likely to err. The rules need have nothing to do with learning. The moral and religious aspects of the student's life are often as much the university's concern as his mental achievement. Even at Yale a student's degree depends as much on the proper balancing and proportioning of sick absences against excused and unexcused absences as upon his scholastic work. He must be single—since it is probably considered illogical to grant a bachelor's degree to a Benedict—and he must be celibate, since ties without benefit of clergy are frowned upon. And those who think differently, either among the faculty or students, are asked to move on, with the suggestion that after all, it is perhaps for their own good, and that it will help general university relations. It is only necessary to recall the constantly recurring cases of dismissed professors, to v rify this. Students obviously fare much worse.

The decision of Justice Smith gives us the hope that possibly the in loco parentis policy of the pedagogues may be changed. It is disturbing to see students forced to lead an educational life circumscribed by numberless rules which, good or bad, are none of a university's business. The issue should be faced: can the spirit be free, can thought be vital, while colleges and universities are clothed in the crepe of formalism?

The Noble Art of Mystery

LEGEND has it that great minds—the minds of engineers, educators, business men, and statesmen—like to relax by reading cheap fiction. This is a monstrous error which any mind that was no more than merely good could demolish with a gesture. Persons with minds never find relaxation in inferior books. They find them, indeed, impossible to read at all, or at least very difficult. Books which are not interesting are surely not relaxing, and we take it that by a cheap novel is meant a poor one.

But an even profounder error is entertained by those who suppose that great men, casting about for dull literature with which to forget the duller world, satisfy their hunger with mystery stories. Now it is true that a certain hunger can be so satisfied. But it does not follow, as legend would have it follow, that mystery stories are cheap or light or inferior. They may be all those things, as books in any class may be. To say, however, that they are necessarily any of those things is to insult one of the major traditions in literature, and to accuse great men of wasting their time.

The modern mystery story, as Michael Sadleir points out in a recent letter to the London Times, is a direct descendant of the "Gothic" romance of the late eighteenth century. Times have changed since Gregory Lewis and Mrs. Radcliffe conducted their heroines through gloomy underground passages resounding with the groans of tortured innocents. We are not regaled any more with apparitions of headless horsemen, armless gloves, and mysteriously nodding helmets. It is not for nothing that fiction has undergone its attack of naturalism. So the heirs of Mrs. Radcliffe have to work their spells in the real, average world we all are supposed to know about. But they do work them; they do serve the tradition which runs back from them farther, much farther, than the eighteenth century. And who is to say that it is not a noble tradition? Who would sniff at the literature of terror? Who does not like to be made afraid of the very world which he thought yesterday to be all too safe, and which, more's the pity, he will think similarly safe tomorrow?

The writer of a mystery story begins, of course, with a murder. It is only in the finding of a body struck down by hands unknown that his reader can be presumed to take the appropriate kind of interest. And we shall not deny that this is so. If life has lost many of its terrors since science and invention made going about in it both freer and more monotonous, death still is strange; and sudden, inexplicable death is stranger yet. From this situation, then, the mystery writer starts. And he goes on as effectively as he may under what would be disadvantages for the novelist, but for him are the very rules of his art. The writer of mystery stories is not a novelist and should not be judged as one, or compared with one, or declared inferior to one because he does something else.

The novelist, for instance, would find it a disadvantage to be dealing with the death of a worthless person. There can be no tragedy in that, he would say, and he would be right; only the writer of mystery stories is not working with tragedy. He is working with terror, which is another thing from terror purged as Aristotle said tragedy purges it. No, the person murdered must be regretted by no one; otherwise how could we hang about the scene of the crime so long and so lovingly, and how could we give ourselves so completely to the task of ferreting out the clues? We must think for three hundred pages of nothing but a stabbed or strangled body.

The novelist again would suffer under the rule which obtains in mystery fiction against characterization. It is situation which counts, and complication; the true devotee of murder literature is impatient at the intrusion of love, or humor, or wisdom, or pathos, or "psychology." Sherlock Holmes is what he is because he is a set of faculties merely. H. C. Bailey and G. K. Chesterton in England have endowed Mr. Fortune and Father Brown with interesting qualities, but in doing so they have run a grave risk; and in "The Canary Murder Case," one of the best of recent American murder stories, Mr. Van Dine has actually handicapped himself by making Philo Vance something of a person.

Mystery stories have their own rules, and they have their own rewards. It is their business to freeze out of the world all but a certain set of actions and emotions, and within the narrow limits thus imposed to give the reader's mind the exercise it needs. All of the arts have their boundaries. It is suggested that someone pay mystery artists the compliment of discovering just what it is they do not do, and what it is they do.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

WHEN the whistle blows at the end of the annual football game between Yale and Harvard all strife and rancor cease. The men in crimson huddle and give a lusty cheer for the wearers of the blue. Yale returns the compliment. This is a practice known as sportsmanship and no doubt the custom has its graces. But I am shocked to find those who would extend these undergraduate rites to conflicts more serious and weighty. Sacco and Vanzetti being dead, there are liberal journals which would have us all forget and love our neighbors without discrimination. The World asks that we honor the patriotic service of Lowell and of Stratton. And adds that equal praise should go to Frankfurter and to Thompson. The Boston Herald boasts that it has been "as liberal to one view as to the other."

Here in America the word "liberal" has lost its savor. Many have come to think of a liberal as a good-humored fellow with some sense of sportsmanship. He strides into a dispute and sagely ventures: "There is much to be said on both sides. The truth lies somewhere between the two." And that's a silly thing to say because it does not indicate just where truth sits in the uncharted field lying between the left and right. Liberalism deserves decay if it has nothing more to offer than the worship of Mrs. Winslow. Sportsmanship is a useful commodity in so far as it affords full and free discussion for both sides in any controversy, but there is no reason to respect the man who keeps his mind so open after the storm has broken that he cannot temper the wind to any shorn lamb. A neutral casts no shadow.

All of which brings me around to the condition of journalism in the United States. I used to be a newspaper man once myself, and the habits of that job are still strong enough to mar me for other work. I begin here apologetically. It might be said if Broun does only one piece a week he should write better than in the days when he did seven. I'm afraid it isn't so. One gets set into a rhythm. The cuckoo in a clock would crow no more sweetly if absolved from all responsibility for the hours and held accountable only for the announcement of each week's beginning. As a reformed columnist I will readily admit that any man who turns out a daily stint must shyly proffer much which is dry and dusty. However, I can be equally dull after a week's hard cogitation. Perhaps in time I shall find grace and even style, but during my apprenticeship I ask indulgence.

Kind friends have said: "You are a fool. Newspaper work's your own line. Why don't you go back to the World, which is ready to forgive and to forget?" Others have passed the epithet "idealist." But I'm not altogether a fool and I haven't earned the other classification either. By following the line of least resistance I came to be a personal journalist. Some years ago I discovered that it was easier to write about myself than any other subject. Less home work was required. I might still write about myself and be happy enough on some paper or other if only I were sufficiently fertile in humorous notions. Editors might be bored, but they were never angry if I wrote about my fish, my child, or even my fingernails. But when something burns inside and that comes out, the situation's very different. Newspapers don't like their men to get mad about things.

I think that journalism has probably grown much more fair than it was twenty or thirty years ago. It seems to me that many papers which are called reactionary were scrupulous in their news treatment of the case of Sacco and Vanzetti. And still I pine for the exciting indignation which is fading away. Newspapers grow bigger and more courteous. Most of them reflect the opinion of no single man, but of a group. When many take counsel moderation may be expected and possibly wisdom, but not much fire. Upon the paper which I know best, important editorial policies depended upon debates in which several men participated. When there was sharp difference of opinion a compromise was inevitable. The view expressed often represented the opinion of no single member, but merely a policy for which all could summon a grudging assent. A composite opinion, like a composite photograph, is apt to be a little vague and misty round the jowls.

In order to pursue the pleasant calling of personal journalism it becomes almost necessary for a writer to be owner and contributor as well. Indeed even this is not an infallible way. Many a proprietor treads softly. The feeling grows that newspapers prosper by carefully refraining from annoying any considerable group of people. "Oh, I don't think the Catholics would like that," is a phrase not unknown in conferences, and the Methodists and the Irish are always with us. It may be that men who have large fortunes tied up in journalistic enterprises know their business, but I am by no means sure of that. I think the harmfulness, from a strictly business point of view, of irritating readers is vastly exaggerated. Subscribers, I believe, are willing to forgive a newspaper for doing almost anything but boring them. In fact I should add my personal testimony that great patience is exercised by the public even toward those who must have been on many occasions tiresome. Unfortunately the rule about avoiding subjects likely to give offense shuts the newspaper commentator off from many of the most interesting themes. Although the churches play a smaller part in the life of the average New Yorker than was the case a generation ago, religion, and also theology, are subjects vitally entertaining to vast numbers of people, but anyone who tries to deal with such things for a daily paper, save in an entirely impersonal way, will soon find that there is panic in the counting house.

And one other explanation I might make to justify desertion of my trade. A newspaper feels that its concern lies almost wholly with the parade which is passing at the moment. It suffers from Lot's inhibition and will not look back. I always did like the wife of that man better. Things do not end when they are done. The liberal Boston Herald said when Sacco and Vanzetti were completely dead that the time for all discussion of that case was now over. "The chapter is closed. The die is cast. The arrow has flown."

It is not true. I won't agree. For truth there is no deadline.

And so maybe in my heart I never was a newspaper man at all.

HEYWOOD BROUN

How "Al" Smith Fared in Mississippi

By HILTON BUTLER

THERE is little political comfort for "Al" Smith in the fact that no man ever fought harder to free himself from a rattlesnake—or even a skunk—than Theodore G. Bilbo, Governor-elect of Mississippi, struggled to rid himself of a charge in the campaign ending August 23 that he was in sympathy with the Presidential ambitions of the New York Governor.

Dennis Murphree, Bilbo's opponent in the second primary, brought the name of "Al" Smith into the race and a roaring answer came to a few questions that politicians have asked with reference to how a Catholic-Wet-Democrat would fare in the South.

In the first primary Bilbo, regaining his strength, swept the whole State and nearly knocked three opponents instead of two out of the ring in the opening round. He gave Mississippi its first landslide thrill since the olden days of the magnificent Vardaman, "the people's choice,"—now a feeble, completely shattered old man pining away in an Alabama hospital. The Smith issue did not break into the first primary. There were sufficient local issues—brick roads, state printing plants, income tax, and pardoning powers. Lined up against Bilbo were Murphree, who became Governor last March when Henry L. Whitfield died from a leg amputation; Mike Conner, a tremendous campaigner and highly capable young man of thirty-four without, it happens, an American Legion button; and Albert Anderson, a weekly newspaper editor and State legislator. Here was the first primary result—before the name of Al Smith had been flung into the race:

BILBO	135,065
MURPHREE	71,836
CONNER	57,402
ANDERSON	23,528

The rest looked so easy for Bilbo that the Jackson Daily News, his bitterest newspaper enemy and the largest daily in the State, admitted that "it looks like Theodore is going to be our next Governor and we might as well make the best of the evil." Bilbo's headquarters claimed that he would win the second primary by 75,000 majority. The Murphree headquarters put in a weak claim for a 10,000 majority over Bilbo, but many of the strongest Murphree adherents admitted freely that they thought Bilbo would be elected with anywhere from 20,000 to 75,000 majority.

Then came the bombshell. Murphree charged that Bilbo had received a letter from the secretary to Governor Smith praising him for his splendid race in the first primary. Murphree went further—and his supporters took heart. He charged that Bilbo was in favor of a Presidential delegation from Mississippi instructed for "Al" Smith. To give strength to these charges, a high Masonic official, George C. Myers, clerk of the State Supreme Court, sent out a letter "To the Master and Secretary of Every Masonic Lodge in Mississippi" charging that Bilbo was in league with Smith's ambitions.

You who know Mississippi know that the word Catholic brings up a vision to the average Mississippian of a dark-faced man, shrouded in black robes, hiding a shiny stiletto; that less than 2 per cent of Mississippi is Catholic. You know further that the State is dry politically, and fairly so personally; and that it has not yet ceased to boast of being the first State in the union to ratify the Eighteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. Perhaps you can see very clearly then "Al" Smith represents, in the Mississippian's mind, these two "evils." To be linked with either of them is political death in the State.

Hence Bilbo jumped to his own defense against the Smith charge exactly as I described it—just like a man fighting to free himself from a rattlesnake or a skunk. He denied, counter-charged, and cried against the "eleventh hour canard." His followers saw his mythical 75,000 majority sink out of sight over-night—weighted down to the briny deep with the insignia of Alfred Smith. The anti-Bilbo press went wild. Only a week of second primary campaigning was left when the Smith issue came up and Murphree followers saw their chance. They plastered full page advertisements in the newspapers, distributed Myers' letter over the State and were well started on a romping change of defeat into victory.

Bilbo countered bravely—but the thing that saved him was the fact that 82 per cent of Mississippi voting strength is rural and the Smith charge simply could not penetrate far enough in the given time. The few daily newspapers in the State gave considerable space to the charge—but Bilbo has made it a political gesture in all his campaigning to tell the "metropolitan subsidized press" where to go, much to the delight of the rural elements. His strength has always been with the 82 per cent, gained largely by ridicule and abuse of the urban 18 per cent. In the few days remaining in the second primary campaign Murphree simply could not get the news of Bilbo's alleged apostasy into the rural regions. But an enormous amount of damage was done at that. Bilbo's expected 75,000 majority crumpling to less than 10,000, the second primary vote being:

BILBO	135,783
MURPHREE	126,398

The two Bilbo figures indicate that he almost exactly stood his ground. But his loss was in his failure to make inroads into the Conner vote of 57,000 and the Anderson vote of 23,000. Conner had fought Murphree and Murphree had fought Conner so bitterly that in fighting each other they almost forgot Bilbo. The Bilbo crowd expected to profit by the Conner vote to the tune of no less than 50,000. The Anderson vote was expected to turn almost solidly for Bilbo.

Bilbo's drop in popularity is laid to nothing else than the Murphree coup in charging him with favoring—or even tolerating—"Al" Smith. Murphree's defeat is laid solely to the fact that he didn't have time to get the Smith-Bilbo story to the 82 per cent.

The thing made Bilbo mad. Deeper rumblings of trouble in the State, as a direct result of "Al" Smith, are heard. Bilbo has his heart set upon going to the United States Senate in 1930 when Senator Pat Harrison comes up for re-election. What the Smith rumor did to Bilbo is fresh in his mind, and the blunt question that the Mississippi

Ku Klux Klan Grand Dragon, Fred E. Wankan of Jackson, asked Senator Harrison a few days ago in an open letter is significant. The Klan requested the Senator to say whether or not he favored a delegation instructed for "Al" Smith for the Democratic nomination for President. Harrison answered that he favored an uninstructed delegation. But the grape-vine telegraph—so commonly used in Mississippi politics—is pushing along the suggestion that perhaps the Mississippi Senator is not wholly unreceptive to the place as Vice-Presidential nominee on the ticket with "Al" Smith. And Governor-elect Bilbo sits back, breathing a little easier now but still hotly, and tells his friends that if Senator Harrison gets mixed up with "Al" Smith, the 1930 Senatorial race will be a simple matter. There will be sufficient time, notes Bilbo, to get the word back to the 82 per cent.

British Women in Politics

By JESSIE STEPHEN

THERE was a time when it was sufficient for man to mutter, "Woman's place is the home" to send every poor female creature who harbored secret thoughts of woman having other useful spheres of influence scurrying to the burrow from which she should never have had the temerity to emerge. To challenge man's supremacy, especially in the field of politics, was regarded as rank treason and simply proved that the poor deluded suffragist had lost every attribute of womanliness. Fortunately times have changed. That is not to say that there do not still remain diehards who regard woman's ever-widening interests as an interference with man's rights, but their number is on the decline.

In Britain this was an attitude of mind which persisted until the beginning of the Great War. Even now British women are not fully enfranchised. While a mere boy twenty-one years of age without ties or property qualifications may cast his vote for Parliamentary candidates, a woman is not allowed to exercise this privilege of democratic citizenship until she is thirty and then only on the basis of a property qualification.

Despite this unfair discrimination women are showing an increasing enthusiasm in the field of politics and have belied all the gloomy prognostications of the politicians who maintained that it was a waste of time to extend the franchise to them. Nowadays every political party is madly scrambling to get the lion's share of the women's vote which is making its influence felt to a considerable degree.

Not only is the proportion of women who use their votes higher than that of men, but greater and greater numbers of women are offering themselves as candidates for the various local governing bodies like the city councils and Poor Law Guardians, not to mention those who are ambitious enough to stand as candidates for Parliament. Already the number of women who have been elected to these local governing bodies runs into thousands while the number of women M.P.'s will be considerably augmented at the next general election.

Those who predicted that women would never make a successful appeal to the electors find themselves all wrong in their calculations. Actually the average of votes cast for the forty-odd women candidates who stood for Parliament in 1924 was not less than 8,000. It is therefore somewhat surprising to find in the United States, where women have had the franchise longer and on more democratic terms, that politics as a career has not made a greater appeal. The idea of lobbying for legislation, which seems to be the commonest method of approach, is out of date and does not frighten the legislators to the same extent that women organized as units in political parties would do.

Of course we have non-partisan groups of women in Britain, but they do not function very effectively. Their influence is so negligible that few politicians would worry at any threats they might make. When even the Conservative Party, which bitterly opposed the granting of votes to women, is politically sagacious enough to enrol nearly a million women in their Women Unionist's Association, this is easy enough to understand. Add to this the fact that both the Labor Party and the Liberals have strong sections of women organized along party lines and it becomes clear why so much progressive legislation affecting women has been passed since 1918, the year when British women were first enfranchised.

Almost the first result was the setting up of maternity and child welfare centers in every town and village throughout the land. Fifty per cent of the funds needed for this work is furnished by the Government and the rest by the local taxpayers. The value of this work is incalculable. I find in my own district, where I served on the Borough Council for six years, that the death rate among babies under the age of twelve months has fallen from 149 per thousand to below 70 since 1920. Not every one of these centers has an pre-natal clinic but a goodly number have, and wherever this work has been attempted it has resulted in a heartening drop in the figures for mortality among mothers in childbirth.

There are few cities which do not possess a dental clinic where mothers and children under the age of five years are attended free of charge. In the case of a mother who is too poor to afford to buy dentures, these are also supplied without charge. Maternity hostels are run so efficiently and cheaply that even middle-class women are using them nowadays rather than the more exclusive and expensive private nursing homes to which they were formerly wont to go.

Many of the more progressive councils have even gone so far as to provide vacation homes for poor overworked mothers. The council on which I served was the first to set up a municipal solarium to which hundreds of children and grown-ups come for the artificial sunlight treatment. In addition they send six tuberculous patients to Leysen in Switzerland for a year to take the treatment. This part of the work has proved most interesting, many of the patients coming back fit to start work again.

None supposes that the present Government in England would have introduced such a radical measure as the Widows' and Orphans' Pensions Act if they had not been well prodded by the Women's Unionist Association who had brought this proposal before the party conferences from time to time. Since the women are proving more active campaigners than the men and are prepared to take on more and more of that drudgery, door-to-door canvassing, the candidates and M.P.'s cannot afford to incur the displeasure of their most ardent supporters and workers.

There is not the slightest doubt that the act which gave parents equal guardianship over the children was the product of a united demand made by women of all parties. No party dared to oppose its passage in the House of Commons although there were a few diehards with safe seats who made their ineffectual protest. In the matter of legislation for children British politicians dare not hedge or offer factious opposition such as I observe politicians are offering in the United States. It is either yea or nay. No straddling the fence will be excused. Each time I see a boy selling newspapers in the early hours of the morning as I travel about New York and other big American cities I ask myself how it is possible that American women should allow this disgrace to exist in their midst.

Housing conditions in Britain have been a standing disgrace for many years, but since women came into politics this scandal is being cleared up. Slums are disappearing so swiftly, especially in places like London, that one wonders why these things were not attempted years and years ago. It is true that protests were made constantly prior to the war and some legislative action demanded, but of what avail were the protests since the people who suffered most, the housewives, had no means of making their wishes become realities. The average politician is a coward at the best, and nothing moves him more quickly and effectively than the threat to jeopardize his seat.

The humanization of the poor law has proceeded apace in recent years, due chiefly to the discovery by women members of the various boards of guardians that abuses such as they had never suspected existed in every poor law union in the country. It was a common occurrence at one time for poor harassed widows to be told that they must sell the best part of their furniture before they came seeking poor relief, and even when they had obeyed these orders they were given such inadequate relief as to compel them to enter the competitive labor market and become a real menace to other women so far as reducing wages was concerned. Now, if they have children, they are paid enough to keep them at home. The Widows' and Orphans' Pensions Act has somewhat mitigated the widow's economic distress too.

Food prices have so engaged the attention of women in all parties that a food council, though without other than advisory powers, has been appointed by the present Government and has been instrumental in preventing the worst abuses. Their reports are given so much publicity that no woman, however humble, need be ignorant as to the proper price which should be paid for the articles she buys.

To show even more clearly how political parties must bow to the will of the women, let me quote the experience of the women in the British Labor Party. At four different annual conferences of the women's sections they had passed almost unanimously a resolution calling upon the party to use its influence in the House of Commons to get the Ministry of Health to advise the maternity and child welfare centers that wherever a woman asked for advice on methods of birth control it must be supplied. At the general party conference this was turned down by the men who felt that it might affect their position in the ballot at general elections. This excuse was not good enough for the women members of the party, and in 1926 they made it so clear that this shilly-shallying must cease that the resolution was carried by a large majority. Only the quiet persistence of the women made this victory possible. Incidentally one notices that no woman Parliamentary candidate has ever opposed the motion despite the suggestion that advocacy of the right of any married woman to have this advice would automatically seal her fate at election time.

Harsh clauses which discriminated unfavorably against unfortunate women in the last Contagious Diseases Act which was passed by the British House of Commons were only eliminated when a united protest was made by politically organized women. Therefore, while non-partisan groups may have their uses, half a million women organized as a wing of some political party will get more results and get them more quickly.

Of course there are groups of women who absolutely refuse to agitate for special legislation to improve the general status of women or her working conditions. For instance the demand by large bodies of women in England that night work should be abolished for women is met with the objection that this discriminates unfairly as between men and women. These ultra-feminists then would have women continue working under conditions which are unsuitable merely because men are doing the same. Their influence is so small, however, that no one pays a great deal of attention to them for the simple reason that the majority of them are women who have no experience of factory life at all and therefore are not entitled to speak for vast bodies of women who want such conditions altered.

It seems to me as a friendly outsider that American women should not be content merely to work in campaigns for the particular candidates they favor but should help in some large measure to decide what the policy of the party shall be when it gets to power. Then it will be impossible for Congress to vote a miserly million or so dollars to maternity and child welfare work, a sum not to be available after 1929. This fact in itself shows whether or not the men politicians are taking their women seriously. I should like to see any of the political groups in Britain attempting anything similar. The first to do it would find itself out of a job at the following election.

Silly Marten

By MADEFREY ODHNER

He galloped nightly with the cavalcade
On the brown mare that foaled the filly moon.
Of starry stallions in the long parade
He rode as master—he the iron dragoon
Of ordered squadrons wheeling in the skies.
An ether swifter than sidereal light
Told Silly Marten when a planet dies
And when the grazing stars stampede in fright
Of some gigantic sun. So Marten thought
Who thought that thoughts are true. He had no words.
The words are mine and they are dearly bought,
Since having them, I think that thoughts are curds
In the digestion of an endless error.
His mare threw Marten and he died of terror.

Oklahoma Goes Rosicrucian

By ALDRICH BLAKE

FOLLOWING the Jack Walton upheaval and impeachment in 1923 and the brief interval of rest which came as the necessary aftermath of those hectic days, Oklahoma's political prophets were busy. And not a single one of them was right.

Oklahoma did not go Klan, as many of them predicted, or anti-Klan, or conservative or progressive or radical, or wet or dry. It did not even get excited about evolution and fundamentalism and modernism, as might have been expected in this tumultous young commonwealth.

Without blare, and hardly conscious of the mighty new forces that were forming, it simply went Rosicrucian. And there it promises to remain, at least until fall, when, according to those who claim to be able to read the political zodiac, another impeachment trial, unparalleled in history on account of the weird and peculiar issues involved, is in the offing.

Not that any of Governor Henry S. Johnston's enemies seek his removal merely because he has adopted this ancient philosophy and religion, originating in India, and which is supposed, according to Webster's dictionary, to enable the believer "to transmute metals, prolong life, know what is passing in distant places, and discover the most hidden things by the application of the Cabala and the science of numbers." Not that the Governor's enemies seek his removal because his confidential secretary, Mrs. O. O. Hammonds, is supposed to be able to send her spirit through space to investigate the character and ability of applicants for public office while her physical body is busy at a desk in the executive office; not because the Governor's principal unofficial adviser, James R. Armstrong, an uncle of Mrs. Hammonds, and an Oklahoma City lawyer of note, is a disciple of Super Akasha Yogi Oussan of Punjab, India, who recently slipped into Oklahoma in all his oriental grandeur as a sort of mystic pope of the quiet sect of Yogi, philosophers and healers, and whose method of "intuned "breathing" is supposed to have brought health and vigor to the failing Mr. Armstrong.

So far as the people of Oklahoma are concerned, the Governor may consult the stars and consort with the spirit to his heart's content, provided only that affairs of state are left to earthly creatures, and are conducted in a halfway efficient manner. It is because the present dictatorship of the spirits seems to be leading to governmental chaos that members of the legislature, who may, under the Oklahoma law, convene themselves in special session, are quietly discussing plans for a mass attack on the Governor's Rosicrucian legions in the next few months. In short, while the people are mildly amused and intensely curious about the Governor's religious views and do not object to the Governor's occult tendencies, as such, they are nevertheless alarmed at what they consider to be a new threat to orderly government. Accustomed heretofore to bloody political combat among mortals, they are naturally aghast at the prospect of a war with spooks and spirits.

In the early days when Governor Johnston was a member of Oklahoma's constitutional convention, he was known as a "good fellow" among his friends. He courageously led the losing fight on behalf of the liquor interests to keep prohibition out of the Constitution. Later he reformed and became a teetotaler, joined the church, and swallowed the Bible whole. The Rosicrucian philosophy, so he claims privately, is merely a higher phase of Christianity toward which all Christians are evolving and which is to be used during the coming Acquarian Age.

As a lecturer for the Masonic order, he became steeped in ritualism and afterwards fell an easy victim to the Ku Klux Klan craze. Of late, the spirits seem to have been unusually diligent in recommending and insisting on Klan appointees, in part, it is suspected, because Mrs. Hammonds, a leader in the Kamelia, and the Governor's constant companion, establishes frequent contact with the Klansmen in the other world.

In his race last year for the Democratic nomination, Governor Johnston was first in a field of seven, receiving barely one-third of the total vote. His election in the fall occurred when 150,000 Democrats, rather than scratch a ticket, stayed home, while many thousands of Klan Republicans were deserting their own nominee. In both campaigns, Johnston appealed secretly to the remnant of the Klan organization and publicly to the churches, for support. Scarcely a Sunday passed when he did not find it convenient to be in some small town where he addressed the Bible class, expounding in mysterious phrases the science of numbers and predicting the millenium in 1936. The good church people, enchanted by the possibilities of the new magic and touched by the sentimental flow of words and endless stream of ritualistic phrases, hustled to the polls to vote for Johnston, Christ, and the Millenium.

It was only after the inauguration and the convening of the legislature that a gentle stir in the political air could be noticed. When one day the Governor delicately suggested that he would like to sign the Crippled Children's Hospital Bill between 11:26 a.m. and 12:30 p.m. because the zodiacal signs were said to be favorable, the newspapers promptly notified the public and books on astrology were soon selling at a premium. The legislature, however, refused to budge and the bill did not reach the Governor's desk until several days later. Thus the lawmakers were successful in their first skirmish with the stars.

But, unfortunately, the Governor did not stop with astrology. Mere heavenly signs and prophesies, it seems, were not sufficient to guide the ship of state safely into port. It was necessary to consult the dead.

For this important task—according to the Governor's erstwhile political managers and friends, now in full retreat before the Rosicrucian gnomes, nymphs, sylphs and salamanders—he enlisted the services of Mrs. Hammonds, by some regarded as a sort of reincarnated Catherine de Medici, by others likened to Mary Queen of Scots, except that Henry's head probably will go on the block instead of hers. At any rate, it is this rather attractive little woman, with her flashing black eyes, quick gait, torrid, coarse conversation, and painfully limited experience, who is supposed to possess what the Rosicrucians call the "sixth sense" and who is indisputably the power of the realm in Oklahoma today, exercising what some of the capital scribes say is a "continuous hypnotic spell" over his Excellency, the Governor.

To appreciate the significance of the Rosicrucian "sixth sense" it is best to consult the official Rosicrucian pronouncement. "This extraordinary faculty," according to the Rosicrucians, "compensates for distance in a manner far superior to that of the best telescope and for lack of size to a degree impossible to the most powerful microscope. It penetrates where the X-ray cannot. A wall or a dozen walls are no denser to the spiritual sight than crystal to ordinary vision." Or, as another of the Rosicrucian Fellowship tracts says: "This sense enables its possessor to perceive and investigate the superphysical realms, where those live whom we call dead."

Alas, members of the legislature, victorious in their battle with the stars, found themselves baffled by the strange woman who guarded the executive sanctum. Party leaders soon fled in dismay, balked in their plans by the simple gestures of the mere female they usually found sitting by the Governor's side, and whose soul, they now suspect, was in the habit of flitting through the key hole, perhaps to some distant county to investigate the character of some applicant for public office, returning in the twinkling of an eye to whisper "no" in the Governor's ear. Even the fundamentalists, bent upon the passage of an anti-evolution law, found themselves in humiliating retreat as a result of the Governor's unexpected announcement that he favored Darwin, or at least the Rosicrucian interpretation of the Darwinian belief.

Exasperated, the Senate passed the Governor's highway bill during an unfavorable sign of the zodiac, refused to confirm his impossible appointees and otherwise defied the Rosicrucian gods. The Governor, meanwhile, seized the highway department, the contractors tied up all contracts by injunction suits, the national government threatened to withdraw federal aid and as a result of the mess not a mile of paved highway has been built in Oklahoma this year except [illegible]. The House held a secret caucus to which the Governor was invited, and where he was politely told his impeachment was imminent unless he surrendered. The House won a fleeting victory, and soon adjourned.

It was at this critical legislative juncture that "Uncle Jimmy" Armstrong and the Yogi priest entered the picture. No one seems to know just what the relationship is between the Yogi philosophy and the Western Wisdom Teaching of the Rosicrucians. But everybody in Oklahoma knows who "Uncle Jimmy" is, and that by virtue of his political acumen (the practical Oklahoma type), the Governor has been temporarily saved and Uncle Jimmy's law practice enormously enhanced—without, it should be added, any sinister reflection upon his ethics as a lawyer. It may be, of course, that Uncle Jim will prevent an explosion in the fall, but the earthly signs do not indicate it. Nearly enough signatures already have been procured to convene the legislature and the dog days of July and August give promise that the political pot, now simmering, will soon boil over.

Public opinion, still confused by the whisperings of those who visit the Governor, and by veiled references in the press about strange happenings at the capital,nevertheless is rapidly reaching the conclusion that regardless of the exact nature of the Governor's beliefs, they make him the dupe of designing plotters who are able to impose upon his credulity and therefore render him incompetent to serve as chief executive. And incompetency is a constitutional ground for impeachment in Oklahoma.

Not the least interesting aspect of the Governor's affairs is his own reaction to the forces which threaten to destroy him. Apparently either indifferent to, or ignorant of, the gathering clouds, he clings to Mrs. Hammonds, boasts of his "achievements," and warns the people against the "interests," which seems to be a word he uses to describe all who oppose him.

Newspaper men who have access to his office report that he will neither affirm nor deny in a clear-cut manner his alleged belief in Rosicrucianism. When the press first began to chide him about his faith in astrology, he gave the rather lame excuse that he wanted to sign the hospital bill at a particular hour to "please a friend." On the other hand, during his campaign for Governor, he often elaborated at length on astrological signs in his Sunday sermons. He admits that he is a vegetarian, and vegetarianism like astrology is a part of the Rosicrucian philosophy. A Fundamentalist, he still insists he believes in evolution, another phase of Rosicrucianism. Before Bible classes he seldom loses an opportunity to expound the mystery of numbers; and the Science of Numbers is a part of the Rosicrucian creed. Even his lifelong and exceedingly intense interest in the Masonic Order is not without significance, for Mystic Masonry is one of the courses taught by the Rosicrucian Fellowship at its school, Mt. Ecclesia, at Oceanside, California. And that Mrs. Hammonds, his chief confidential adviser, through some sort of alleged mystical or occult power, either hypnotizes him or appeals to him as a co-believer, is the conviction of every intelligent observer in the State.

While there are some who look forward to another open season on Governors in Oklahoma with all the zest of a good sportsman, there are others who regret that Oklahoma, after twenty years of Statehood, is still in difficulties. It is, indeed, a bit sad that just after conquering a horde of Dragons, Titans, Goblins, and Cyclops, we people of the great Southwest, where John Cowper Powys recently said he had found much that is finest in American civilization, should be bound and gagged by a swarm of spirits, and compelled once more to battle with the Great Unseen.

Diplomatic Sonnet

By HARRISON DOWD

I'd not attempt to name the moon again;
The moon is like too many things. Take care,
There is a certain circle in the brain:
Madness, to which we frequently compare
The moon. I knew a man who used to make
So many handsome titles for the thing
That he began to stammer and to shake
Like any cuckold at a christening.
At last one night this foolish fellow said,
"The moon is like," and stopped, because he had Forgotten every name inside his head,
So that he soon went quite completely mad
And sang to nobody, crazy as a loon,
"It's like a moon, exactly like a moon!"

Is Africa Going White, Black, or Brown?

By WYNANT DAVIS HUBBARD

I

AFRICA to be appreciated must be pictured not as just a jumbled collection of unrelated crown colonies and dominions, but rather as a homogeneous continent connected, wanderingly it is true, but nevertheless connected, by railroads, telegraph lines, river boats, and in some parts telephones and automobiles. Fifty years ago Africa was the Dark Continent. Today it is "Brightest Africa"; Africa developing and unfolding; an enormous continent with a magnificent future. Where formerly only a few of the more adventurous hunters, missionaries, and traders penetrated, there now stand fine hotels with electric lights and ice-making plants. Tourist parties ride up to the Victoria Falls in comfortable trains. Under the guidance of agents large parties even go from Capetown to Cairo by a combination of trains, lake boats, motor cars, and river steamers. "Darkest Africa" has gone. In its place has come an entirely new country.

The gold reefs of Johannesburg were discovered about 1886. Sixteen years before Kimberley and its unique diamond-bearing deposits had been brought to the notice of the world. Thus, although South Africa has been settled for a long period and many treks and wars have been made and fought, her real development is only some fifty years old. This youthfulness must be remembered when judging Africa.

Twenty-five years ago native wars ceased through the intervention of the white man. Traders made their appearance everywhere. Ranches were taken up, mines discovered, the railroad from Johannesburg to the Congo was being laid. The Congo was pretty well known in general. East Africa was opening up and the possibilities of the west coast were being intensively prospected.

Today Africa is known. There are localities which have never been mapped in detail and even some which no white man has ever penetrated, but as a whole Africa has yielded up her major mysteries. A compilation and study of the results show some amazing things.

Undoubtedly the most important single event which has taken place in Africa is the cessation of cattle, wife, and slave raiding. While this was prevalent only the most warlike of the tribes were sufficiently powerful to protect herds of cattle and large grain fields. The villages of the smaller tribes had to be mobile. Each village had its gardens of grain, pumpkins, and cassava. But these were hidden away in hard-to-get-at spots. Grain only barely sufficient for the actual needs of the village inhabitants was grown. As a result of this, drought years or years when an extra heavy rainy season brought floods worked havoc through starvation. The native population increased very slowly. The odds against them were almost too heavy.

Now that wars have been stopped all that has changed. Within limits natives graze their flocks and herds where they please. Each village is surrounded with acres and acres of kaffir corn, various small grains similar to millet, melons, tomatoes, pumpkins, cassava or bananas. There is no need for concealment. Herds can increase, no longer are raiding parties imminent nor do the flocks of goats have to be kept down to mobile units which can be rushed off and hidden at a moment's notice. On the high, healthy central African plateau prosperous villages are to be found on an average within ten miles in any direction from any given point.

II

Over this vast continent, which is as large as Europe and North America combined, are distributed approximately 180,000,000 Negroes of many different tribes, sects, and beliefs. There are so-called Christians, Mohammedans, and an almost infinite variety of native beliefs. To control them there are not 5,000,000 whites, 1,000,000 of these being concentrated in South Africa.

This handful of whites have done much in the short time they have roamed over Africa. Starting at Capetown, in Natal, at Walfish Bay, Zanzibar, Egypt, and the mouths of the Congo, Niger, and Senegal rivers, they penetrated Africa from all directions. The slave raiders, ivory hunters, and explorers went first. Many of them were ruthless and cruel. They caught natives and forced them to work without pay. They trapped them wholesale and shipped them off in fast raked-mast vessels as slaves. Elephant hunters of iron determination like Neuman settled among savage tribes and tamed them single handed. Courageous, far-sighted men of the type of Livingstone, Stanley, Moffat, Pasha and MacKenzie traveled over the face of the plateau. The reports which they brought out stimulated interest. Settlers came in. Governments were set up. As a result slave raiding was abolished, settlers could develop farms and ranches, railroads were dreamed of, mines were located, and the real development of Africa was begun.

Among the basic raw materials which are considered essential to our civilization cotton, copper, coal, wool, chrome, gold, sisal, and oil stand near the top in importance. Africa has an abundance of all save oil. Johannesburg alone produces more than three-eighths of the gold of the entire world. In the heart of the Congo copper is mined and smelted. The resulting ingots are shipped out over a long winding railroad to a port in Portuguese East Africa. Here they are lightered aboard a steamer. Yet even with the cost such transportation means, this copper can be landed in New York and sold at a profit for a lower price than domestic copper mined in Montana. As a wool grower Africa is prominent. She is a coal exporter and her interior countries are loaded with this valuable necessity. With New Caledonia she shares the chrome monopoly of the world. Cotton can be grown over vast areas. In Nyasaland a variety is produced which is classed as the best in the world. Sisal, tea, tobacco, fruit, grain, coffee, peanuts, wattle bark, rubber, and sugar are produced in quantities. From the west coast come palm oil, tin, mahogany, piassava, ginger, cocoa, and pepper. From the east come cloves, high-grade coffee, cotton, beeswax, sisal, grain, and bunker coal. From the north are exported dates, cotton, lead, zinc, phosphates, and gum arabic.

Youthful as the country is, railroads are being constructed. One has already reached the Congo. Others are being rushed to completion from either side. In [illegible] part the rails are pushing deeper and deeper. They are climbing up to the plateau, carrying with them traders and settlers, modern machinery, and blooded cattle.

Before many years have passed this movement will have been reversed. Instead of pushing up onto the plateau there will be the beginning of a downward deluge. Even today this has started. In Uganda so much cotton is raised and baled that the railroad cannot move it all.

When the day comes on which transportation becomes adequate to the needs of the country, streams of cotton, grain, sugar, meat and coal, copper, zinc, and other materials will pour down off the plateau. The ports will be even busier than they are now. Where today there stand twenty to fifty electric cranes, there will be sixty or perhaps a hundred. The towns will hum and double-track railways will have to be constructed.

No one who studies the climate and geology of Africa can fail to appreciate her enormous economic resources. Africa's position in this respect is second to none. Her available water power alone totals more than a third of the total potential water power of the entire world. Rich in gold, in land, with all types of climate from temperate to tropical, with railroads and motor cars, office buildings and fine hotels, great mines and the beginnings of an export-produce trade, what of the future? To whom will Africa eventually belong when all this wealth is exploited?

Today Africa contains 180,000,000 blacks. It is impossible to estimate how many cattle, goats, sheep, and hogs they own. From observation in the Rhodesias and Portuguese East I would guess that there is at least one domestic animal for each native. Cultivated acres are in about the same proportion. If this is true Africa has about the same number of domestic animals as the United States, 60,000,000 more of population and about half as much cultivated land. But there is one difference. The United States is white. The figures which I have quoted are for the Negroes of Africa.

At present the produce output of the Negroes is only slightly in excess of their requirements. In a good year each village throughout the plateau produces a certain number of goats, sheep, cattle, fowls, eggs, pumpkins, corn, kaffir corn, beans, peanuts, yams, tomatoes, melons, and bananas which are sold. Not every village produces all of these products, but it is the exceptional one which will not have at least nine of them. Not one of these products is the equal in quality of those which a white farmer or rancher will raise. But neither is the price the same. In proportion to quality the produce of the native is the cheaper.

The natives are increasing. Just how fast they are multiplying it is impossible to say, but that they are multiplying is beyond doubt. If the rate of increase could keep pace with the increase in production of food stuffs all would go well. But it has not to date. The increase in production has been greatly in excess of the increase of population. This will probably continue to be true. What then?

If it were merely a question of trade the problem would be comparatively simple. The native grains would be used locally for mines, etc., and the grain of the whites would be exported. This is true today in a small way. But the native is improving his produce. In southern Rhodesia the government is supplying blooded bulls to raise the standard among native cattle. In Uganda the Negroes have received cotton seed and been instructed how to plant it and collect the cotton. All over Africa the natives working for farmers have stolen or received as gifts seed corn and other seeds of a better grade than their own. In Portuguese East natives raise sugar, cotton, onions, and fruit to sell as well as grain.

This higher standard will probably mean competition for the white man. Undoubtedly as the native increases and produces more and more produce this produce will gradually become better and better. A certain quantity will find its way into markets formerly opened only to white produce. For this produce the native receives money or the equivalent of money. It is here that the danger lies.

The whites in Africa are dependent on the blacks for labor. In the majority of countries where whites rule a hut tax varying from five to ten shillings a year has been imposed on all male natives. While this produces revenue, the idea is to force the native to work. The tax must be paid in cash, not kind. It was thought that by imposing a cash tax the native would have to work.

But if he can sell grain, live stock, cotton, tobacco, sugar or some other product, the native will not have to work, at least for a white man. Further he will tend to become fianancially independent of the whites or at least indifferent. Natives today can be found working as farm laborers, in railroad gangs, as miners and as cattle herders. But there are a great number working as brick layers, storekeepers, stenographers, farm foremen, cooks, carpenters, gardeners, locomotive firemen, police, court interpreters, and nurses. These are far from unintelligent. Indeed it is my belief, after handling well over a thousand natives from a dozen different tribes, that the average native African is as intelligent as the average white man. He has not the knowledge the white man has nor has he the background. But he is decidedly intelligent.

In British East Africa and Uganda native labor is already becoming difficult to obtain. The Negroes there are becoming independent of work as a means of securing cash for their hut taxes. The raising of profitable crops such as cotton or tobacco and the ready sale they obtain for fowls, eggs, and other produce account for this.

III

There is another factor which enters into the competition, present and future, between blacks and whites, and that is the missions. Missions can be divided into three classes: industrial, medical, and religious. For the first two I have a great deal of respect. They are really helping the Negro. For the religious missions I have no respect whatever nor can I see that they help the Negro in any way.

At an industrial mission Negroes learn to make bricks, to build a wall, saw, carpenter, garden, wash, cook, and to become nurse boys. Such occupations or trades enable the Negroes to earn more money than they would as general laborers. They have easier hours and are not subject to the rigorous attentions of the capitao or native foreman. With their money they can have more clothes, beads, wives, food, or cattle than their associates and consequently go up in the world a step. At industrial missions the Negroes also learn to read and write both their own language and English. They learn to figure a bit and they come to understand the use and advantages of some of the white man's tools and implements. In all ways they progress and, what is more, they keep their self-respect.

The medical missions do much to alleviate pain and stop possible epidemics. They are in intimate touch with the medical side of native life and are in a position to be of great value to both whites and blacks and also to the government.

But the religious missions! They tear down the belief of centuries and build nothing in its place. They condemn many native customs and practices. Where possible they forbid them. The result of this is that religious missions break down the homogeneity of a tribe, they confuse and bewilder and instead of being constructive are utterly destructive. A religious mission-trained native is one to avoid. In the compound they are fomenters of trouble. They are whiners, men who have lost their self-respect. In contrast to the upstanding courageous kraal native, or the native who has a trade, a religious native is an abomination, a total loss, a washout. More often than not he is a thief and braggart, shiftless and lazy.

Once I was camped in the village of N'kala in the Kafue River district of Northern Rhodesia. While I was there a missionary came to preach. He preached to a large gathering in the native language which I understood. I listened dumbfounded to a recitation, with embellishments, of how God regarded the whites and blacks as equals both on earth and in Heaven, of how the Negroes when they died would fly to Heaven and sit at ease in golden chairs mingling on a basis of equality with whites.

I have the greatest respect for Negroes. I like them personally and collectively. One or two of my old hunters and nurse boys I love as much as I ever loved any white man. But I recognize that the Negro in Africa occupies at present a very distinct place. And most certainly that place is not a place of equality on earth with the white man I do not know about Heaven. But I do know that I have never seen a missionary eating with an African Negro, sleeping or bathing with one, or doing anything except order him around most imperiously. I have, however, seen missionaries kick Negroes, beat them with bullock straps, and hammer them with canes. Once I saw one force a balky Negro to chew up a mouthful of dry quinine and epsom salts.

But to go on with the story. After the sermon was over I invited the preaching missionary over for some tea under my wagon. I had not seen a white man for two months and wanted to talk. We had been sitting for ten minutes or so when N'kala came over. He is an old man and very dignified. After the proper greetings he squatted down ten feet away and began a conversation.

"N'kos," he addressed me, "I wish to ask the Bwana a question."

One must be familiar with Africa to appreciate N'kala's choice of language. N'kos means chief. Bwana is the term used for any white man. By addressing me as N'kos he was showing respect. But what did he intend when he referred to the missionary as Bwana and, further, why should he have asked me to ask the Bwana a question when he knew perfectly well that the Bwana could speak and understand his language as well if not better than I?

"Yes, N'kala," I answered him, "what is your question?"

"N'kos," he began, "I would ask the Bwana this: When he spoke to us the Bwana told us that we were the equal of the white Bwanas. He said that when we died we would go to the same place that white Bwanas go. The Bwana told us that his God had told him this. Will the Bwana then tell me why his God did not tell me that? Why was it necessary for his God to tell the Bwana to tell me that I am his equal?"

I passed that on to the missionary without adding any embellishments of my own. When he understood what the question was he poured forth a line of eloquence I have never heard equalled. What the point of it all was I never quite understood. He piled up quotation on quotation from the Bible and talked at length about Christ and his teachings, but he did not answer N'kala's question. He could not because there is no answer.

When he finally subsided N'kala, who had been listening intently, turned to me and said: "N'kos, please tell the Bwana that what he says may be true." He got up, then shrugging his shoulders, continued: "It is a pretty story. But it is a story for children. We old men . . ." He walked away very dignified and erect, his dirty skin blanket flapping around his skinny legs.

The results of missionary teaching are these: A native told that he is the equal of the white man leaves his village and goes out to work. If he balks at any particular job he is either fined, dismissed, or given a hiding, most probably the latter. He finds out that even though in spirit he may be the equal of the white man practically he is not. The result is that missionaries in particular and white men in general go down several notches in the natives' estimation.

Industrial and medical missions tend to raise this estimation again. But the general opinion among natives is that all white men are mad. From the evidence which natives see, who is to say that they are so far wrong?

IV

A phenomenally rich country is Africa, a young country but yet an old country. A continent with a population already large, yet increasing steadily; a population black as to skin, but composed of men and women who are as a whole very courteous, kind, understanding, hard-working and intelligent. They are backward and primitive, they wear few clothes, but their chiefs and leaders are men of wisdom and wealth. The tropical climate suits them, they are indigenous.

Ruling this country and competing against the herds and flocks of the natives, their grain and produce, their increase and labor, stand a handful of whites.

What will be the outcome? Will the whites surrender their large concessions in response to demands for land by the natives? Or will they try to segregate the blacks and hold them in reservations? Can they do that? The whites have developed cotton, rubber, and cocoa plantations; mines, railways, and irrigation projects in which huge sums of money have been invested. Will they surrender these? Will whites allow natives a voice in government and thus afford them an entering wedge?

I cannot answer any of these questions. I feel that there are three possibilities: first, that Africa will eventually be a black country; second, that the whites will wipe out the blacks; third, that whites and blacks will interbreed and produce a new brown race which will control the wealth of Africa. I believe in the inevitable eventuality of a black Africa. I am not sure but that I would like to see it. The whites, after all is said and done, have not progressed so far beyond the Negroes in the one commodity of life which means much—happiness. In this, in spite of our telephones, subways, electricity, etc., the natives of Africa far excel the vaunted civilized white men. And is not happiness the ultimate aim of our own existence whether we be white, yellow, brown, or black?

Press Comment on the Sacco-Vanzetti Execution

TO the everlasting credit of their editors, the newspapers that we quote below maintained steadfastly that grave doubts concerning the guilt of Sacco and Vanzetti existed—grave doubts that would not down. The execution, as the following editorials of the morning after reflect, served only to intensify the fear of many that possibly an irrevocable mistake had been made.

Waterbury (Connecticut) Republican

Millions of people all over the world believe that two innocent men have been legally murdered, and there is at least a fair possibility that they are right. Millions of others who have no decided opinions as to the guilt of the men, regret their execution after seven years of imprisonment as an unfortunate misuse of the death penalty. Only a very small proportion of intelligent people, it is safe to say, heartily approves the outcome of this case. . . . The majesty of the law is upheld when it proves itself inflexible against the winds of passion and prejudice, but not when it proves itself impregnable to the criticism of the public conscience. The law waxes in power when it withstands the shouting of the mob, but it wanes in authority when it will not heed the sober reasoning of good and wise men everywhere. The damage has been done, and the State of Massachusetts and the United States will not soon recover from it.

Waterbury (Connecticut) American

The indisputable fact is that suspicion exists, and not only among radicals but among thousands of thoughtful conservatives as well. Surely it cannot be considered insidious or irresponsible levity to maintain that a recurrence of such doubt and suspicion ought to be prevented if possible by a revision of criminal practice in the courts of Massachusetts, calculated to anticipate the objections and delays which have made of the Sacco-Vanzetti case an international scandal.

St. Louis Post Dispatch

Recalling the martyrdom of Socrates, John Huss, Joan of Arc, Savonarola, Giordano Bruno, and John Brown, the Post Dispatch adds the names of Sacco and Vanzetti to the impressive list of those who have died to live again in the imagination of millions:

Like many of these others, Sacco and Vanzetti were of the lowly of this earth. We do not know if they were guilty or not. They did not die like it. Neither does Massachusetts know. If she had, she would not have waited seven years to kill them.

We do, however, know that they long ago entered that great domain of human psychology in which time at last evaluates all things coolly, [illegible] of innocence and injustice complete from 399 B. C. to 1927 A. D.

New York World

[illegible] can: one reviews the evidence, and tries to see it as conclusive; one reflects that justice should not be subservient to popular [illegible] somehow have got the right men. Yet, try as one will, [illegible]

Baltimore Sun

Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti went to their execution with dignity; unafraid. There was nothing in the manner of their death to shake the belief of many persons that they were innocent of the crime for expiation of which their lives are taken. Humble in calling and alien in thought were these two men. Yet in the seven years and more of their imprisonment, in the quiet courage with which they faced an end unmitigated by religious faith, they proved themselves of sturdy mold. . . .

Over common sense, reason and mental honesty prevails the widely held conviction that in this case Massachusetts has blundered terribly. The world-wide cry of protest is based on something more substantial than sentiment or propaganda. It is in large part the voice of a humanity which, whatever its country, is deeply stirred by any seeming trespass on the high cause of simple justice.

Pittsburgh Press

There lies before the people of America the duty of seeing that never again shall such an exhibition of judicial ineptitude mark the course of American justice. . . . Seemingly these two accused men have had the benefit of every legal protection. There have been writs of every kind, petitions, motions and appeals and every move has been met, so it appeared, by a readiness of the courts to listen.

Yet the fact has been this: So far as the courts were concerned, the fate of Sacco and Vanzetti has rested from the very day that Judge Thayer pronounced sentence on them, solely in Judge Thayer's hands. There never has been a time that any other or higher court could intervene in their behalf unless Judge Thayer was prepared to admit formally that he had erred. Understand what that means. Unless Judge Thayer could bring himself to say that he, through personal prejudice, had caused these men to receive unfair treatment in court, no court in the land had the power to step in and set his judgment aside. . . .

The work now to be done is to bring about a careful, calm, impartial inquiry into the Massachusetts judicial system. Good can be wrought out of this present mistake—for we cannot recede from our conviction that this execution was a tragic mistake—if through this mistake the courts of justice in America can be protected against such mistakes in the future.

Toronto Mail and Empire

That millions of Americans will be shocked at the news that Sacco and Vanzetti have actually been put to death is the one unanswerable comment upon the tragic business in Massachusetts. A month ago it seemed incredible that the supreme penalty would be inflicted upon them. It seemed almost impossible that the three distinguished citizens whom Governor Fuller appointed to assist him in reviewing the case would arise from that task with their minds purged of doubt.

But that he did make mistakes in the course of his handling of the case is not to be denied. He made a cardinal error in the personnel of his commission, which should not have been composed wholly of members of the class against which Sacco and Vanzetti and their like had carried on their puny warfare. The committee itself stands convicted of at least one grave mistake in assuming that a certain cap found near the scene of the crime had been identified as belonging to Sacco. There was no identification. On this point at least the committee showed a misconception of the evidence submitted. Other evidence was ignored, particularly the notes, only recently available, of the Pinkerton operatives who had investigated the crime almost immediately after its commission, and which are strongly favorable to the accused men. But as we have said, the whole case from beginning to end deals almost exclusively with probabilities.

NEW YORK TIMES

There remains visible a body of intelligent and disinterested opinion which became stirred by the Sacco-Vanzetti case purely out of an unselfish fear that a wrong might have been done, that men accused of murder might not have had every opportunity to establish their innocence, and that there was danger lest American criminal procedure should have a stain affixed to it in the eyes of the whole world. Say, if you please, that all this was founded upon a mistake, and was too much of the nature of mere sentiment. But, in any case, it was a creditable and noble sentiment.

MILWAUKEE LEADER

Perhaps we shall never know whether or not these men had any connection with the payroll holdup, but we know that witnesses swore that they were elsewhere, and that these same witnesses, like honest men, recently demanded that they be put on trial for perjury so that they could prove that they told the truth. We know also that even the Governor's committee stated that the trial judge was guilty of a "grave breach of official decorum," which is enough in itself to invalidate the trial in the eyes of fair-minded men. And we know that they had to make their motion for a new trial before the same judge, and had only his decision to appeal from to the higher courts. This judicial procedure is incredibly unjust. In the face of such a travesty, the men must be presumed to have been innocent.

Let there be no reprisals in kind. The working class must prove itself higher and better and nobler than the ruling class. But let this terrible injustice increase the determination of the workers of the world to change this hate-producing social system into a brotherly one.

BROOKLYN DAILY EAGLE

Controversy over this case will not soon die out. It will continue to be clouded and exacerbated by extravagances of statement on both sides. There will never be agreement unless new facts affecting the guilt or innocence of the dead are discovered and proclaimed. But it would be well if agreement could be brought about regarding the need for reform in the judicial procedure of Massachusetts in cases of capital crime. . . . There has been no review of the evidence in this case by the Massachusetts Supreme Court. That court was concerned only with the legal power of Judge Thayer to rule as he did. Moreover, it was made possible for Judge Thayer to be the arbiter in proceedings challenging his own impartiality —a judge sitting in judgment upon himself. These facts affecting the judicial system of Massachusetts have provoked widespread criticism from men who speak with authority on judicial processes.

NEW YORK TELEGRAM

We may pass by the frantic threats of anarchists and communists. We may ignore their efforts to terrorize officials of the law. We may pay no heed to their foolish charges that capitalism was back of an effort to kill these men, guilty or innocent. For we do not sympathize with their views concerning government and law.

But we do have great respect for the decent opinion of mankind, and while we had no strong conviction as to the guilt or innocence of Sacco and Vanzetti, the Telegram, in the interest of justice, strongly favored a new and fair trial to the end that mankind might form an intelligent opinion based on a full and impartial presentation of the facts.

"Have Faith in Massachusetts"?

LETTERS FROM OUR READERS

Neither Sense Nor Pity

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I want to pay my tribute to John Dos Passos for his magnificent letter to President Lowell published in The Nation of August 24. Again we see the wonderful wisdom in Death which will continue to remove the old.

And again we see it is not the proletariat who brings on bloody revolutions but the oppressing class that never has either sense or pity. Either quality would have prevented the Sacco-Vanzetti executions. There was world doubt as to their guilt, and this doubt I as a lawyer of nearly forty years practice share, but in any case seven years has gone by—the men have suffered much. Society would not be benefited by killing them, but now they have been made martyrs.

I share John Dos Passos's view of the stupidity of the Lowell report and a certain class callousness in it, and I think Governor Fuller has been more vindictive than law itself, and more stupid than a politician ought to be.

CHARLES ERSKINE SCOTT WOOD

Los Gatos, California, August 22

Those Maddening Pacifists

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Now that the burnings in Boston are over and the real trying of the Sacco-Vanzetti case but fairly begun, I am not sure but that the most penetrating word that has yet been spoken is that of the "professor in a Southern university" who writes in your issue of August 24 of his fear that the execution will cause honest Americans "seriously to doubt the possibility of justice from our government under its present organization." It is amazing that the reactionaries have not been able to perceive that here, at a single stroke, they have done more to further the cause of radicalism in the United States than everything that either real or fancied Red propaganda has been able to achieve in ten years. In sheer desperation, if not otherwise, hundreds of Americans must now drive into the radical camp. Of Sacco and Vanzetti, as of others, history will record that they accomplished more for their faith by dying for it than they could possibly have secured through continued life.

Personally I cannot claim to share, in any definite way, many of the specific beliefs, such as they were, of Sacco and Vanzetti. But the pacifism of the two men is exceedingly suggestive in its bearing on the larger outlines of the case. It was fitting and proper that these who refused to slay should themselves be slain—slain under the monstrous and horrible pretense that they themselves were slayers. Among all the beliefs which those of us who are liberals share in common, none gives greater offense to our rulers than our spineless, recreant pacifism. They may forgive us for everything else: they will never forgive us for refusing to believe that it is the human creature's happy privilege to slay for his ideals! Here again, it seems to me, is a lovely example of the blindness of the reactionaries. Let them thank God that the liberals of the world are pacifists! It will be a sad day for them if they ever succeed in converting us to their ghastly faith. Gentle, tolerant human beings have marked the cross of blood on their oppressors before this: they may be driven to do so again. If liberalism is ever forced into the shambles again, it is hard to say who will be slain, but one may be very confident that it will not be helpless conscripted men of other nations, with whom we have no quarrel. God save us all from such a reckoning! And God give cowards and bigots the grace to see that they are even now doing their very utmost to bring mankind to such an imbroglio!

Seattle, Washington, August 25 EDWARD WAGENKNECHT

From a Native of the State

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As a native of Massachusetts I wish to extend to you my sincere thanks, and assure you of deep feelings of gratitude because of your masterful article, Massachusetts the Murderer.

And the sound principle of building better without destroying the good we now have, of eliminating the undesirable by education rather than by violence—this will meet with the approval of all well-meaning people. And most people are well-meaning; they only need to be shown the way. And I wonder if one good way is not by learning to think for ourselves as we read and listen, and not too readily accept as proper the actions and statements of some of the officials elected to maintain justice?

CHAS. L. HAMBLIN

Marstons Mills, Massachusetts, August 29

Poets' Last Chance

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Please permit us to compliment you on your stirring editorials on the crucifixion of Sacco and Vanzetti; and to issue through your columns a last-minute call to poets to contribute to the anthology of poems of protest against the murder of these two martyrs which we plan to publish in book form this October. We shall issue it as a tribute to the enduring memory of these heroes and as a contribution toward making impossible the repetition of such an offense against civilization as their frame-up. Dr. John Haynes Holmes has kindly consented to write the introduction; and many leading poets have contributed —assuring a dignified memorial.

RALPH CHEYNEY,
LUCIA TRENT,
Publishers of Contemporary Verse

75 Claflin St., New Haven, Connecticut, August 25

The Los Angeles Times

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Readers of The Nation need no enlightenment as to the reactionary calibre of the Los Angeles Times. I doubt, however, if one can fully grasp the social menace of such a newspaper until one has been forced to depend upon its distorted immediate news source during the progress of such an important story as that of the Sacco-Vanzetti case, as has chanced to be my misfortune for several weeks. During that time every press service and special story to the Times dealing with the Sacco-Vanzetti case has been so edited as to exclude the views of almost every person of note who has been enlisted in behalf of the two victims of Massachusetts justice, whether American or foreign. In editorials, news and feature articles, and through the skilful manipulation of headlines, the distinct impression was created that only Reds were offering any opposition to the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti.

The Times carries each day a prominently displayed column called "The Lancer," written by Harry Carr. Something of the quality of his thinking and something of the manner in which the Times indulges in misrepresentation may be gathered from the following, which I quote from Mr. Carr's column in today's Times:

> [illegible] hundred [illegible] negative value for the [illegible] Sacco and Vanzetti has been of positive value. It has brought into the bleeding ranks a tremendous number of citizens [illegible] who have been [illegible] enemies of the United States. As usual, the effect of this murder will come from [illegible] common people. Socialists of the Debs-Thomas-Hillquit type [illegible] Debs [illegible] against everything [illegible] the general principles of mud-sling and scurrilous writers. All of these people will be making trouble [illegible] Sacco and Vanzetti had never existed.

During the same period the Times has continued its campaign of vilification and misrepresentation against the Bureau of Power and Light of the city of Los Angeles, representing one of the most successful public ownership enterprises in America. The explanation lies in the fact that the ownership of the Times is heavily interested financially in the Southern California Edison Company, the private competitor of the Bureau of Power and Light. The municipal group has no newspaper through which to reach the taxpayers in order to offset the campaign of the Times, and is forced to resort to circularization by mail.

Los Angeles, August 26 GUY EMERY SHIPLER
Editor, the (New York) Churchman

As Seen from the South

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am doubtful about human progress being helped along by the case of Sacco and Vanzetti. The groups which forced and conducted the trials and convictions of Socrates and Jesus Christ, for instance, were at least honest and direct in their accusations. Now, from the evidence available, it seems that the conviction of Sacco and Vanzetti is secured on the basis of prejudices obviously existing but concealed under the charge of murder. This looks worse to me than a mere miscarriage of justice, without any particular prejudice causing it as sometimes happens in our courts; instead of any sign of progress, I see here a clear case of degeneracy. In all history I do not know of any apparently worse cases of outraged justice under the cloak of clear, impartial justice. Heretofore you might be burned at the stake or have your bones broken on the wheel for being a heretic; but usually, if my history is right, you were charged with being a heretic if you were put to death for being one; or at any rate those who put your lights out tried to keep up no illusions as to the nature of their government. I would much prefer to live under the sway of a Machiavellian prince, who would at least be enlightened, and honest if possible—but always enlightened in his dishonesty or cruelty—than to live under a government which is so unskilful in its hypocrisy, or criminally dull.

Raleigh, N. C., August 16 A. Z.

Modern Saints

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am pasting the portraits of Sacco and Vanzetti in an illustrated Bible I possess, so that others looking at it may count them among the saints who have enriched life with their Christ-like utterances.

And that Bishop of the Church of the Prince of Peace who was in the "four-to-one" group to congratulate Fuller upon his act of loving kindness and righteousness, was it not of him that Anatole France wrote when he described Judas as being the first Bishop of the Church but not the last to betray Christ?

New York, August 25 I. GEORGE DOBSEVAGE

In the Driftway

FROM the moment the Drifter and his cowboy friend entered a restaurant in the small Western town he was exploring, he had been interested in a man at the next table. Six and a half feet of raw-boned lankiness was slung over an inadequate chair. A tall narrow head, with a tight ring of sweat around it to show where a hat had rested; a leather-colored face; hair a gray yellow, parted in the middle; eyes small but twinkling, set in the wrinkles that come from living out of doors in a sunny country. He wore an ordinary suit, but his trouser legs were stuffed into high-heeled cowboy boots and a ten gallon hat hung on a peg above his head. To the Drifter at least he typified the Old West and he was making the best of an opportunity to study at close range a passing phenomenon when his friend's voice broke in upon him. "See that old desperado over there?" He indicated the man with the tall head, and went on. "That's old Bill Cory. A slick one if there ever was one. He came from Texas, but he landed in this valley in the early days. They say he was run out of Utah and Colorado and I don't know where else before he settled down here." He lowered his voice. "Do you remember that big train robbery that Geraghty pulled on the Great Northern years ago? Well, Bill Cory never tells nothin' on himself, but he did say one day that Geraghty rode his (Bill's) white horse that night.

* * * * *

WELL, as I was saying, he came here years ago. He didn't have a cent when he got here, but in three years he had 500 head of cattle—and he never bought a cow in his life. You see, it was this way. The biggest cattle outfit in the country in the old days had a brand like this. . . ." He drew on the tablecloth a bar and the number three (—3). "Well, Bill's brand was a cross and the number eight (+8). See how he got 500 head of cattle? But he never stole from his friends.

* * * * *

HE still lives over on Raft River. He's got a little shack down in the willows. You can't see it until you're right onto it. One night on the way home from a roundup I tied my horse and sneaked up to the door and opened it by surprise. Say, he had me covered before you could say Jack Robinson. He laughed when he saw who it was, but he said, 'You'd better not do that again. This might go off accidentally, before I knew it was you.' He always carries a gun. He's got one right now under his left arm inside his coat, where it's easy to reach. Come on over, I'll introduce you." The man from Texas rose to his lean height and the most genial of smiles lighted his brown face, as he extended an enormous hand. "Stranger here? . . . Yes, I've been here a good while now. But it ain't like it used to be. There's nothin' here now but dry farmers and their damn fences. An' you can buy a cow and calf for $15!"

* * * * *

THE old West is passing. There is no place for Bill Cory in a generation of law and order. But the Drifter cannot help regretting the breezy virtues and the large-handed sinning of the frontier.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Rock Dusting in Mines

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of June 22 appears a review by Powers Hapgood of a book on "The Rock Dust Remedy" written by Harry Phythyon, a Pennsylvania mine inspector. Mr. Hapgood holds Mr. Phythyon up to praise for "having the courage" to stand as "one against a thousand" in his opposition to rock-dusting bituminous mines as a means of preventing mine disasters due to coal-dust explosions.

Mr. Hapgood would have it appear that the rock-dust remedy for coal dust explosions was "a mistaken theory" which the United States Department of Mines is trying "in a brilliant advertising campaign" to "put over" on the public.

As a matter of fact, the rock-dust preventive of coal-dust explosions is not a mere "theory" but a demonstrable fact. This discovery of modern engineering science has been reinforced by ample and convincing practical experience in both American and British mines. Also as a matter of fact, which Mr. Hapgood could easily have ascertained, the nation-wide campaign for state legislation to require coal companies to safeguard the mines against coal-dust explosions by the use of rock dust was initiated five years ago—and is being continued with encouraging results by the American Association for Labor Legislation.

When this association in December, 1922, opened its present campaign against needless coal-mine accidents it pointed out that about 15 per cent of the fatalities in bituminous mines were caused by coal-mine explosions; that coal-dust entered into practically all "major" explosions, and that for this class of accidents there is a simple, inexpensive, and effective remedy —rock dusting. The effectiveness of rock dusting had been demonstrated by engineers of the Bureau of Mines, but this scientific information had been buried in government reports.

Six States have already enacted provisions for rock dusting. Indiana's new rock-dusting law, adopted this year, is based on the "Standard Bill" prepared as an aid to uniform State legislation. This bill embodies the "standard practices" recommendation of the American Engineering Standards Committee. These recommended standards for applying the rock-dust safeguard in the mines were thus formulated after the most painstaking consideration by representatives of the following organizations: American Institute of Electrical Engineers, American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers, American Mining Congress, Associated Companies, National Safety Council, United States Bureau of Mines, and United States Department of Labor.

Already hundreds of lives have been saved by rock dust in American mines. Seven hundred miners owe their lives to this safety device in the most recent coal-mine explosions in Pennsylvania. A similarly spectacular saving of human lives occurred in the New Orient mine at West Frankfort, Illinois, in January, 1926.

Foreign experience is also impressive, and this, too, is ignored by Mr. Hapgood. In Great Britain rock dusting has been required by law since January 1, 1921, and it has successfully eliminated disasters due to coal-dust explosions. For the past ten years rock dusting has been required in the gassy and dusty coal mines in France, and no explosion disasters have occurred in the French mines during this period. After a quarter century of requiring water sprinkling as a safeguard against coal-dust explosions, Germany has now completely abandoned sprinkling and adopted the modern and effective remedy of rock dusting. Germany's new law, which is the result of long study and careful tests by the mining authorities and coal operators, thus recognizes the superiority of rock dusting over watering as a means of explosion prevention.

New York, August 15 JOHN B. ANDREWS,
Secretary, American Association for Labor Legislation.

The Real Arabian Nights

IF YOU had sat at the Sultan's feet, on the same cushions of the haremlik, as Scheharazade wove the pattern of these wondrous tales into a many hued oriental tapestry of words, you would have enjoyed "The Arabian Nights" no more than you will this sumptuous, illustrated limited edition.

For years the translation of Richard Burton has been the last word. But it is no longer. Dr. J. C. Mardrus translated the exotic Eastern tales into French, treating the unblushing, original Arabian text with the deft and delicate touch of a great French artist. From this complete, unexpurgated version, E. Powys Mathers has given us "The Arabian Nights" in English, more complete, more beautiful, more scintillant than it has ever been before.

Privately Printed for Subscribers

Publication of this most complete and authentic edition of the epic of the East brought the highest praise from the British press.

"In the 'THOUSAND AND ONE NIGHTS' the tale after all is the thing, and the tale is better told by Mardrus than by Burton. But let not those who are jealous of every word suppose he has attained this result by the method of a sub-editor. For artistic presentment the abhorred shears are not necessary. All the superfluities have also a value. Burton cut out a great deal. The Mardrus version is very much fuller in detail."—The London Times.

LIMITED EDITION—NOW NEARLY EXHAUSTED

A very few sets of the edition remain unsold. No plates of this book exist. When the few remaining sets are sold, no more will be available. Your opportunity to own these books is limited to a very short time.

Superbly printed. Frontispieces in four colors from Persian illuminations. Bound in 8 volumes on rag paper or in 4 volumes on thin bond paper. Four thousand pages of text.

DINGWALL-ROCK, Ltd., Dept. 19A
45 West 45th Street New York City

DINGWALL-ROCK, Ltd., Dept. 19A
45 West 45th Street, New York City

Gentlemen: Without [illegible] information in detail about "The Real Arabian Nights"

Lives of the Past
—the Living Present

O Rare Ben Jonson
By BYRON STEEL

Who, if not vastly, should compel and entertain? A young American's enchanted pen has rescued the great Elizabethan from academic death and restored him to us as a picturesque, profane, and vivid contemporary. $3.00

The Romance of Villon
By FRANCIS CARCO

Translated from the French by Hamish Miles

The Villon of history, extricated from the prettified figure of popular legend—and in the process made actually more romantic. Illustrated. $3.00

The Promised Land
By LADISLAS REYMONT

The Peasants won Reymont the Nobel Prize for Literature; and that great work is now received as a classic in most modern languages. The Promised Land—a great panorama of the peasant uprooted and exploited in industry—is the other half of Reymont's original conception. Two volumes boxed, $5.00

Selected Prejudices
By H. L. MENCKEN

The first five volumes of Prejudices represented in a one-volume selection painstakingly made by the author himself; the choicest of his aversions and prepossessions. $2.50

Land of the Pilgrims' Pride
By GEORGE JEAN NATHAN

A critic of life and letters makes a penetrating examination of recent salient changes in our code of sex morality and related subjects. $2.50

On the Steppes: A Russian Diary
By JAMES N. ROSENBERG

A vivid account of present-day conditions in agricultural Russia as the author saw them in 1926. $2.50

Life and the Student
Roadside Notes on Human Nature, Society, and Letters
By CHARLES HORTON COOLEY

Here's a book which the publisher issues with pride and assurance, not because of its author's eminence, but because we believe it contains as much lasting wisdom, expressed with as much dignity and trenchancy, as any American volume whatever—and we do not forget Emerson and Thoreau. $2.50

At All Bookshops

Catalogue upon request. The Borzoi Catalogue of Books for Children upon request.

Alfred A. Knopf

Publisher BORZOI BOOKS New York

Books and Music

Legend of the Brazier Man

By PIERRE LOVING

He touched the flesh once of a newborn
Child: deviltry mocked his wandered blood,
And when his hand had cooled at last he stood
As one bewildered, fawn-eyed, sucking grass
As though the splashed green blade—but he, alas,
By this had stumbled through a mile of absent corn.

He stumbled through pale thickets of his days. His hand grew thin
And what it was possessed
It to turn palimpsest
He never knew until it moaned, began to flicker,
Flanged up, proclaimed itself a brazier Spring
Had kindled leaves with in old times. His blood poured quicker
Now whenever at her increment
The green year, between her flowers and stars and ministering,
Like a running girl half-spent,
Would let him kiss her hair or bind her latchet.

Out of a cloud dropped weather of strange music. "Wind-
hover,
Windhover, snare me in your flight design. To match it,"
He cried, "swiftbird and gull and plover,

You must consider speed's not wing
At all, wing clatter is not beauty." Spring's over,
Yet he is on his knees to Spring.

Voyaging on the Unconscious

Blue Voyage. By Conrad Aiken. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

THE new fiction like the new poetry has been attacked and championed chiefly on the basis of its form. In their anxiety to prove that its novel technique was or wasn't a rational medium, few critics have considered asking it more pertinent questions, and thus it has escaped a perilous accounting by the ordinary standards of fiction. It is time that attention is shifted, as it eventually must be, beyond this initial stage. For though in the mixed multitude that followed and preceded Joyce there were many who used the modernist motley to hide their nakedness, the outstanding figures are all able artists who have deliberately chosen the cut and color scheme because it suited their purpose. They have modern psychology and the recorded evolution of literary form overwhelmingly on their side, and instead of doubting the validity of their instrument there are more reasons for inquiring: Why, with all this specially invented machinery, have they so signally failed in their peculiar purpose? This does not reflect upon the form. Its advantages are obvious, and any athletic mind can accustom itself to it as readily as to the various literary conventions which habit has naturalized. And if to a devotee of Addisonian prose "Ulysses" seem like the product of a linotyper in the last stages of delirium tremens, think of what a jungle Addison is besides the simple declarative of the Bible. Even the crude asides of a melodrama villain is an attempt to render, on a double plane, complexities of mind unintelligible because unconscious in primitive literature. But granting the necessity of an amphibian form to track the amphibian modern mind to its sub-conscious recesses, the question still remains: why, with all its profound soundings and patient dragging of the unconscious, has it failed to bring up monsters out of the deep? Not mere data concerning them, however detailed, nor recollected nightmares, but creditable tangible beings such as swim about in the pages of Dostoevsky, Hardy, and Wasserman, caught with the hook, line, and sinker of ordinary narration.

In his first novel, which is in many respects the most successful exploitation of the new method, Conrad Aiken rephrases the same situation. If he breaks through the procreative impotence of some of his fellow craftsmen and comes nearer to achieving individuals, it is because he stops his "stream of consciousness" long enough to incorporate in it passages of thinly disguised description. All of which seems to point to the fact that swimming the "stream of consciousness' is as yet in the nature of an aesthetic stunt, and not thoroughly dependable for all the purposes of fiction. A terribly wasteful feature of it is that the chief protagonist and owner of the stream of consciousness on which the work is built is so psychologically eviscerated in the process of extracting it from him as to be unrecognizable. William Demarest, the hero of Aiken's novel, is a young writer voyaging to England in the hope of meeting his Belle Dame sans Merci, a snobbish Englishwoman of quality aptly called Cynthia, who floats unattainably in his fancies like the moon over a love-sick tom-cat. On the trip, those of his fellow passengers who impinge on his consciousness are made to live for us—some of them unforgettably. But of William Demarest himself we know very little. Or perhaps too much. At least all that he pours forth about himself fails to coagulate into an individual. It may be argued that—thanks to psychoanalysis—we know too much about individuality to think it individual; that the contents of the unconscious, which the line of individuality follows, reveals itself under analysis as monotonously the same within certain limited classifications. Perhaps—but there is also the possibility that our eyes are not yet accustomed enough to the new psychological landscape to see its peculiarities.

Mr. Aiken's style in "Blue Voyage" is opportunistic. It switches from free association to methodical self-analysis according to the exigencies of the occasion; and sometimes clue and solution follow each other rather more obviously and more inevitably than either science or art would justify. As such it is less consistent but more readable than Joyce. Some day, when the symbolic language of the unconscious has been sufficiently [illegible] we will be able to employ it freely in literature. After all, everyday speech itself is nothing but a collection of worn-out symbols. In the unconscious we have a ready mint where the defaced coinage of modern speech can be perpetually restored to meaningfulness. Therein lies the literary value of such a test trip as "Blue Voyage."

ALTER BRODY

Acknowledge the Wonder

Mornings in Mexico. By D. H. Lawrence. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

MR. LAWRENCE continues to shoot skyrockets over Indian villages. In the quick-shot glow and long glimmer of sparks, he sees distorted shadows, whirling jade knives, plumed serpents, throbbing terrors, and now and then a clear-etched glimpse carving out the pulsating core of an alien people. But, in general, he pictures shining leprosy on a background of darkness. He holds up a warped plank full of holes where bent soul-nails have driven out other nails—come d'asse si trae chiodo con chiodo. Remarkable poetry, the sweeping dance and turn of prose attuned to elemental tides—but he hushes reality better to hear his own celestial symphony. He makes a shrouded ghost out of a healthy brown-skinned animal, and then, like a fever-stricken Lady Macbeth, washes out the bloodstains in a phantasmagoric record of fretful fear and hate, grim inquisitional geniality, fire-lit with dreams that burn luridly over the ramparts of his sick but ambitious soul. I speak of "The Plumed Serpent" as much as of the present slender volume of eight cactus-thorn essays.

Unfortunately the record, in both the volumes named, is not so stark as the foregoing would suggest; to achieve intense apperception of the dithyrambic communal quality of Indian mass-life, Mr. Lawrence has burned mystery incense before many humble understandable things. With a drawn face he peers at the Indian village through trembling cloudy fingers—an inverse sentimentalism not unlike that of uneducated women in villas, and indeed Mr. Lawrence's coign of vantage is a sort of Mexican mud villa with parrots, a dog, a "dumb-bell" servant; and he writes on an onyx table.

To use Mexico as a flail to excitate one's soul is one thing; to approach it scientifically or with poetic reality is another. The counter-poise to Mr. Lawrence is such a writer as the great old chronicler, Bernardino Sahagún; or the graceful ease of Flandreau's "Viva México!" or if we turn elsewhere, Borrow's "The Bible in Spain"—all the sinuous, muscular, nonsentimental records of men who went abroad to work, to conquer, to live, to understand, to build.

Mr. Lawrence declares Mexican myths hold "no grace, no charm, no poetry." Bunk! His own half-told myth of the goddess giving birth to a "razor-edged blackish-green flint" illustrates the contrary. Since when did poetry agree to be tender? And what is more lovely and tragic than the departure of Quetzalcoatl, the Evening Star, from Tula, to embark on his raft of snakes over a distant sea? How about the legends of the Nahuatl heavens? Of the trip to Aztlán? Mr. Lawrence states that the goddess of love is a "goddess of dirt and prostitution, a dirt-eater, a horror." Undoubtedly he refers to Tlaclqüani (Eater of Unclean Things), the Goddess of Carnality; but how about the real Goddess of Love, the spring-clear beauty of Xochiquétzal (Precious Flower), or of Chicomexóchitl (Seven Flowers)?

Lawrence would like to be a free pagan, wear the Tolstoian mujik caftan, would like to be a hale Walt Whitman, "using pornography for chaste ends"; would like to be able to exclaim with Pinel, "What a magnificent cancer!" But naturalism creates in him constant fascination and shuddering recoil, and out of this shuttle flares the lightning-cleft of insight denied lesser writers. The English puritanical queasiness clings; fundamentally he hates the grape-heavy southland; all normal animal functions become distorted. He loves to mess in the mud with one ginger toe, then gets conniption fits at the sight of his soiled digit. The fortunate result of this arte d'essere infelice is just such glorious prose that wreathes so many of the pages of "Mornings in Mexico."

Yet this recoil, ending in stubborn isolation, this semi-hatred of others, though it incapacitates Lawrence to know the homely joys of Mexican life, nevertheless accentuates his appreciation of differences, of contrast, of bold color, of surging [illegible] communal life and psychology; the semi-animistic approach to the forces of nature; the indigenous Bergsonian concept of the time-stream as opposed to the white man's painful piecemeal exactitude; the reckoning of distance in subjective terms of beauty or physical fruitions. [illegible] thinking of the Indian in curves, not the white man's straight lines "hacked out against the will of the world." Faithful, too, is the author's sensitivity to the creative surge welling up in the corn dances, the snake dances: the dancer, "slightly bending forward, a black gourd rattle in the right hand, a small green bough in the left, . . . the eternal drooping leaf that brings life down, down, down from the mind, down from the broad, beautiful shaking breast, down to the powerful pivot of the knees, then to the ankles, and plunges deep from the ball of the foot into the earth, toward the earth's red center where these men belong, as is signified by the red earth with which they are smeared."

But in general Lawrence's approach to the Indian is that of wonder, wonder tinged with sentimentalism, with foreboding, with anxiety over the fate of the white monkeys when the present Fifth Sun shatters—and since this wonder is exactly the Indian's own approach to the universe, it betrays that Lawrence, though quite outside indigenous intimacies, lacking intellectual rapprochement, is emotionally coalescent with the whole mainstream of Indian life-consciousness. Says the Indian and says Lawrence, "Thou shalt acknowledge the wonder."

CARLETON BEALS

The Sense of Tragic Life

A Good Woman. By Louis Bromfield. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.50.

NOT unlike that God whom his hero Philip Downes created in his own image after years of unbelief, Mr. Bromfield is concerned with the "whole glowing tragic spectacle of living." His interest even includes Jason, the mocking sensual dudish little runaway husband of the Good Woman, and Naomi, the white-faced sloppy ecstatic missionary, and the Reverend Castor, who has listened to the troubles of his women parishioners and lived with a hellion for fifteen years. As in the other novels he is preeminently interested in Lily Shane, who has escaped the Town, but whose beauty and gaiety and sinfulness are still a legend in it; and in the play of character on character and of the community on the individual. He is interested in the gathering social conflict, and has a keen sense of the changes that have taken place in the Town as the old pleasant feudal system of living, based on agriculture and trade, has given way to the new, grimy, flamboyant, breathless, but still feudal system, based on manufacturing. He sees the Town growing bigger and dirtier and harder and faster and more poignant and inarticulate in its tragedy. He sees the necessity for that escape which is the theme of his four panels of American life that are concluded with this novel, pressing more insistently on those uncomfortable individuals who cannot accept its Gods or its aesthetics or its morals or its system of economic distribution. He sees, though not so poignantly, for his sense of life is chiefly that of human life, the splendors of the Jungle and the mist on the Flats in the moonlight.

Unfortunately the fascination with which he tries to surround the figure of Lily Shane is never quite satisfactorily accounted for in her actual presence; it even seems sometimes to rest rather heavily on her ability to live luxuriously on a wealth that is indirectly piled up by those same new industries whose encroachments, grime, and rapacity she and her mother so generously resent. The forces that destroy Philip are still chiefly forces outside himself—his mother's encroachments on his will and personality—instead of those more subtle and alarming forces that operate equally to destroy men whose life is lived in a freer spiritual atmosphere than that of the Town. Instead of arising out of the conflicting impulses of human nature, the hazards of the story are supplied by the pet indignations of a clear-eyed young man who can put a firm finger on all the weak spots in his environment and say, if the church were not so besotted, if the capitalist system were not so unjust, men might be free. In short, this novel, that starts out with an interest in the whole tragic spectacle of living, loses itself sometimes in the literature of protest. This is not to deprecate Mr. Bromfield's interest in that gathering social conflict to which most of our competent novelists are strangely blind; nor foolishly to suggest that that conflict is in itself other than supremely important. But the fundamental traits of human nature are less affected by the particular economic theories a man may hold than the ardent advocate of a new system is prone to believe; and it is fallacious to represent the

WORLD - FAMOUS WRITERS PRAISE BEST SELLING NOVEL IN AMERICA*

OIL!

By

UPTON SINCLAIR

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD: "One of the most remarkable books that I have ever perused and one of the most readable."

CLARENCE DARROW: "Few novels have impressed me as much as 'Oil!'"

JOHAN BOJER: "This novel is created by a great poet, a great artist, and a great heart. Since Emile Zola I can't remember a similar work."

* First on the list of one leading wholesale distributor. Second on the list of the other.

At all bookstores, $2.50

THE JOURNAL OF WILLIAM MACLAY

With an introduction by CHARLES A. BEARD

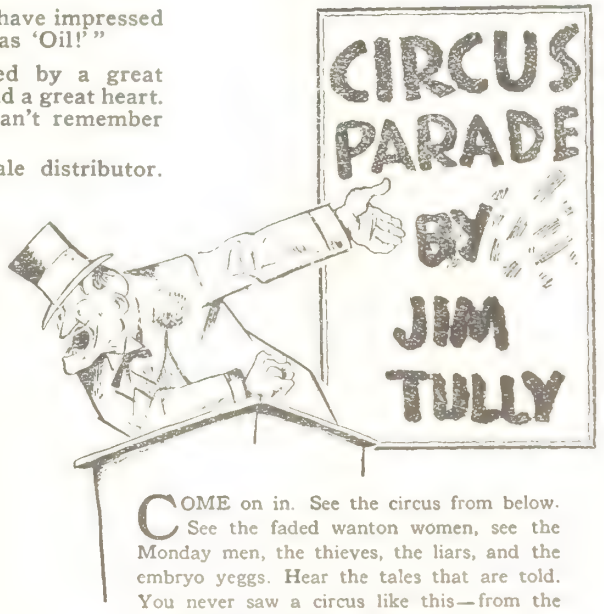
"One of the most precious human documents for the study of American manners, morals, and intelligence, political and general. It deals with the period which witnessed the inauguration of the federal government under the Constitution. Through the burning glare of its spot light stalk, amble or drift all the distinguished personalities of the age, from George Washington to Fisher Ames.
Anyone who wants to discover the spirit that lay behind Jeffersonian democracy simply must read, nay study, this JOURNAL; and anyone who loves rich old lore, like wine in dusty bottles, must make it a familiar companion."
—From the introduction by Professor Beard. $4.00

THERE'S NOT A BATHING SUIT IN RUSSIA

And Other Bare Facts by
WILL ROGERS

"It is a fine achievement to succeed simultaneously in two such difficult and mutually exclusive fields as humor and politics."—N. Y. Times.

Illus. $1.75



COME on in. See the circus from below. See the faded wanton women, see the Monday men, the thieves, the liars, and the embryo yeggs. Hear the tales that are told. You never saw a circus like this—from the inside. If you have read Beggars of Life, you know what to expect. Illustrated, $2.50

GEORGE JEAN NATHAN
"The best achievement in a portrayal of the mean sphere it deals with that I have encountered since the mean tales of Gorki. Tully has got the rawness of life as few American writers have been able to get it, and, with it, a share of poetry and of very shrewd penertation."

WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE
—in the Emporia, Kans., Gazette
"Realism is here—hard, terrible realism that will shock the life out of unsophisticated readers. . . . For straightaway descriptions of unpleasant scenes and primitive peoples this book has no equal in the season's offerings."

JAMES STEVENS
"This is what Dante would have written if he had travelled with a circus instead of through hell. Hellishly magnificent."

HARRY HANSEN—in the New York World
"Jim Tully came to grips with life a long time ago and hung on by his teeth. He has written 'Circus Parade' and it is a wallop. And it's my tip to you that if you want the small-town circus as it was, in a straight-hitting fashion, you should get 'Circus Parade.'"

THE LIFE OF BUDDHA

By A. FERDINAND HEROLD

GLEANED from the epics, the poems and the legends of India, this LIFE OF BUDDHA retains all the exquisite beauty of that ancient literature. The author has invented nothing; the life as he traces it from the miraculous birth of the infant Siddhartha to the legendary death of Buddha, is taken from the original texts; but he has used a poet's discretion in the choice of incidents, and while preserving color, the atmosphere and the imagery of the original, he has contributed a beauty of form and a poetry of language that is his own.

Illustrated, $3.00

Albert & Charles Boni - - 66 Fifth Avenue, New York

defendants of the present order as necessarily gross, and the advocates of the new as necessarily idealistic.

Mr. Bromfield's equal interest in the individual and in the social scene against which the individual moves is evidence that he has in him the makings of a major novelist. But so far, and the fact is especially marked in this, perhaps the best of his four novels, the two interests work antagonistically, since in his desire to paint a passing social scene of immense significance he makes his characters symbols of the various aspects he wishes to dramatize, destroying them as individuals in order to stand them up against a wall as tendencies and shoot at them. But no sooner does he invade their individualities than they cry out to him that after all they are real people. And because he is a real novelist, he sets them walking on their own feet again for a page or two.

The style, which has always been more flowing and rhythmical than individual or exact or poignant, has gained considerably in this book. And we could ill afford to exchange Mr. Bromfield's wide canvas, his verve and his sense of life, for a half-dozen happy phrases. It remains to be seen whether his seeming contentment with the casual or approximate word and his rather hasty and inadequate presentation of many scenes marks a real artistic limitation, or is a natural defect in a man whose characteristic it is to be more interested in a scene as a whole than in its details. For though Blake's dictum that "to generalize is to be an idiot, to particularize is the great distinction of merit" is devastatingly true, it is also true that a great talent gets itself fully into control more slowly than a small precise one; and there is no question in my mind that Mr. Bromfield has great talent as a novelist.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

The A B C of Communism

Communism. By H. J. Laski. Home University Library. Henry Holt and Company. $1.

IN the important series of monographs in the Home University Library such writers as Lord Hugh Cecil, Professor Hobhouse, and Mr. Macdonald have contributed expositions of Conservatism, Liberalism, and Socialism. Professor Laski, who has already written on Karl Marx, completes this series on political parties with distinction by the present volume on Communism. It has been said that to understand a movement one must first sympathize with it, and the earlier books in the series have been written by outstanding members of the parties concerned. It is a high compliment to Professor Laski's ability that, while writing as an avowed critic, he has yet succeeded in leaving no impression that the strength of the Communist argument has been understated. For ten years Conservative journals have been conspiring with Labor newspapers to advertise the game of Communism; it is fortunate that somebody should be found to expound in a book of brilliant lucidity what the game means.

Modern Communism, Professor Laski recognizes, is Marx writ large; it is the gospel of Marx and the acts of Lenin. Hence Mr. Laski's treatment of what Engels, in contrast to "scientific Socialism," termed "utopian Socialism" is of the briefest. As a consequence, the book reads as the history not of a dream but of a system. The paradox of Marx is that he was an individualist by temperament, as much as Plato was an aristocrat. It is the conservative monk who is the practicing Communist. The iron had entered into the soul of this exile, Marx, and it is as a bitter individualist that he took over the smugly individualist assumptions of the classical economists. As a result his Labor theory of value is better as a demolition of the individualistic economy, with its assumption of natural equality of bargaining power between men and its further assumption that each man is paid what he is worth, than as a constructive document. Negatively, it effectively contrasts the optimistic theory with the facts of capitalist society in the middle of the last century. But, positively, its economic theory is as mistaken as Marx's proof that the proletarian revolution would come first in the most highly industrialized countries. Professor Laski has not fallen into the trap which has caught many of the critics of Marx, has not attacked the words of an indifferent economist and allowed the ideas of a prophet less endearing but more important than Mazzini to go unscathed.

Similarly negative and uncommunal is Marx's political doctrine. The facts which confronted Marx were those of the industrial revolution and the fruits of lucre, self-help, and free competition. It was the kind of age when most men would have been in agreement with Sir Ernest Benn. Principles of Eternal Justice, proclaimed by Godwin and Sismondi, were ghostly stuff to turn back the clock of invention which had recorded the passage from an agricultural into an industrial civilization. The distinction is perhaps scarcely clear in Professor Laski's book between the interpretation of history in terms of the material instruments of civilization and the more ephemeral and rationalistic interpretation, typical of Marx's times, in terms of the psychology of acquisition. But the book lucidly states the doctrine of human bondage to physical needs, and of that competition for the alleviation which wealth can give between those cities of "haves" and "have-nots" into which Lord Beaconsfield divided the contemporary world. Professor Laski endorses Marx's premise of the existence of the conflict of class interests, but he declines to draw Marx's conclusion that the competition must inevitably become fiercer and develop into class-war which, the Leninist wing not illogically maintain, carries the corrollary of violence.

The weakness of the constructive and community side of Marxian Communism is shown by the vagueness of the New Age. This, for Marx and Lenin, is to follow when the state, instrument of conventional order and of class oppression, after having been turned by the proletariat against their enemies, the obstinate opulent or the undisciplined anarchist, has accomplished its last work of destruction and is itself destroyed. Such suggestions as have been made by Trotski—of the first interest in their discussion of such topics as the place of the expert—seem to look forward to an age of American efficiency, Slav self-abnegation, and control by the Russian mujik and town-laborer. The trouble with scientific Communism is that, in its Russian example, it has little chance to be scientific. And, against Bolshevik political strategy, Professor Laski protests with Mr. Bertrand Russell that the intelligent cooperation of Communism is not to be encouraged by engendering the class hate and contest for power of Leninism.

Professor Laski has the happy gift of writing important books, and the present is no exception to his practice. By solemnly warning us that, unless we give due weight to what is just in the Marxian diagnosis of social ills, we are contributing our little mite to promoting the trial of the drastic Marxian cure, Professor Laski deserves the thanks of all those who are pressing for social research as preliminary to sound diagnosis and for scientific social reform "in our time"—and in time.

GEORGE E. G. CATLIN

A Major Prophet

The World in the Making. By Count Hermann Keyserling. New York. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

IT will be recalled that Count Keyserling, the contemporary pilgrim of eternity, after satiating his soul with Oriental mysticism, at the end of "The Travel Diary" renounced his allegiance to the East in favor of the Western world of action. "We are the hands of God," he assured us. In the present work he casts his eyes over the creation of these hands and with a far glance down the future pronounces it ultimately good. While his view of culture as the outward expression

More Contemporary Americans

By PERCY H. BOYNTON

Setting aside the prevailing pessimism on the subject, Mr. Boynton sets out to defend American life and letters. His six chapters on certain literary spokesmen who have gained recognition are interspersed with discerning comment on the many various innovations of American life. $2.50

Plays for Three Players

By
CHARLES RANN KENNEDY

In the classic tradition, but startlingly new in manner and presentation, each of these three plays is an idea dramatized. "The Chastening," "The Admiral," and "The Salutation" are fine and original additions to the drama as it is heard or read. $2.50

The Old Testament

An American Translation
By J. M. P. SMITH, T. J. MEEK, A. R. GORDON, AND LEROY WATERMAN

This fresh, accurate version brings the Old Testament directly from its original language to our own without the hindrance of intervening translations. It gives new meaning to one of the most important books the world has ever known.
Cloth $7.50, Leather $10.00

Jesus

A New Biography
By
SHIRLEY JACKSON CASE

The newspapers say, "blasphemous," "silly," and "heretical." The Christian Century says, "not the Jesus of the stained glass window, but the Jesus who lived and walked with men." Thoughtful readers will find it a straightforward, stimulating account of the real Jesus of history.
$3.00

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS

The Ten Princes

Translated from the Sanskrit
By
ARTHUR W. RYDER

Unfaithful wives, sages, rakes, kings, gay girls and gods, court ladies, merchants, nuns, and courtesans troop through these pages in gorgeous procession. Their views upon the wise conduct of living provide undiluted entertainment for the truly cultivated reader. $2.00

Roosevelt and the Caribbean

By HOWARD C. HILL

Harry Hansen in the New York World calls it "the sober second thought of the historian . . . . a very able study of this president's policies and politics." And the Herald Tribune says, "Professor Hill has turned the X-ray of historical criticism upon Roosevelt's Caribbean policy." $2.50

The Nature of the World and of Man

". . . . fascinating reading. . . . . The book has taken on the unity, the coherence, the mastery of one great epic poem." —Chicago Tribune ". . . . the story is well told, well illustrated, and well colored with human significance . . . . popular without being diluted." —The Nation. $5.00

Seventeenth-Century Lyrics

Edited by A. C. JUDSON

This sort of carpe diem philosophy is being repeated over and over again in much of our modern poetry. Besides John Donne, Richard Lovelace, Robert Herrick, and the rest. They were more modern than they knew. $4.50 of an inner spirit is identical with Spengler's and while he agrees with this arch-pessimist that culture today is everywhere dead or dying, he believes that he can see clearly the phoenix egg of a new birth. Whereas former national and racial organizations were developed around particularistic religious sanctions of emotional and untransferable character, modern civilization, based upon applied science, is daily proven to be essentially transferable. Relatively independent of tradition, it can be picked up almost over night, as in the case of Japan. This means that a world unity is actually in the making before our eyes. The spirit induced by modern industrialism is world wide. "Since the decline of antiquity no revolution has been equally cataclysmic," and again "The technical is grasped by a larger percentage of all people than any cultural achievement since the Stone Age." This means the triumph of the generally human over the particularistic, over race and nation. The perfervid nationalisms of the present day are doomed in the nature of things. Already since the war super-national blocs of nitherto unheard-of proportions have arisen: the Anglo-Saxon, revolving about London and New York, the Pan-Islamic, the Russian Oriental.

The ultimate goal, centuries ahead, is the ecumenic state embracing the whole world. But Keyserling has no fear that this world will remain mechanized. The abstract intellect, which has attained such priority over other activities of the human spirit, is after all only a part of it. The spirit in its essence is irrational, its religious and aesthetic demands perennial. In the long run, wearied of its mechanical toys, its external organization stabilized, it will return to a cultivation of itself and a new culture will arise. But this will be a world-culture, the expression of a new type, the world-man.

Readers of "The Travel Diary" do not need to be told that such an outline does no justice to the wealth of suggestive and original ideas which Keyserling drops lavishly on every page he writes, or that it overlooks the numerous inconsistencies which are a part of his fertility of thought. But the chief value of this new work lies in its pertinence. Here is a philosopher who has something to say not only about the Absolute but about his own generation. Here is a man who in the midst of the greatest revolution in history has some curiosity as to its significance. Whether his specific prophecies be correct or incorrect depends upon how far he himself is the type of the future—for he himself is just this man of the world whose far-off coming he prophecies.

ERNEST SUTHERLAND BATES

A Lyrical Mind

The White Rooster. By George O'Neil. Boni and Liveright. $2.

THE poetry of George O'Neil exhibits a union of two qualities rarely fused in any epoch and more rarely still in our own. There is enough aseptic and unillusioned intelligence about him to enable him to tread the path of T. S. Eliot if he wants to. There is enough immediate magic of melody and image to put him in a common realm with Yeats. It is perilously easy for a poet to become a mind and cease to be a musician. It is a peril that E. A. Robinson himself has not always avoided. And poets with a gift for singing and for pictures often lack the detachment of the equipment for thought.

"The White Rooster" seems to me a notable volume, first of all because it sings with a vital and insistent music. But its song is song with a substance and its substance is that of a questioning and unmitigated intelligence. I think most readers will be struck by the song and the energy before they are arrested by the mind. The title poem is an evocation of that positive color of life which is the peculiar domain of poetry:

> Ah God! to have a breast like that
> To throw at day,
> Thrust for the hands of dawn
> To quiver and flare upon.
>
> [illegible]
> And all yourself an arch.
> [illegible]
>
> [illegible]
> Tear at the sky!
> With his spine a tilted flame.
> [illegible]
> What singer could not make one song
> [illegible]

But if they are careful, they will discover a significant crackling in the flame. It is the sound of a modern and skeptical mind, singing instead of sobbing, and remaining, though skeptical, upon a major and vital note. There is an almost brazen stab and hurt of beauty in the lines and in the consciousness of this poet, who can also write:

> [illegible]
> To wander blindly over ruined land,
> Where no word falters between thwarted friends
> And no pathetic lover lifts his hand.

"Events" is a kind of inverse ironic history written by an unfooled observer who sees the toad on Napoleon's path, the raindrop that falls on Cleopatra, and the thrush that sings while Tristan and Isolde sleep.

Mr. O'Neil keeps his eyes clearly on the edged and vivid surfaces of things, he keeps his voice limpid and his mind clear. A poet who can do that demands attention. A poet who can do that should not permit himself ever, as Mr. O'Neil does on a few occasions, to be obscure.

IRWIN EDMAN

Superior History

History of England. By George Macaulay Trevelyan. Longmans, Green and Company. $4.25.

THIS book will never be a rival of the other one-volume textbooks of English history on the market, since it confesses to a series of Lowell Lectures as a point of departure and is written by one of the few men now alive who not only can but invariably do write history which is also literature. The author presupposes, it is true, both information and interest which the American student probably lacks, but there is more than adequate compensation for this in the superior workmanship of the volume as a whole and in its charming style.

It is an understanding book.

> [illegible] of Anglo-Saxon and Dane is like Macbeth's battle on the blasted heath. Prophecy hovers around. Horns are heard blowing in the mist, and a confused uproar of savage tumult and outrage. We catch glimpses of giant figures—mostly warriors at strife. But there are ploughmen, too, it seems, breaking the primeval clod, and we hear the sound of forests crashing to the axe. Around all is the [illegible] of waves and [illegible] of seamen launching their ships.

It is a book of enthusiasms. The zest of the author for his task is patent in his accounts of the Vikings and of the Normans; he warms to his subject visibly in his brief but penetrating sketches of Wyclif, Cromwell, Marlborough, the great Whigs, Wilberforce, and in his quiet estimate of Victoria.

Moreover, it is a fair-minded book, well informed, always intelligent, very frequently stimulating. The author knows his Chaucer and his Shakespeare as well as he knows Parliamentary statutes and the latest monographs, and uses them as freely.

He stubbornly clings to his earlier view that the Lollard movement persisted until the sixteenth century. He is equally at home in the corporate life of the Middle Ages, in the towns and villages of the seventeenth century, and in the England of the Industrial Revolution. The chapters devoted to the Stuarts are perhaps the best in the book, as might be expected, but those dealing with the Tudors and with the earlier Hanoverians are not less brilliant. Finally, it is a sustained book (it is hardly the author's fault that the nineteenth century is something of an anticlimax in English history), and it is a teachable book, by reason both of its intelligent organization accompanied by very skilful subordination of detail and because of its numerous and excellent maps.

A few quotations, though selected at random, will suffice to give the flavor of the book. "If Alfred's lot was cast in narrower geographical limits than the Napoleonic area of Charlemagne's activities, his work has lasted longer." "Green earth forgets—when the school-master and the historian are not on the scene." "Our constitution was the child of Feudalism married to the Common Law." "Pym and Cromwell had to tread the path of revolution to procure the armed force which the Parliamentarians of the Middle Ages normally and legally possessed." "Her [Elizabeth's] bold decisions are few and can be numbered, but each of them began an epoch." "English king worship was the secret of a family and the spirit of an age." "The riddle of Oliver must be read not in his mutable opinions but in his constant character." "Nelson is the best-loved name in English ears." "In the earlier scene, man's impotence to contend with nature made his life brutish and brief. Today his very command over nature, so admirably and marvelously won, has become his greatest peril. Of the future the historian can see no more than others. He can only point like a showman to the things of the past, with their manifold and mysterious message."

SIDNEY R. PACKARD

Books in Brief

International Problems. By Tommaso Tittoni. London: Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent. 10/6.

The President of the Italian Senate has been making official and political speeches during a long and honorable career. Those conserved in this volume no doubt served an excellent purpose at the opening of various sessions of the Italian Senate and on other official occasions. Reprinted, they serve to show how impeccable sentiments may be expressed in the finest oratory and merely fall on the air. On economic subjects Signor Tittoni is as correct as on all others. Only in one, strangely companioned with its bedfellows, does a human being break through when discarding form Signor Tittoni makes a long speech full of gossipy interest about Stendhal on the occasion of unveiling a memorial to him. The book is avowedly published to help to an understanding of Fascism. It does show that a great European Liberal could go on making the same speeches before Mussolini seized power and after. But an air of correct ineffectiveness that pervades it hints at a cause for the exasperation which helped to make Mussolini what he is.

Wolf Song. By Harvey Fergusson. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

"Wolf Song" begins with Sam Lash and two other mountain men riding from their winter beaver trapping into Taos—riding to "white liquor," "brown, willing women," and "fat eating and store fixings." It ends with Sam Lash in primordial embrace with Lola Salazar, daughter of Castilian grandees. "Antagonists who could neither triumph, they struggled in a grip neither could break." Wolf songs are always about women, and this one the reader has no desire to break away from. It shivers to the marrow and throbs to the sky. On the one hand it depicts the struggle between

"You Must Have Spent Years on Shorthand"

"No; I Learned it in 6 WEEKS!"

HER employer laughed [illegible] "You're joking, Miss Baker. No one could learn shorthand in six weeks. You have been with us about a month and you are by far the most competent secretary I ever had. Surely you don't expect me to believe that you gained your present speed and accuracy in only six weeks." Why, a great many of our stenographers have studied shorthand for ten months or a year or more and still they make a great many errors."

"That isn't their fault, Mr. Chapman. Old fashioned shorthand requires months of hard study and practice even when it is mastered it is difficult to read. But Speedwriting is very easy. I—"

"Speedwriting? What's that?"

For answer the girl handed the big business man her notebook.

"Why, this is remarkable, Miss Baker. It's in simple A. B. C.'s!"

"Yes, surely. That's how I learned it so quickly. Anyone can learn Speedwriting. There are only a few easy rules. There are no hooks or curves; every 'character' you use is a letter you already know—one that your hand needs no special training to make."

"Well, that's the most remarkable thing I ever heard of. I could use that myself at board meetings and a dozen other places. You can write it rapidly too?"

"One boy I know who studied Speedwriting in his own home, took court testimony at the rate of 106 words a minute after only 15 hours of study."

[illegible] I really believe I'll take it up myself!"

Two months later Mr. Chapman and all his stenographers were Speedwriters.

Speedwriting

[illegible] fashioned methods of learning and writing shorthand by this marvelous new system, which may be written with a pencil or on a typewriter; can be learned in a third the time needed to master any [illegible] rapidity.

Mail the coupon tonight. It will bring you an illustrated book full of examples and stories of successful Speedwriters all over the [illegible] fill that need better with Speedwriting.

BRIEF ENGLISH SYSTEMS, Inc.
200 Madison Ave., Dept. 152J New York City

Also Offices:
1415 Royal Bank Building [illegible]

[illegible]
200 Madison Ave., Dept. 152J, New York City.
[illegible]

Name . . .
Address . . .
City . . .

between Anglo-Saxon frontiersman and Spanish pride and breeding—the theme Mr. Harvey Fergusson worked out so well in "The Blood of the Conquerors." He knows these men of the mountains: their way of raising hair, of wolfing meat, of telling tall tales, of taking what they want, of following the blazing trail struck by the immortal Jim Bridger. Perhaps he does not know human nature so well. But he does know how to tell a story.

Employment Statistics for the United States. Edited by G. Hurlin and William A. Berridge. The Russell Sage Foundation.

When Wesley Mitchell contributed his volume on "Business Cycles" to [illegible] he compared the study of Big Business in respectable statistical terms. Since then economists have busied themselves in gathering [illegible] presenting more accurately the facts of employment. The study [illegible] the necessity of checking up such statistics with va[illegible] as trade unions and employment offices, and [illegible] of presenting the results in a form which [illegible] the average man of affairs, not economist. [illegible] an excellent outline for any [illegible] to undertake accurate [illegible]

Wine, Women, and War; a Diary of Disillusionment. Anonymous. [illegible]

Too bad that it is not as illegal to mislabel a book as a bottle of whiskey. Instead of fatal title and misleading jacket, this volume could have a man's better chance to make its proper [illegible] Its contents will disappoint seekers for sensation and [illegible] Those who want exciting and colorful narratives of [illegible] Harvey Allen's "Towards the Flame," for example. But those who have not already had all the gallantry they will need since they have [illegible] read; an unedited and unexpurgated diary of life in the American S. O. S. in France. The [illegible] gives [illegible] and had [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] iterates a single note; and it is obvious that Beethoven is bowing to the limitations of the horn of his day. Therefore, since today the horn can play the theme, it does.

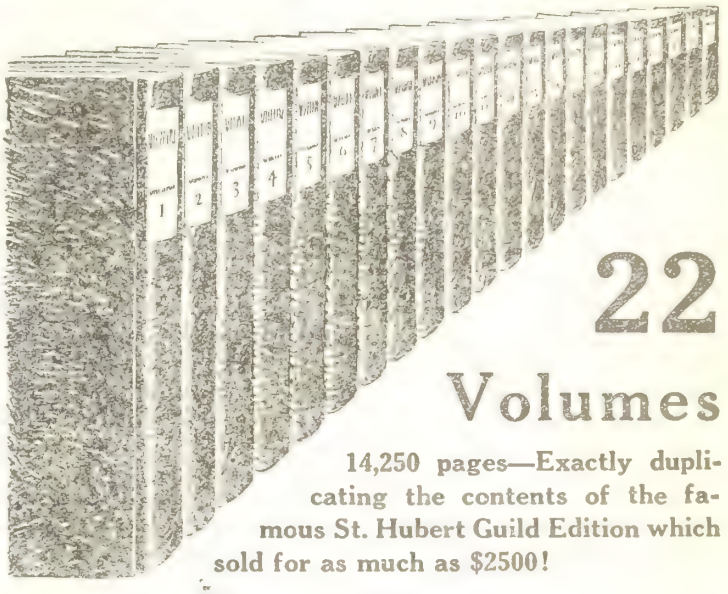
Occasionally, however, the difficulty is created by the composer's inability to make use of even such resources as are available. Schumann, for example, has been criticized for obscuring important themes, or dulling what should be brilliant sonorities, by poor combinations of instrumental timbres. This is not so obvious as one might suppose from the criticism, because the noticeably bad places must be comparatively few, and because the works are played by fine-sounding orchestras under skilful conductors who improve passages by adjusting the loudness of the various instruments or even by altering the orchestration. It was almost inevitable that someone should suggest doing a complete job. "Such fine, noble themes, good workmanship, and yet such abominably poor orchestration," Theodore Thomas said to Frederick Stock (says Mr. Stock) after a performance of the third or Rhenish symphony. "All of Schumann's four symphonies should be re-scored, but especially this one." And this one was indeed finally re-scored by Mr. Stock, who introduced the new version to his Chicago audience in 1921. Critical comment was favorable: I recall that Mr. Aldrich approved mildly in the New York Times.

I recall, moreover, being struck, in Mr. Aldrich's report, by the fact that Mr. Stock had not merely re-distributed the notes of Schumann's music among different instruments, but had actually changed and added to the musical substance. Why, when Schumann's workmanship had been praised and only his use of orchestral timbres criticized? Mr. Stock's version, now that I have heard it at a Stadium concert in New York, does not constitute an answer; the changes in musical substance are unnecessary or positively objectionable. One is aware that Mr. Stock "has not omitted to avail himself of such opportunities as arise for contrapuntal embellishment in the various orchestral voices, these, however, growing out of the material which Schumann originated." This is absurd, obviously: it is for Schumann to decide, as he may be presumed to have done, not only what material to use, but just how it should be used. And this applies even more to the coda which Mr. Stock substitutes for Schumann's own, using Schumann's material. At the close Mr. Stock introduces the main theme of the first movement, which Schumann seems quite able to do for himself, since just previously he has introduced the theme of the penultimate movement. And at the beginning of this movement—in accordance with his astonishing practice of adding "a measure here and there in order to give greater clarity to Schumann's thought"—Mr. Stock places an introductory measure, "so that the enunciation of the theme of the movement, somewhat clouded in Schumann's version, may be made more apparent to the ear." Again, the possibility can hardly have failed to suggest itself to Schumann, and his decision to begin abruptly should stand. For Mr. Stock does not make the theme clearer with his introductory measure; he only weakens it. He also weakens the climax of the passage by splitting an introductory quarter-note into two eighth-notes. And throughout one catches similar alterations of rhythm, displacements of accents and other types of what one can call nothing better than unnecessary petty meddling.

Now, therefore, even more than when I read his account, I am struck by the approval of Mr. Aldrich, who ordinarily reveals acute distress over even a literal transcription of a Bach organ fugue by Mr. Stokowski. I am struck, that is, by another example of our critics' preoccupation with everything except the musical result that alone concerns them. For Mr. Stokowski is the bad boy among conductors, while Mr. Stock is a good boy. There appears, then, to be an important distinction between a man who draws attention to himself with a spotlight and one who does it by meddling with a composer's music. The distinction may be hard to make, but it must be there, for Mr. Aldrich and his colleagues are guided by it.

B. H. HAGGIN

The Complete Works of VOLTAIRE



22 Volumes

14,250 pages—Exactly duplicating the contents of the famous St. Hubert Guild Edition which sold for as much as $2500!

FOR years there has been no adequate edition of the Complete Works of Voltaire in English. Voltaire lovers have been forced to pay high prices for used sets of the St. Hubert Guild Edition or to be content with incomplete or abridged translations of a few of his best known titles.

Now for the first time since that edition was exhausted—you can own every word Voltaire ever wrote. His romances, poems, Philosophical Dictionary, criticism, essays, and dramas in a beautiful new edition.

Strictly Limited Edition

Sumptuous format; printed on clear spring laid antique paper; bold, easily read type; photogravure illustration. THE AROUET EDITION of the Complete Works of Voltaire is limited to 500 numbered sets for subscribers only. Already the orders are pouring in. To be sure of your set quick action is necessary. Mail the coupon at once for full description of this magnificent Voltaire and Special Pre-publication price.

DINGWALL-ROCK, LTD.
45 West 45th Street, Dept. 19, New York City

DINGWALL-ROCK, LTD.
45 West 45th Street, Dept. 19
New York City

Please send me, without obligation, the circular describing the Arouet Edition of Voltaire and particulars of the Special Pre-publication Offer!

Name .....

Address .....

City ..... State .....

International Relations Section

The Soviet Opposition

THE plenary session of the Central Committee and the Central Control Committee of the Soviet Union Communist Party on August 9 adopted a resolution dealing with the situation created in the party by the activities of the opposition groups under the leadership of Trotsky and Zinoviev. The resolution and a declaration submitted to the session by the leading members of the opposition was published in the Moscow press on August 10.

The resolution, after recounting the story of the opposition and its factional activities, which are declared to have constituted a violation of the party discipline, reads in part:

The combined plenum of the Central Committee and the Central Control Committee draws the attention of the party to the fact that the opposition, due to its factional activities against the party, has become objectively the center for rallying anti-party and anti-Soviet forces and that its disorganizing activities are counted upon by the internal and external counter-revolution.

The party, in the course of a number of years, has displayed the greatest tolerance and patience, having repeatedly warned the opposition in an effort to induce its leaders to submit to party discipline.

However, the recent acts of Trotsky and Zinoviev show that, after having exhausted all means of warning, the party has not succeeded in inducing the leaders of the opposition to submit to the will of the party; that the opposition leaders have flagrantly and systematically violated the very bases of party adherence and party discipline which are obligatory for each party member, no matter who he may be; that the opposition, led by the opposition members of the Central Committee, is carrying on factional activities undermining the unity of the party and leading toward a split.

The resolution on the unity of the party adopted at the Tenth Congress makes it obligatory for the plenum of the Central Committee and the Central Control Committee to put the question not only of expelling the frank disrupters and disorganizers of the party and of the Comintern from the Central Committee, but of expelling them from the party as well. Nevertheless, the praesidium of the Central Control Committee, in its desire to give the leaders of the opposition an opportunity to correct their errors and to renounce their offenses against the party, proposed only the expulsion of the Comrades Trotsky and Zinoviev from the Central Committee.

Moreover, the praesidium of the Central Control Committee and the combined plenum of the Central Committee and the Central Control Committee, in their desire to give the opposition leaders the opportunity to find a way out of the blind alley whither their policies had driven them and to facilitate the cause of peace in the party, have made a last attempt to preserve Comrades Trotsky and Zinoviev in the Central Committee and offered them a number of elementary conditions which are absolutely obligatory upon members of the Bolshevist Party and indispensable for the maintenance of peace in the party. . . .

However, notwithstanding the attitude of compromise adopted by the plenum of the C.C. and the C.C.C., and the mildness of the conditions, the leaders of the opposition declined to adopt these conditions.

Only when the combined plenum of the C.C. and the C.C.C. were compelled by this refusal to adopt in principle the resolution on the expulsion of Comrades Trotsky and Zinoviev from the Central Committee of the party, did the opposition consent to submit a number of errors and agree to [illegible] with reservations, to the proposal of the plenum of the C.C. and C.C.C. and to make the corresponding declaration.

In view of this, the combined plenum of the Central Committee and Central Control Committee have decided to table the question of the expulsion of Comrades Zinoviev and Trotsky from the Central Committee and to reprimand them with a stern warning.

The combined plenum of the C.C. and C.C.C. expects that this may prove a step forward toward establishing peace in the party. However, the plenum of the C.C. and C.C.C. is far from considering the "declaration" of the opposition an act sufficient to secure the necessary peace in the party.

The plenum of the C.C. and C.C.C. demands that the opposition immediately dissolve their faction and it calls upon all organizations and all members of the party to adopt all measures for the liquidation of factions, factional groups, and factional activities.

The Declaration of the Opposition

The declaration submitted by the opposition follows in part:

Without entering into the polemic form in which the questions have been put, we are substantially answering them.

To the first question: We are unconditionally and without reservation for the defense of our Socialist country against imperialism. Of course, we are unconditionally and without reservation for the defense of the USSR with the present Central Committee and the present Executive Committee of the Comintern in power.

If that particular part of Trotsky's letter wherein he refers to Clemenceau might have given any cause for an incorrect interpretation as meaning a struggle for power through making use of war difficulties, we categorically decline such interpretation. At the same time we maintain our conviction that, in time of war, the party cannot renounce criticism and refrain from amending the policy of the Central Committee should it prove incorrect. . . .

On the question of termidorianism [a movement toward the right] we declare: There are elements of termidorianism growing up in this country with a fairly firm foundation. We do not doubt that the party and the proletariat will overcome these forces by following the lines of Lenin and through the inner-party democracy. What we demand is that the party leadership should more firmly and systematically oppose these tendencies and their influence upon certain links within our party. We in no sense declare that our Bolshevist party, or its C.C. and C.C.C. have become termidorian.

To the second question: We acknowledge that there is a danger of a split and the creation of two parties in the Communist movement in Germany. While submitting to the decision of the Comintern and agreeing that it is not permissible to maintain organizational bonds with the expelled Urbans Maslow group, we at the same time propose, and we shall insist in the Comintern, that the decision on the expulsion be revised in view of the fact that there are among the expelled hundreds of old revolutionary workers closely connected with the working masses, devoted to the cause of Lenin and sincere in their readiness to defend the USSR to the end. . . . .

To the third question: We categorically condemn every attempt to create a new party. We consider the road toward the creation of a second party in the USSR as absolutely destructive to the revolution. We shall oppose with all our force and in every way every tendency toward two parties. We condemn just as absolutely and categorically the policy of a split. We will carry out all the decisions of the All-Union Communist Party and its Central Committee. We are prepared to do everything to avoid all the elements of factions which have been created through the fact that, under conditions where the inner-party regime has been perverted, we have been compelled to fight to bring to the attention of the party our actual views, and these views have been incorrectly represented in the press of the country as a whole.

(Signed) Avdeev, Bakaev, Evdokimov, Zinoviev, Kamenev, Lizdin, Muralov, Peterson, Piatakov, Rakovsky, Smilga, Soloviov, Trotsky.

August 8, 1927.

Soviet Courts

THE following account of the workings of the courts in the Soviet Union is taken from a longer compilation assembled by Myron Zaslaw after a recent visit to the USSR:

The people's court consists of one judge appointed for one year, but practically for good behavior. The purpose of the courts is to strengthen the gains of the revolution, to defend the working class against the onsets of conscious and unconscious enemies, and to inculcate respect for revolutionary laws. They are frankly and avowedly class courts. They are mild and sympathetic toward offenders from the peasants' and laboring classes so long as the crimes are due to social causes, inheritances of the long sad past of oppression, ignorance, bigotry, poverty, weakness, and disease. They are stern with criminals who ought to know better, especially if the crimes can be even remotely construed as directed against the dictatorship. In adjudicating civil cases or cases of assault and battery and the like, they are very fair and tolerant. But in law-suits involving merchants or individual entrepreneurs versus workingmen or against public enterprises, the judges show scant sympathy for the former and seldom indeed decide in their favor. Everyone is free to employ a lawyer or many lawyers and in case of grave charges free legal counsel is given the accused. The judges are workingmen, usually Communists. Most of them are not only honest and conscientious, but are very studious and, after a few years' service, display remarkable sagacity and knowledge of law.

The word "illegitimacy" has been dropped from the Russian lexicon. All children, born in or out of wedlock alike, have the rights and duties in and the claims upon society and family. Both parents must contribute to their support. But the difficulty of maintaining the child if repudiated by the father and the stigma still attaching to an unmarried mother in conservative circles have been the causes of many infants killed. It seems best to give three illustrations culled from the newspapers. A girl of nineteen, loving and loved by a young man, marries him and confesses being pregnant from an earlier lover. The husband pardons her and decides to adopt the baby. The pair quarrel often and the unfortunate bride, unable to bear his reproaches and vituperation, rejoins her parents. They are too poor to support her and the baby, and the young woman returns to her husband only to resume the terrible squabbles and bickerings. At the end of her wits, she decides to slay the baby and do away with herself. She forces prussic acid into the baby's mouth. Horrified at the infant's agony, the wretch runs with it to a hospital where it dies within two days. She is tried, confesses all, and tells the story of her sufferings to the court, which imposes a sentence of eight years without loss of her legal rights, as provided by law for infanticide. But considering the punishment too severe as a social measure, the judge on the spot commutes it to one month, which is redeemed by her preliminary imprisonment before the trial. She is free.

An intelligent woman of twenty-five kills her baby six weeks old because its father was infected with syphilis and she dreads the consequences to the innocent being. The judge sentences her to eight years, but commutes it to three years with strict isolation. The appellate division annuls the penalty as

THEATERS

THEATRE GUILD ACTING CO.
THE SECOND MAN
GUILD Thea., W. 52d St. Evs. 8:40. Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:40.

34th WEEK
THE ACTORS' THEATRE, Inc.
Guthrie McClintic, Director presents
Maxwell Anderson's Comedy
SATURDAY'S CHILDREN
"Best American play of the year."—Gabriel, Sun.
BOOTH Thea., W. 45 St. Eves., 8:30.
Matinees Wed. & Sat., 2:30.

Little Theatre
44th Street West of Broadway
Evgs. 8:30. Matinees Thurs. & Sat.
THE GRAND STREET FOLLIES
"One cannot find anywhere in New York more clever ideas, more fresh satire or more color." Joseph Wood Krutch in The Nation.

TRAVEL

"See Russia for yourself."
See
SOVIET RUSSIA
Second Tour Eight Weeks
October 14 to December 15, 1927
LONDON-HELSINGFORS-LENINGRAD-MOSCOW
An opportunity to witness the extraordinary celebrations of the Tenth Anniversary at the Russian capital, together with frequent visits to historical and cultural Visiting delegates expected from all countries limit our number to one hundred.
APPLY IMMEDIATELY FOR RESERVATIONS
WORLD TOURISTS, Inc.
69 Fifth Avenue
New York City
Algonquin 6900
"The greatest Achievement in History."

socially unnecessary. The supreme court sustains the court

A high school student of nineteen, herself an illegitimate daughter, become pregnant, but completes her studies, and then gives birth to the baby, whom she registers in the name of its father. The latter, however, repudiates them both, and, unable to earn a living for the two, the girl strangles the child. The verdict is guilty, but the sentence of eight years is commuted [illegible] jealousness and the general prejudice against unmarried mothers. The court of appeals recommends a suspended sentence of three years and is confirmed by the highest court. The murderess is set free.

The following case we were so fortunate as to hear in a typical small town on the Volga. Two high school boys, [illegible] of peasants, seventeen and seventeen and a half years, respectively, are accused of wilful swindle. In a strange town, far from their pauper parents who cannot give them any support, and at the end of their resources, they concoct a scheme to get money. [illegible] is the brain of the concern. He manages to steal a stamp of the cashier of a large cooperative store and the younger, a good mechanic, makes a copy of it. The stamp is then returned to the store. One day the two enter the store, buy 30 rubles' worth of textiles, stamp and initial the sales slip, receive the goods, and dispose of them to a "fence." Elated at their success, they return to the shop to repeat the operation the next day. They are apprehended and brought before the judge. They are paroled and ordered to appear for trial in three months. The younger, a nice but weak lad, continues to go to school and keeps his word, but the older one fails to put in an appearance.

The trial is postponed for three months and still the fugitive boy is absent. He is arrested in another town, kept in prison for two months and liberated again, but must report to the police regularly. Finally, for the third time, the trial is fixed for September and both defendants are present. The only outsiders are ourselves and a half-dozen schoolmates of the accused. The trial lasted about half an hour. The charge was read to the accused. They were asked their ages, social status, details of their lives. Our sympathy was with the [illegible] told of a poor mother with small children and a ne'er-do-well father, of harrowing poverty, of hunger, of unpaid rent which was only a few cents a month. The judge suggested that he should have confided in his teachers, who certainly would have [illegible] for a youth. The younger boy had in the meantime finished high school and taken the entrance examinations to the poly-[illegible], but, [illegible] the [illegible] months, the judge declared the sentences suspended for [illegible] years.

[illegible] addition to whatever other penalty they may incur.

An immense number of people in Russia have [illegible] who had violated the innumerable and continually [illegible] laws against private commerce, speculation, and the like [illegible] who had suffered penalties. Although the [illegible]

JUST PUBLISHED

Walter Lippmann's New Book

Men of Destiny

Illustrated by Rollin Kirby

A NEW [illegible] in the American Scene by the editor [illegible] and great who make the current page of [illegible] and powerful in America. Alexander H. [illegible], Calvin Coolidge, Sinclair Lewis, Senator Borah, Bryan, Wilson [illegible] in Mr. Lippmann's sharp character etchings. Incisive issues of the next presidential campaign are presented with illuminating clarity in several chapters. The whole book is one that will appeal instantly to intelligent men who [illegible] to keep informed on the main currents of our national life.

The [illegible] from Mendum's [illegible] cyclone foundry is typical of Mr. Kirby's illustrations.

Regular edition $2.50
Autographed edition $5.00

The Macmillan Company · · New York

New Vanguard Titles

Full Size, Well Printed, Clothbound

Daughter of the Revolution, and other Stories. John Reed. Introduction by Floyd Dell.

Romance and revolution, passionate love and rebellious life found on the streets of New York, among camp followers of Balkan soldiers, in Mexico or the underworld cities of Paris, form the material of these intensely human stories.

The A B C of Art. John Haldane Blackie.

Art must not be the exclusive privilege of the intellectuals. In clear and simple language, devoid of technical terms, the author of this book explains the elements of aesthetic understanding and appreciation.

Company Unions. Robert W. Dunn. Introduction by Louis F. Budenz.

[illegible] addition to the literature of the labor movement [illegible] an exhaustive study of this newest development in the [illegible] field that shows why employers [illegible] favor it.

Kropotkin's Revolutionary Pamphlets. Peter Kropotkin. Edited, with Introduction, by Roger N. Baldwin.

A rare and valuable collection of the powerful writings in which [illegible] has exerted a tremendous influence on social and political life, compiled [illegible] and [illegible] in book form.

50c Each—At all Booksellers

By Mail 55c each, including free catalogue

VANGUARD PRESS, 80 Fifth Ave., New York

same crime or misdemeanor, everything from suspended sentence to the extreme punishment, i.e., death, depending upon the attendant circumstances, age, and character of the defendant, his social status and antecedents, as a rule penalties are very light, as indeed they have always been in Russia, even under the czars. If the judges find extenuating circumstances, the punishments are the minimum permitted. Trustworthy first offenders often leave the prison and attend to affairs in town during the day, returning to confinement at night. Sometimes, after reporting to the keepers, they may even sleep outside. The prison term thus becomes nominal; it is reduced one-third or one-half for good behavior, while amnesties, especially on November 7, the anniversary of the October revolution, sets hosts of prisoners free.

The utmost simplicity and dignity pervade the shabby court rooms with their uncarpeted floors, wooden benches, and uncurtained windows that are seldom used for ventilation. The doors are open and anybody may come in, quietly. Accused, witnesses, and the general public sometimes come in ragged, dirty, unshaven, barefoot. They do not have to remove their headgear, but they are not allowed to smoke or talk. The court sits behind a plain table on a rude, low platform without bars.

Contributors to This Issue

HEYWOOD BROUN, formerly writer of the column It Seems to Me in the New York World, is the author of several books. The latest, a collaboration with Margaret Leech, is "Anthony Comstock, Roundsman of the Lord."

HILTON BUTLER is the Washington correspondent of the Jackson (Mississippi) Daily News.

JESSIE STEPHEN is known for her interest in the advancement of women.

MADEFREY ODHNER is a California poet.

ALDRICH BLAKE, a resident of Oklahoma City, was executive counsellor to ex-governor Walton.

HARRISON DOWD is a young American poet.

WYNANT DAVIS HUBBARD is a resident of Rhodesia, Africa.

PIERRE LOVING is an American poet and journalist living in Paris.

ALTER BRODY is a New York poet, critic, and playwright.

CARLETON BEALS is the author of "Brimstone and Chili."

ALICE BEAL PARSONS frequently reviews novels for The Nation.

GEORGE E. G. CATLIN is the author of "The Science and Method of Politics."

IRWIN EDMAN is assistant professor of philosophy at Columbia University and author of several volumes.

ERNEST SUTHERLAND BATES is on the staff of the Dictionary of American Biography.

B. H. HAGGIN is a New York musician and critic of music.

Do you want to make extra money?

Address Dept. 11
The Nation
20 Vesey Street New York

UPTON SINCLAIR'S
HIS BEST OIL A VITAL WORK
DON'T MISS IT! $1.98 Post Paid Reg. $2.50 WORTH READING

AMERICA COMES OF AGE (Reg. $3.00) $2.59 Post Paid

THE NEXT AGE OF MAN (Reg. $3.00) $2.59 Post Paid

WHY WE BEHAVE LIKE HUMAN BEINGS (Reg. $3.50) $2.98 Post Paid

BOUQUET (Illustrated) (Reg. $3.50) $3.09 Post Paid

REVOLT OF MODERN YOUTH (Reg. $3.00) $2.59 Post Paid

MOTHER INDIA (Reg. $3.75) $3.29 Post Paid

ALL $2.50 FICTION—$1.98 Post Paid
ALL $2.00 FICTION—$1.59 Post Paid

FREE — Handsomely bound, illustrated copy of "Arnold Bennett", an intimate biography by his wife, will be included gratis with each order for six or more books. Send your order today.

Small additional charge on C. O. D.'s
10c additional West of Mississippi

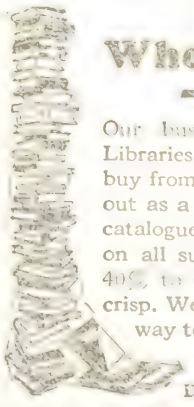
Ask for our new catalog

BOOK-LOVERS LEAGUE Dept. N915
405 LEXINGTON AVENUE NEW YORK, N. Y.

THE Background of the SACCO and VANZETTI case can best be understood when one is familiar with the hysteria prevailing at the time of their arrest. The best story of that period is

THE DEPORTATIONS DELIRIUM OF 1920

By Louis F. Post,
Assistant Secretary of Labor of the U. S. from 1913 to 1921. $1.50 postpaid.



Buy Books Where Libraries Buy —Save Money

Our business is primarily with Public Libraries, but thousand of individuals also buy from us. No order too small. Tear this out as a reminder to send for our 60-page catalogue listing hundreds of splendid titles on all subjects, nearly all at discounts of 40% to 60%. Delivered by mail new and crisp. We pay transportation. Learn a new way to buy books.

CAMPBELL & LEUNIG, INC.
Dept. 106, 4 East 12th Street, New York

REAL HARRIS HOMESPUNS Direct from the Makers at Manufacturer's Price
Suit Lengths Cut to Order. Postage Paid
NEWALL, 150 Stornoway, Scotland.

SCHOOLS

THE LITTLE WHITE SCHOOLHOUSE
Valley Cottage, N. Y.

An informal school in the country one hour from New York for children from five to twelve. Limited to six pupils.

Address: MISS LEWA, director
Valley Cottage, N. Y.

The Châteauneuf School

A Church School for Young Girls preparing for American Colleges.

Welcomes equally the opportunity to receive a select limited number of boarding pupils. Early application necessary.

For the Council: H. Smith, Bishop of American Churches in Europe, Chairman of Board of Trustees.

Address: The Council Chairman, Head Master, Château-Neuve, Neuvic-sur-l'Isle, Dordogne, France

The UNIVERSITY Preparatory SCHOOL
STATE BOOK BLDG. - BROADWAY AT 39TH STREET
Telephone UNIversity 5149
REGENTS::COLLEGE ENTRANCE
COMMERCIAL
Pre-eminent in faculty—Strong in Equipment—A home school for those who want good teaching. Co-Ed.
Moderate Tuition Fees
DAY and EVENING SESSIONS
Classes now open

HESSIAN HILLS SCHOOL
(Formerly Mt. Airy School)

A Little School in the country where boys and girls from 2-12 years may live and grow in a world not only of text books.

Elizabeth Moss, director — Croton-on-Hudson, N. Y.

Throw Away Your Glasses
And Better Your Sight

Every wearer of glasses should read this book

"Perfect Sight Without Glasses"
By W. H. BATES, M.D.

The author of this book presents evidence that all errors of refraction are caused by strain—and cured by rest and relaxation. A complete method of treatment is explained in every case the author has treated. Even if you have used glasses for years, you should send for this book. Price $1.

The Central Fixation Publ. Co.
Dept. 5, 383 Madison Avenue, New York

Name
Address

CAMP

TIMBERLAND
IN THE HEART OF THE ADIRONDACKS
The Camp Limited to a Congenial Group of 40
Bungalows and Main House made in every respect. Rate $27 per week
Excellent facilities and equipment for all camp sports; also golf.
Round Trip Fare to Riverside, N. Y., station, $13.27.
OPEN UNTIL OCTOBER 1st.
N. Y. Office, 55 West 42nd St. Pennsylvania 7663
Mail your reservations to POTTERSVILLE, N. Y.

PERSONAL

Diogenes with a lantern!

A business man with a fine job and a record of successful work, "is tired and will not look for his job" or "cannot find one" is needed by a publisher to personally represent a magazine which could use him in hiring him (at about half of what a good me-

Address, WRITER, Box 86, Vanderveer Sta., Brooklyn, N. Y.

Your Fall Problems

If you want to rent a house or an apartment for the coming winter, or if you have one to rent—or sell, advertise in the classified section of The Nation, read by desirable landlords and tenants. Rates on application. Special three-time rate. Dept. Y. W. P., The Nation.

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITY

Investor and Executive Wanted

I will cancel $5,000 of my own investment

PERSONAL

GERMAN TRAVEL

DR. LOUIS N. ROBINSON Swarthmore, Pa.

classes 10.

NATION "ADS"

HOUSE FOR RENT

APARTMENT FOR RENT

AN attractive apartment in Greenwich Village, ideally arranged for two or three people. Entire floor, three rooms, kitchenette, and bath. Electric light and steam heat. Open fireplaces. Unfurnished $100. Write Box 857, The Nation, or phone Watchall 7730.

GREENWICH VILLAGE, 38 Perry Street. Large studio room, private bath. All modern improvements. Steam heat. Large fireplace. Attractive. For lease October 1st. Call Watkins 1670, evenings. Oxhandler.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXV NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1927 No. 3246

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 271

EDITORIALS:

The Revolt at Geneva 274

Debts of Justice: Unpaid 275

Cheating at Solitaire 275

Mob-Murdered Aviators 276

IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 277

MR. BABBITT, MEET SINCLAIR LEWIS. By William J. McNally 278

A YEAR AFTER THOIRY. By Robert Dell 282

CHINA TESTS OUR RELIGION. By Harry F. Ward 283

A CONFERENCE WITH GOVERNOR FULLER. By Arthur Garfield Hays 285

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 286

CORRESPONDENCE 287

BOOKS AND PLAYS:

Professor McMaster Continues. By William MacDonald 289

Chaucer and Sherlock. By Frederick Tupper 289

Credible Macabre. By Martha Mott 290

Marxian History. By V. F. Calverton 290

In the Caves of Ariège. By Ruth Benedict 291

A Note on Progress. By Melville J. Herskovits 292

Books in Brief 292

Drama: The Curtain Rises. By Joseph Wood Krutch 294

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

Madame Sun's Withdrawal 296

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER — Managing Editor

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH — Literary Editor

FREDA KIRCHWEY

MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS HEYWOOD BROUN CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

WE ARE DELIGHTED that France has put on so high a tariff against the United States that our manufacturers are setting up an almighty howl. They are particularly dismayed that whereas Germany, because of her recent trade agreement with France, receives favorable rates, the maximum possible ones are being levied against the United States. We should like to see the same treatment meted out to us by Italy and Germany, and by every other country in Europe. That would perhaps bring our tariff maniacs to their senses. It might at least induce some of them to do a little examination of political economy and to abandon their attitude that the United States can do precisely as it pleases in tariff matters, while all the other nations must obediently come to heel. If the highest possible tariff walls were built against us Americans might suddenly perceive that the world which would then result would be preposterous, and themselves take the lead in pulling down our own tariff walls as a first step toward sanity and free trade between the nations of the earth. Meanwhile our tariff boosters have the joy of pondering upon the fact that, unless a new trade treaty is negotiated with France, American products will be taxed four times as much as German goods, so that in a short time Germany should win away most of America's business with France. Some of the rates on American products are extremely interesting. Thus, American electrical equipment for automobiles is to be taxed between 800 and 1,300 per cent. Incredibly funny is the protest of the injured American manufacturers that this tariff will penalize the French motoring public by protecting French industry which cannot produce as economically as that in the United States! What, in heaven's name, does our tariff do?

NEITHER STANLEY BALDWIN nor Joseph Stalin can get much satisfaction from the resolutions of the British Trades Union Congress recently in session at Edinburgh. When Mr. Hicks, president of the congress, came out for some sort of cooperation between employers and employees it looked like a gesture of agreement with Mr. Baldwin's appeal for industrial peace. But a few days later the congress adopted a resolution blasting Mr. Baldwin, his Government, and his trade-union bill; accusing him of being the chief stumbling-block in the way of peace, and challenging him to bring his policy before the country in a new general election. The congress has ended its relations with the All-Russian Council of Trade Unions, and decided against recognition of "minority" or left-wing unions in the British movement. But if anyone assumes, from these acts, that the British trade unions are supporting the Russian policy of the Baldwin Government he will meet with another surprise. British labor may be anti-Russian and anti-Communist itself, but it won't, if it can help it, allow the British Government to be. The resolutions adopted at Edinburgh are characteristic of a movement which proceeds according to no apparent logic or plan, which is consistent with nothing except itself.

FROM THE EXECUTIVE CHAMBER of the capitol into jail that appears to be the regular procedure in Indiana. A couple of weeks ago former Governor Warren T. McCray was released on parole from the Atlanta penitentiary; last week they indicted Governor Ed Jackson and are going to try him on October 3 on the charge of conspiracy to commit a felony. It seems that Mr. Jackson went to Governor McCray, when that official was under indictment and about to face trial in the criminal court, and offered him $10,000 if he would appoint a certain James E. McDonald as prosecuting attorney in Indianapolis, in which case the charges against the Governor would be dropped. Indicted with the Governor were Mayor John L. Duvall of Indianapolis, George V. Coffin, the Republican city and county chairman of Indianapolis, and Robert I. Marsh, Governor Jackson's law partner, a prominent figure in the Ku Klux Klan of Indiana and its counsel. This is a good beginning, but it is only a beginning. Governor Jackson's relationship with D. C. Stephenson, formerly Grand Dragon of the Ku Klux Klan, who presented him with a horse and is said to have contributed large sums of money to his campaign fund, is still to be investigated by the grand jury. In this case we have proof of the way the Ku Klux Klan corrupted about everything that it touched. Meanwhile, Mayor Duvall has already gone to trial. But how much simpler it would be, if the voters of Indiana continue to elect men of this type to office, to ask the latter to sign a pledge in advance of their election that they will voluntarily go to jail a year after they are inducted into office, thus saving the State the expense of their trials.

TRADE HONESTY is a boast of Western capitalism, and a general assumption is that Russia's Communist rulers are not to be trusted. Frederick W. Lewis, head of the Furness-Withy Lines, has had experience. Some years ago shareholders and associates of the Furness-Withy Lines subscribed half the stock of the Russo-British Grain Export Company, the other half being controlled by Russian interests. Each year this English shareholding group has advanced considerable sums of money to the grain company, which the latter in turn has lent to the Russian Government to finance the marketing of Russia's grain crop. Now Mr. Lewis reports that this business has been conducted in a perfectly normal and satisfactory manner, and that interest has been paid at a rate commensurate with the security offered. Nor have any losses been incurred by any of the British manufacturing firms extending credits to the Russian state trading concerns. Russia needs vast credits for super-electric power stations, the development of its mineral resources, and the enlargement of its manufacturing plants, and the Soviet Republic is England's best potential customer—in 1913, 4,822,000 tons of goods were shipped from Great Britain to Russia, as compared with 231,000 tons in the fiscal year 1925-26. But the Baldwin Government, by breaking off diplomatic relations with Moscow, has made British vessels trading at Russian ports subject to higher taxation than ships of nations enjoying the benefits of a trade agreement with Russia, and has compelled representatives of English firms, desirous of doing business in that country, to go to other capitals for the necessary visa. "If politics and business could only be completely separated," remarks Sir Frederick, "the pathway of business relations between the two nations now at diplomatic loggerheads would be made infinitely smoother."

FROM ACROSS THE OCEAN comes an appeal of the non-political Italian Refugees Relief Committee whose chairman is Lady Slesser, and of which Mrs. Helena Swanwick of Foreign Affairs, Wickham Steed, Delisle Burns, Lord Olivier, and Lady Mary Murray are also members. This group of humanitarians has come together to afford help to those Italians who are compelled to leave their country because of the Fascist regime. Anti-Fascists who have private means and keep quiet can stay in Italy, but those who have to earn their living are so boycotted and discriminated against as to be compelled to leave Italy. A report in the London Daily Herald declared that considerably more than a thousand persons had then been deported to the private Siberia which Mussolini has established on a few of the Mediterranean islands. These men have been sentenced by special local committees who do not even interrogate the accused. Those who flee to escape this fate include doctors, lawyers, school teachers, journalists, and shopkeepers. They are penniless and in great need. Contrary to the historic policy of Great Britain, these refugees are not allowed to enter England; it is France that upholds the great principle of political asylum, which America, too, has abandoned. A French relief committee is headed by Marc Sangnier. We suggest to our readers who desire to do so to send their contributions to the British committee in care of the secretary, Mr. W. S. Kennedy, 3 Harcourt Buildings, Temple, E. C. 4, London.

MUCH TO THE SURPRISE of the American officials at their recent conference with the Royal Canadian Commission, it was revealed that smuggled liquor does not all travel south. American denatured alcohol, it seems, is in considerable demand in Canada, and bootleggers obligingly carry it northward across the Canadian border. The explanation is elementary: the denatured alcohol is recooked in this country and then placed in the hands of distributors in Canada at about $1.25 a gallon. As the Canadian Government imposes a tax of $10 a gallon on real liquors, it can easily be seen why the distributors prefer the American product. The only difficulty seems to be that the Canadian Government, while it sanctions the drinking of the good, wholesome Canadian liquors, is opposed to seeing its citizens die from alcohol poisoned in the United States for the special use of American citizens.

PEACE AND QUIET prevail once more in Superior, Wisconsin. The school strike which set that community by the ears last May has been settled and the 1,000 students who were on strike for a month are again satisfied. It is the newly elected school board that has restored equanimity to the Superior school situation. The first act of the board was to reinstate the two teachers, Lulu J. Dickinson and C. G. Wade, whose dismissal led to the student strike. The board went even further and dismissed Paul R. Spencer, the former superintendent of schools, who had dismissed them. The "loyalty contracts" of the Central High School teachers were rescinded and replaced by ordinary contracts. These "loyalty contracts" were curious documents by means of which the school board attempted to force every teacher in Superior to work against the elective school officials and for the appointed members. The charges and counter-charges that have flown back and forth between the old appointed board and the newly elected body have somewhat befogged the issues, but the outcome proves that even teachers are not entirely helpless where the community is interested in their treatment.

WITH COMMENDABLE PERSEVERANCE the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters continues to fight for a payment of honest wages to Pullman porters. They meet, however, very stubborn opposition from the Pullman Company. For a long time they were unable to gain even recognition of their union. This achieved, the way seemed open for mediation of the dispute. But the efforts of the United States Mediation Board were unsuccessful. The next step, ordinarily, would have been submission of the dispute to the Arbitration Board. This the Pullman Company refused to permit, although its action was a clear violation of the Railway Labor Act. So the porter's union has been forced to carry its fight to the Emergency Board of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Before this board the Brotherhood hopes to win its demands for minimum wages of $150 a month instead of the pitiful $72.50 now in effect. It would then be possible, they point out, to abolish the system which compels the porters to rely for their wages on the hazard of tips, which average only $56 per month. The union also asks a month's service of 240 hours instead of nearly 400 hours, which would equalize it with the Pullman conductor's month. These demands are not unreasonable. The porters should surely be entitled to a "living wage" sufficient to do away with the tipping system, even though such a provision might mean a reduction of the Pullman Company's dividend.

THE PESSIMISTIC PROPHECIES about the dire results that would follow the introduction of the eight-hour day in the steel industry seem to have been just a little too hasty. We now learn from the Iron Trade Review that after four years of experience with the shorter day the producers have been convinced of its economic advantages. Since its introduction four years ago, the trend of iron and steel prices has been downward—despite the fact that Judge Gary produced voluminous figures to show that prices would increase as a result. And then again there has been the alleviation, "to a marked extent," of the problem of labor turnover—despite Mr. Gary's theory that the men would become more restless with four extra hours on their hands. The men, it seems, are more satisfied:

> Steel-mill executives hold that with the eight-hour day has come greater employee efficiency. Whether this can be measured in dollars and cents, of course, is not clear. . . . It is certain, however, that the increased efficiency of employees and the apparent added contentment in the ranks of steel organizations have resulted in economies in operations in many lines.

And through it all the United States Steel Corporation has managed to maintain its prosperity. This turn of events, at least, shows that even the great, far-seeing captains of industry make errors once in a while—that is to say, it is only once in a while that they are caught making them. But we must concede that in these uncertain times it does take a special sort of skill to predict so many things none of which actually come true.

EVERY MAN, whether citizen or alien, is equal before the law in this country—unless he is a coal miner on strike in eastern Ohio. There Benson W. Hough, judge of the United States District Court in Steubenville, has remolded the law nearer to his heart's desire. In issuing an injunction setting limits to picketing he has ruled, according to an Associated Press dispatch, that "No man can serve as a union picket under the terms of the order unless he is an American citizen and knows the English language." This illegal discrimination between aliens and citizens recalls a tirade delivered by a Chicago judge, a certain William R. Fetzer, during the judicial hysteria previous to the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti. As recorded in a special dispatch to the Los Angeles Times, Judge Fetzer said to a group of persons alleged to have created "disturbances":

> You people might as well understand right now that you cannot run Chicago or this country. Organizations, associations, or affiliations cannot and must not attempt to interfere with what courts of another State, or this State, do. Judges and prosecutors are competent and will do their duty.
>
> Those of you who do not like the way this country is conducted can get out and return to your own lands. It is none of your business what is done by the courts of Massachusetts or any other part of this country.

We hope this report is somewhat distorted. It seems incredible that any one occupying even the most inconsequential bench (we don't know Judge Fetzer's court) should spout such bull-dozing balderdash. "Judges and prosecutors are competent and will do their duty," says Sir Oracle. Since when? For as far back in history as it is possible to trace the workings of government, in order to get even a shadow of justice and effectiveness out of it for the common man, it has been necessary to keep the closest kind of watch on all public employees. And just now it seems advisable to double the guard on judges.

MR. MENCKEN SHOULD BE WORRIED. If imitation is flattery it is also death to iconoclasm. And the abundance of imitations of Mr. Mencken and his American Mercury is evidence that he has become one of the new American demigods. The young college generation speaks a degenerate Menckenese; and the new magazines ape his program and the typography with which Mr. Knopf has generously clothed him. He has become in his turn a national fashion. An unknown publisher announces an effort to outmencken Mencken with Mr. G. D. Eaton as editor of Plain Talk; and the Reflex, which began in July as a monthly panorama of Jewish life in America, shows in typography and thought how closely its editors, while suspicious of assimilation in general, have assimilated Menckenism at least. It is not an unhealthy phenomenon. American Jewry has earned its right to be proud of its contribution to America and its shepherding of its race throughout the world; but its pride, like all patriotisms, needs occasionally to be taken off the shelf and scrubbed with Mencken's analytic soap.

WE HAVE FURTHER NEWS of twelve-year-old Anna, about whom we wrote in our issue of September 7 [page 219]. When she was five years old Anna was given by her mother to a Negro family in Milwaukee. Anna lived with them until recently, when the police took charge of her while she was following a carnival company in the street. In court it appeared that Anna was white, and—although she wanted to stay with her foster parents and they wanted to keep her—it was decided that that wouldn't do. Anna was sent to the Home for Dependent Children "pending investigation" of the ability of her foster parents to support her. To those acquainted with the ways of officialdom that sounded like an indeterminate sentence. But it has not turned out so. J. P. Schroeter, one of our readers in Milwaukee, sends us an item from the Leader of that city which tells that later on Anna's mother came from Georgia and testified that she herself had Negro blood. So Anna was restored to her foster parents. Our correspondent writes: "You probably know that our mayor and nearly one-half of our aldermen are Socialists; therefore you may be sure that any such matters will always find a fair solution." He asks that we print a note "cleaning the name of our city." We are glad to do so; but we still wonder what the outcome would have been if Anna's mother had said the child was white.

INTO POWERS HAPGOOD'S account of the action of the Boston police in committing him to a psychopathic ward in order to keep him away from Sacco and Vanzetti protests, printed in our issue of September 7, slipped a last-minute error for which Mr. Hapgood was in no way responsible and which he asks us to correct. The article as printed stated that "While I was detained at the hospital Mr. Hays, as my counsel, tried to see me and was not permitted to, nor were doctors who accompanied him for the purpose of examining me." Mr. Hays did see Mr. Hapgood; the accompanying physicians were not permitted to.

The Revolt at Geneva

At last there are stirrings within the League of Nations. The smaller nations have taken their courage in both hands and flung down the gauntlet to the Great Powers, who, from the very beginning, have acted as if they considered the League their private property. In 1923, Hjalmar Branting, the former Prime Minister and representative of Sweden, was so outraged by the League's spinelessness in the face of Mussolini's attack upon Corfu that he talked of taking the smaller Powers out of the League. Four years have elapsed. Nobody seems to have organized the revolt, but it has come. Latvia, Finland, Sweden, Norway, Lithuania, Belgium, Holland, and Poland led the way. The Foreign Minister of Sweden, M. Lofgren, Branting's successor, openly attacked Sir Austen Chamberlain for his lack of faith in the League that he pretends to support, and the Prime Minister of Latvia denounced him for sabotaging the security protocol of 1924. In the face of the Englishman's open disapproval Poland brought forward its plan of outlawing war, and Holland, without going hat in hand to Sir Austen for the latter's kind permission, most unexpectedly raised the question of disarmament. All of which is nothing short of lese majeste. Also it is the healthiest and most hopeful sign that has come out of Geneva since the League was started. For frank speaking and straight-from-the-shoulder hitting there has been nothing like it. It has already achieved one result; it has at least made Sir Austen, the now pinchbeck hero of Locarno, bend his knee and alter his tone.

It is a fact that when Sir Austen undertook to head off the Polish plan for outlawing war, which provides for general security and non-aggression agreements, supplemental to and not replacing regional agreements, and in effect guarantees existing frontiers, he found that he had undertaken a good deal more than he could achieve. After a two-hour conference with the French Foreign Minister and one of an hour with Dr. Stresemann he turned a complete somersault and was compelled to sit by while the Polish representative, M. Sokol, introduced a modified resolution declaring that all wars of aggression are international crimes and are forbidden, that every pacific means should be employed to regulate disputes, and that members of the League should consider it an obligation to conform to these principles. These would seem to be the very ideas for which the League was founded; that any statesman could be found in 1927, eight years after its birth, seeking to prevent a mere expression of opinion like this, is the clearest proof of the way the League has failed heretofore to live up to its opportunities and of the necessity for a revolt. Sir Austen is quoted in effect as denying that there is an inner council within the council of the League and that that inner council settled in advance what the League should do. He also declared that other nations discussed coming events in advance. But the very fact that he undertook offhand to tell Poland what it should or should not do in this matter of outlawing war is the clearest proof that he has an entirely mistaken idea of the role which he ought to play.

He is in a sense hardly to be blamed. From the beginning England and France have considered themselves the midwives to supervise the arrival and the early care of the League; any other nurses they have relegated to the outer chamber and they have declined to admit that anybody else stood on a parity with them. Now we hope that a new era has begun, but whether the revolt will go beyond expressions of opinion is yet to appear. Certainly Sir Austen could not deny what Premier Cielens of Latvia said, that since 1924 disarmament hopes have been sinking lower and lower; that Europe's military budget, with Germany almost eliminated, is $1,443,000,000, about the same as in 1913, while the standing armies of Europe total today 3,145,000, despite the disarming of the beaten powers. "We are living," he added, "in the condition of armed peace which preceded the World War."

Next the all-wise Tory statesman had to sit by and see the moral victory of the meeting go to Germany. Dr. Stresemann has repeatedly given proof of the pacific intentions of the modern Germany—we have heard a foremost American diplomat declare that the German proposals which originated the Locarno agreements will be recognized a hundred years hence as one of the greatest moral advances, and one of the greatest acts of self-abnegation in the history of modern nations. Now Dr. Stresemann has pledged Germany to accept before the end of the month "the optional clause of the Hague Court statute providing for compulsory arbitration of disputes with other nations which have accepted it," which ought to be final evidence of the purpose of Germany to abandon once and for all the use of force in the settlement of international disputes. "We are most anxious," he said, "to be pioneers in achieving general peace, which is the ideal of the League"—the latter phrase, doubtless, for the benefit of Sir Austen. The optional clause he accepted reads as follows: "On behalf of [Germany] I recognize, in relation to any other member or state which accepts the same obligation, that is to say, on the sole condition of reciprocity, jurisdiction of the Court as compulsory ipso facto and without special convention."

With whom will Germany enter into these contractual relations for compulsory arbitration in all possible disputes? Why, Austria, Belgium, Abyssinia, Brazil, Bulgaria, China, Denmark, Esthonia, Finland, Norway, Holland, Portugal, Sweden, Switzerland, Uraguay, Haiti, and Lithuania. Does one find on this list the names of Great Britain and France? Emphatically one does not. M. Briand spoke magnificently for extension of the non-aggression pacts, said that Dr. Stresemann's "noble discourse came as a ray of light to dissipate the mist," and pledged France to "dedicate her every energy to perpetuate the Franco-German friendship and world peace." But he failed to pledge France to accept compulsory arbitration. Sir Austen? He informed the League that there were certain limits beyond which England would not go in accepting arbitration; that England placed the alliance of nations, known as the British Empire, above and beyond the League and that he would not further extend the Empire's commitments in defending smaller European states against aggression, which led the London Daily News to declare that his speech was "so singularly infelicitous that it seems to have alienated the good will of nearly every delegate in the conference." He did not aid matters by adding that in his belief no country can today possibly withstand an adverse moral judgment by the League against any of its policies. That is again merely playing cat and mouse with the League. The smaller nations are right in declaring that the League is disgraced by the failure to outlaw war, and their stand is worthy of the highest commendation. They deserve the praise of every adherent of the League for their fine course and for their effort to make the League a real parliament of the nations.

Debts of Justice: Unpaid

CITIZENS of average mental development are aware that courts of justice are not infallible, and that we have, inevitably, many innocent victims of erroneous convictions or detentions in criminal cases.

The outstanding grievance, however, is not that such injustices are committed (and more or less subconsciously recognized), but that America, with the exception of two States, has manifested an utter disregard for the plight of the victims. Professor Borchard of Yale University, points out that only California and Wisconsin have provided laws to indemnify the unfortunate victims of mistakes in the administration of criminal law. In other words, the state enjoys a virtual immunity from its own wrongdoings and blunders in criminal procedure.

Time and again innocent citizens are wronged by the state. Probably the most frequent abuse occurs through the activities of the police, whose arrests inevitably ensnare a high proportion of innocent people. Of most of these we hear nothing; it is only occasionally that we have such dramatic spectacles as the arrest of hundreds of citizens for displaying sympathy for Sacco and Vanzetti in Boston and other cities of the republic, and of Powers Hapgood imprisoned for forty-eight hours in a Boston psychopathic ward—as revealed later—with no justification whatever.

But these flagrant wrongs pale when compared with the experiences of people who have been erroneously convicted and condemned for crime. A decade ago the country stood aghast at the case of Andrew Toth, who was convicted of murder in Pennsylvania, sentenced to life imprisonment, and after having served twenty years was found absolutely innocent. It was left to the generosity of a private citizen, Andrew Carnegie, to do something for Toth, since the law of Pennsylvania made no provision for his relief and the State legislature refused to provide compensation.

England, too, witnessed a similar miscarriage of justice in the case of Adolph Beck, who was convicted for the crime of another man and imprisoned for seven years. Parliament, however, granted Beck a gratuity of 5,000 pounds; a further result was the establishment in that country of a Court of Criminal Appeal. Is it not time that America move to compensate such helpless sufferers?

Hitherto American public law has taken the position that the safeguarding of society by the prosecution of crimes against it is an attribute inherent in all government, and that the state cannot be held liable for errors made in exercising this sovereign power. As Professor Borchard explains, "whether the injury to the individual is accidental or intentional on the part of the state or on the part of the judge (except one of most inferior jurisdiction) the injured person is left without redress."

Our own government sanctions compensation to the individual when a special sacrifice is required of him for the public good. Where a citizen's property is condemned for public use our fundamental law prescribes that just compensation must be paid. We protect the citizen against the invasion of his property rights by eminent domain, but not against invasion of his personal rights by the administration of criminal law. The only difference seems to be that according to our prevailing political philosophy the property rights are regarded as more sacred. Those owning property have had more power and have spoken more convincingly for proper compensation.

We do not plead that the officers of the law be less active in their efforts to punish criminals; all duly accused persons must be prosecuted. But inevitably a proportion will be found innocent; some will be called upon for sacrifices—the loss of personal liberty, the loss of income, the loss of reputation. These sacrifices are imposed upon the citizens for the public good and, as Dean Wigmore says, "The public good has gained quite as much as it would have done when commerce was served by a railroad placed on land taken by force from that same man." Why should not the sacrifice be compensated?

Most European countries recognize the principle that society, rather than the individual, should bear the risk of error in the administration of criminal justice by statutes that provide for compensation of unjustly convicted persons. Nothing would do more to create respect for the courts than thus to make decent their treatment of the individual's personal rights.

Cheating at Solitaire

JEAN CALLIZO, an aviator of mixed French and Algerian parentage, who had been officially proclaimed as holder of the world's altitude record, forgot that gasoline motors do not function properly in very rarefied atmosphere unless they have been especially adapted to meet the unusual condition. Certain engineers connected with the company manufacturing the motor he used did, however, remember the fact, and they grew suspicious of his alleged feat. When he accepted their suggestion that he try to break the record again they hid a second barograph in the tail of his machine, and when he had descended it was discovered that there was a vast discrepancy between the instrument which he carried in the cockpit and the one of whose existence he had been unaware. Summoned before a jury impaneled by the Aero Club, he confessed to systematic and elaborately prepared cheating. Not only had he drawn a line in invisible ink on the barograph sheet, which he developed while in flight, but he had even gone so far as to take so much of a poison, intended to counterfeit the effects of exhaustion, that he barely escaped wrecking his plane when he descended.

It is difficult to imagine the mental process which would lead a man to the perpetration of such a fraud from which he could hope to gain nothing except a renown which he would know to be meaningless. It is exactly like cheating at solitaire. And yet Callizo is not the only man who has ever been guilty of a similar madness. The ever-famous Dr. Cook aside, there is the recent case of the Viennese biologist Kammerer whose suicide was attributed to the fact that either he or one of his assistants had been proved guilty of faking the records of a scientific experiment which he made public, and there is also the more ancient one of John Payne Collier, a distinguished scholar, who forged additions to genuine documents relating to Shakespeare and thus threw into great confusion the very problems which he himself had striven to elucidate. In none of these cases was the guilty man merely a fraud. Even Dr. Cook had more than the average man's intrepidity as a traveler; even Callizo was at least a skilful pilot; and Collier had done scholarly work so sound that his forgeries could not wholly deprive him of renown. Kammerer, too, was a man of genuine attainments. In each case we have to do with a man who became gradually so obsessed with the idea of fame that he could, in a sort of dream, betray the very things to which he had devoted his life.

Callizo, so the reports say, only escaped a beating at the hands of his infuriated fellow aviators by slipping out a side door after he had made his confession, but it is difficult not to feel for him a sort of pity. With his records expunged, his pilot's license taken away, and himself expelled from the Aero Club, he presents the spectacle of a man who cared more for reputation than for anything else and who has had that reputation irrevocably destroyed. There is no possible explanation, no possible excuse, which will be accepted as affording the slightest palliation. "I'm finished," he said, and there are few men of whom that could be said in a sense more nearly absolute and eternal.

Mob-Murdered Aviators

IN their bloody and uncivilized day the ancient Romans gathered to watch human gladiators stab each other to death in the public arena. In our refined and enlightened scientific age millions of newspaper readers get their excitement by watching aviators plunge to death in the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. Since the World War, with the possible exception of the suspense of watching the clock move toward two doomed men's execution-hour, the newspaper public has had no more engrossing and delicious thrill. It loves it.

There is heroism in it. There is courage. But physical bravery is one of the cheapest of commodities in a nation molded by the iron code of sportsmanship; and there is not even bravery in buying editions to find out whether brave men have been found and saved. If men, of their own initiative, and for their own souls, wish to risk death in a lonely ocean, it seems to us their right to take that risk. To urge a law to ban stunt flights is one of the most ridiculous excrescences of a law-ridden age. But the twenty-five men and two women who have met death in connection with transoceanic flights this summer did not die simply because of a spontaneous upwelling within them of a determination to fly across the sea. They succumbed to a mass hysteria, to a newspaper ballyhoo, which made it almost impossible for a man, once he had announced his intention, to heed the dictates of common sense.

Givon, the French aviator, headed out toward the open Atlantic when the winds blew strong and the fog-banks closed in on him. He had the decent common sense to give up, for that time at least, an impossible attempt. He turned back—and the bloodthirsty mobs nearly lynched him. For all common sense [illegible] Nungesser and Coli are heroes to the mob—and the stories are forgotten that government officials, wishing France to win the aviation honors first, sent them out with a false weather report. After all, the officials acted from "patriotic" motives; and why should not peace as well as war be permitted its quota of patriotic murders?

Byrd took the responsibility of waiting, and finally made his flight successfully; but it is not for his long wait that the public applauds him. Had he taken a wilder chance and been lost with his companions in the ocean that holds the secrets of Nungesser, of Redfern, of the Princess Lowenstein-Wertheim, of Bertaud and Hill and Payne and the rest, he would still be acclaimed as a hero. He is honored because he took the risk of death—and the public which adored the war in these lesser days finds its thrill, regardless of reasonableness, in the gladiatorial combat with the sea. Poor Charles Levine by this time probably wishes that he had never planned to make another record flight; but he knows the jibes that await him if he does not. If he should finally take passage on a sound, safe steamship the act would prove more real courage than his much vaunted adventure in taking his seat beside Clarence Chamberlin.

And the Dole flight. Of all examples of public readiness to send good men—and women—to death this was surely the most flagrant. An Hawaiian pineapple-planter offered a prize for a flight from California toward his pineapple fields. Everyone knew that the planes which started were unequipped with pontoons, and even that some of them showed engine defects before they started. But the ballyhoo was on. The public roared; impatient as it had been while Lindbergh and Chamberlin and Byrd waited for favoring winds, it was still more exigent in the Pacific. Despite the demand of aviation experts for delay it was announced that the flyers must start on a certain day. Pedlar and Knope and Frost and Scott, and Miss Doran, paid with their lives for that mad act; and Erwin and Eichwaldt died in a hopeless effort to search the seas by retracing in another plane the route that had killed those five. The United States Navy burned up 4,055,050 gallons of gasoline steaming back and forth across the silent Pacific hunting for at least an oil-spot to tell the story of their death. (There is a certain sardonic humor in the spectacle of the great ocean bulldogs, equipped with the last devices for killing men by thousands, weaving their way across the ocean in the hope of saving one or two of these five. Probably the funds of the navy were never better spent.)

Now in a sudden fit of revulsion, this same mob-public is demanding an end to stunt flights. At least, says one stalwart friend of humanity, women must not be allowed to take such risks. Why not? If there is to be ballyhoo, why should not Thea Rasche, and Mildred Doran, and the sixty-two-year-old princess who stepped into fame as she mounted into her death-plane have their share of mob-glory? Women, who have won their right to votes and jobs, now demand an equal right to death, and they should have it. If we are going to set in upon a wave of revulsion against unnecessary death, let us not confine it to one sex, or, indeed, to transoceanic flights. There is such a thing as a sense of proportion. Twenty-seven people have died in transoceanic flying this summer; the Great War cost ten million lives. But it is probably too much to hope that a little of the revulsion against stunt flights should be turned toward disarmament.

It Seems To Heywood Broun

"'I SAID to her that if I could marry her I would, but that it was out of my power. I said that money was no object and that all I could do to make her happy and comfortable would be done.'

"'Very generous, I am sure,' said Holmes with a sneer."

I was pained to learn that Sherlock sneered. The quotation is from "The Problem of Thor Bridge," in the latest collection of detective tales by Conan Doyle. Some few years ago Mr. Doyle killed his detective and it is a pity that second thoughts roused him from eternal slumber. At last his creator has consigned the famous character to a fate worse than death. Sherlock Holmes has turned moral. He is ruined by reincarnation.

To be sure, even in the old days Holmes was invariably stalwart against the forces of crime. Short shrift he gave to murderers, bank robbers, and blackmailers. Yet he was, within reason, the disciple of personal liberty. Not all his own habits were good. Tobacco he used, and still uses, to excess, but the old familiar rallying cry of a master mind in periods of boredom has departed, and no longer shall we hear the imperative command: "Quick, Watson, the needle." When preachers complain of the new licentiousness which they think they find in fiction I shall remember back to the days of a rowdy Holmes, and I do regret the pressure of the modern magazine which has made it necessary for Conan Doyle to reform him.

It was entirely wrong for Neil Gibson, the Gold King, to suggest a relationship somewhat short of matrimony to Miss Grace Dunbar, the lady chiefly distressed by the problem of Thor Bridge. And it was most unwise for Mr. Holmes to employ narcotics at such times as he lacked the stimulation of a current mystery. However, it was very necessary that the great detective should possess a weakness, and among his virtues tolerance should loom up above all other peaks of rectitude. In my own youth, and to others in their formative years, Sherlock Holmes was a god. The best gods have imperfections, for in perfection there is no kindliness. No character in modern English fiction has attained as wide a fame as Sherlock Holmes, and it seems inevitable that his name must be known to Dr. Freud and all the Freudians of Vienna. How strange, then, is the fact that none of the textbooks analyze the curious case of Conan Doyle.

Of the author's early upbringing I know nothing, which is on the whole a help rather than a handicap, since it permits the amateur psychiatrist to speak freely. Accordingly, it is my guess that Sir Arthur did not like his father much and set about in later years to create one closer to the heart's desire. Sherlock Holmes is superbly the father image. His equipment consists of all wisdom, all courage, and all strength. No problem ever defied the wit of the big man in Baker Street. Men and women, heavy laden with perplexities, called at his door and found comfort. Even when death hissed all about them, Holmes needed no more than a few cigar ashes and, perhaps, some dry, caked mud, to find a pathway out of peril. Conan Doyle is himself a ruddy giant, and even so I hazard the opinion that he has found much in life to give him pause and panic. For his own purposes of relief he conjured up the helpful Holmes and it was a public benefaction to give this character to the world. Toward all of us who quaked and shivered when stairways creaked and strong winds blew, Holmes served as anti-bogey.

There is a tragic incompleteness in graven images. The ancient prohibition against these likenesses to be found in heaven, earth, and water still holds true. Anybody with a fair degree of imagination can make a god for himself and one eminently satisfactory for short hauls. But it is hard to cherish home-brew idols. So in those early days when Conan Doyle was fashioning the hero Holmes, the writer of detective fiction was already moving upon the first stage of a longer pilgrimage. If we had been wise enough we might have known that Sir Arthur was on his way to God. Most logically a belief in spiritism grows out of a faith and fondness for Sherlock Holmes. There is a wisdom in the psychology of that church which gives its members saints and martyrs as Indian clubs by means of which one may acquire a muscular Christianity capable of sustaining more weighty dogma.

I have no patience with those who sneer at Conan Doyle's preoccupation with mediums and ectoplasm. Once I heard him talk about his experiences with psychic phenomena and I was singularly unconvinced by his testimony. All I accepted was his sincerity. Still, it is no part of Sir Arthur's job to find a philosophy in which I may find peace and comfort. Since he has gained ease of mind for himself, and very likely for others, he would be a fool to drop the matter because of jibes from the side lines. Only one thing I hold against Conan Doyle. It is no kindly service which he performs in publicly exhibiting the bones of Sherlock Holmes. A gulf has been set up between the detective and his creator. Doyle has averted his face from the rooms in Baker Street. His mind is now engrossed with other themes which may be more important.

In this last work, "The Case Book of Sherlock Holmes," the famous deductor is no better than the muddlers from Scotland Yard. Feebly he moves to solve petty mysteries which would hardly perplex a precocious child. Again and again in these later chronicles I found myself at least two or three jumps ahead of Holmes and waiting for the poor old wheezer to keep pace with me. Save only in the problem concerning the murder at Thor Bridge did it seem to me that a spark of the old ingenuity remained. When Holmes at last discovered that the dead woman had actually murdered herself I was disposed to say: "Excellent, my dear Sherlock," for I had arrived at that same decision not more than half an hour previously.

If Conan Doyle continues to put a decrepit detective through his paces something should be done about it. Sherlock Holmes deserves a comfortable old age. Why not a pension? Those of us who love him are so numerous that we could readily afford to set him out to pasture. Possibly he might not be happy in rural quietude, and so we might agree to let him have a murder once a year just for his birthday.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Americans We Like

Mr. Babbitt, Meet Sinclair Lewis

By WILLIAM J. McNALLY

The first in a series of personality portraits.

"HELLO, George, you darned old son-of-a-gun! So you're Myra's husband, eh? Well, well! How are you, anyway? And how's Myra?"

"By golly, if it ain't Red Lewis himself in person! Put her there, ole timer. I've been wanting to know you ever since the little woman got that knock-down to you at that house party up in the north end of the State. Say, she talked a lot about you. Nuthin' else but. Gosh, say but I'm glad you ain't one of them long-haired literary guys. You know you look enough like a human being to be a brother Elk. Don't happen to be, do you? No? Well, anyway you're my kind. Yes, sir-ree. Put her there again, ole sorrel top, and have one on me."

It is in the foregoing not precisely austere or ascetic fashion that Sinclair Lewis and George F. Babbitt are wont to meet. On any number of occasions I have seen them thus come together.

Sinclair Lewis spent a good deal of 1926 back in his own Middle West. He was collecting material for a preacher novel as yet untitled, but destined to be known as "Elmer Gantry," and he was picking up his detail on the ground. After a spring sojourn in Kansas City, he came north to his home State, Minnesota, where, at Big Pelican Lake, he literally pitched tent for the summer. The summer place which he took was hidden away in the woods and, no doubt, appealed to him because of its seclusion. The seclusion which he enjoyed, however, was mostly theoretical.

It so happened that one of the smart summer hotels of the Northwest was situated on the other end of the lake. The gregarious Lewis could not, of course, do other than drop over to the hotel frequently, and, as a result, he was constantly coming in contact with the Twin City crowds which thronged it. That the Babbitts constituted a generous percentage of these crowds might all too readily be inferred. That they would know better than to disappoint Lewis by returning to the city without motoring over to call on him might also be regarded as too obviously inevitable to be worth the chronicling. Consequently there were few hours of day or night when he was safe from their irruptions. Their devotion to their lampooner was such that at times Lewis's literary headquarters might well have been described as "The Babbitts' Retreat."

I chanced to be up at Lewis's headquarters during a portion of the summer, and hence saw a good deal of him in his social relations with Babbitts. I must say that I was surprised to note how well they got on. It was not that Lewis sought Babbitt out; on the contrary, he had Babbitt thrust upon him. But, as soon as they got together, they appeared to team up spontaneously and heartily, on occasions even uproariously. In Lewis's nature there is the same broad streak of friendliness that there is in Babbitt's; or, to put the case differently, aloofness is as foreign to Lewis as it is to Babbitt. Both Lewis and Babbitt are alike in refusing to have anything to do with the formal "Mister," and Lewis is not one whit tardier in referring to Babbitt as "George" than Babbitt is in referring to Lewis as "Red."

At bottom Lewis no more dislikes the Babbitt of life than he dislikes the Babbitt of his own creation. True, Babbitt's gabble sometimes infuriates him, but mostly it amuses him. Lewis and Babbitt have too much in common to be genuine enemies. Poles asunder though they be in outlook on life, in temperament they are blood brothers. Both are voluble and companionable; both are overflowing with cordiality; both are ready, on a second's notice, to "lead the gang" in a song or a cheer; both despise Greenwich Village, "arty" people, and effeminate men; both hate affectation, grand manners, and intellectual pretensions; both have a basic, instinctive, and thoroughly American distrust of foreigners; both are high-spirited, plain-spoken, impulsive, quick on the trigger, riotous, hilarious, and gay. Lewis, of course, is not wholly comfortable with Babbitt, particularly if [illegible] to take him in long stretches. But they do get along famously during limited encounters; and, at any and all times, Lewis is far less uncomfortable with Babbitt than with the pale young man who confesses to a volume of privately printed verse and keeps the conversation exclusively confined to James Joyce, Carl Van Vechten, and George Meredith. In his innermost soul Lewis feels a real and unconquerable detestation for the latter; but there is no detestation in his soul for Babbitt.

II

With the Main Streeter, the situation is different. I chanced to be witness to at least one encounter between Main Street and the author of "Main Street," an adequate description of which would require nothing less than the trained talent of the newspaper sporting editor.

The time was July, 1926, the locale the summer hotel already referred to. A group of guests had gathered round the hotel piano. Lewis, tall, lean, in knickers, and red-headed, was, characteristically, master of ceremonies. Characteristically, too, he was having the group sing hymns. His repertory of hymns is inexhaustible, and he sings and leads them with a derisive gusto which is likely to keep the casual spectator continuously convulsed. When he had wearied of the hymns, he turned to the pianist, and asked him to play the Opus 39, Number 15, Brahms waltz. (Lewis is, or was at the time, devoted to this composition.) Lewis, the caricaturist, vanished the moment the opening bars were heard; and a new character, Lewis the rapt disciple of music, appeared in his stead.

At this point a late diner left his table and made himself a part of the group. He fixed his eye on Lewis, and freely confided that he was from Crosby, Minnesota. Winning no response from the man intent on Brahms, he moved a step closer and added the more intimate information that he had once been in Sauk Center. Lewis, still engrossed, paid no attention to these geographical and autobiographical gratuities. The dauntless citizen from Crosby, however, was not to be ignored. Advancing directly to Lewis, he said: "Hey! Just because you wrote 'Main Street' you needn't think you're so damn much. I'm as good as you are any day."

And by the way of giving a subdued and modest emphasis to his subdued and modest statement, he caught Lewis with a powerful and well-directed left hook to the jaw.

In a second Lewis was on his feet. Brahms was forgotten. Literature was forgotten. Civilization was forgotten. What followed was strictly a personal affair between the red-head from Sauk Center and the tow-head from Crosby. Main Street and the author of "Main Street" were meeting—and without gloves. Lewis went after his assailant with a natural fighting vocabulary and a natural pair of fighting fists; the Manassa Mauler could not have waded into an opponent with a less complicated determination to kill than the red-head now waded into the tow-head.

III

Above all else, Lewis is a character. "Red" exactly expresses him. Beside him, Gene Tunney would seem academic. Lewis should have been an Elizabethan; he and Kit Marlowe would have had a congenial time of it in the swashbuckling tavern days when rowdies were illiterate and arguments were brawls. Lewis is so much of an anachronism to the twentieth century that his routine doings have become front-page copy. The belief has been fostered in certain quarters that he is a deliberate publicity seeker. This is very far from the truth. He happens to be the possessor of a vehement and eruptive temperament which he would like very much to control, but which he cannot control.

I once asked him why he didn't give up his wanderings and settle down permanently in Minnesota. His reply was illuminating.

"Oh," he said ruefully, "the city is just small enough, or village-minded enough, so that I'd be having outbreaks from time to time and offending everybody. And I'm tired of scrapping. All I want is peace and a few civilized companions and a quiet fireside."

And there one authentic side of the true Lewis spoke. Paradoxical as it may seem, he hates brawls, yet cannot keep out of them. And again, paradoxical as it may seem, with an unmatched talent for making enemies, he is the friendliest animal in the world.

With his talent for making enemies one would suppose that there would co-exist, inevitably, some capacity for sustained hatred. But nothing of the sort is to be found in him. There is little in life that he takes seriously, least of all, certainly, his feuds.

It is impossible to understand Lewis without understanding his grin. He always comes back to his grin. And that grin is the key to much of him. It is the grin of the small boy, and Lewis remains essentially, the small boy. He knows nothing, and never will know anything, about the language of diplomacy. He has to speak his mind out, whether that means ruffling susceptibilities, provoking riots and getting himself into pickles or not. He is like the small boy in his extraordinary naivete and candor. Every mother has lived in dread of her ingenuous young son who, if he is having a poor time at a party, informs his hostess succinctly that her party is "rotten." And, when she subsequently takes him to task for his remark, he never makes matters easy for her. "But it's the truth, mother," he insists. "It was a rotten party. Everybody thought so."

This is the explanation of Lewis's talent for making enemies. He has never outgrown his habit of blurting the truth out as he sees it. In sheer simplicity Lewis greatly resembles a certain well-known American whom he differs from in just about every other known respect, namely, Henry Ford. Both are alike in that they were born with stern inhibitions against being anything but themselves. That is the secret of both their incomparable publicity temperaments.

IV

I have spoken of Lewis as a friendly animal. That, too, exactly expresses him. He is as naturally friendly as a puppy. He has an exceptional capacity for liking people; and he warms up to them at once. His capacity for liking people far outruns his capacity for admiring them; and one constantly finds him liking people he has decided doubts about. Indeed it is difficult for him not to like people even when he knows that they are knaves, rascals, frauds, and bores. He likes them just as he likes his Babbitts and Gantrys. Now and then one hears of the author who can enjoy putting into a novel only characters he would admit to his drawing room. The oddity of Lewis is that he would open his doors to all his characters as readily as he opens his pages to them. He is as incapable of intellectual snobbery as he is of social, and as incapable of moral snobbery as he is of intellectual. At heart he is, and always will be, a vagabond.

Main Street is firm in its conviction that Lewis suffers from megalomania. Only Main Street does not phrase it that way. It insists tersely that he has "the swelled head." The rural press of Minnesota is full of such accusations. I must confess that I have never been able to understand precisely what was meant by "the swelled head"; but, if it means anything, I suppose it means entertaining an exaggerated notion of one's achievements and capabilities. I have met many individuals about whom this comment might, with justice, be made; yet Sinclair Lewis is certainly not one of them. Except when he has his war paint on, he is a person of infinite intellectual humility. I have never found that discussing his own success with him differed in the least from discussing it with any other keen-minded observer. He surveys his success with the utmost objectivity. He attributes the vogue of "Main Street" partly to fortunate "timing" (the period of disillusionment following the war being ideal for the appearance of a novel of disillusionment), partly to persistent newspaper columnist agitation, and partly to the provocative and bellicose mood in which it was written. He once remarked to me that if "Main Street" had been written with more poise and less temper it probably would never have been read outside the intellectual circles at all.

He does not, of his own initiative, refer to his books. He will talk about them freely, and even critically, if they are brought up by an understanding outsider; but he appears to prefer talking about books turned out by other hands. I do not believe that he has ever allowed himself to form any precise opinions as to the merits of his various novels. I think he distrusts his judgment when applied to his own works. I have the feeling that somebody whose judgment he respects—Mencken, for example—might easily persuade him that a given novel of his was either excellent or poor. Summer before last, for example, when the reviews of "Mantrap" were coming in, I could not form any conclusion as to what Lewis himself thought about the book. One morning he tossed across the breakfast table a sheaf of reviews which had just come in from England. He vouchsafed no remark, and shortly sauntered off to the tent where he wrote. The reviews, I discovered, were uniformly favorable. Throughout that day it seemed to me that Lewis was rather warm on "Mantrap." Several days later there came in a copy of the American Mercury, with Mencken's review of "Mantrap" a part of its contents. Mencken did not care for "Mantrap." I may have been mistaken, but it seemed to me that, in Lewis's mind, the stock of "Mantrap" suffered a sharp and immediate slump. Of this, however, I am sure: "Mantrap" was no pot-boiler. Lewis would not know how to put his tongue in his cheek and write solely for money. He might write from mistaken enthusiasm; he could not but write from enthusiasm.

"Arrowsmith," apparently, is his favorite among his own works. In the entire body of his writings the only passage I ever heard him admit to a shy weakness for was that description of the beginnings of the influenza plague which appeared in Chapter XXXI, which ran as follows:

> From Yun-nan in China, from the clattering bright bazaars, crept something invisible in the sun and vigilant by dark, creeping, unfeared, terrible; creeping across the Himalayas down through walled market-places, across a desert, along hot yellow rivers, into an American missionary compound—creeping silent, steady, and busy and there on its way a man was black and killed with plague.
>
> In Bombay a new dock guard, unaware of things, spoke boisterously over his family rice of a strange new custom of the rats.
>
> The princes of the [illegible] in dark and turn had gone mad. They came out on the warehouse floor, ignoring the guard, springing up as though (the guard said merrily) they were trying to fly, and straightway falling dead. He had poked at them, but they did not move.
>
> Three days later that dock-guard died of the plague.

V

The name of Sinclair Lewis, the novelist, is associated by every critic in the country with at least two outstanding qualities, gusto and unique powers of mimicry. And no less are these qualities associated with Sinclair Lewis the individual by every friend of his who knows him at all intimately. He runs to mimicry as spontaneously as a monkey. The most frequent object of his mimicry is our old acquaintance, Babbitt.

"Now my idea of them radical literary fellows is this," he will begin with a positive air. "As I was sayin' just the other day—"

And with that he is on the loose. Having become Babbitt, one never knows how long he will stay Babbitt. He could, if need be, remain in character for hours. I remember a certain evening when, having transformed himself into Babbitt, he told us of having gone down to Washington to shake the President's hand. The particular Babbitt he had become had, it seems, once been a school-mate of "Cal's," and wished to renew the ancient acquaintance. The aimless and inconsecutive flow of dreadful platitudes, thick-witted observations, and ungrammatical philosophizings proved to be as diverting as it was torrential. The conclusion of the interminable narrative found Babbitt proudly displaying the hand which had shaken the hand of the man who had once shaken hands with "Cal"—it developed that Babbitt had never got to "Cal" himself at all—and informing his auditors that he had never had a more inspirational and educational trip. The sketch, which Lewis improvised as he went along, would have made a very respectable companion-piece to any of Ruth Draper's satirical sketches. It was characterized by the same voluminous detail and the same high spirits that one encounters in the Lewis novels. When Lewis begins Babbitudinizing, his difficulty is never that of finding words, but of preventing them from flooding him. He literally showers Babbitudes. He is less a rain than a downpour. Though he mimics Babbitt best, his mimicry is not confined to Babbitt. He mimics anybody; indeed, I do not know that I have ever met anyone who does a verbal cartoon more tellingly and with less effort.

In an earlier day, I used to wonder why Lewis did not prefer a quieter satirical method in his novels. When he is seen at close range, the answer is obvious enough. His temperament is such that he cannot travel other than "in high"; and he has no brakes. His embarrassment begins when he recalls that he is under the necessity of checking his furious pace and slowing down. He does not know how to slow down. Sheer momentum continues to sweep him forward long after he has reached the logical place to halt.

What makes him formidable in the literature of attack is this uncontrolled and uncontrollable drive. When he undertakes to attack something in his novels, one gets the impression of ocean waves piling up without stint or limit, inexhaustibly. Long after the rock has been washed away, the waves continue lashing, lashing, lashing—apparently unable to subside at all.

This is Lewis himself in conversation. Naturally irrepressible, he is simply unable to subside. Put him in a group, and he is likely not only to do most of the talking, but also to be the last survivor. In the long evenings up at Big Pelican Lake Lewis was regularly fresh, unwearied, and voluble after everyone else had gone reeling to bed. His vitality is astonishing. There is no wearing him down. Up at the lake he was not merely the last to turn in, but the first to appear at breakfast the following morning. Then, at the breakfast table, one was always sure to find him sparkling with energy and good humor and conversing at white heat throughout the remainder of the meal and, more frequently than not, throughout the remainder of the morning as well. "Elmer Gantry," at the time but a stack of sheets next the typewriter in the tent, had to submit to complete neglect every other day or so. Its author was regularly forsaking it for one of his long-distance conversations.

Though busy with "Elmer Gantry," Lewis did not talk about it much. Once in a while he would give Elmer's "Hallelujah" yell, an exercise which was always congenial to him (he has the natural temperament of the cheer leader), and now and then he would drop a remark about Sharon, who was just beginning to take on form and outline, and who had suddenly captivated him. His prevailing mood during the composition of "Gantry" was clearly that of an anti-evangelical evangelist; but when he reached Sharon it seemed as if the novelist had leaped at him from the rear and pinioned him, catching him, in a sense, unaware. Lewis, instead of being displeased with this turn, was delighted. The novelist in him, after all, is a force to be reckoned with. He recognized the danger that the evangelist in him might swamp the novelist altogether; and he was anxious that the novelist unseat the evangelist, seize the pen, and write as much of the book as possible. One reason why he was so ardently on the side of the novelist, I think, was because he felt that in this book the novelist was in unusual peril of being the under dog.

Certainly he had enough "religion" in his system and in his household to satisfy anybody. The Reverend Mr. Birkhead and Mrs. Birkhead, a charming couple from Kansas City, were living in the cottage, while Lewis himself was living in the tent a couple of hundred yards away. Both the cottage and the tent were littered with heavy, humorless religious tomes. Religious periodicals were coming in all the time. The only items in the newspapers which interested Lewis were stories relating to clergymen. The table conversation was filled with references to various Kansas City clergymen, Earl Blackmore, "Bill" Stidger, and so on, all of whom, of course, Lewis liked. One evening Father John, a Catholic priest from Sauk Center, came over to visit Lewis. Father John was one of Lewis's pet enthusiasms. On another evening Lewis motored over to Brainerd to hear Minnesota's leading fundamentalist and anti-evolutionist, the Reverend Dr. Riley, deliver a lecture. He had a chat with Dr. Riley afterwards and, needless to say, came back liking him extremely.

Contradictory Lewis unquestionably is. It is his contradictoriness, in no small measure, which makes him interesting as a character. Why should it infuriate him, for example, to hear the English gravely praise "Babbitt" as a perfect portrayal of American customs and manners? Yet infuriate him it does. He resents that pronouncement (when it comes from the other side of the water) as hotly as Babbitt himself. He resents it as hotly as he resents the antithetical pronouncement when it comes from this side of the water. And there you are. Find the consistency if you can. Ask Lewis to explain the inconsistency, and a boyish grin will lighten his countenance, and he will tell you to go to the devil. The answer naturally is that he is American to the core. It is quite all right for Americans to tell Americans of their faults; but he will take no censure of America, even by implication, from foreign sources.

There is still another respect in which Lewis is contradictory. In his belligerent moments he is quixotic; in his contemplative moments he has no admiration whatsoever for chivalry, which he considers futile. In his belligerent moments he is full of certainties; in his contemplative moments he has none at all. In his belligerent moments he cannot but be hortatory and evangelical; in his contemplative moments his contempt for evangelism knows no bounds. Catch him in his contemplative moments, and you are struck by the sensitiveness of his taste, the breadth of his outlook, and the razor-like sharpness of his intelligence. Catch him in his belligerent or sentimental moments, and you are amazed at his utter primitiveness. He is enthusiastically devoted to his few friends, and makes of friendship a lyric thing; yet his concept of friendship is essentially that of a tribal chieftain's.

Loyalty overshadows all else for Lewis; he could no more be heterodox in his view of Judas than Babbitt. He not only places a high evaluation upon loyalty, but upon militant loyalty. He likes the type of friend who is ready to avenge an insult to him with his fists. It is not enough to take loyalty for granted; he enjoys seeing it demonstrated spectacularly, even melodramatically. I suppose it is sufficient to say that he enjoys receiving the sort of friendship he is ready to give. Lewis himself belongs to the breed willing to submit to any inconvenience or to go to any lengths, no matter how extravagant, for his friends. He enters upon a friendship with the same abandon, the same gusto, and the same heartiness that he enters upon a novel. With his friends he is much more like the doughboy with his "buddies" than the citizen of the world with his companions. Yet, for all that, in his contemplative moments he is the poised philosopher, the citizen of the world complete. These contradictions are simply not to be explained; they are inherent in Lewis himself.

Lewis, in fine, is a distinctively American phenomenon. He is American in the sense that the flavor of him is unmistakably, unabashedly, inevitably, and inimitably American. Like Abraham Lincoln, Mark Twain, Walt Whitman, and P. T. Barnum, he is simply not to be conceived of as a European. Prairie influences molded his personality; the tang of the prairie is to be felt in him still. Encounter him merely as a red-headed stranger in any international gathering, and he would be the first man in the group whose nationality you would feel certain about. "Mid-west America!" would be your immediate ejaculation. In this cosmopolitan nomad there is even a trace of the back-home American.

To my surprise, I discovered in him a good deal of sentiment for his home State. He has abused it and been abused by it; yet withal he retains a real affection for it. I doubt if it would be prudent for any Bostonian or Philadelphian to speak slightingly or superciliously of Minnesota in his presence; Lewis would as likely burst into a sheet of flame as not. Sensitive as a poet and rough as a lumberjack, ready to fight at the drop of the hat and yet quite as ready to give you the hat, part Gopher Prairieite and part cosmopolite, part boy and part seer, prankish, playful, outspoken, inconsistent, sentimental, militant, quixotic, and dynamic, a bundle of quivering nerves, a personality electric with interest in life, a bond-buying vagabond and a flag-hating flag-waver, a primitive ultra-modern, a pugilistic aesthete, and a crusader against crusading, even his enemies would have to admit that he was at least an unforgetable experience and an unsurpassable companion. Nature as a novelist was never in a more opulent or paradoxical creative mood than when she invented the torrid, rich, and variegated character of Sinclair Lewis, proletarian plutocrat, bourgeois gypsy, patriotic expatriate, unmannerly critic of manners, and loud-speaking champion of the subdued voice.

A Year After Thoiry

By ROBERT DELL

Paris, August 19

NEARLY a year has passed since M. Briand's famous speech in the Assembly of the League of Nations after the admission of Germany into the League and his subsequent meeting with Dr. Stresemann at Thoiry. When one compares the hopes that were aroused a year ago with the distressing reality of the present situation, one is almost driven to despair. Not only has nothing been done during the last twelve months to realize the provisional agreement made at Thoiry, but there has been a distinct set-back to the policy inaugurated at Locarno—the policy of friendly cooperation between England, France, and Germany, on which the peace of Europe depends.

Yet the hopes of September, 1926, should not have been illusory, for they were based on solid grounds of reason. M. Briand returned from Geneva last year in triumph, confident of his ability to carry through the Thoiry policy, and his confidence seemed to be justified. He had the greater part both of the press and of the public in France on his side. The Quotidien declared that his policy must go through, even if it involved the downfall of the Poincaré Cabinet, and papers such as the Petit Parisien and the Petit Journal, with no pretension to be on the Left in politics, spoke of the early evacuation of the Rhineland as a settled thing. At that moment French public opinion was undoubtedly ready for evacuation and for unreserved reconciliation with Germany.

Not so, unfortunately, M. Briand's colleagues in the Cabinet, from whom he had by no means a cordial reception. He was accused of having exceeded his powers—for he had arranged the Thoiry meeting without consulting the Cabinet or even M. Poincaré—and of having committed himself to a policy dangerous to the security of France. Nevertheless, it was announced that there was "complete agreement" in the Government as to the policy to be pursued and that a committee of experts would at once be appointed to report on the suggestions made at Thoiry. No such committee was ever appointed and in fact the only policy on which the Government was agreed was that of adjourning the matter sine die. M. Briand lost a great opportunity which has never returned. Had he said that he would resign rather than consent to the abolition of the predominant position of the politicians, he could have crossed the Government, for, had he resigned, M. Poincaré would have resigned too. No doubt it was in accordance with M. Briand's temperament and habitual methods to yield rather than cause a ministerial crisis.

There was, however, another and perhaps a stronger motive for giving way. M. Briand knew that for the French public the franc is more important than reconciliation with Germany or the peace of Europe. Had he brought down the Government he would have become the destroyer of the Savior of the Franc and the wrecker of financial restoration, and the country would have turned against him. It was because M. Poincaré knew this, too, that he made the continuance of M. Briand in office a condition of the continued existence of the Government. I doubt whether even the Quotidien, in spite of its brave words immediately after Thoiry, would have supported M. Briand. It has certainly given him no support for a long time past. Indeed, since the first flush of enthusiasm faded away, he has had no effective support from the Radicals and Socialists, least of all from his Radical colleagues in the Cabinet. Both M. Herriot and M. Albert Sarraut were ready and even eager to take his place at the Quai d'Orsay and follow M. Poincaré's instructions. When it became evident that the Thoiry policy was indefinitely postponed, no paper of the Left, not even the Populaire, made any attempt to work up a campaign in its favor. L'Humanité, of course, did not, for the Communists were opposed to Locarno from the first on the absurd ground that it was directed against Russia and because they are apparently opposed on principle to any pact of peace between capitalist governments. In short, M. Briand is isolated.

Instead of strengthening his position, as he evidently hoped, time has weakened it. M. Poincaré has continued to use the menace that made M. Briand yield a year ago and he takes care not to proceed to the legal stabilization of the franc and thus end the state of uncertainty that makes his own position almost impregnable. Moreover, while M. Briand and his supporters have been inactive, the opponents of the Thoiry policy have been extremely active and have gradually undermined M. Briand's influence and revived fear and distrust of Germany by a skilful campaign. Nothing could more clearly show how completely M. Briand is paralyzed than the fact that he has not once this year been allowed to make a speech in Parliament on foreign policy, nor has there been a single parliamentary debate on foreign affairs. And both the Radicals and the Socialists have acquiesced in this muzzling of M. Briand and Parliament. The Socialists did, indeed, give notice of an interpellation on foreign policy in the Chamber at the end of the session and M. Poincaré agreed to a debate but, when M. Briand, who was in the country for his health, returned to Paris for the express purpose of replying to the interpellation, the Socialists withdrew it!

Such has been the conduct of those on whose support M. Briand might naturally have counted. Meanwhile M. Poincaré began at Bar-le-Duc a series of Sunday afternoon speeches on the wickedness of the Germans, raking up German "atrocities" and even pre-war incidents, and complaining that the German Government had not changed the name of an ancient warship called the Elsass. The worst was the speech at Lunéville, which led Dr. Stresemann to ask whether France was for the policy of the Ruhr or the policy of Locarno. His question remains to this day unanswered. Perhaps M. Briand might have answered it, had not the Socialists prevented him from speaking, as I have mentioned. The press of the Right began a campaign on the menace of German armaments and the imminent danger of a German attack, obviously inspired by the General Staff to prevent the evacuation of the Rhineland or even a reduction of the occupying forces. The campaign culminated in a three-column article in the Echo de Paris on August 16 in which the occupation of the Rhineland was declared to be the only guarantee of French security, which implies that it must be permanent, Germany was represented as being on the point of attacking France, any reduction of the occupying forces was opposed, and Sir Austen Chamberlain was accused of having sent a note on the question of reduction so offensive in tone that M. Briand dared not read it to the Cabinet.

The net result of all this is that M. Briand goes to Geneva a year after Thoiry discredited and without authority or prestige. It amazes me that he has the face to go at all and it would not surprise me if he resigned when he came back. It would be the course most consistent with his dignity. M. Henry de Jouvenel of the Senate and the Matin has given him a parting kick. There is considerable force in the official reason that M. de Jouvenel gave for resigning from the French delegation. It is true, as he says, that the most important questions concerning European peace, beginning with the Corfu affair, have been withheld from the League of Nations. Because it is true, M. Briand's reply was very weak, but he was justified in remarking that M. de Jouvenel had taken a long time to find out that the League was being set aside, for he was already a member of the French delegation at the time of the Corfu affair of four years ago. In his explanatory article in the Matin, however, M. de Jouvenel let the black cat out of the bag. He wants France once more to be the center of the "little nations," that is, he is for the military alliances with Poland and the rest against the policy of Locarno. Two months ago M. de Jouvenel declared in an interview given to the Vossische Zeitung that the Pact of Locarno was insufficient and further guarantees were required. He suggested that the Powers should return to Locarno to make a new pact, which should include "at least" a British guarantee of the present Polish frontiers.

It is sometimes said that M. Poincaré is not really opposed to the Thoiry policy—that is, to the evacuation of the Rhineland—that he is merely waiting until America is willing to buy the German railway securities, and that depends on the ratification by France of the debt agreement, which in its turn depends on stabilization. In that case, why does not M. Poincaré stabilize, as both the financial and the industrial interests in France now desire? It is a more probable hypothesis that one of his reasons for postponing legal stabilization is a desire to postpone the consequences mentioned. But the realization of the German railway securities was not an essential part of the Thoiry policy. It was probably suggested merely because M. Briand wished to have some quid pro quo to induce his colleagues to agree to the evacuation of the Rhineland. The essence of the Thoiry policy was the recognition of the evacuation as the logical consequence of Locarno, which morally bound the occupying Powers to withdraw.

M. Poincaré proposes to continue it as a guarantee of reparations, that is, of the fulfilment of Germany's obligations under the Dawes Plan. He foresees that the Dawes Plan will break down, either because it will be found impossible to transfer the payments, or because Germany defaults, and in either case he intends to use the occupation of the Rhineland as a means of bringing pressure on Germany to make a new arrangement. That this is his policy is certain, and he will never agree to evacuation before the fate of the Dawes Plan is known, which is to say that he is opposed to the Thoiry policy.

China Tests Our Religion

By HARRY F. WARD

MOST of the current discussion concerning the nature and worth of our religion has about it an air of unreality. It is of the same pattern as the Moscow talk about the condition and survival value of capitalism before the Communist dialecticians became realistic enough to appraise the economic phenomena of Europe, and so to recognize a period of stabilization for the system whose collapse they expect to hasten. In the case of religion the most significant body of data for determining its place and part in the future life of man is to be found from now on in Asia and in Russia. In this vast human laboratory, China is for the moment the most vital spot. It has suddenly become a great test tube in which the religion of the West, like its statecraft and its economics, is being subjected to an analysis the like of which it has never before undergone.

This process is now being hastened by the lighting of the fires of persecution, and in their lambent heat the various elements of our religion, and their comparative vitality, begin to appear. The Nanking affair, and a few similar minor incidents, brought to completion the revealing work of the anti-Christian movement. Here was the first touch of persecution felt by Western Christianity since the Boxer uprising; for its officials, under lay influence, declined the challenge of the anti-religious movement in Russia and of the Soviet laws against religious education. In that case it was inevitable that economic fear should outvote religious courage. When a religion has reached the prudential stage, when its conserving tendencies have outgrown its creative capacity, it naturally looks for its growth more to the money of the millionaires than to the blood of the martyrs, and one need not go to China for a germination test of that variety of seed. Its capacity for developing religion can be seen in plenty of cases nearer home, where it has not been mixed, as it has abroad, with the more vital sacrificial gifts of those of small income.

In the China test, the reaction of the mission boards at home, whose main task is financing the enterprise, is of course to be distinguished from that of missionaries in the field. The headquarters attitude necessarily expresses the institutionalist stage and type of religion when the adventurous spirit of the early days of poverty has given place to the sober judgments of vested interests. To these, already strained by lessening contributions, anti-foreignism in China is a calamitous burden, not a joyous test. It means that evacuated missionaries must be transported and maintained, that property must be replaced or restored, that the question of indemnity must be faced—shall it be accepted officially, for property if not for life; shall individuals be forbidden, encouraged, or left free to claim it? Manifestly, in this stage of an organization, we cannot expect the singing courage with which the I. W. W. leave the courtrooms of California on their way to jail, or the joyous abandon of Left Wingers on the picket line at Passaic, any more than we can find these things at A. F. of L. headquarters. It is the perennial problem of human organization—how to prevent the hardening of the arteries that a[illegible] also to institutions, how to preserve the virility of the dogmatic propagandist without his intolerant gyrations. Will it in the end be done through the discipline of the experimental attitude developed by science, or is there also needed that indefinable element of passion for the universal and continuing welfare of humanity that links man with the infinite?

Among the missionaries in China there appear two diverse reactions to the loss of possessions and the danger of death. One is the historic spirit of the martyr, soberly rejoicing in persecution as a test of faith, forgiving the persecutors with tolerant goodwill. This attitude is real enough to impress tough-minded, twentieth-century newspaper men with its value for the adjustment of distorted human relationships, even as long ago it made its dent on hardened Roman centurions. Another group shows the opposite reaction. Here one finds the spirit of retaliation, conventionally cloaked in the demand for justice. Punishment of wrongdoers is necessary to prevent repetition. Mad dogs are a common menace and must be destroyed—the old bromides! Naturally this group became the tool of the commercial interventionists of Shanghai, who desperately needed missionary support for their program, and whose journalistic mouthpieces gleefully cabled home long interviews from the few they could find and get to talk on the theme that missions must be reinstated and temporarily protected by armed force.

The clear consequence of this attitude reveals its nature. Denying the essential and universal elements in its own gospel it could not propagate itself. But those who by nature and training had failed to see and understand these elements could not be expected to perceive that their position was playing into the hands of the anti-Christian movement, whose chief charge was the association of Western religion with the spirit and methods of imperialism. Nor could they see the effect of their attitude upon their Chinese converts and colleagues. "Their talk," said a very influential Christian Chinese, "makes some of us wonder if we have not made a mistake in accepting Christianity from the hands of Western Christians." The more serious thing is that the attitude of such missionaries is indistinguishable from that of the commercial interventionists. They talk the same language, except that the men of the cloth draw back from the logic of their position and persuade themselves that to smash Hankow would not mean intervention.

This sort of religion is thus revealed as a special interest, requiring the same methods as other special interests for its protection, and as the price therefore providing them with its emotional dynamic and its rationalizing justification. In the end, then, it must take a subordinate place to nationalism and money-making, which are left in supreme command of the energies of man. Instead of supplying these forces with ethical guidance, this type of religion takes its ethics from them. It even blesses their union, whose offspring is competitive economic imperialism, and so becomes accomplice in the mutual destruction of mankind. How much of what we call Christianity is of this sort, and how much of it is the indestructible spirit of goodwill getting itself organized in all human affairs, China is helping us to find out. And the outcome is not only pertinent to the rationalist and his quarrel with religion, it is also very vital to the future of mankind, for one of these varieties of religion can make alliance with science for the transformation of human life, the other cannot.

Further light is thrown on this question by the attitude of missionaries toward evacuation. In most cases they went or stayed by the word of consuls rather than the judgment of missionary administrators. The tendency of religious executives, since the World War, is to let the state take command. Submission has become a habit. Democracy, having freed the state from the domination of the church, is now apparently on the way to harness the church to the triumphal chariot of the state. Some time since, when some missionaries in China informed our minister that they desired no protection from our government, they were answered officially that they would get it whether or no. And the mission boards took this lying down, though most of the missionaries are beyond the reach of protective measures and the value of the principle to the government is obviously elsewhere. In the present emergency, not a few missionaries put the authority of their staying where they had found the call of their going, in the needs of the Chinese. This for them, voiced by the Chinese themselves, was the expression of the God they must obey rather than men. For the others, more conventionally minded, in localities where the consul guessed wrong and no danger developed, what propagating power will their religion now have, or what solidarity with their Chinese colleagues?

When a religious journal spoke of a gold-star list for those missionaries who ignored both consular "advice" and ecclesiastical instructions to leave their posts, some who had left protested another consideration than endangering their Chinese fellow-Christians. They were not willing to provoke a situation in which some of their fellow-citizens might be called to risk life in their behalf. Here they voiced the common human interest against the claims of that enslaving mechanism we call the state. For the man in the street refused to get excited over the danger of missionaries in China. He assumed that which his government denied, that they had gone at their own risk and did not expect him to do anything about it. Hence it is clear that if missionary organizations will follow the lead of their front-line forces, if they will formally reject the protection of the state and ignore its orders, if they will deny its specious claim to protect missionaries against their will, they will thereby help to save other citizens from being disposed of by the state in behalf of certain underlying interests. Thereby they would demonstrate a more vital religion than either nationalism or money-making.

The answer that China is writing to the current questions concerning the nature and vitality of our religion can only be recognized if we remember that what we call Christianity is a conglomerate of various and often irreconcilable elements, running all the way from Holy Rollers to Unitarian Brahmins, from Aimee McPherson to Bishop Manning. Crossing all these divisions of sects—which express the externalities and eccentricities of religion—there are also differences of type that express its various essential elements. Of these types, two classifications have recently been suggested. One divides our current religious organizations into the imperialistic and the democratic—the former depending upon and developing authority, the other resting on and encouraging the process of mutual consent. The other classification finds three types of religion among us: the dogmatic, emphasizing doctrine and creed; the institutional, busying itself with religious machinery and good works; the experimental, whose approach is scientific, whose expression is ethical. These types coexist in various proportions in the big middle-class American denominations, and they probably always will, for people belong to them by temperament as well as by training. The proportion, however, can be changed by cultivation, and if this is to be done it must needs be on the basis of the universal and permanent values present or lacking in each type. Here again China is testing, for we have done more missionary work there than anywhere else, and more than has been done in any other one country by anybody else. Also this testing has some bearing upon the future of Judaism, since the differences between Orthodox, Reformed and Ethical Culture Jews correspond roughly to the differences between certain types of Christians.

Obviously the imperialistic and democratic types of missionaries in China reacted to persecution and orders to evacuate according to their name and nature. Those whose motive and method had been to impose something on or hand something down to the Chinese, who had resisted or reluctantly accepted the transfer of authority in their institutions to Chinese colleagues, who had opposed or misunderstood the Nationalist movement because it challenged their own governments, inevitably revealed in the crisis that their religion belonged to an earlier period than the spirit of goodwill in whose name they were commissioned. They reacted in the spirit of force. With them were most of the dogmatists, though some of these stayed at their posts from the sheer power of long-continued human associations, and for the same reason showed no bitterness or resentment. The institutionalists split more evenly, depending upon their degree of social passion and upon whether or not they were pacifists. The experimentalists and the democrats, seeking with the Chinese a mutual discovery as well as a sharing of the nature and meaning of religion, naturally manifested the spirit of goodwill in the emergency. They were solidly against intervention, partly on the ground of ethical principle, which possesses for them religious value and authority; partly on the ground of an intelligent provision of consequences. On both counts they were on common ground with the Chinese.

Thus it is more true than most mission executives know when they say it that China now represents the end of an era in the expansion of our religion. For them it means that Christianity in China is to become autonomous and to incorporate indigenous elements. But this means certain changes in its nature, which are also in process elsewhere. The imperialistic type henceforth can hold but a minority position. The dogmatic type goes the same way. China and the rest of Asia will finish what science has begun. As one of her leaders, himself a Christian, said: "We Chinese simply cannot understand the furore in your country over such questions as the Virgin Birth."

For a time China is likely, because of her practical turn, to cultivate the institutionalist type of religion too heavily. In the stress of present circumstance it will be strongly nationalistic, thus repeating a lot of history. But once free from the West, China will have to face the same test it has put to the West, the test of whether religion is only what it has mostly been—a sanction for local, particular, and private interests, or whether it possesses values that are indispensable to the common development. The answer to this question lies not in the field of dialectic. It will be demonstrated, one way or the other, by the experimental type of religionist, and for this type the Chinese have affinity. To it they will add the test of their deep-seated rationalism, their long-established ethical bent.

A Conference with Governor Fuller

By ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS

FRANK WALSH, Francis Fisher Kane, and I attended at the Executive Chamber. Mr. Sullivan, His Excellency's hard-boiled secretary, was apparently not greatly cheered by our visit, but after a time we were ushered into the presence of Governor Fuller, clothed on that day, August 22, 1927, with the power of a god—the power of life and death.

We explained our mission—that we were for the moment interested in just the one phase of the case of Sacco and Vanzetti—that relating to the government files, which the federal officials had offered to open. Disclaiming any contention that the files showed a frame-up or improper collusion between departments of government, we pointed out that on the basis of affidavits of former government agents, the evidence therein contained was material to the case. We appealed that the men should not be put to death while these files remained secret. What answer would there be to a large and sincere public opinion which felt that this secrecy in itself was evidence of connivance by the federal government?

"Do you think these men are innocent?" inquired the Governor.

"We wouldn't be here if we didn't."

"Have you interviewed the witnesses? I have. Presumably I know more about the case than you do."

We refrained from pointing out that he had believed one set of witnesses rather than another, and that in view of his background and his attitude expressed in Congress toward radicals, his choice of where to place his confidence was natural. Instead we answered that the report of the Lowell committee appointed by him had effectively contributed to the "doubts" and, in admitting the "grave breach of official decorum" and the "indiscretions" of Judge Thayer, had made clear that the trial had not been before an "impartial" judge as guaranteed by the Massachusetts Bill of Rights. Later, Frank Walsh made the query: Did the Lowell committee believe the witnesses who testified that Judge Thayer had called these men "anarchist bastards" and other vile names; did Thayer confess, or on the other hand had he denied the accusations, the committee regarding his denials as lies? An important question, for one or the other must have happened in view of the committee's report! Did Judge Thayer confess or did he lie? The Governor ignored the question.

"If the Lowell committee report made the strongest possible case against these men," we continued, "it is not surprising that there should be doubt?"

"Who said it made the strongest case?" said the Governor.

"They owed it to the public to state all the facts that led to their conclusion, so presumably they did."

"Do you know why Vanzetti failed to take the stand in the Plymouth case?"

Apparently this had great significance to the Governor. He had referred to it in his report, and in view of his constant reference it seemed a controlling circumstance, for the question, so I am informed, was put to many who conferred with him that day. What was at the bottom of it?

"Presumably he was advised not to take the stand."

"Perhaps he refused to take the stand." (Did the Governor have private information of conferences of Vanzetti with his former counsel? If so, where did he get it? We knew merely that Vanzetti had for years claimed that counsel in the Plymouth case had betrayed his interests at the trial and had advised him not to testify.) "Isn't it your experience that an innocent man insists upon taking the stand?"

"There may be many reasons, Governor, why a man should not. Advice against it is often sound, particularly with the defendant a foreigner and holding unpopular views. See what happened to them in the other case when they did. They seem to be damned if they do and damned if they don't."

The philosophy of protecting a defendant who fails to testify is so apparent that, under the law, no man is required to take the stand, and the jury is instructed that failure to testify may not even be considered as an indication of guilt.

"But, Governor, we are entitled to rely on the Lowell report. We wish to refer to just one statement in that report. One of the alleged facts on which the committee came to its conclusion was that the cap found at the scene of the murder fitted Sacco. The Defense Committee denies this. On this point there were three witnesses at the trial. First, Sacco, who testified it was not his cap. When it was tried on it was apparently far too small, sitting on the back of his head, as is shown by newspaper cartoons at the time. Secondly, Mrs. Sacco, who said it was not her husband's cap, and then the superintendent of the factory, who said he thought it was of the color of Sacco's cap, but refused to identify it. Governor, this question can be factually determined. Before you kill Sacco, try on the cap! What answer can there be to this? Have you read the editorial of the New York World, analyzing the report and quoting the evidence on this?"

"Who wrote that editorial?" asked the Governor. We gave our opinion that presumably the writer was Walter Lippmann, but we knew that the Governor attributed it to Felix Frankfurter, though we wondered why this should affect the soundness of the argument.

Contempt for former officials who would relate "secrets" in the files of the government; an assurance that the United States government, even in the days of the notorious Mitchell Palmer, could do no wrong; reliance upon the failure of Vanzetti to take the stand as an indication of guilt, leaving an inference that there was a sinister attack of innuendo by Vanzetti's former lawyer; and animus toward Felix Frankfurter, as one whose fight for these men in his book on Sacco and Vanzetti had caused the public excitement, were apparently working in the Governor's subconscious.

The point of our conference had been diverted but as we left we again made our appeal that the government files be opened. Then our last thought to the Governor: "Only an infallible judge should fix an immutable sentence."

In the Driftway

THE Drifter had for years had a completely erroneous impression that the blacksmith was obsolete. But he found one the other day, and he was very much alive. Moreover, he went straight to the heart of the matter by asking the Drifter if he knew that there were a lot of people in the world—especially garage keepers—who couldn't get along very well without a blacksmith. "He's just as important now as he was when King Solomon built his temple. After that temple was built old Solomon held a contest to find out which worker was the most instrumental in building it. At first there were thousands of contestants but gradually all of them were eliminated except the blacksmith and the tailor. That tailor was so glad over the result that he jumped up and down for joy—and his scissors fell out of his pocket and broke. Then he was mad, because he had to go to the blacksmith to get them fixed and that eliminated him from the race. He got madder and madder, so when he got his scissors back from the blacksmith he just stooped down and snipped that blacksmith's apron right up the middle. And that's why every blacksmith's apron since then is split up the middle. You never saw one that wasn't, now did you?"

THE Drifter admitted he hadn't and the irrepressible blacksmith told him another. "You know that finding a horseshoe is lucky, don't you? But do you know why it's lucky? No? . . . Once upon a time, so the legend says, a horse walked into the shop of an old German blacksmith and said he wanted shoes on all four feet. Now the old German had never heard a horse talk before and he was scared to death, and kind of suspicious. He said he wouldn't do it. 'All right,' said the horse, 'I'll kick down your shop.' He had a mean look in his eye and the blacksmith thought he meant what he said, so he finally consented to make shoes for him. When he lifted the forefoot, he found that all his suspicions were right. It had a cloven hoof. And so did all the other feet. It was the devil all right, and the old German knew it. He decided to fix that devil good and proper. He put the shoes on hot, turned the nails the wrong way and drove them into the hoof. He finished his job and the horse, or rather, the devil, paid him and walked out. Then the horse had trouble. His feet hurt him something awful. At last he couldn't stand it any longer so he took them off and left them in the road. Well, the devil has never liked horseshoes since then and whenever he sees one he'll go a long way off his course to keep from getting anywhere near it."

FALL came in the day after Labor Day. The Drifter met it on an early morning walk along the Hudson. The sun had not quite penetrated the autumn haze. The river was shrouded in mist and the blue hills beyond seemed hardly more substantial. The concrete road was still wet with dew and quietness lay about like sleeping children. Raucous signs put out to catch summer traffic were no longer offensive, for now their days were numbered. "Try our coffee with hot franks," "Rooms for tourists with running water," "Sanitary rest rooms ahead,"—only tired summer resorts murmuring in their sleep. . . . Thin sunlight on brown grass, dusk on an autumn river, and the Drifter feels school starting, and turns up his coat collar.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Hail, Heywood Broun!

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I hail with pleasure your announcement that beginning some time in September Mr. Heywood Broun will contribute a page in The Nation every week. Indeed, for a writer of Mr. Broun's known liberal tendencies the logical place was always in the columns of the fearless Nation. With the assurance of complete freedom of expression, I hope Mr. Broun will continue to write in the vein of his last article in the World—I mean the one which sent such a cold shudder down the back of Mr. Ralph Pulitzer.

New York, September 5 Chas. Bitterbaum

From the Other Boston

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: You rose to the height of a great argument in your leader on the dreadful deed. You wrote truly, adequately to the occasion.

This is not the time for detailed observation, but one thing is sure that after we have picked ourselves together we must pertinaciously, each in his own way, carry out the duty on behalf of the ancient claims of freedom and justice and reason which this happening lays upon us.

Boston, August 31 Thomas L. Lawrence

Who Plants Bombs?

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In 1885 in Coffeyville, Kansas, a bomb was exploded with baneful result. The machine officials (Republicans) charged it to the newly organized Farmer's Alliance, claiming it was a terroristic organization, etc. Later it was found the bomb had been sent by express by a member of the Republican machine. A year later there was a similar happening near Lincoln, Nebraska. Traced, it gave a similar result. Then came the Haymarket hanging in Chicago. In the early nineties a bomb was found planted under the front porch of William J. Strange, Paterson, N. J. Mr. Strange was president of the Silk Manufacturing Association and was trying to defeat the silk workers then on strike. It later developed that the policeman who found the bomb was the man who placed it there.

I believe the bombing of the juror's home did have a very bad effect upon the Sacco and Vanzetti case, but do not believe it was the work of any radical. I believe it was done precisely for this evil effect.

Fairhope, Ala., September 5 G. S. Hoffecker

On Reading the Sunday Newspapers: 1927

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Sacco's face, with its husks of nostrils, hollowed by a febrile wind of sorrow, is a thin mask of bitterness: the mold of a creature very young, who was killed (but for a dramatic gesture left) seven years ago.

Vanzetti's gaze has more substantial bulk. (Man was never made to think.) Yet he, also, deep in that hardy aversion to despair, peering, wondering mildly, saw a little of that final thing. Maybe he even guessed that Judge Thayer, older, held the last dry remnants of life's fading splendor very preciously.

In the churches, Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians pray cautiously for that small comfort which endures between the involuntary, naked hour of birth and avaricious moments of the dying. Fear justifies all. (Death, to the gods, is insignificant.) Fathers, mothers, children pray around the lamp on Sunday, praying no bomb ever will shatter this wall, and the new victrola and Mabel's radio. (In the last war, Germans finished Molly's husband—left her destitute.)

None are afraid enough. Not one believes in the six feet of darkness already marked for each. Not one believes that the slow, glittering sunshine will spin blank days, weeks, and centuries where none recall how Judge Thayer once convicted two Italian laborers on evidence that many counted insufficient. Even that "gentle rain from heaven" will rain with but indifferent quality on wastes where every vanity has scattered, and breeds rank corn to feed some savage who, not puffed up with the conceit of justice, slays his bolder victims boldly: convinced, utterly, that all he says and does is right.

New York, August 31 Evelyn Scott

A Negro Looks at Sacco's America

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your splendid article, Massachusetts the Murderer, is a stinging and manly rebuke to the powers that be who are responsible for the murder of Sacco and Vanzetti. Every sentence will help to destroy the naive idea which many Americans have that this is the "land of the free and the home of the brave."

Of course this is no new thing; Negroes have been lynched, burned, and murdered both North and South ever since the Civil War. America is a land of oppression, murder, lynching, and crude civilization. Nowhere, so far as I know, are police so ignorant, arrogant, crude, and uncivil as in America. For my own part I have long since lost faith in America to lead the world in anything except mob rule, murder, race prejudice, and oppression.

New York, Sept. 1 Thomas L. Dabney,
Organizer, American Negro Labor Congress

Among the Teachers

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: What indifference among the summer-school teachers concerning the Sacco-Vanzetti tragedy! I refer especially to the historians. They tell their classes about the Dreyfus case —how an innocent man was [illegible] for years despite the protest of millions, and if they know post-war revelations, they add that the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, Gabriel Hanotaux, received a protest from Count Muenster, the German ambassador, completely exonerating Dreyfus, but Hanotaux put that in the files of the Foreign Office without breathing a word of it. The American teacher of history has learned too much from the war. He (or she) believes that the authorities must be supported. How often did I not hear: "Well, Fuller and his committee know more about this than I. So I'll stand by Fuller."

Aside from that there seemed to be complete ignorance and indifference. What superb detachment these historians have achieved! They wax eloquent denouncing the persecution of the Christians or the cruelties of the Inquisition; they never tire of pointing out the devious paths trod by Bismarck, Cavour, and perhaps Hanotaux. But the Sacco-Vanzetti case has not yet reached the textbooks. So they need not worry about "monstrous injustice" or "secret files of the government." After all, they teach history. They refuse to help [illegible] it.

What seems to be a live issue among the historians is the fight on your valued reviewer, Harry Elmer Barnes. The tories of the American Historical Association never will forgive him. In their magazine, the American Historical Review, Barnes is spanked again and again. Well, the naughty boy deserves it! Why can't he let pedants be pedants?

A splendid example of the tory attitude came to my attention this summer. The class was one in modern history and the instructor an old member of the A. H. A. When he got to the war he stopped to excommunicate Barnes. "Mr. Barnes has no standing at all in the historical world. He's a sociologist. Besides, as a friend of mine says, Mr. Barnes writes history so fast that I cannot keep up with him." Well, what should the class read? Oh, to be sure, read Hazen (here I gasped involuntarily, which brought the addition: even if he is a bit biased). Then there is Gooch (an excellent book in its day, but now surely much out of date), and Poincaré, Haldane, Loreburn, Grey, Lord Fisher, Asquith, Bernadotte Schmitt (whose "England and Germany" was published during the war and is much behind the revelations of the last decade) and Sidney Fay's articles in the A. H. R. of 1920 and 1921.

I think I begin to see the light. Barnes is excommunicated because so many "cannot keep up with him."

New York, August 21 CHEZ COLUMBIA

Vrai Bon

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: When Mr. Krutch, the reviewer of my novel "The Delectable Mountains," says "there is never any necessity for reading between the lines" and refers to an "illegitimate" baby, I am forced to wonder if, as so often is the case in a reviewed book, he did not also fail to read the lines themselves? The baby was legitimatized by bell, book, and candle and the first three hundred pages or so of the book were devoted principally to that legitimatizing.

And what does Mr. Krutch mean by "a commonplace plot," and what has that got to do with the value of a novel? Was there ever a first-class novel the plot of which wasn't commonplace? I am not implying that "The Delectable Mountains" comes in this category, I am asking a generic question. According to my humble opinion the moment a writer tries to attract attention by so-called newness, of which in this world there is no such thing, he immediately takes his mind off the only two things that make a novel important: characterization and comment. As for myself, I have never read an important novel in which its creator did not treat almost with contempt this newness and this commonplaceness. He hasn't time to bring babies into the world in some curious and gymnastic way. Also he accepts the fact that having babies has been a commonplace practice of humanity for a long while, none the less frequently earth-shaking to the individuals concerned even if it is an ancient rite and even if the motion pictures have discovered that it happens. I think that just at present American criticism is almost invalidated by the idea that the vrai bon, as Mr. Krutch calls it, consists entirely of being so original on the surface that what's inside of you isn't original at all. I put this down to the fact that so many books are published that the reactions of the average reviewer are numbed. But I am surprised when Mr. Krutch commends. I call his attention to a great many books, recently published, where this strange belief that a hand-spring is also a heart-beat is evident in the accruing criticism. I have just finished one such book in which the whole action takes place in twenty-four hours. Up to that fact—the initial fact—the book is amusing, but beyond that fact it isn't, because what takes place in that twenty-four hours, as I see it, is neither true nor interesting.

The vrai bon is trying to get at the truth; the faux bon is deliberately evading it. If I try to get at it in what Mr. Krutch considers a commonplace way that is because what seems to him commonplace does not seem so to me. But to speak of an honest man as having written a "popular and deceptive alloy" is to enter upon a moral field in which, if I may say so, Mr. Krutch knows enough neither about myself nor about my work to pass a judgment.

STRUTHERS BURT

Moose, Jackson's Hole, Wyoming, August 12

Are you young?

capable and energetic?
interested in world affairs?
anxious to devote yourself to their study and to the practical utilization of your ideas?
willing to associate yourself with a small group of men similarly minded?

and have you

an independent income?

If your answers to the above questions are "Yes," you might find it worth while to communicate with Gordon A. Olds, 420 Lexington Ave., N.Y.C. He will give your letter to the people who are paying for this advertisement in the hope of reaching three or four men having like interests and desires.

Why Travel for a
LIBERAL EDUCATION!

From the middle ages onward the value of travel in foreign countries has been recognized as adding the final touch to a liberal education.

The broadening of one's views accomplished by travel can also be effected by coming in contact with the fresh viewpoint on world affairs and the unbiased ideas on men, letters and things presented in

The Manchester Guardian
WEEKLY

It is a store-house of information on international politics, European trends of thought, current English literature, and cultural developments the world over.

The intellectually inclined in more than sixty countries depend on The Manchester Guardian Weekly to keep them furnished with reliable information on all important world happenings and to keep their viewpoint on vital affairs clear and unprejudiced.

----------MAIL COUPON BELOW----------

The Manchester Guardian Weekly,
222 West 42nd Street,
New York City.
I enclose three dollars for a year's subscription to THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY.

Name .....

Address .....

Books and Plays

Professor McMaster Continues

A History of the People of the United States During Lincoln's Administration. By John Bach McMaster. D. Appleton and Company. $5.

THE eight volumes of Professor McMaster's "History of the People of the United States" stop at the eve of the Civil War. The present volume, although announced as an independent work, continues the story through the Lincoln administration and into that of Johnson, and may in fact be regarded as the final instalment of the great undertaking to which Professor McMaster has devoted his life.

To any one who knows Professor McMaster's method and literary style, this account of the Civil War period will offer no novelty. The same wealth of illustrative, if not always typical, fact drawn particularly from newspapers, the same reliance upon a few documentary sources (in this case, naturally, the Official Records of the war) and infrequent mention of secondary works, the same skill in piecing together a story, the same generous assumption that the reader will know at once the full names of persons who appear in the text only as Governor This or General That, and the same placid refusal to be stirred by anybody or anything, that characterized the previous volumes are equally in evidence here. Seldom, if ever, has so elaborate a historical narrative embodied such a mass of well-arranged incident, or given so clearly the impression that all that really happened was just one thing after another.

It cannot be said, however, that for the Civil War years the method, admirable beyond question in its way, works out as well as it did for much of the preceding period. The Civil War was an episode of many sides—sectional, partisan, constitutional, military, economic, humanitarian, diplomatic, religious. The stage upon which the play was set was large, the actors many, the plot sometimes obscure and always complicated. Less than ever was it possible for any one newspaper to reflect a general opinion even in its own locality, and the monumental documents of the federal government are far from containing the whole story of what the government knew or did. Amusing or informing sidelights we get, of course, as when the Rev. Stephen H. Tyng told his audience at the Madison Avenue Baptist Church in this city that the first Bull Run battle "was fought on Sunday and that was reason enough for defeat," or when Henry Ward Beecher, replying in the New York Independent to Lincoln's famous letter of August 22, 1862, to Greeley, assured his readers that while Lincoln "means well, and tasks himself to do well for the country," "he is an overmatched man" and "cannot carry the government in its great emergency." Given the method and the point of view, Professor McMaster has done, perhaps, as well as it was possible to do, but although he pilots us safely through the forest, it is somewhat disturbing to find him at least equally interested in the trees.

Nevertheless, the book is a great achievement. Its strong points are its exposition of the diplomatic relations between the United States and Great Britain and France, its exceptionally full presentation of political opinion and maneuvering within the Confederacy, and its summary views of economic conditions in the North and the South during the war. To these noteworthy features are to be added the passages in which he describes such minor episodes as the first movements of troops for the defense of Washington, the suspension of the habeas corpus privilege, and the draft riots in New York.

Taken as a whole, the book is analytical rather than descriptive. Doubtless the historian, if he is to be scientific, must hold himself to his sources and let facts tell the story. Professor McMaster's unemotional temper, however, leads him to pass lightly over episodes which, at the time, caught the imagination of the North or the South. The brilliance or tragedy of battles and sieges, the play of personal motives in soldiers and statesmen, the thrill and pathos of Lee's surrender or of Lincoln's death—such things as these stir but slightly his annalistic calm. One who had never before read a 650-page history of the Civil War would certainly close this book with a distinct impression that there had been a great conflict, and that in its course the nation had been thrown into vast disarray. He would be a more than ordinarily reflective reader if he gathered an equally clear impression of a national existence imperiled, or of a culmination of seventy-five years of national history which made war inevitable and determined the manner in which the war should be fought.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Chaucer and Sherlock

Some New Light on Chaucer. Lectures delivered at the Lowell Institute. By John Matthews Manly. Henry Holt and Company. $2.50.

THE central theme, the "spire of meaning," about which Professor Manly leisurely organizes his interesting lectures on the Canterbury Pilgrims is fitly forecast by the suggestion that the original of his frontispiece, the Seddon portrait of the poet, "may well have been painted from life." The picture, thus derived, not only aptly anticipates but strikingly symbolizes the lecturer's repeated contention that Chaucer's own sketches of fourteenth-century men and women are drawn directly from living models. The energy and efficiency of a master of investigation and of the skilful inspectors of his staff never wane nor weaken in the rigid determination to identify the Pilgrims with this or that lawyer or franklin or shipman that trod fourteenth-century English earth, for to these ingenious detectives the success of Chaucer's art seems to hang upon the ability of his contemporary audience to recognize straightway the originals of his portraits, their features and their foibles.

Unhappily for Professor Manly's symbol, careful comparison of the Harvard painting with the manuscript presentments of Chaucer compels the conviction, shared by its present academic owners, that it is merely one of the many modifications of the famous little sketch by Occleve drawn from memory after the death of its subject. Unluckily for the thesis, so sturdily championed, three large considerations run directly counter to the claim that the poet's persons are accurate reproductions of actuality. Such is not the method of the literary craftsman in any age; such surely cannot be the way of the medieval satirist of classes, whose readers reveled in generalization; nor does such a design seem at all in accord with Chaucer's oft-demonstrated love of individualized conventions. A word or two for each of these objections.

The observer of the habits of many men "describes not men but manners, not an individual but a species." And every journeyman of the guild heavily underscores this patent distinction between the real and the actual. The imagination, fed upon reality manifest in many persons, fashions its figments, each an artistic composite, a significant blending of several simples; and we recognize with delight not a chance acquaintance but a common humanity. Such implications of a universal likeness even in marked unlikeness survives and appeals when the artist and his world are dust. On the other hand the fleeting humor of topical "digs and grinds and hits" that Professor Manly finds alike in Chaucer and the Christmas Revue (a parallel fatal to his argument) is meaningless when the individual victims are unknown or forgotten. Moreover, the medieval mind is less interested in the particular than in the general, in the exceptional than in the normal. Medieval literature cherishes the type, the standard, and is concerned with categories and characteristics. The numerous social satires of the time are invariably directed against conventional and traditional weaknesses of orders and classes rather than against personal error. As a man of his age, Chaucer is primarily concerned with the typical attributes of each occupation, merchant, doctor, ploughman. Though he may individualize the representative of a class or calling by circumstantial touches of time or place, the great expositor makes general features, collective qualities, the foundation of his sketches. Hence the eager hue and cry after personal identification seems trebly mistaken and misleading—and (alas!) provocative of far-resounding strife with rival sleuthhounds from other agencies, trailing other originals. For example, it may be reasonably argued by the opposition that the prototype of the "Good Wife of beside Bath" is to be sought in the initial theme of her prologue, the five-husbanded woman of Samaria "beside the well" (fons is the common gloss of "bath" and "well"), and not in a contemporary Dame Alice resident in St. Michael's Parish.

Whatever be the source of Chaucer's figures, the rich material in Professor Manly's book amply vindicates the modest claim of its title. Some new light, surely, has been shed on Chaucer's man and women by these full-length portraits of prominent members of the various professions, and even the most obstinate heretic will heartily welcome such revelations of fourteenth-century actuality. We know the Man of Law, the Franklin, the Shipman better for having met under competent guidance Thomas Pynchbek, John Bussy, and John Hawley. The deduction from hearsay evidence no longer extant ("And this they wrote that another man wrote of a carl in Norroway") that Chaucer studied law in the Inner Temple is a least in accord with his role on many diplomatic missions. And the inferences regarding the wealth and importance of those good burgesses, the poet's forbears, seem fully warranted by the evidence. The attempt to advance the date of Chaucer's birth from 1340 to 1345 is far less fortunate, as the age of twenty, that of his young Squire, is far better fitted to his services in France (1360) than the most mature fifteen. By the way, why should the most daring of scholars repeatedly describe Thomas Chaucer as "the supposed son" of Geoffrey, inasmuch as that filial relationship is established far more firmly than any contention in the present volume?

FREDERICK TUPPER

Credible Macabre

The Dark Chamber. By Leonard Cline. The Viking Press. $2.

IT is a rare quality, that which Mr. Cline displays when he brings the fantastic and the macabre to such a high pitch of reality that the most prosaic strap hanger must believe in it as he reads. This quality lies not in the tale itself, the tale of Richard Pride, a curious, relentless man exploring his past and coming gradually to feel that all the experience of the race lies buried somewhere deep in his own consciousness. As he withdraws further and further into himself on his endless quest after this history his wife struggles vainly to bring him back from "the dark chamber" of his mind, and his daughter flees away from the morbid whirlpool of his investigations.

The mechanism is clumsy at times, for the story is told in the first person by the young musician who comes to help Pride and to play for him the music of his past. The musician is a shadowy figure, sensitive and quick, but never rounded out by his own remarks, or by the actions of others towards him. Also, the setting of the story reeks somewhat too obviously of the sinister—the huge, [illegible] who does not look at Pride's daughter, but past her; the wife who practises black magic; and Richard Pride's [illegible] study above the Hudson, a building which looks like a "peering monster" [illegible].

Yet, out of this mixture of the obvious and the bizarre Mr. Cline has evolved a tale which is gruesomely credible. His characters, inanimate and animate, move on the canvas, and are something new before one has time to [illegible] and call them only the trappings of a ghost story. Mr. Cline understands to the full the effectiveness of the verb as against the adjective, and there are no worn-out phrases as he carries on his time-honored task of describing the macabre. For instance, the shadows cast on the wall by candlelight "hunched and reared and panted," and, later, a winter wind coming in through a hole in the window "stumbled and rolled on the floor clawing at scraps of paper and rugs." This method can be carried too far, but Mr. Cline has unusual literary tact. His story moves to its bleak conclusion with a foreboding speed which is restless and alive without being too nervously abrupt.

MARTHA MOTT

Marxian History

Peasant War in Germany. By Friedrich Engels. International Publishers. $1.50.

Thomas More and His Utopia. By Karl Kautsky. International Publishers. $2.25.

BOTH of these books have the same outlook. Both are radical in the interpretation of their material. Both represent the revolutionary approach of the Marxist.

In these days when the influence of Marx is felt in the protest and revolt of oppressed peoples in all parts of the globe; when a revolution has been effected in his name; and when almost every phase and activity of life has been examined in the light of his theory, it is of importance that Marxian classics be translated and reprinted so that the social philosophy embodied in this doctrine can be fully understood and appreciated. Marxism is more than economic dogma. It is a philosophy of life. It studies the whole of life in terms of its underlying economic formulas. Its approach to every subject, therefore, is different from that which prevails in most of our intellectual world. Engels, for example, in the preface to the second edition of "The Peasant War in Germany," while describing the method of the book, states the Marxian position very clearly:

> I [aimed] to prove that the political and religious theories [illegible] but the result of that stage in the development of agriculture, industry, land and waterways, commerce and finance which then existed in Germany.

While Engel's work in "The Peasant War in Germany" is confined to Germany, and Kautsky's work in "Thomas More and His Utopia" is confined to England, the very fact that both books are concerned with the beginnings of that revolt against feudalism, which was to lead to the individualism of our present era, makes their kinship the more conspicuous. The rise of Protestantism was once treated as a profound revolution. It was once viewed as the triumph of the modern conception. In the historical analysis of both Engels and Kautsky, however, we discover Protestantism to be but part of that great movement of individualism that had begun to sweep over the entire face of the European world. The Renaissance had been a cultural outgrowth of the commercial revolution which had first transformed Italy from the remnant of a decadent empire into a distorted confusion of struggling republics, each in aggressive competition and conflict with the other. The Hanseatic League in the Baltic was a northern expression of this same revolution. With the compass, the discovery of America, and the development of trans-oceanic traffic, these inland-sea civilizations surrendered to the oceanic ones. England, holding the key position in the new avenues of trans-oceanic commerce, became the dominant power. With all of this change, however, had come the growth of modern civilization, the downfall of medieval culture, the rise of a competitive economy, the decline of communal attitudes, and the protrusion of individualistic [illegible]. Individualism became the ethical criterion of the new age. Individual values were exalted over social. Luther in his cry for the right of the individual to interpret the Bible in his own way, and his desire to afford the individual the opportunity of reading the Scriptures in his own language, expressed this economic motivation. Protestantism was not a cause but an effect. It was not Protestantism that changed the old world into something new; Protestantism was part, an effect, of the underlying economic change which did achieve this great revolution in values. Unity was replaced by diversity, order by chaos, the social by the individualistic. The internationalism of the Roman Catholic Church was replaced by the nationalism of rising economic centers and groups.

It is out of this rapidly changing background that the peasant wars, which Kautsky described as "the last convulsions of a dying community," developed and spread. Engels describes this background in vivid and flashing detail. His account of the conflict between Luther and Muenzer is in itself a clean-cut and illuminating analysis. The contrast between Luther, that "easy living flesh of Wittenberg," who attacked the peasants as "plundering hordes," and Muenzer, the "man with a hammer," who in his eager defense of the peasants erected, in his own words, "a wall of iron against the kings, princes, [and] priests," is effected in a manner that makes moving drama as well as faithful history. Even such figures as Joss Fritz, Hosza, and Gyorgy Dozsa, who was later to be roasted on a fiery throne and have his flesh eaten by his own soldiers, are included in the lively descriptions of the revolts as they sped from province to province, breaking out with an almost revolutionary rhythm on Judica Sunday. Engels vivifies the sweep and swing of this movement. The peasant camps become centers of exciting, insurrectionary activity. The failure of the revolts, due to the decentralization of Germany and the poor because unequipped and crude organization of the peasants, is discussed in abundant detail.

In "Thomas More and His Utopia" Kautsky deals with that complexity of forces that led up to the English Reformation and provided the contradictions and conflicts in economic life which gave More his social vision. More and his conception of Utopia are interpreted as outgrowths of the peculiar milieu that was sixteenth-century England. More is shown to have been a very humane, tolerant, liberal mind. His attitude, despite his adherence to Catholicism, was far in advance of that of Luther, the author of that famous expression "Whore Reason." It was as an Under-Sheriff that he gained his insight into the nature of economic life. It was out of the methodology of humanism that the logic of More's communism was born.

These books, it may be said in conclusion, afford an introduction to a period that has hitherto suffered from superficial analysis. In interpreting the epoch from the point of view of historical materialism they have flashed new light upon an important set of phenomena. V. F. CALVERTON

In the Caves of Ariege

Primitive Hearths in the Pyrenees. The Story of a Summer's Expedition in the Haunts of Prehistoric Man. By Ruth Otis Sawtell and Ida Treat. With Illustrations by Paul Vaillant Couturier. D. Appleton and Company. $3.

AMONG the uncounted books on prehistoric European archaeology that have been published in the past dozen years, here is one that fills a niche of its own. Reading volume after volume of neatly catalogued reference surveys of type stations, or elaborate synopses that seem to have no other aim than to equip us to arrange a museum exhibit of chipped flints, who has not longed to recommend rather a book that sorts the endless detail into big and little, that is authoritative and yet does not conceal like the plague the romance and mystery of the paleolithic caves, their almost melodramatic appeal? But no one had written such a book.

It was a happy chance that gave to three persons—for the artist must be reckoned as one—the enthusiasm, the training, and the powers of description to make the caves of southern

A New Romance by America's Most Distinguished Writer

SOMETHING ABOUT EVE

A Comedy of Figleaves
By JAMES BRANCH CABELL

The story of how Gerald Musgrave, a young Southern gentleman, journeyed toward the goal of all the gods, and of how he, too, became a god. There is a strong supporting cast of not wholly unfamiliar characters, including God and the Emperor Nero and King Solomon and Merlin and the Sphinx and Francois Villon—and somewhat preeminently—Eve. Net, $2.50

[Apply to your bookseller for information concerning the two Storisende Editions of the complete works of JAMES BRANCH CABELL, limited to 1,250 numbered sets, signed by the author.]

STRANGE WOMAN

By ELMER DAVIS

Author of "Friends of Mr. Sweeney," etc.

The story of a woman of forty whose job is done. Her children no longer present a problem. Her husband safely launched on his career. She is faced with boredom. What next? A keen study of American life that will interest women and men of every age. Net, $2.00

COMMODORE VANDERBILT

By ARTHUR D. HOWDEN SMITH

Here is the unshaven, shaggy truth about a figure of a man, Cornelius Vanderbilt of the horny fists. While unfolding the life span of Vanderbilt, the author has written, in large dimensions and very accurate, the saga of our country's growth from a handful of squabbling colonies to the greatest power of the modern world.

Illustrated. Net, $5.00

GENGHIS KHAN

The Emperor of All Men

By HAROLD LAMB

The life story of the brilliant conqueror who rose from simple herd boy to rule an empire far greater than Alexander's. The first authentic biography in English of that amazing leader of whom extremely few books but many legends exist. Illustrated. Net, $3.50

ROBERT M. McBRIDE & COMPANY
7 West 16th Street New York

France something more than museum specimens. Whether it is the lady traveller who is planning to include the caves of Arnège or Dordogne, or a class in prehistory that has missed the living background of the spirited art of Cro-Magnon man, or only someone who has always nursed a secret wish to see for himself these earliest of man's triumphs, they will find this book written to their desires.

There are excellent chapters which tell with sufficient fullness and complete accuracy the story of prehistory in Europe as it is known today, and, having gone the tour of the caves, [illegible] beyond the water-filled galleries and stalactite-closed caverns, up to the bold engraved bisons and wild horses that prehistoric man drew there in bold sweeps without a faltering line, you know more of the man of the Quaternary than from any mere recital of the flint industries.

Of course any book on prehistory would be incomplete without the reproduction of certain unforgettable masterpieces of Cro-Magnon art, but in the present volume there are some delightful unhackneyed reproductions also, drawn off by the artist with a sure eye for the significant. Especially the drawings from Niaux are admirably selected.

The book is important, however, as a record of things done, not only of things seen. The authors were primarily interested in the excavating of a cave of their own, and uncovered one of the most important of recent finds, the only yet-discovered skeleton of Azilian Man who inhabited Europe during the prehistoric Dark Ages, the hiatus between the Old and the New Stone Age. They have written a book which stands as the most delightful of introductions to prehistory.

RUTH BENEDICT

A Note on Progress

Social Factors in Medical Progress. By Bernhard J. Stern. Columbia University Press. $2.25.

Should We Be Vaccinated? By Bernhard J. Stern. Harper and Brothers. $1.50.

THE thesis that a civilization runs on much in its own way, and that its development is conditioned only by what it itself has developed during its own past, is one which has been the subje t of much debate among students who are interested in the mechanisms of cultural development. Professor Ogburn has perhaps given the most uncompromising statement of this position, and he has been bitterly attacked, most naturally, by certain psychologists and such biologists as are of the eugenist persuasion in their social thinking, who feel that history is essentially a matter of the great man and where he happens to be found to make whatever inventions may be needed at any given moment.

What have been needed in all this discussion, more than anything else, are data. Is it true that the great man swings the course of his civilization as he wills? Were Edison and Chaka and Napoleon and George Washington and Pasteur responsible for what seems to have happened because they lived and behaved as they did? Or are they merely expressions of the manners and times in which they lived and the historical development behind those times? Discussion has gone on and on, but, aside from Professor Kroeber's analysis of the rise and fall of the length of women's dresses with the years, and Professor Ogburn's and Dr. Thomas's list of simultaneous independent inventions, there have been few facts made available.

These two books by Dr. Stern, however, are directed toward throwing light on the problem which is presented, and they provide no little food for thought. The first takes up several outstanding phases of the development of medical practice and theory, while the second is an intensive discussion of one phase of that development, namely, the vaccination controversy. It is usually thought, by those who have not gone into the material, that the scientist has but to announce a discovery, publish his method and results, and submit to careful verification, in order to meet with acceptance as a matter of course. This would seem to be essential to the scientific method, and certainly would be expected in the field of human medicine.

But Dr. Stern, going through the history of medicine, tells a vastly different story. There are vested interests at work to prevent the diffusion and acceptance of new methods and practices, vested interests not only of the economic variety, but also those of "status, reputation, and prestige." There is the power of tradition—the resistance to change on the part of the conservative. There is the reverence that is felt toward the authority exercised by those who do things in the traditionally sanctioned manner. Text-books must be rewritten, apparatus must be altered, plants go into the discard when a new discovery changes technique and theory. Yet in spite of this the new discoveries go on, and sometimes prevail. But the most interesting point about it all is that, when our culture reaches a stage where it is ready for a discovery, that discovery seems to be made. Probably the most significant contribution in these two books is the table at the end of the first one, detailing multiple discoveries that have been made in medicine. Here are data to the point, and for one item after another of accepted medical practice and belief we are given the names of discoverers and the dates and places of two, three, four, and even five independent discoveries. They range the field of theory and practice of both curative and preventive medicine and surgery. It is an impressive list, and it is the sort of thing that must be done more and more if we are to have adequate light thrown on the problem of cultural change and its control.

One word may be said about the special discussion of vaccination. In spite of its title, it is not a controversial book. It is rather a historical presentation of the controversy that has raged about vaccination itself. And it should be of interest not only to the medical man who vaccinates but to the student of social processes who can see here, so to speak, social change [illegible] under the microscope.

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS

Books in Brief

Victor Hugo: The Man and the Poet. By William F. Giese. The Dial Press. $4.

Gautier and the Romantics. By John Garber Palache. The Viking Press. $3.

This would seem to be the open season for Frenchmen; the air is full of moralistic arrows. Coincident with Barry Cerf's Mid-Western diatribe against the unfortunate Anatole France comes Professor Giese's irate philippic against Victor Hugo. Professor Giese goes about his indictment of Hugo as a barbarian with a ruthlessness that is almost savage. The erudition displayed is overwhelming; but the urbanity, the surgical intelligence that distinguished Babbitt's demolition of Rousseau are not reflected in the work of the disciple. Repetition, Ciceronian sentences, rhetorical inflation, and bludgeon-like satire are some of the unclassical weapons that Professor Giese employs to destroy a figure whose reputation has been on the wane for fifty years, and who is now very little more than a forlorn god in a poetic Pantheon that nobody visits. The puerile romanticism which Hugo represents is at this date so obviously non grata that one questions the necessity of these 300 pages of moral and aesthetic indignation. The trouble with the professor is that he does not know when the other fellow is down. He not only breaks his opponent's neck but continues, with an admirable obstinacy, to kick him in the stomach. It is bad enough to overwork a theory; but to ride a plain fact to death is sheer inhumanity to man. Mr. Palache's first book on Diderot, Laclos, Restif, and Crébillon had the advantage of covering fairly virgin ground. His second, carelessly written and filled with a superabundance of quotation, merely repeats the regulation anecdotes, from Gautier's rose waistcoat to Bau-

KEEPING THE NAME BEFORE THE PUBLIC

If he keeps at it long enough, will the "cumulative effect" make me run to get the scarlet fever?

THE TWINS—BIG BUSINESS AND BIG BOOSTING

But which of the Big Brothers is the father and which is the son?

OLD SOX ASKS "WHO? WHO PAYS FOR THE TRUMPETING?"—

Answer No. 1: "Athens."—Answer No. 2: "The Vendors."—Answer No. 3: "Nobody Pays."

BIG BUSINESS

AND BIG BOOSTING have grown enormously since the war. Never in the history of the world have we seen such tornados of tooting as now. One billion two hundred and fifty ($1,250,000,000) is the estimate of our annual advertising as against perhaps four to five hundred million a few years ago. And meanwhile business is concentrating more than ever. Fewer factories. Fewer enterprises. Almost no new brands put before the public. And single advertising appropriations lifted from $100,000 to $500,000 to $2,000,000 to $5,000,000 and even more. What next?

IN POLITICS

Publicity stunts are being practiced beyond any dreams of the past masters. During the war publicity bureaus were established in numerous departments; and the managers did not always resign after the armistice. If they did the bureaus, divisions and even individual cabinet officers, who had had a taste of expert guidance on the way to brighten the limelight, built up new publicity machines. What is the answer?

Is Advertising "Economic Waste"?

How much of it is Science? How much of it is "Bunk"?

WE have published a most unusual book, a burlesque of modern business methods as related to publicity; every page a comedy, and yet every single comical situation designed to stir the reader, to make him think and analyze and to force him to answer the author's unanswered questions on modern business problems.

This book is all the more unusual because it is a satire on selling schemes, advertising and trade practices written by the active head of one of the well known national advertising agencies, who for twenty-five years past has handled many millions of dollars of advertising. His most widely known publicity work came in connection with the war when he was editor-in-chief of the 4-Minute-Men, writing the bulletins and speeches; thereafter associate director general of Labor propaganda in charge of the newspaper releases, speakers' bureau, war industries committees, motion pictures, and division of posters; and after the armistice in Europe, as chairman of the labor commission. (Note his ironical reference to his own war activities in his book.) Later he handled for some years the extensive advertising of the United States Shipping Board. Among his clients are men and firms of national and international reputation.

In attacking the "bunk" part of his own profession, the author handles his subject with the most refreshing frankness!

TAUROS and Bullem of the mighty Tauros Trumpeting Agency are about to sign up Zeusikin, the merchant prince of Athens, on a trumpeting contract based on a "bunk" plan for selling olive oil. Then Old Sox, a street corner loafer, "butts in," followed later by his two disciples, Platon and Aristoteles.

Old Sox asks so many questions, that the tragedy ends where it began—on the rock of faith amid an atmosphere of misty mysteriousness.

Here are some of the questions:

1 Is commerce good and beautiful? If so, where and how?

2 Is trumpeting a necessary evil in commerce? If so, is it not good and beautiful, even when ugly? But when and where and how is that [illegible] necessary?

3 Who pays for the trumpeting—Who? Athens? And can that be good and beautiful?

4 About those terms, Big Business and Big Boosting—are they the same as the terms above as "Commerce" and "Trumpeting"?

5 Is the Art-Ful Novel an expensive picture [illegible] poetry necessary in order to make the sale of trumpeting [illegible] Art-Ful?

6 What is "Success"? What is [illegible] Art? Are the philosophers?—(And he might have added, "Are the [illegible] the "Saturday Evening Post" and the readers of "The Nation"?)

In trade, in politics and even in religion, the man who knows how to turn on the limelight in the right way becomes the leader. Does this make for merit in leadership? Or is it bunk and trickery? The solution and the only solution seems to lie in a different attitude of the business man who advertises and of the public at large.

Are you interested in the ways men "work" each other to make money? And how then jointly they "work" the public?

"Old Sox on Trumpeting" is outwardly a pure comedy, a farcical story of business. One critic said "If the author has a purpose, he's written no book for the Babbitts; the Babbitts will get only the jokes." The author's purpose evidently is directed to the man who can read between the lines. That is why we are advertising this book to readers of "The Nation."

Clip

THE COUPON

Send No Money—No C.O.D.—Book Shipped

On Approval $2.00

To CONSOLIDATED BOOK PUBLISHERS, Inc.,
2242 Grove St., Chicago, Ill.

Please send me a copy of the book, "Old Sox on Trumpeting," by E. T. Gundlach, [illegible] pages, illustrations by Edwin [illegible], in boards on Big Business and Big Boosting.

If book is satisfactory in my judgment, I will send $2; otherwise I will return it in 10 days.

Name .....

Address .....

Offer by mail is [illegible], so kindly append name of your bookstore.

delaire's green hair. Unlike Professor Giese, Mr. Palache has nothing particularly to say about romanticism. His exposition of the romantic theory is a tame summary of the usual text-book generalizations. It is clear that his volume was written simply to serve as a convenient vehicle for a number of literary anecdotes. It is an occasionally amusing joke-book; but, in Mr. Saintsbury's phrase, its only unity was given it by the binder.

The Fall of Robespierre and Other Essays. By Albert Mathiez. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

Regardless of what may be said of Professor Mathiez's manner—a certain verbosity, a mixture of the trivial with the significant, a Latin penchant for controversy, an obvious partiality that sometimes lays him open to the charge of special pleading (though it would be hard to challenge his defiant claim never to have made any assertions without valid proof)—his work is the most important for the interpretation of the French Revolution that has been done since Aulard; in so far as it corrects many misinterpretations of the latter, it is indeed even more important than his. This is the first translation of any of the numerous writings of Professor Mathiez into English. The choice is not altogether a happy one, for Professor Mathiez has done much that is more important and better written. It is to be feared that the general reader, wearied by documents quoted in full and by details regarding minor characters of the revolution, will close the book in disgust before he finishes. If he perseveres, however, he will find two essays, at least, that will repay his efforts. The one on Robespierre and the Cult of the Supreme Being shows that Robespierre did not invent this deistic religion and then proceed to foist it upon an unwilling convention and republic, as is generally believed, but that it was an effort, demanded by the convention and supported by the people, to codify the conflicting religious laws and practices that had arisen since the Apostolic Church had been proscribed. The other, on Robespierre at the Commune on the 9th Thermidor, will show that Robespierre, instead of being the timid legalist hesitating to appeal to insurrectionary arms on the day of his outlawry and capture that all accounts have hitherto portrayed him, acted the part, at first, of an astute politician and then, having decided on action, of a vigorous popular leader.

Congaree Sketches. By E. C. L. Adams. University of North Carolina Press. $2.

With this volume the University of North Carolina Press makes another addition to its notable series of books dealing with the Negro. This time the volume pretends to be fiction, but there is little in Dr. Adams's work that suggests an artist consciously manipulating his material. The author appears to have effaced himself almost completely from his book; except in one brief passage the Negroes do all the talking, and it is talk unrestrained by the presence of a white man. Most of the fifty-four brief dialogues, folk tales, anecdotes, and verses are interesting, and a few—of which "Ole Man Tooga's Chile" is probably the best—have the concentration, simplicity, and savor of enduring literature.

Drama

The Curtain Rises

CURIOUSLY enough the theatrical business conducts itself without the slightest regard to the laws of the drama. Even though a season has its beginning and its end it never commences with anything likely to capture the attention of the spectator and never ends upon anything but a dying whimper. During the last days of August certain dismal farces begin to appear upon stages left dark by the lingering death of last winter's successes; and then, no matter to what heights the season may rise, it most undramatically peters out in the

The New School for Social Research
Fall Term
September 26 — December 23

Waldo Frank will give twelve lectures on Modern Art: Its Meanings and Its Direction
"The course will attempt reciprocally to interpret modern art in terms of life, and modern life in terms of the experience of art."
Tuesdays, 8:20 P. M.

Alfred Kreymborg
twelve lectures and recitations of Modern American Poetry
